Vers. 25, 26. The third part of the decree authorizes Ezra to set up judges experienced in the law for the entire Jewish people, and impose punishments for infractions of the law; this contains that very matter in which he is to afford the very help to the congregation upon which all now depended, a matter in which Artaxerxes in his good-will made an important step in advance beyond Cyrus and Darius. Since the civil and social life of Israel was so closely connected with their religion by the law, they could not well prosper under judges who had neither appreciation nor understanding of their religion. It might appear strange to us that nothing more is expressly said of the setting up of Jewish judges. But our book, which limits itself to the negative side of confirmation in the law, to the separation of the heathen women, was not the proper place for this. In the book of Nehemiah, which adds the positive side, since the congregation obligate themselves in chap. x. to keep all the important parts of the law, this is implicitly involved.

Ver. 25. And thou, Ezra, after the wisdom of thy God, etc.—בְּחֵכְלֵךְ as in verse 21, etc., "which thou possessest." מִנִּי is imper. Pa. "appoint," "set up," for מִנִּי, the less hard sound is more easily uttered, and occurs as a matter of course when it is followed by a second syllable ma or man.—Magistrates and judges, which may judge all the people that are beyond the river.—The imperf. לְהִי, with the part expresses continued action. The people to be judged are as a matter of course the Jewish people. Among them are not only those who know the law of God, but also others who yet for the first time must be instructed in it. We are not to think of the latter as proselytes, nevertheless it refers not only to the Jews of Palestine, but also to those dwelling widely scattered in the land to the West of the Euphrates. They are all to be subject to the judges set up by Ezra; the judges however are, according to the context, to watch over the observation of the Mosaic law, and maintain its authority. This is the foundation for the Jewish tradition of the institution of the great synagogue by Ezra.

Ver. 26. The object of this institution was that judgment might be diligently held over any one who did not keep the law of God and the king.—The law of the king can here be joined on to that of God, because so far as it required obedience to the law of God in the foregoing decree, it was transgressed by disobedience. Perhaps it had already been shown, likewise, that where obedience to the law of God ceased, usually also obedience to the royal command vanished. הִינֵנּוּ דִּינָה is in the Targ. not unusual for "hold judgment." מִנֵּה "out from him" = "over him." The point of beginning is here at the same time the point aimed at. The following הֵן—הֵן = sive—sive—whether it be unto death or to banishment, whether to confiscation of goods or to imprisonment.—שָׁרָשׁ an entirely Syriac form of שָׁרַשׁ, properly rooting out, is here in distinction from death, banishment, Vulg.: exilium, or at least excommunication (comp. x. 8) [Rawlinson], not paideia (Sept.). Respecting the punishment in נֶזֶק, treasure, property, as vi. 8, comp. x. 8.

Vers. 27, 28. A closing doxology. Ezra cannot but add to the foregoing decree—whose communication we are without doubt to ascribe to his hand—his praise for the grace of God, which had been so gloriously exhibited in putting this into the heart of the king to beautify the temple in Jerusalem.* בָּלַב as Neh. 12; vii. 15, yet likewise already in 1 Kings x. 24. מְבֹאֵת = the like, namely, as is indicated in the foregoing decree. We are to consider that the exaltation of the worship is likewise a glorification of the house of the Lord.

Ver. 28. And hath extended mercy unto me before the king.—This is the continuation of the relative clause in ver. 27. The לְ before מִלְּפָנֶיךָ puts this word on one and the same footing as the foregoing. Comp. the לְ before שָׁרַי in vi. 7; that is to say it represents here essentially the לְפָנֶיךָ, which is before הִמְלִיךְ. The clause: And I was strengthened, which leads over to the narrative, would say "I was able, would feel myself strong,—and I gathered together = so that I gathered together out of Israel chief men. These chief men were heads of households or families who, if they should be taken for the emigration to Judah, would naturally take their families with them.

* ["Here the decree of Artaxerxes was more favorable to the Jews than those of all previous Persian monarchs. We hear of a similar exemption of ecclesiastics from tribute, only to a less extent under the Seleucids. (Josephus' Ant. Jud. XII. 3, § 3)." Rawlinson in loco.—Ta.]

* ["This abrupt transition from the words of Artaxerxes to those of Ezra, may be compared with the almost equally abrupt change in vi. 6. The language alters at the same time from Chaldee to Hebrew, continuing henceforth to be Hebrew till the close of the book." Rawlinson in loco.—Ta.]

THOUGHTS UPON THE HISTORY OF REDEMPTION.

Vers. 1-10. (1) It seems that there were found among the Jews remaining behind in Babylon, even after Zerubbabel and Jeshua, at different times, such persons as were seized with a holy longing for the land of their fathers, especially for the temple of the Lord, with its lovely divine worship; who also, accordingly, went up thither not merely for a short time, but to remain forever, in order to become members of the congregation of Jerusalem, although many difficulties stood in the way of most of them, and it might be known to all what great deprivations, yea, evil circumstances, were to be endured in Judah. "Woe is me that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar." This was certainly in these times the sigh of many with the poet of the 120th Psalm; and "I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help" was their subsequent triumphal song with the author of Psalm cxxi. How much more then should Christians be inspired with a holy longing to become pilgrims on the way to heaven, and become members of the upper Jerusalem, seeing that in the city of God, that is above, among the many thousand angels and saints, every lack and every evil circumstance has vanished. Ezra and the others who went up to Jerusalem in order to be able to lift up their eyes to the heights of the earthly Zion, seem to us to be saints. That Christians should strive for the higher aim, that beckons them from heaven, is, after all, only natural, and so much the more are we obliged to charge ourselves with frivolity, if we lose sight of the aim and jewel of our heavenly calling—yea, are in a condition of entire forgetfulness of it.

(2) To reform the congregation when it has fallen away to the world is impossible without a faithfully preserved and unfalsified word of God, which is their heavenly archetype; or rather ever holds before them anew the eternal norm, according to which they are to be fashioned. Even in Jerusalem, even in the most immediate vicinity of the temple, the congregation, when they neglected and forgot the law of God, might fall into a condition in which a reformation was pressingly necessary. And even in the distance, even in Babylon, Ezra, because he was a true student of the Scripture, might be called to be the reformer.

Vers. 11-26. (1) The congregation in the Diaspora had, properly speaking, for the present the great task of awakening in the heathen world—even in heathen princes, in some way a presentiment that true knowledge of God and piety above all were with them, and thereby to beget in the deeper spirits a receptivity as well for the worship of the true God as for the observation of His law. The decree of Artaxerxes, the goodwill of the heathen king towards Jerusalem in general, might be an evidence of the important fact that the Diaspora actually fulfilled this allowed task. Thus there is involved therein the prophecy that they were to render this preparatory and mediatorial service for the first time to its proper extent in the Messianic times. This second edict of Artaxerxes was in distinction from the first (chap. iv.), at any rate, an evidence that he was only prejudiced against the supposed political efforts of the Jews, that he had no objection to their worship of the true God, to their existence as a religious congregation; that on the contrary it caused him joy if the worship of God in Jerusalem was promoted in a suitable manner.

(2) Notwithstanding the commands of Artaxerxes respecting what should be done for the improvement of the worship of Jerusalem were so minute, he did not allow himself in the least degree to prescribe that which concerned the internal affairs, which were regulated by the word of God. He exercised only the so-called jus circa sacra, and we find this in him, the heathen prince, from good motives. Manifestly, since there is no longer any theocracy, all princes likewise should be thus discreet. For the internal affairs there are higher laws and authorities, in which an earthly authority can never interfere without punishment.

Vers. 27-28. The Lord's praise expressed by Ezra is a thanksgiving that the Lord, by turning the heart of the king and his counsellors, had enabled him to make the journey to Jerusalem. We may, however, find still something more therein. After all he likewise expressed, if only mediately, his joy that the grace of God had succeeded in making such an impression upon the head of the world-monarchy at that time as the congregation, according to its highest task, was to make,—a joy which was well calculated to mark an era in the history of the congregation living in the Diaspora.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-10. God's care over His congregation.

1) He awakens teachers (if it be necessary, even reformers) and other persons of importance to the divine worship. He wins also the hearts of the rulers, upon whose good-will the success of the teacher is conditioned.—STARK: It is not enough to build houses and temples of stone, but we must have living instruments, that is, teachers and preachers. Preachers must first of all exhibit in their own life and consecration that which they preach to others of practical truth, as necessary and possible, 1 Cor. ix. 27; 1 Tim. iv. 12, 16.—No one should be presumptuous in any thing; he will then be sure of his calling, and it will give great comfort in all kinds of opposing circumstances.—Magistrates should also contribute their part to the building of churches and schools, and, above all, act with benevolence, because they can best do so; otherwise the heathen will put them to shame in that day. It is a sign of the great grace of God towards a people when He inclines the heart of their rulers to take suitable care that pious teachers be given to them. It is very easy for God to fill His people with blessings, for the earth is His, and the fulness thereof (Ps. xxiv. 1; 1 Chron. xxx. 12), and He has much more to give away than He has already given. 2) He protects and preserves His instruments in the way that they must go ere they can labor with the congregation. 3) He gives in their hearts the impulse and calling to do, as well as to teach His will.—The holy longing for Jerusalem: 1) it urges us out of Babylon to Jerusalem, and wins for us the hearts of such as will sustain us; 2) it provides us with fellow-pilgrims; 3) it causes the journey to succeed.

Vers. 11-26 are to be treated in essentially the same way as the decree of Darius in chap. vi.

Vers. 27-28. The best grounds for thanksgiving to God: 1) God has made the authorities of earth serviceable for the glorifying of His house and name; 2) He has placed His called ones in the position of being active in the enlargement and strengthening of His congregation.—STARKS: It is a noble gift of God, if we have a magistrate who is devoted to the true religion.—The servants of God, it is true, must submit to receive unthankfulness and disfavor for all of their faithfulness from mankind in general and great lords in particular; but if the contrary should be the case, they should recognize the fact with all the more thankfulness.

[HENRY: Moses in Egypt, Ezra in Babylon, and both in captivity, were wonderfully fitted for eminent service to the church.—Would we secure our peace and prosperity, let us take care that the cause of God be not starved.—If any good appear to be in our own hearts, or in the hearts of others, we must own it was God that put it there, and bless Him for it.—WORDSWORTH: Even Artaxerxes, a heathen king, is conscious and proclaims his persuasion, that the neglect of God and His service brings down God's anger on a nation.—TR.]

B.—EZRA'S OWN DOCUMENTARY REPORT.

CHAP. VIII. 1-36.

I. Respecting his Companions. Vers. 1-14.

1 THESE are now the chief of their fathers, and this is the genealogy of them that 2 went up with me from Babylon, in the reign of Artaxerxes the king. Of the sons of Phinehas; Gershom: of the sons of Ithamar; Daniel: of the sons of David; Hat-3 tush. Of the sons of Shechaniah, of the sons of Pharosh; Zechariah: and with him
4 were reckoned by genealogy of the males a hundred and fifty. Of the sons of Pa-5 hath-moab; Elihoenai the son of Zerariah, and with him two hundred males. Of the sons of Shechaniah; the son of Jahaziel, and with him three hundred males.
6 Of the sons also of Adin; Ebed the son of Jonathan, and with him fifty males.
7 And of the sons of Elam; Jeshaiiah the son of Athaliah, and with him seventy 8 males. And of the sons of Shephatiah: Zebadiah the son of Michael, and with 9 him fourscore males. Of the sons of Joab; Obadiah the son of Jehiel, and with him
10 two hundred and eighteen males. And of the sons of Shelomith; the son of Josi-
11 phiah, and with him a hundred and threescore males. And of the sons of Bebai; 12 Zechariah the son of Bebai, and with him twenty and eight males. And of the sons of Azgad: Johanan the son of Hakkatan, and with him a hundred and ten 13 males. And of the last sons of Adonikam, whose names are these, Eliphelet, Jeiel, 14 and Shemaiah, and with them threescore males. Of the sons also of Bigvai; Uthai, and Zabbud, and with them seventy males.

II. Respecting a Rendering of this Band Complete. Vers. 15-20.

15 And I gathered them together to the river that runneth to Ahava; and there abode we in tents three days: and I viewed the people, and the priests, and found 16 there none of the sons of Levi. Then sent I for Eliezer, for Ariel, for Shemaiah, and for Elnathan, and for Jarib, and for Elnathan, and for Nathan, and for Zecha-17 riah, and for Meshullam, chief men; also for Joiarib, and for Elnathan, men of understanding. And I sent them with commandment unto Iddo the chief at the place Casiphia, and I told them what they should say unto Iddo, and to his brethren the Nethinim, at the place Casiphia, that they should bring unto us ministers for 18 the house of our God. And by the good hand of our God upon us they brought us a man of understanding, of the sons of Mahli, the son of Levi, the son of Israel; 19 and Sherebiah, with his sons and his brethren, eighteen; And Hashabiah, and with 20 him Jeshaiab of the sons of Merari, his brethren and their sons, twenty; Also of the Nethinim, whom David and the princes had appointed for the service of the Levites, two hundred and twenty Nethinim: all of them were expressed by name.

III. Respecting the Preparation for the Journey, the Journey and Arrival in Jerusalem. Vers. 21-36.

21 Then I proclaimed a fast there, at the river of Ahava, that we might afflict ourselves before our God, to seek of him a right way for us, and for our little ones, 22 and for all our substance. For I was ashamed to require of the king a band of soldiers and horsemen to help us against the enemy in the way: because we had spoken unto the king, saying, The hand of our God is upon all them for good that 23 seek him; but his power and his wrath is against all them that forsake him. So we 24 fasted and besought our God for this: and he was entreated of us. Then I separated twelve of the chief of the priests, Sherebiah, Hashabiah, and ten of their 25 brethren with them, And weighed unto them the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, even the offering of the house of our God, which the king, and his counsellors,
26 and his lords, and all Israel there present, had offered: I even weighed unto their hand six hundred and fifty talents of silver, and silver vessels a hundred talents,
27 and of gold a hundred talents; Also twenty basins of gold, of a thousand drams;
28 and two vessels of fine copper, precious as gold. And I said unto them, Ye are holy unto the LORD; the vessels are holy also; and the silver and the gold are a 29 freewill offering unto the LORD God of your fathers. Watch ye, and keep them, until ye weigh them before the chief of the priests and the Levites, and chief of the 30 fathers of Israel, at Jerusalem, in the chambers of the house of the LORD. So took the priests and the Levites the weight of the silver, and the gold, and the vessels, 31 to bring them to Jerusalem unto the house of our God. Then we departed from the river of Ahava on the twelfth day of the first month, to go unto Jerusalem: and the hand of our God was upon us, and he delivered us from the hand of the enemy,
32 and of such as lay in wait by the way. And we came to Jerusalem, and abode
33 there three days. Now on the fourth day was the silver and the gold and the vessels weighed in the house of our God by the hand of Meremoth the son of Uriah the priest; and with him was Eleazar the son of Phinehas; and with them was Joza-34 bad the son of Jeshua, and Noadiah the son of Binnui, Levites; By number and
35 by weight of every one: and all the weight was written at that time. Also the children of those that had been carried away, which were come out of the captivity, offered burnt-offerings unto the God of Israel, twelve bullocks for all Israel, ninety and six rams, seventy and seven lambs, twelve he goats for a sin-offering; all this 36 was a burnt-offering unto the LORD. And they delivered the king's commissions unto the king's lieutenants, and to the governors on this side the river: and they furthered the people, and the house of God.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-14. The register of those heads of families who went up to Jerusalem with Ezra is here inserted as a second important document. It originated from Ezra himself, as the use of the first person in ver. 1 shows; it is the foundation on which his narrative of his journey and activity in Jerusalem rests. It is distinguished from the register in chap. ii. by giving not only the names of the families to which those returning belonged, but also the heads themselves of those households who returned. It is as if they became gradually more and more conscious that the existence of the Jewish congregation no longer depended upon nationality, but the free resolution of individuals, that the individual accordingly, that especially the deciding heads of households had an entirely different significance from ever before, and that this their significance might be exhibited by their express mention by name in the sacred history. That the names of families here almost exclusively, yea, if we accept the very natural emendation in vers. 8, 5, 10, are without exception the same as those that occurred already in chap. ii., is explained simply from the fact that of the families which returned with Zerubbabel, households had still remained behind in Babylon, which now with Ezra followed their relatives; and that this very relationship might have been decisive for the resolution to go up with Ezra. It is worthy of note that in this emigration just twelve families were represented. In connection with the importance then ascribed to the number twelve (comp. chap. ii. 1 sq.; vi. 17; viii. 35) Bertheau finds it probable that Ezra's company was to be a representation of the congregation of Israel in its totality. —In Esdra's viii. 28-40 are found some other deviations, which now perhaps are worthy of consideration. As regards the sum total of those who returned with Ezra, it amounted to one thousand four hundred and ninety-six men and fifteen heads according to the Massoretic text; but according to Esdras one thousand six hundred and ninety men and thirteen heads without counting the priests and sons of David, whose number is not given, and in comparison with the number of the rest was perhaps but small, since Zerubbabel had already led back with him a relatively large number of priests and sons of David. In the numerical signs corruption might easily creep in, and we must leave it undecided, which statements are more correct.

Ver. 1. These are now the heads of their fathers, and this is the genealogy of them that went up.—רָאשֵׁי אֲבוֹתָהֶם = רָאשֵׁי בֵּית אֲבוֹתָהֶם, not only here but usually, house of their fathers—their household. The head of the house of their father—the head of the household. In a household, however, the sons are often again fathers, without their forming on this account households of their own. Thus often many fathers belong to the household, and under a common head of the household. Thus the head of the father's houses can easily be head of fathers. The suffix of אֲבוֹתָהֶם refers without doubt to the totality, that is, to the children of Israel. הַרְחִיץ is first "record itself;" then the "register of families" is, however, sometimes used for the family itself. It is here added, because the name of the heads of households is to be followed by the name of the family to which they belonged.

Ver. 2. Here are first mentioned two heads of households of two priestly families; of the family of Phineas, who was a son of Eleazar, thus a grandson of Aaron, Gerson; and of the family of Ithamar, who was Aaron's younger son (comp. 1 Chron. xxx. and xxix.), Daniel; whether the latter is identical with the one mentioned in Neh. x. 7 is uncertain. Both are to be regarded as accompanied by their households; for in ver. 24 Ezra is able to select from the priests who went up with him, twelve to take care of the presents. Then follows a head of a household of the family of David, without doubt the king David, namely, Hattush, possibly to be identified with Hattush, the son of Hashaniah (Neh. iii. 10), but to be distinguished from the priest Hattush, Neh. x. 5; xii. 2. It is questionable, however, whether he is not more closely defined by the first words of ver. 8.

Ver. 8. Of the sons of Shechaniah, of the sons of Pharosh.—The twice-repeated כִּנְיָ following one another and unconnected is striking. The Sept. has supplied an "and" before the second, so that it designates at once two families as such to which the head of household next following belongs. But this is certainly only to improve the text which was at that time just the same as ours. Esdras, on the other hand, has Ἀδούβς τοῦ Σεχενίου, since it renders the מְרִיבֵשׁ of ver. 2 by Ἀδούβς, attached שְׁכַנְיָ of verse 8 as a much closer definition, and besides read the singular לְאֶחָד for כִּנְיָ. It is very probable that there has been a corruption of the text in this passage, and the conjecture that Esdras makes recommends itself all the more that מְרִיבֵשׁ in 1 Chron. iii. 22 is adduced as a son of Shemiaiah, and therewith also is a grandson of Shechaniah [so Rawlinson.—Tr.] Accordingly we have left in ver. 8 only the family of Pharosh, as such, to which Zechariah with his household belonged. The next clause we may translate: And with him belonged genealogically one hundred and fifty men, since הַרְחִיץ is taken as preterit, and the singular is explained from the fact that it precedes the verb. הַרְחִיץ might, however, be a noun, so that the sense would be: and with a family, לְאֶחָד = of men.

Ver. 5. Of the sons of Shechaniah the son of Jahaziel.—It is singular that the son of Jahaziel is not mentioned by name. The Sept. has ἀπὸ τῶν υἱῶν Σαδόνης Σεχενίας υἱὸς Ἀζήλ, and Esdras viii. 32 essentially the same. Σαδόνης seems to be the same as מִיָּאָה, Ezra ii. 8. Thus the Sept. and Esdras seem to have read מִיָּאָהוּת, so that it is to be translated: of the children of Zattu, Shechaniah, the son of Jahaziel [so Rawlinson.—Tr.]

Ver. 9. Here the sons of Joab are treated as a particular family, whilst in chap. ii. 6 they are counted with the sons of Jeshua as of the family of Pahath-Moab. Probably only a few of them belonged to those who returned under Zerubbabel, so that they were then not counted with that family with which they were nearest related, although the number of the children of Pahath-Moab, in consequence of this, became rather large.

Ver. 10. Here the Masoretic text has: of the sons of Shelomith the son of Josiphiah.—It is the same as in ver. 5, according to the Sept. and Esdras, and we are to read: Of the sons of Bani (comp. Ezra ii. 10) Shelomith, the son of Josiphiah [so Rawlinson.—Tr.].

Ver. 13. And of the last sons of Adonikam, whose names are these, Eliphelet, etc.—It is strange that a common head of a household should be mentioned first. Keil supposes that the sons of Adonikam, here referred to, because they did not constitute a proper father's house, are embraced together with the sons of Adonikam, who returned under Zerubbabel, and distinguished from the latter as אֲחֵרִים. But all the new comers here mentioned would have united with their fellow-members of the same families who already dwelt in Judah from the time of Zerubbabel. Besides the reference to those who previously returned is so entirely without support that אֲחֵרִים cannot well be explained from it. Perhaps the meaning is: not a first-born of the first line, who as such would have been head of the father's house, but only a later born, none of whom had the dignity of a head of a father's house, but only that of subordinate heads of families. Accordingly only lesser divisions of that father's house went up with Ezra. Thus would אֲחֵרִים be explained from the same circumstance from which the name of a common head of a household fails. It is true we must then suppose that אֲחֵרָנִים had gained such a general sense in itself that it had become a technical term for those later born.

Ver. 14. Instead of one head of the sons of Bigvai, two are mentioned, Uthai and Zabud, yet not as later born sons, but as it seems as real heads of father's houses. The author of Esdras viii. 40 has οὐδὶ δ τοῦ Ἰσραηλίου, so that it might be asked, whether the two names are not to be reduced to one.

Vers. 15-20. Above all Ezra was anxious to gain for the emigration some persons capable of ministering in the worship. Ver. 15 is probably to be translated: I gathered them together to the river, that runneth to Ahava, not that floweth into the Ahava. Ahava is probably the name of a place or region, after which the river there flowing was named; in ver. 21 it occurs briefly as אֲחָוָה, and in ver. 31 נָהָר אֲחָוָה, which is either: the river of Ahava; or also after the analogy of the נָהָר פָּרָה, the river Ahava. Where we are to seek the river and region is not known; probably, however, in the vicinity of Babylon; probably it is a tributary or canal of the Euphrates, according to Ewald, Gesch. IV., 8, 154, perhaps the Pallacopas, in favor of which is certainly the name (פָּלָא אֲחָוָה), and indeed the more northern, which lay more in a direction towards Canaan.*—And I viewed the people.—Respecting the lengthened form by the addition of the ה, אֲחֵרָנִים here and אֲשֶׁרֶתָּה in ver. 13, comp. Ewald, § 232, g [Green, § 99, 8.—Tr.].

Ver. 16. The Sept. translates: And I sent to or for Elieser, etc. [so A. V.]. This might mean in connection with ver. 17: I sent thither in order to have him come and use him as a messenger to Iddo. We may, however, take the ל in this later usage of the language with the Vulg. and many interpreters without hesitation, as nota accus., according to 2 Chron. xvii. 7, where it is used in this very way with שָׁלַח, thus: I sent Elieser, etc. The first named messengers were רָאשִׁים, probably heads of little communities; the remaining two סִבְיָנִים, that is, teachers, Neh. viii. 7, 9; 1 Chron. xv. 22; xxviii. 8, etc. Keil takes it in a more general sense, judicious, prudent; but this is opposed by its connection with רָאשִׁים and the circumstance that Ezra would have sent men who could make an impression in accordance with their entire position. According to ver. 15 these men did not belong to the Levites, who usually carried on the office of instruction, comp. 1 Chron. xv. 22; xxviii. 8, etc. But scholarship in the Scriptures might have gradually become more widely diffused, especially in Babylon. It is possible, also, that they were priests. In chap. x. 15, 18-31, many of the names here mentioned recur again; but probably different persons were meant there.

Ver. 17. And I sent them with commandment; thus the Qeri. According to the Kethib, whether now the ל in אֲחֵרָנִים be genuine, or first added by the Masoretes, it is to be understood: I had them go forth, אֶל-עֲרֵי הָרָאשׁ, unto Iddo. אֶל, according to later usage is for אֶל־. What kind of a head or chief Iddo was, what society he was of, whether merely religious, or also learned, why Ezra did not above all seek to influence Iddo himself to the return to Palestine: all this we must leave undetermined.—At the place Casiphia.—We know not, as a matter of course, how we are to take the clause בְּכַכְפִּיָּא חַפְסִים. The Sept. and Esdras have not regarded כַּכְפִּיָּא as a proper name. The former has ἐν ἀργυρίῳ τοῦ τόπου, and the latter makes Iddo the head of the treasury without doubt in Babylon. It is probable, if it be a place, it is one in the vicinity of Babylon and Ahava.—To his brethren, etc.—אֲחָיו הַנֶּתְחִינִים, which thus gives no sense, should probably be: to his brothers (the Levites) and to the Nethinim, namely, besides to himself, I ordered them to go; not to his brothers, the Nethinim [as A. V.]; for that Iddo himself was one of the Nethinim is improbable from his honorable position; that they, moreover, should be designated as his brethren without any natural relationship would be against all analogy.—To bring us ministers for the house of our God.—Those are especially meant who, when they had performed the service in the house of God at the feasts, should be able besides to instruct the people in the law.

Ver. 18. And they brought us.—וַיָּבִיאוּ is written with dagesh in א as Gen. xliii. 26, as also וַיָּבִיאוּ, Lev. xxiii. 17, as then הָהָרָה וְעַל sometimes occur with dagesh, "quorum omnium ratio nota est in Arcanis Cabbale," R. Mose bar Nachman in Comm. upon Jezir fol. 61.—Under the gracious help of God (יְיָ, as vii. 6), and through the influence of Iddo, they gained forty Levites and two hundred and twenty Nethinim. First of all the אִישׁ שָׂכָל (that this is a proper name is shown by the י before the following names), a descendant of Mahli, the grandson of Levi (Ex. vi. 16, 19; 1 Chron. vi. 4), then Sherebiah, who again occurs in ver. 24 and Neh. viii. 7; ix. 4; also x. 13; xii. 24; then in ver. 19 Hashabiah, who likewise is again mentioned in ver. 24; Neh. x. 12; xii. 24, and finally Jeshaiiah, who does not again meet us in Ezra or Neh.; in ver. 20 the Nethinim, who had been appointed already by Jeshua (comp. note on ii. 48 sq.), then more definitely as it is here alone mentioned, by David and the princes, that is, the high officials, to perform the heavier work for the Levites. The last words of ver. 20 mean* according to 1 Chron. xii. 81; they were all expressed by name (particularly), namely, for the going up with Ezra.

Vers. 21-30. The final preparation for the departure; at first the arrangement of the feast. The fasting had the purpose of imploring from God a way straight or level, free from hindrance, thus a prosperous journey. As an evidence of a penitent self-humiliation, it contributed to gain the favor of Him who, since He is throned on high, can only dwell among the lowly (Is. lvii. 15), so already Judges xi. 26; 1 Sam. vii. 6; Joel i. 14; 1 Chron. xx. 8.

Ver. 22. To implore the help of God, had a special impulse in the circumstance that Ezra and his companions had expressed a trust in God before Artaxerxes which they would not have confirmed if they had not especially relied upon God; if they had been willing to claim earthly means of protection. To show this trust in God was certainly important, because Artaxerxes' respect for the Jewish religion might be best strengthened in this very way. They acknowledged that the hand of our God is upon all them for good that seek Him; but His power and wrath is against all them that forsake Him.—We might expect the words: for evil; but His strength and His wrath=His power of opposing, is sufficiently clear; it is as if the previous clause were: His goodness and favor are over, etc.; so that the words "for good" might have been left out.

Ver. 23. We fasted and besought our God.—This should be followed by וְאָמַר, and not עָל־זֹאת. עָל־זֹאת seems to refer back to ver. 22 in the sense of therefore. Yet it is at least questionable whether it may not after the verb of asking, likewise introduce the object, comp. עָל־זֹאת with הִתְפַּלֵּל (Ps. xxxii. 6), and indeed notwithstanding the כִּן before אֱלֹהֵינוּ.—And He let Himself be entreated for us.—This is at once manifest in the successful progress of the journey.

Ver. 24 sq. The appointment of guardians of the treasures.—And I separated twelve of the princes of the priests.—Instead of לְ before שְׂרָבְיָה, we are to read וְ with Esdras viii. 54; for Sherebiah, etc., did not belong to the priests, but to the Levites. In addition, therefore, to the twelve princes of the priests, there were accordingly twelve Levites, as those to whom Ezra weighed the treasure and gave it in charge.

Ver. 25. And I weighed, etc.—וַאֲשָׁקֹלָהּ is written with וְ after פ because the Sheva of פ was meant to be heard, and indeed as Chateph Kamets, and it is probable that this form is to have the same vocalization in the next verse, as then J. H. Mich. found it to be so in many MSS. The other view that it was to be spoken with Chateph Patach was held because the וְ was lacking after פ, as likewise in Jer. xxxii. 9. The silver and gold were a heave-offering, תְּרוּמָה, that is, a present to the house of God, that the king and his counsellors had set apart, comp. vii. 15, 16, 19. תְּרוּמָה in connection with תְּרוּמָה means: to take off from the other possessions something, in order to consecrate it to God. The article before תְּרוּמָה represents the relative pronoun as 1 Chron. xxvii. 28; xxix. 17; 2 Chron. xxix. 86, etc.; comp. Ew. 381, b.—הַנִּמְצָאִים (with kamets under נ instead of sheva on account of pause, comp. Esther i. 5). These are those who were happened upon or met.

Vers. 26, 27. What Ezra weighed, עָל־יָדָם, in their hands, as i. 8. With respect to the talents comp. vii. 22; the darics, ii. 69; the covered cups, i. 10. Finally there were two copper vessels of excellent polish. קִדְרֵךְ cannot very well be part. Hophal; in connection with נִחְשֶׁת, it would just as well as the following נִזְכָּר have the fem. form. It seems to be a noun formed like כְּוִיָּץ, כִּינֹר, קִטְרֹה (Is. viii. 8, 23) with the meaning of polish. קִדְרֵךְ occurs Lev. xiii. 80, 82 of bleached hair, become somewhat fox-like by leprosy; the root, קָדַר, is, however, certainly connected with קָדַר, Arab. sahaba, and the other roots in קָדַר and קָדַר, whose meaning extends to: to be bright. הַמְדִּירוֹת is properly a noun=lovelinesses, comp. חֲמִדּוֹת, 2 Chron. xx. 25.

Ver. 28. The sacredness of the guardians as such, especially of the treasures entrusted to them as a heave-offering to the Lord is emphasized by Ezra, in order to make them right watchful with reference to them until they shall have delivered them up.

Ver. 29. הַלְשָׁכוֹת is acc. of direction, but not stat. constr. as the article shows. The לְשָׁכוֹת are, because almost exclusively the temple-chambers, sufficiently definite of themselves. יְהִיָּה is in apposition with the foregoing.

Vers. 31-36. The journey and arrival in Jerusalem.—Ver. 31. They began their journey from the river Ahava on the twelfth day of the first month. The interval from the first had been occupied by that which is narrated in vers. 16-20. The statement in ver. 15 that they had encamped only three days on the river of Ahava is probably not to be understood as if they after three days had again broken up (Berth.), but indicates either the point of time when that which is mentioned in ver. 15 sq. occurred (comp. v. 32), namely, when Ezra observed the lack of Levites (Keil); or it means to say that after three days they had gone somewhat further on their way, but without leaving the river Ahava, towards a region where they could unite with those coming from Casiphiah, from thence then entering upon their journey proper.

Ver. 32. When then they had come to Jerusalem, according to chap. vii. 9, on the first day of the fifth month, then after a lapse of three and a half months, they remained there three days, that is, rested, until they understood something further, just as Nehemiah in chap. ii.

* [Rawlinson in loc.: "The writer seems to mean that he had before him a list of the two hundred and twenty, though he did not think it necessary that he should insert it."—Tr.]

11, whilst without doubt they already made preparation for the delivery of the treasures.

Ver. 33. Now on the fourth day they weighed out the treasures in the hand (ver. 26) of the priest Meremoth ben Uriah, whom we find again Neh. iii. 4, 21, and probably also Neh. xii. 8, and Eleazar ben Phinehas, who is not further mentioned, and two Levites, Jozabad ben Jeshua, who may be identical with the one mentioned in chap. x. 23, and Noadiah ben Binnui, whose family is mentioned likewise in Neh. x. 10; xii. 8.

Ver. 34. By number and weight of every one, that is, as it was for each and every number and weight. The weight was written then at that time, as Neh. iv. 16, in a public document, so that the correct preservation might be confirmed.

Ver. 35. In order now to secure for themselves a good reception with the Lord, they offered above all burnt-offerings, whereby they rendered homage to Him, dedicated themselves to Him (comp. notes upon iii. 8), and indeed for all Israel, in their name and as their representatives, conscious indeed that they had value before God only as a part of this whole, or rather as in union with entire Israel. They offered twelve bullocks (comp. vi. 17), besides ninety-six rams (ninety-six as intensification of twelve) and seventy-seven lambs (seventy-seven as intensification of seven, the number seven expressing the covenant-relation), as a foundation of the burnt-offering, however, twelve he-goats for a sin-offering, because only the reconciled can do homage to the Lord in a proper manner and worthily dedicate themselves to Him.

Ver. 36. In order now to put themselves in a good relation with the satraps and governor in Abar-Nahara, they delivered to them the decree of the king. The satraps, אַחֲשֵׁרֶפֶט, Persian (according to the inscription of Behistun), khsatrapava, from khsatrapavan, from which the noun in the Hebrew expression of the word is explained, prop. = ladd-protector* (comp. Esth. iii. 12; viii. 9; Dan. iii. 2), come into consideration as military officers, alongside of the governors, חֲמוּנֵי, as the presidents of the civil government.—And they furthered, etc.—These closing words are certainly to be referred to those Persian magnates, to whom indeed this supporting was commanded by the royal edict, vii. 20–24. וְעָלָה as i. 4. The Perfect וְעָלָה with ! simply continues the narrative as וְעָלָה in ver. 30.

THOUGHTS UPON THE HISTORY OF REDEMPTION.

Vers. 1–14. So long as God was obliged to dwell in a particular temple, in the midst of His congregation, yet separated from them, mediatorial persons were still necessary, namely, priests, and a worship of sacrifices; Jerusalem must still remain the proper place of worship, and Judah be the holy land as no other land could be. And the congregation in the dispersion must regard it as their sacred duty, over and over again to put themselves in relation to the temple and Jerusalem, and send thither whole bands, in whom the longing for the land of their fathers awoke, to the enlargement of the principal congregation, or yet at least little embassies (comp. Zech. vi. 9), to enliven the communion with it, so likewise to take part, when opportunity offered, either in person, or at least through representatives, in the offering of sacrifice in the legitimate place of sacrifices. This common relation to the one centre and hearthstone of their religious life, constituted a bond, which held the people together in spite of every scattering and spreading out, yes, cultivated the feeling of a grand unity; and even if this bond was only an external one, it yet was all the more important, the weaker the internal bond was in the times of the law and the letter of the law. Christendom is united by the internal bond of one common faith and the most comprehensive love. Would then that this may never prove internally weaker! Would that in spite of all distances and separations, all might remain ever truly and vitally conscious of this, that they may constitute more than the people of the old covenant one only great union the body of the Lord! What can be more exalting and strengthening than this consciousness that we do not stand alone, do not struggle alone, do not suffer alone, do not rejoice alone, but that the Lord has in every land a people, a great and united people?

Vers. 15–20. The relation to the God of Revelation who would be conceived, not according to common notions or ideas, but according to His historical manifestation of Himself, and on the ground of the acts of redemption wrought by Him, would be honored according to the regulations given by Himself,—begets by internal necessity the need of instruction and training. It cannot be maintained in any other way than by the parents' making known to their children, and the learned to the unlearned, the Providences and Histories through which the true God has come near to the understanding, and that trained and suitable persons should cultivate the divine service in a proper manner. The idea, that religious knowledge, so far as it is necessary or desirable, makes its appearance in every man of itself, has no place except in the sphere of natural religion, and is disconnected, if it has become more general in our day, with a falling away from the religion of revelation to the religion of nature. It thus had its good ground that Ezra would not go up to Jerusalem and enter upon the work of elevation of the congregation at that place, without having gained above all a sufficient number of persons for his emigration, who might stand at his side, as instructors and helpers in the worship of God. And for those who would cherish the true religion, it should ever be a chief care to attract suitable teachers and ministers to the church, whilst now, sad to see, it seems as if it were thought that, at any rate, they could be dispensed with.

Vers. 21-30. Already in Is. lii. 11 the encouragement: depart, depart, go ye out from thence, is connected with the admonition, be ye clean, ye that bear the vessels of the Lord. Ezra might even, without this, have felt himself called upon to prepare himself and those who accompanied him by fasting; that is, by self-humiliation, for the journey to Jerusalem. But since he carried with him vessels and treasure designed for the house of the Lord, and in so far sacred; in other words, since his journey ministered not to ordinary, but sacred purposes, by which properly all who took part received a higher significance, purification and sanctification by true and genuine fasting, were an especially indispensable prerequisite. No one can essentially further the cause and honor of God in a free and conscious manner without previously doing what fasting signifies—namely, chastising, yea, overcoming his soul—that is, his old man. He who has accomplished this will then have a keener feeling also for the particular obligation imposed upon him by his calling or his task, especially for the sacred duty conscientiously to watch that that which has been intrusted to us of blessings or gifts shall be truly serviceable for the higher ends for which they were given to us. He will understand the connection between the two when Ezra says: at first, be ye holy to the Lord, and the vessels are holy,—so watch and take care, etc.

Vers. 31-36. Men like Ezra, who know that they are instruments in the hand of the Lord, and indeed for the accomplishment of a high mission, may reckon with the confidence of heroes on especial divine protection and support in the midst of all the dangers threatening them: "And although all the devils would withstand us," etc. What, however, is secured to them in this respect by God cannot be for them a motive for giving themselves over to a false security, but only become an impulse for them to make use of all that is entrusted to them, with all the more conscientiousness for the accomplishment of its purposes. At the same time they would be very careful, like Ezra, when he ordered the weight of the gifts brought by him to be written down, of securing their good name against any wicked slanders that so easily are raised against them. That the returned exiles so soon offered sacrifice to the Lord, and indeed burnt-offerings, with the sin-offerings belonging to them, expresses, moreover, the knowledge that the mere offering of external gifts, however great they might be, amounted to nothing; that an internal gift, namely, that of the heart, by internal worship, must be added, yea, that it alone, if it be of the true kind, gives worth to all the rest.

When the returned exiles laid claim to protection and support on the part of the magistracy through the handing over the decree of the king to his officers, they subordinated themselves to them thereby at the same time. As they thus through their sacrifice gave to God what belonged to God, so through the decree of Artaxerxes they gave to the state what the state might expect.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 15-20. The importance of teachers and other officials in the congregation. 1) Ezra, although there were priests enough in Jerusalem, felt the absence of Levites and other persons of lower rank, who there might care for the divine service, and also instruct the people. 2) He seeks to procure them before he undertakes anything further. 3) He gains them through the experienced help of God.—STARKS: That Ezra seeks to supply the lack of Levites, and sends so far for them, shows his zeal for the house of God, and indicates how much we should make of wise ministers of God, should it ever be necessary to bring them from afar. We need also frequently such persons as may fill the lower offices more pressingly than others who sit in exalted stations; and we must have more village-pastors than doctors of theology and superintendents. He who is of a sincere and unenvious disposition in the ministerial office will not always be alone, but can very well endure, yea, desires and assists, that more laborers and colleagues may be procured alongside of him, Num. xi. 29; Matt. ix. 37.

Vers. 21-30. Respecting the true preparation for the most important journey. 1) By fasting or overcoming one's self; 2) By watchfulness with respect to the blessings and gifts that serve to glorify the divine name; 3) By conscientious execution of the higher duties.—STARKS: Although Christians are not bound to any particular time of fasting, yet they should ever lead a temperate and moderate life, in order that they may be the more qualified for prayer, 1 Peter iv. 8.—Observe this, ye travellers: Divine protection sought by humble prayer is your safest escort.—God is the best guide (Ps. xci. 11); though we walk in the dark valley, we need not fear, Ps. xxiii. 4. If after the offering of prayer our enterprise goes successfully on, we ought not to think that it has been without dangers, but confidently believe that our prayer has been heard.

Vers. 31-36. The pilgrims to Zion. 1) Their journey (is towards Jerusalem under God's especial protection); 2) their blessings and gifts (belong to the house and congregation of the Lord); 3) their aim (to offer to the Lord, and indeed, above all themselves, recognizing the authorities of the world). BRENTIUS: Sunt autem (Christiani), sanctificari in baptismo per fidem in Christum. Unde portare debent sancta vasa, quæ sunt sancta opera. Credere in Christum, sanctum opus est.

[HENRY: All our concerns about ourselves, our families, our estates, 'tis our Wisdom and Duty by Prayer to commit them to God and leave the care of them with Him. Our prayers must always be seconded with endeavors.—'Tis a great ease to one's mind to be discharged from a trust; and a great honor to one's name to be able to make it appear that it hath been faithfully discharged.—WORDSWORTH: It appears from the narrative that Ezra's God was good, his treasurers faithful, and his companions devout; and that the royal governors furthered his work. Such were the salutary effects of prayer and fasting.—TR.]

SECOND SECTION.

The Chief Fault of the Time and its Removal.

CHAPS. IX.—X.

A.—THE CHIEF FAULT OF THE TIME AND EZRA'S PENITENTIAL PRAYER.

CHAP. IX. 1-15.

I. The Chief Fault of the Time, and Ezra's Sorrow for It. Vers. 1-4.

- 1 Now when these things were done, the princes came to me, saying, The people of Israel, and the priests, and the Levites, have not separated themselves from the people of the lands, doing according to their abominations, even of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Jebusites, the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Egyptians, and the Amorites. For they have taken of their daughters for themselves, and for their sons: so that the holy seed have mingled themselves with the people of those lands: yea, the hand of the princes and rulers hath been chief in this trespass. And when I heard this thing, I rent my garment and my mantle, and
- 2 plucked off the hair of my head and of my beard, and sat down astonished. Then were assembled unto me every one that trembled at the words of the God of Israel, because of the transgression of those that had been carried away: and I sat astonished until the evening sacrifice.

II. Ezra's Penitential Prayer. Vers. 5-15.

- 5 And at the evening sacrifice I arose up from my heaviness; and having rent my garment and my mantle, I fell upon my knees, and spread out my hands unto the
- 6 LORD my God, And said, O my God, I am ashamed and blush to lift up my face to thee, my God: for our iniquities are increased over our head, and our trespass is
- 7 grown up unto the heavens. Since the days of our fathers have we been in a great trespass unto this day; and for our iniquities have we, our kings, and our priests, been delivered into the hand of the kings of the lands, to the sword, to captivity,
- 8 and to a spoil, and to confusion of face, as it is this day. And now for a little space grace hath been shewed from the LORD our God, to leave us a remnant to escape, and to give us a nail in his holy place, that our God may lighten our eyes, and give
- 9 us a little reviving in our bondage. For we were bondmen; yet our God hath not forsaken us in our bondage, but hath extended mercy unto us in the sight of the kings of Persia, to give us a reviving, to set up the house of our God, and to repair
- 10 the desolations thereof, and to give us a wall in Judah and in Jerusalem. And now, O our God, what shall we say after this? for we have forsaken thy command-
- 11 ments, Which thou hast commanded by thy servants the prophets, saying, The land, unto which ye go to possess it, is an unclean land with the filthiness of the people of the lands, with their abominations, which have filled it from one end to another
- 12 with their uncleanness. Now therefore give not your daughters unto their sons, neither take their daughters unto your sons, nor seek their peace or their wealth for ever: that ye may be strong, and eat the good of the land, and leave it for an
- 13 inheritance to your children for ever. And after all that is come to pass upon us for our evil deeds, and for our great trespass, seeing that thou our God hast punished us less than our iniquities deserve, and hast given us such deliverance as this;
- 14 Should we again break thy commandments, and join in affinity with the people of these abominations? wouldest not thou be angry with us till thou hadst consumed
- 15 us, so that there should be no remnant nor escaping? O LORD God of Israel, thou art righteous; for we remain yet escaped, as it is this day: behold, we are before thee in our trespasses; for we cannot stand before thee because of this.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-4. To a positive strengthening of the life in accordance with the law belonged without doubt a long preparatory activity on the part of Ezra. It could not be accomplished by merely external arrangements or contrivances. Rather it was necessary that Ezra should bring about an internal change, excite a holy zeal for the law, as we see it break forth in fact at a later period (Neh. viii.—x.), and thus above all deepen and render more general the knowledge of the law. But already, at the outset, he had to undertake a negative improvement, the removal of a bad state of affairs that threatened their future. It was again the question as previously in the time of Zerubbabel, respecting their relation to the heathen, which was involved in their present political relations, especially their union with heathen under the same government. If, however, the problem in the time of Zerubbabel had been merely to ward off those who would unite with the congregation on the plea of a common worship of Jehovah, now the question was with reference to the exclusion of those with whom union had been established, notwithstanding difference of religion.

Ver. 1. And after the completion of these things, etc.—לְכֹל is infin. nomin. = completion. מְלִיךָ is neuter, referring to the things mentioned in chap. viii. 83-86. This statement of time is somewhat indefinite—yet we are not to suppose that the length of time of the things here narrated was very long after chap. viii. The delivery of the gifts brought with them occurred on the fourth day after Ezra's arrival; thus, on the fourth or fifth day of the fifth month (comp. chap. viii. 82 and chap. vii. 9); the bringing of the offerings, moreover, chap. viii. 85, without doubt soon followed, and so also the delivery of the royal decree to the officials (viii. 86); the support on the part of the latter may be very well mentioned in chap. viii. 86 prophetically, or is to be understood of their promise. If a longer time had elapsed between Ezra's arrival in Jerusalem and chap. ix., it would not have been necessary for the princes of the congregation to have first made complaint respecting the evil circumstances in question, but Ezra would have observed them himself. Accordingly by the ninth month,—on the twentieth day of which, according to chap. x. 9, the first assembly of the people was held respecting the affair here coming into question,—is meant without doubt the ninth of the first year that Ezra passed in Jerusalem. —The princes came to me. הַשָּׂרִים (with the article) are not the princes as a whole—for according to ver. 2 many of them participated in the guilt, and these would not have given information of themselves,—but the princes in distinction from the people. The princes distinguish as such who have not separated themselves, that is, kept themselves separate from the people of the land, three classes, that occur elsewhere, also along side of one another: the people of Israel—that is, the common people (יִשְׂרָאֵל) is in apposition to עַמִּי, comp. Jos. viii. 33; 1 Kings xvi. 21)—the priests and Levites—comp. e. g. chap. ii. 70.—The people of the lands are the ḥḥv, and indeed, first of all, those in the vicinity, comp. chap. vi. 21. For the most part there were, without doubt, remnants of the ancient tribes of Canaan, whose abominations, according to the subsequent narrative, were peculiar to them; but probably during the exile other heathen races also had emigrated into the depopulated Palestine. Ezra and the princes thus, when they required a separation from all these heathen,—that is, excluded an intermarriage with them,—exceeded the letter of the law, which only prohibited intermarriage with the Canaanites (Ex. xxxiv. 16; Deut. vii. 3),—but not because a certain Pharisaism had already made itself felt among them (O. v. Gerlach in his Bible-work), but because it was absolutely necessary now if the congregation was to be preserved from sinking down into heathenism. The heathen dwelling in close vicinity to them, and not being separated in political affairs, the mixed marriages now threatened, if not positively forbidden, to become disproportionately numerous, whilst in former times they could never have been more than exceptional. And besides, these heathen were now essentially the same as the ancient Canaanites.—According to their abominations.—This briefly—as their abominations required. לְכֹנְעֵי does not then begin the enumeration of the races in question—which is against not only the accentuation which separates this clause so strongly from the nations, but also the position of the word, for the clause “according to their abominations” would not then have intervened, but should have followed the enumeration; and besides also the ל before כְּנָעֲנִי—which would have scarcely an analogy in its favor. Rather לְכֹנְעֵי, “belonging to the Canaanites;” briefly—as they were peculiar to the Canaanites, the Hittites, etc. The abominations are designated by this clause as the ancient ones, condemned by the prophets, and especially by Moses, long before; and all the various names of nations are mentioned because the abominations had been so many and so different among the different races. It was not the purpose to give a complete statement, else the Ilivites (comp. Ex. iii. 8; xiii. 5; xxiii. 23) and also the Girgashites (comp. Deut. vii. 1) would also have been mentioned.

Ver. 2. For they have taken of their daughters, etc.—namely, wives, comp. chap. x. 44; 2 Chron. xi. 21, etc. The object נָשִׁים is in this connection, to a certain extent, to be understood of itself.—And have mingled themselves as the holy seed with the people of the land.—This has properly the same subject as the foregoing. The following יָרַע הַקֹּדֶשׁ is to be placed in apposition with the subject, as it seems; that is to say, although they are a new and holy seed, or shoot, which, after the old tree had fallen by the severe judgments of God, was to grow up into a new and better tree. Since the expression “holy seed” does not occur again elsewhere, it is not doubtful but that there is here a reference back to Isa. vi. 18. That at least the better part of the people had not yet by any means forgotten the ancient prophets, but preserved them at the present time to strengthen their faith, follows already from Haggai and Zechariah, where the Messianic promise, on the basis of the more ancient prophecy, yet again brought forth the richest flowers.—Yea, the hand of the princes—rulers hath been chief in this trespass.—In this unfaithfulness the princes had been leaders with their bad example, assuming thereby the responsibility, comp. Deut. xiii. 10. מַעַל, properly unfaithfulness (comp. Lev. v. 15) is spoken of, in so far as they had abandoned the blessing of the purity of Israel and periled thereby the higher blessings connected therewith. מְצַוִּים = commanders, chiefs, is a word passing over from the ancient Persian into the Hebrew, comp. Is. xli. 25.

Ver. 8. Ezra could not but express the deepest pain at this information, as well as the greatest displeasure, and indeed with the warmth of Oriental manners; none the less that there must be applied a remedy, only to be carried out with difficulty, and occasioning much sorrow. He expressed his grief by rending (tearing) his under and over-garment (comp. Lev. x. 6 and Josh. vii. 6), his displeasure and anger by plucking out the hair of the head and beard (a part of it), comp. Neh. xiii. 25; that is to say, he hurt himself and disfigured his appearance (comp. Isa. l. 6); if he had only been sad, he would have shaved his head, Job i. 20. In this condition he then sat down staring, שָׁמַם in Piel expresses the being stiff and dull (hence also the being waste), comp. Isa. lii. 14.

Ver. 4. Ezra's behaviour produced a profound impression upon those who feared God's word;

because of the unfaithfulness of הַגּוֹלָה, the people of God living in captivity Ezra continued his behaviour herein even when they assembled themselves unto him. According to chap. x. 8 we are not to explain: all who trembled at the word of God on account of the unfaithfulness, etc.; although חָזַר may be connected with עָל

(Is. lxvi. 2, where עָל indeed = אָל, in the sense of trembling towards, comp. Is. lxvi. 5), but: all who allowed themselves to be frightened by God's words, which referred to the unfaithfulness. God is here called the God of Israel because He had in the words in question called for the purity and dignity of Israel.

Ver. 5-16. At the time of the evening sacrifice, however, he arose from his mortification—הִתְעַנִּית, humiliation, mortification, which had consisted in giving way to sorrow, but had certainly likewise been connected with fasting, and indeed accompanied with the rending of his over or under-garment; that is to say, in that he still continued or repeated the rending—in order now to spread out his hands to God as those who pray usually did (1 Kings viii., etc.), publicly uttering a penitential prayer.

Ver. 6. This penitential prayer would emphasize throughout what great reasons the congregation had of bawing of the sins in question. He renders prominent in ver. 6 how great guilt they already had upon them without this, and adds in ver. 7 that sin has been the cause of all the misfortune and misery of Israel. He calls to mind in ver. 9 that God's grace had preserved only just such a remnant, but by no means had constituted a situation in which they could dispense with Him. He confesses in vers. 10-12 that God had expressly forbidden the sins now indulged in, and had made nothing less than the strength of the congregation, yea, the very possession of the land, conditional upon their obedience to his command. He then in vers. 13 and 14 raises the painful and sad question, and draws the inference whether, if after so many chastisements, and after such an exhibition of favor, they should again be guilty of such a transgression of the divine command, whether God would not then really become angry unto their entire destruction. He concludes in ver. 15 with the repenting confession that the Lord is righteous, that the congregation, however, cannot stand before Him. Ezra now prays expressly for forgiveness, as we might expect: he ventures not, he is ashamed, as he himself says, to lift up his face to the Lord. But such a penitential prayer and confession of sin is already in itself a pleading for grace; yea, works more powerfully indeed than a petition expressly uttered. And, at any rate, it is, just as it is, very well calculated, at the same time, to bring the people to the lively consciousness of the perverseness of their sin.

Ver. 6. I am ashamed and blush.—וָאֶשְׁתָּבֶשׂ and נִכְלַם are joined together for emphasis, as in Jer. xxxi. 19, etc.—For our iniquities are increased over our head.—Occasioned by the transgression under consideration; all sins and transgressions whatever come to the remembrance of Ezra. He who already has so many sins upon him should take very particular care lest a new one should be added, especially when one has already been brought into such deep misery by the previous ones. רָכַח from רָכַח has the same meaning as usually רָכַח from רָכַח. לְמַעַל = upwards, passes over easily in our author to the adverbial sense of "very abundantly" (comp. 1 Chron. xxix. 8), even with רָכַח (comp. 1 Chron. xlii. 17), but here in connection with שָׁמַם retains its meaning as a preposition—beyond. The iniquities are regarded as a flood in which man soon perishes [comp. Pa. xxxviii. 4, and the general use of water to indicate great troubles] [our trespasses—unto the heaven—comp. 2 Chron. xxviii. 9; thus the mercy of God is compared in extent with the heavens, vid. Pa. xxxvi. 5; lvii. 10, etc.—Tr.].

Ver. 7. And for our iniquities we have been delivered—into the hands of the kings of the lands to the sword, etc.—To translate, with Bertheau, through the sword, is remote from the sense, and is not suited to the following "into captivity." The shame is called that of the face because it especially works upon the face, as Dan. ix. 7.—As this day, namely, teaches or shows; הַיּוֹם in connection with הָיָה is not—about or on, but has a comparative force, as also in Jer. xlv. 6; xxii. 23; 1 Sam. xxii. 8. The present teaches the here asserted delivering over, in so far as the congregation was still a קָהָל, comp. ver. 4.

Vers. 8, 9. It is true, the Lord has again allowed His grace to work after His anger, but not so that He could be dispensed with; only through Him has the congregation protection and continuance.—And now a little moment (comp. Isa. xxvi. 20) hath been grace from the Lord our God—namely, during the time from Cyrus to the present, which seems short in comparison with the long time of the previous chastisement, especially since the latter had begun already with the Assyrians (comp. chap. vi. 22 and Neh. ix. 32), and had properly been continued even to the time of Cyrus. Ezra would not so much praise the greatness of the divine grace, as if his thought had been that transgression ought to have been avoided out of thankfulness (for then he would have expressed himself in an entirely different manner), but he would say that the congregation, whatever it might be, was only through grace; and back of this lies the thought that with it they would forfeit their one and all.—To leave us a remnant and to give us a peg in his holy place.—נָתַן = us, “the people as a whole,” in distinction from which the קָהָל is the congregation of the returned exiles. The peg, תֵּבָה, is to be regarded as one driven into the wall, on which domestic utensils of any kind were hung, comp. Is. xxii. 23 sq.* Hence we cannot understand thereby, either with Bertheau, the congregation itself (to make us a peg = a congregation of a reliable stock), or, with Keil, the temple, which is opposed by the words, “in the holy place;” rather “to give any one a peg in a house” (here in the temple, in the holy place) means to give him a part and right in the house, accept him as a cohabitant in the house. It comes into consideration that God is often regarded as a Householder, and His people, in a similar manner, often as His family, who dwell with Him in His house (comp. Psalms xv. 1; xxiii. 6; xxvii. 4, etc.). We have an example in Isaiah lvi. 5: I will give them hand and name in my house, where the י explained in so many different ways may be simply activity or right to be active, in general to stir one's self.—That our God might lighten our eyes, and give us a little reviving in our bondage.—The infins. וְהָיָה and וְהָיָה are subordinated to the foregoing infinitives = that he thereby. The subject אֱלֹהֵינוּ appears in an independent position, as especially Isa. v. 24; comp. Ewald, § 307, c, because the object עֵינֵינוּ had preceded and intervened between it and the infin. “The eyes enlighten” means to remove the night of trouble and weakness resting upon them, which was, according to that which follows, already indeed a night of death, and indeed by reviving, that is, by bestowing salvation, strength, encouragement, comp. Ps. xlii. 4; Prov. xxix. 18, especially also 1 Sam. 14, 27, 29.—קָהָל = preservation of life, or as here, reviving (comp. 2 Chron. xiv. 12), is used here for the adjective “revived,” whilst in ver. 9 it retains its abstract meaning. קָהָל is added, without close connection, as Neh. ii. 12; vii. 4. The idea at the basis is, that national ruin is a death of the congregation, and that the re-establishment is an awakening from the dead. This re-establishment was a very incomplete one so long as the dependence on the powers of the world still endured, and the congregation must still be called קָהָל. The reference to the prophecies of the prophets is here unmistakable. As the expression “holy seed,” already in ver. 2, so also “leave a remnant,” and the expression “peg,” remind us very decidedly of Isaiah, comp. chaps. i. 9; xxii. 23 sq.; lvi. 5; the expression “revival” looks back upon Ezek. xxxvii. 1-14, where the figure on which it is based is carried out with great vividness and power. We see that the pious Israelites subsequent to the exile, Ezra before all, attentively took to heart the ancient prophecies of chastisements, and that which should follow them, in order to apply them without doubt to their own times.

Ver. 9. And hath extended mercy unto us before the kings of Persia, to give us revival.—The subject of the “giving” is not the Persian kings (Berth., Keil), which is opposed by the previous verse, and also by the fact itself; but God alone, whose it is alone to slay and make alive. It is not necessary, on this account, to make God the subject of the clause: to set up the house of our God, and erect its ruins. This infin. may be subordinated to the foregoing, so that the Jews become the subject = that we, etc. The subject of the last infin. to give us a wall in Judah and Jerusalem, is surely again God, and not one of the Persian kings (Berth. and Keil). The expression “give a wall” leads of itself more to God, for it is naturally to be understood figuratively, and indeed not of the temple, but in the more general sense of the protection which was afforded the congregation in Judah and Jerusalem against their oppressors, comp. Zech. ii. 5.

Vers. 10-12. The transgression here spoken of cannot be excused at all, with the plea, that it was not expressly forbidden.—And now, what shall we say?—for we have forsaken thy commandments,—not: that we have forsaken (Berth. and Keil), which would be weak. Ezra means: I may thus ask, for, etc.

Ver. 11 may be translated: thou who, or also, which thou hast commanded by thy servants, the prophets.—Ezra does not mention Moses in particular, but the prophets in general, not because the commands of the Pentateuch were not mediated or written down by Moses alone, but also by other organs, as Delitzsch in his introduction to Genesis supposes;—whether Ezra knew this, is at least very doubtful,—but because his thought is that God by His prophets has given or again enforced the commandments in manifold and oft-repeated ways, comp. Judg. iii. 6; 1 Kings xi. 2. When a truth is under consideration, which is not represented by one prophet, but more or less by all, then it is usual to cite in general, as the author of the book of Kings also does. Moses is meant at any rate, yea chiefly. And this explains the fact that Ezra states the command, not it is true verbally from a passage in the Pentateuch, but yet formularized in a manner only appropriate to the Mosaic period, when they still had to take possession of Canaan. He has in mind before all Deut. vii. 1-3, as there also the entire manner of expression is undeniably that of Deuteronomy, but he draws into consideration, in a free manner, other passages, and indeed even from Leviticus, comp. especially Lev. xviii. 24 sq. נִרְה, the abominable, for which in Lev. only טִמְאָה and תִּלְעָבוֹת occur, is used in the Pentateuch of the impurity of the issues of blood in women, only subsequently by the prophets of other impurities likewise, especially also of ethical impurities (comp. 1 Sam. i. 17; Ezek. vii. 20; xxxvi. 17). It is preferred to its synonyms as an especially strong expression. כִּפְּהָ אֶל-פֶּה, does not mean, certainly: from side to side (Keil), or from one end to another (Berth., A. V.); for neither the one nor the other meaning has been proved, or etymologically established for פֶּה. In Isa. xix. 7 it is either the mouth, or the bed of the Nile (later in distinction from the bank, as the שִׁפְהָ). פֶּה is easily the equivalent of person, from person to person, is, however = on or in all persons, = throughout and everywhere. Comp. כִּפְּהָ, 2 Kings x. 21; xxi. 16. It is worthy of attention, of course, that this method of expression only occurs of objects which hold men, of land, house and city, or of men themselves.

Ver. 12. Nor seek their peace nor their wealth forever.—These words are from Dt. xxiii. 7, where this is said with reference to the Moabites and Ammonites. It almost seems as if Ezra would have justified from the very letter of the law by this citation, his extension of the prohibition of intermarriage to the Moabites and Ammonites. The clause, that ye may be strong, remind us of Deuteron. xi. 8; the next clause, and eat the good of the land, of Isa. i. 19; the last clause, however: and possess it, or take possession of it for your children for ever, which does not occur in the Pentateuch in this form, rests on the promise that is often repeated, especially in Deuteronomy, that in case of obedience they would live long in the land that the Lord gave them. הָאָרֶץ means here not give into possession (Berth., Keil), for then it must govern the double accusative (comp. Judg. xi. 34; 2 Chron. xx. 11), but "take into possession, possess." For the children, posterity, that is, permanently.

Vers. 13, 14. Thus there can be no question but that the new transgression is to be decidedly condemned. This follows, as well from the punishment for previous sins, as from the way of pardon.—And after all that is come upon us for our evil deeds, and for our great trespass.—The article before מִכָּל properly represents the relative, as viii. 25; x. 14, 17; for מִכָּל cannot well be a participle; as such it would be in the plural. The continuation of this clause does not occur already in the second half of the ver. (Berth.); in this case the following וְ would have to be taken in the sense of, in truth (after all, in truth hast Thou, our God, spared us). then ver. 14 would be in too little connection; it would not appear that two kinds of things, that as well punishment as forgiveness formed the foundation of ver. 14. Rather the second half of the verse verifies the thought, which is involved in the first, that the guilt was very great, and that it properly would have deserved still severer punishment, and thus entirely prepares the way for ver. 14. Its sense is, at any rate, that the punishment has been less than the transgression. The words might mean: For thou, our God, hast restrained a part of our sins from below, so that they (namely, through their consequences, the visitations of punishment) have not gone entirely over our head, have not utterly ruined us; for there is no objection to taking כִּי עֲוֹנוֹתֵינוּ partitively. Already Esdras has thus: ὁ νοστινὰς τὰς ἀμαρτίας ἡμῶν. In favor of this view is the fact that in this way לִכְפֹּתָהּ would come into contrast with לִמְעַלָּהּ in ver. 6, in which it is also found elsewhere, Jer. xxxi. 37. At all events, however, we may likewise explain: Thou hast restrained Thine anger or Thy punishment below the measure of our misdeeds, so that the punishment has not been as great as our misdeeds deserved (so J. H. Mich., Gesen., and Keil). לִכְפֹּתָהּ, indeed, is nowhere else found with כִּי, but perhaps only for the reason that it nowhere else is followed by a noun of closer definition. כִּי follows, at least, the corresponding סִימָנָהּ, 1 Chron. xxix. 8; the synonymous סִימָנָהּ has usually ל after it.

Ver. 14. Then should we again break thy commandments, and unite ourselves in marriage with, etc.—This question appeals to the general sentiment, and serves to emphasize very strongly the blamableness of the new transgression.—Wouldst thou not be angry with us, even to destruction?—עַד-פִּלְהָ, as 2 Kings xiii. 17, 19.

Ver. 15. Lord God of Israel, thou art righteous.—This concluding and confirming confession would not say: Thou art a severe judge, and must interfere against the congregation on account of its decline (Berthieu and Keil). The usual meaning of צָדִיק (graciously righteous), is against this, and then also the following clause, "for we have remained over as an escaped remnant," which is not = we have remained over merely as escaped, but: we have not been utterly ruined. Rather Ezra would say, that no one can reproach God for not doing all that could be expected.—Behold, we are before thee in our trespasses, etc.—This, the second half of the verse, constitutes a very suitable and logically conclusive antithesis to the foregoing. The more blameless God is the more deserving of punishment Israel's guilt. The yodh in יְהוָה is found in the edition of R. Norzi and J. H. Mich.; but is missing in some MSS., and the pointing corresponds with the latter. Both methods of writing might in this case easily go on alongside of one another; the singular would be favored by ver. 18, but the plural corresponds with the full-toned style of Ezra.—[We cannot stand before thee, e.g., as thy holy people, who are privileged to stand before their king.—Th.]—Because of this. נְהַי־לֵךְ = with this new evil deed.

THOUGHTS UPON THE HISTORY OF REDEMPTION.

Vers. 1-8. 1. If we act upon the supposition that the sacred Scriptures, even the Old Testament already, are to give us warning, exhortation, and instruction with reference to every situation and question of church, civil, or domestic life, yea, that the Old Testament very particularly comes into consideration for the details of life, it is natural that we should find in the opposition that Ezra makes in chapters ix. and x. to intermarriage with the heathen, a warning or exhortation with reference to intermarriage with those of a different faith from our own. And in fact that which may be urged against such an application, e.g., that as Christians we rejoice in a greater liberty than the Jews; that mixed marriages have not been forbidden of themselves and under all circumstances, that the Christian church is never threatened with as great dangers as the Jewish congregation in the time of Ezra, that besides the piety of the Christian has a mightier protection and help than the religion of the Old Testament pious—all this is outweighed by the opposing facts. The wife is now on a greater equality with the husband than in ancient times, has a greater influence upon the man himself, as well as in the training of the children, may thus easily become more dangerous. Besides Christianity is much more internal and deep than Old Testament piety, more influential upon the heart and disposition upon all sides, and hence comes much more into consideration with reference to the married life, that rests upon internal communion. It is true there is very seldom in the mixed marriages of our times a question respecting the difference of religion; usually it is only respecting a difference in the confession of faith, or a different degree of vitality of Christian religiousness—and to place marriages of this kind on the same basis as those intermarriages with the heathen would be premature, yea unfair. Heathendom stood in an essential and indeed very positive contrast to Judaism. The different Christian confessions, on the other hand, have the essential things in common with one another. And between those which are distinguished merely by the degree of the vitality of their Christian religiousness, there is often no positive contrast at all; the less vital Christianity may be awakened and strengthened, especially if treated with love. But we must always recognise and take to heart, with reference to Ezra and his behaviour, the fact, that in the conclusion and conduction of a marriage those considerations which have respect to the interests of religion are more important than all others, and therefore a difference of confession, which threatens not to promote but diminish religious ardor, according to the nature of the case, which besides constantly disturbs or of itself renders impossible the internal living together in the highest and holiest spheres, which then likewise has so much that is unendurable with reference to the training of children, and involves so many difficulties; that likewise in the same manner, a lack of any religious faith, that places itself in open conflict with Christianity, that more earnestly considered, is to be regarded as a positively different religion, or wanders into scornfulness and frivolity,—these ought to be real hinderances to marriage for all Christians. As regards the lack of faith, of the kind here referred to, which manifestly must be placed on the same footing at least with heathenism, the apostle did not allow (1 Cor. vii. 12, 13) that a Christian brother should marry an unbelieving wife, or the reverse, but only that he should retain her if he once had her. That a brother should marry an unbelieving (heathen) wife, he seems not to have regarded as at all possible. With reference to marriage with an unbeliever, we are to take to heart what he says in the subsequent context (ver. 16). What knowest thou, O wife, whether thou shalt save thy husband, or what knowest thou, O man, whether thou shalt save thy wife?

2. The question how the congregation was to act towards others of a different faith, was now to be answered for the second time. It is not easy, with reference to this matter, to do exactly the right thing; for Christians, who more decidedly have the task of winning others for their faith, thus in no way should shut themselves off from them, it is still less easy than for the Israelites. But since all depends upon imparting to the others the best that we have, it follows that we must draw back, when this is impossible, especially if we incur the danger of losing this best thing ourselves. Under all circumstances it is self-evident that we should only cherish such an association as we can ever withdraw from if necessary.

8. No error is so conspicuous in the new congregation as that of intermarriage with the heathen. Not only Ezra but Nehemiah had still to contend with it (Neh. x. 31; xiii. 23 sq.), and as the princes, so indeed had the sons of the high-priests taken part in it (comp. chap. x. 18). Without doubt there was a reason in the circumstances themselves. Usually new tasks are imposed as well upon the congregation as a whole, as also upon the individuals in the new relations. A new end is to be attained, and the difficulty of striving after this in the right manner often involves the temptation of approaching it in a false way. The task of the new congregation was to assume such a relation to the neighboring nations from whom they were no longer separated by political boundaries, as that they might ever be in the position in the fulness of time for fulfilling their missionary calling with reference to them. Accordingly the history itself urged onwards to a sort of approximation. Notwithstanding this, however, the institution of false relations, which could only render the accomplishment of their mission impossible, had no excuse.

4. Having lost their political independence, and reduced to a small number, the congregation, even their leaders or princes might have come upon the thought that it was not only allowable, but indeed was advisable, to enter into closer relations with the heathen, who now were separated from them by so very little. They might have hoped that their people, on the basis of such a connection, might exercise a good influence with reference to religion and morals, and in consequence of this the congregation would gain the desirable increase; yet this error would not have been possible, if they had had the true singleness of heart towards the divine command. By the lack of this singleness, those who ought to have been to the rest of the congregation guides to good, became guides to evil. Ezra on his part, who did not lack this singleness, recognised in these very circumstances, with which the princes might justify the transgression under consideration, grounds for just the contrary, for a still more careful separation from the heathen. In fact, just because the congregation were without the protection of a political independence, because moreover they had become weak and despised on account of their small numbers, there was scarcely a doubt that the heathen, instead of allowing themselves to be influenced by the Israelites, would have become the influential factor for them, and they would have jeopardized the very existence of the congregation itself.

5. In a similar manner, as after other great judgments, as, for example, after the deluge, it became manifest after the exile likewise that the delivered, however excellent they proved to be at first, were unable to constitute a really new beginning, which should be pure and sinless, but ever only a continuation of the ancient sinful existence; that there was now no more sinless development, that rather sin breaks forth in new forms in the new relations which have been established by the judging and preserving providence of God, so that it needs ever anew a holy reaction against it on the part of the Lord. Nevertheless, of course, the judging and preserving acts of the Lord are not in vain. The congregation advances through them forwards, if not to a pure, yet to a better development, and their course, even if it is never that of a conqueror who has entirely overcome his hereditary enemy, is yet that of a victorious warrior, who at least beholds the complete victory and its noble prize at the end of his course. Nevertheless, the circumstance that among the princes many recognised the wrong as such, and sought to remove it with the help of Ezra, is a proof that the Lord at this time had provided a number of a better element, who already not only constituted a starting-point for His reaction, but also themselves began to react out of their own midst.

Vers. 5-15. 1. Before Ezra did anything else he expressed his sorrow for the failure of the congregation from the word of God, and indeed particularly by a penitential prayer, in which he included himself most devoutly within the congregation which had transgressed. The first thing with which to begin a true reformation will ever be the feeling of penitence, and in accordance with this a penitential prayer, which issues from the deepest conviction that we are involved in the sinfulness of the congregation, and which has to share in the fear of the threatening judgments, which, however, none the less manifests the sharpest contrast to the sin in question. Such a penitential prayer, especially if it is connected with an humble recognition of the justice of the judgment that is feared, already has also the significance of a prayer for forgiveness, help, and preservation, just as the praise of the Lord as the God who hears prayer, affords redemption and salvation, at the beginning of those very Psalms, that are prayed out of deep need, and run out into a petition for redemption and salvation, is itself already a mighty petition, which in spite of every necessity joyfully praising God, is able without doubt to most powerfully move His paternal heart.

2. Ezra's prayer very suitably unites various things, which must fill us with holy abhorrence of fresh transgressions after redemption; he reminds us at first of the fact that we are deeply involved in sin from our fathers, we might say, already by nature, and thus can not be too much on our guard against it, and at the same time, that it is our sins that have brought about the misery in which we all more or less live; so then that God has given us grace which certainly appears exceedingly great over against our sins and unworthiness, so that it must fill us with thankfulness and urge us to sanctification, which, however, over against the necessities of earth, is a small beginning of better things, easily lost again; furthermore, that the sin, that we might perchance be guilty of, is against God's express command, and can never be justified; that God's visitation of punishment, if we are not warned by His punishment or by His grace unto holiness, must necessarily become greater and more serious. These truths will have a preserving and improving power for the congregation of all times.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. We have the duty of keeping afar off from others. 1) When? If we can exercise no improving influence, but have to fear lest we be ruined with them. 2) Why? because we have to preserve great blessings for ourselves and others. 3) How? with renunciation of temporal advantages, especially with self-denial.—The importance of a correct choice in marriage: 1) the injury that is done by a bad choice; it is not only temporal, but eternal; 2) the gain that we have in a good choice.—STARKE: Marriage with an unbelieving woman is very dangerous, for she can convert a man easier than the man can convert her, 1 Kings x. 4.—What other injuries unequal marriage may accomplish, vid. 2 Chron. xviii. 1.—The importance of true family life for the furtherance of church life: 1) Church life is a matter of the free resolution, which must be correctly guided by proper training; 2) church life is conditioned upon learning its advantages, as this is possible, first of all, only in the bosom of the family.

Vers. 5-15. The fundamental principles of true reformatory activity: 1) True simplicity of heart,—we must not allow ourselves to be led astray by the temptations that are often involved with sufficient strength in the relations given by God Himself; we must rather gladly and without reserve bow to the divine word; 2) true sorrow for the present transgressions, however difficult they may be to remove, they must yet be recognized seriously in their true character; 3) true fear of the divine judgment—it is a bitter, but indispensable medicine for the destructive wanderings from duty. —BRENTIUS: Exprimatur affectus pietatis, qui in unoquoque debet geri erga proximum suum, videlicet quod unusquisque non debet aliter affici erga peccatum proximi sui, quam si ipse ea perpetrasset. Sic affectus erat Abraham, erga Sodomitas, sic Samuel erga Saul, sic Daniel erga populum Judaicum. Et hic affectus multorum bonorum auctor est, videlicet ne traducamus proximum nostrum, sed oremus pro eo, et castigemus eum, pro officio nostro. —STARKE: Pious people laugh not at the sins of others, but are sad at heart on their account, Jer. ix.; Gen. xviii. 23; 2 Sam. xv. 85; 2 Cor. xi. 29.—How inexcusable are the fresh transgressions of those who have been redeemed from the misery of sin. 1) Sin has already wrought misery enough. 2) God has shown His grace in delivering from it, which is exceedingly great, but may easily be lost again. 3) He has let us know His will. 4) His visitation of punishment will be still more severe. —STARKE: The strongest walls and the surest fence about a city and village is God's gracious care, Ps. iii. 4-7; Prov. xviii. 10.—By the wickedness of the inhabitants is a land defiled; accordingly let us beware of sin. In the judgments of God we have to recognize His moderation, and thank God for it.—The true penitential prayer: 1) Recognition of sin in its entire greatness and ruin: 2) recognition of the divine grace; 3) recognition of the cleanness of the divine will; 4) recognition of the justice of the judgment to be feared.—Intercession of pastors for their congregations: 1) Out of love in spite of sin; 2) in faith in God's grace; 3) in hope of a hearing. —STARKE: Since Ezra in his prayer sets before him the entire people, he includes himself among them and accepts his share in the sins of the people, comp. Is. lix.; Dan. ix. 5; Neh. i. 6.—Teachers should particularly stand in the gap and seek to ward off the punishment of God by prayer. We often know not for the sake of what believer's prayer God has spared a people and city. [SOOR: Silent grief and astonishment sometimes form the most expressive protestation against enormous crimes; and when men speak on such occasions it may be more effectual to address themselves to God than to the offender.—HENRY: A practical disbelief of God's all-sufficiency is at the bottom of all the sorry shifts we make to help ourselves.—The scandalous sins of professors are what we have reason to be astonished at.—An eye to God as our God will be of great use to us in the exercise of repentance.—There is not a surer or sadder presage of ruin to any people than revolting to sin, to the same sins again after great judgments and great deliverances.—WORDSWORTH: Observe, this confession and prayer of Ezra, the priest and scribe, the friend of the king of Persia, was in a public place, at a time of public resort to the temple. He was not ashamed of repentance and self-humiliation, and he showed publicly that his trust was in God's help, vouchsafed to fervent prayer at the door of God's house.—Th.]

B.—THE REMOVAL OF THE ERROR, AND THE LIST OF THOSE WHO PURIFIED THEMSELVES FROM IT.

CHAP. X. 1-44.

I. The effect that Ezra's prayer had upon Shechaniah, then upon the princes of the congregation.

Vers. 1-8.

- 1 Now when Ezra had prayed, and when he had confessed, weeping and casting himself down before the house of God, there assembled unto him out of Israel a very great congregation of men and women and children: for the people wept very sore.
- 2 And Shechaniah the son of Jehiel, one of the sons of Elam, answered and said unto Ezra, We have trespassed against our God, and have taken strange wives of the
- 3 people of the land: yet now there is hope in Israel concerning this thing. Now therefore let us make a covenant with our God to put away all the wives, and such as are born of them, according to the counsel of my lord, and of those that tremble
- 4 at the commandment of our God; and let it be done according to the law. Arise; for this matter belongeth unto thee: we also will be with thee: be of good courage, and do it. Then arose Ezra, and made the chief priests, the Levites, and all Israel,
- 5 and do it. Then arose Ezra, and made the chief priests, the Levites, and all Israel,
- 6 to swear that they should do according to this word. And they swore. Then Ezra rose up from before the house of God, and went into the chamber of Johanan the son of Eliashib: and when he came thither, he did eat no bread, nor drink water: for he mourned because of the transgression of them that had been carried away.

- 7 And they made proclamation throughout Judah and Jerusalem unto all the children of the captivity, that they should gather themselves together unto Jerusalem;
8 And that whosoever would not come within three days, according to the counsel of the princes and the elders, all his substance should be forfeited, and himself separated from the congregation of those that had been carried away.

II. The Success of Ezra in the Assembly of the Congregation. Vers. 9-17.

- 9 Then all the men of Judah and Benjamin gathered themselves together unto Jerusalem within three days. It was the ninth month, on the twentieth day of the month; and all the people sat in the street of the house of God, trembling because 10 of this matter, and for the great rain. And Ezra the priest stood up, and said unto them, Ye have transgressed, and have taken strange wives, to increase the trespass 11 of Israel. Now therefore make confession unto the LORD God of your fathers, and do his pleasure: and separate yourselves from the people of the land, and from the 12 strange wives. Then all the congregation answered and said with a loud voice, As 13 thou hast said, so must we do. But the people are many, and it is a time of much rain, and we are not able to stand without, neither is this a work of one day or two:
14 for we are many that have transgressed in this thing. Let now our rulers of all the congregation stand, and let all them which have taken strange wives in our cities
15 come at appointed times, and with them the elders of every city, and the judges thereof, until the fierce wrath of our God for this matter be turned from us. Only 16 Jonathan the son of Asahel and Jahaziah the son of Tikvah were employed about this matter: and Meshullam and Shabbethai the Levite helped them. And the children of the captivity did so. And Ezra the priest, with certain chief of the fathers, 17 after the house of their fathers, and all of them by their names, were separated, and sat down in the first day of the tenth month to examine the matter. And they made an end with all the men that had taken strange wives by the first day of the first month.

III. List of those who Separated Themselves from their Wives. Vers. 18-44.

- 18 And among the sons of the priests there were found that had taken strange wives: namely, of the sons of Jeshua the son of Jozadak, and his brethren: Maaseiah, and 19 Eliezer, and Jarib, and Gedaliah. And they gave their hands that they would put away their wives; and being guilty, they offered a ram of the flock for their trespass.
20 21 And of the sons of Immer; Hanani, and Zebadiah. And of the sons of Harim; Maaseiah, and Elijah, and Shemaiah, and Jehiel, and Uzziash. And of the 22 sons of Pashur; Elioenai, Maaseiah, Ishmael, Nethaneel, Jozabad, and Elasah. Also of the Levites; Jozabad, and Shimei, and Kelaiah, (the same is Kelita,) 23 Pethahiah, Judah, and Eliezer. Of the singers also; Eliashib: and of the porters;
24 Shallum, and Telem, and Uri. Moreover of Israel: of the sons of Parosh; Ramiah, and Jeziah, and Malchiah, and Miamin, and Eleazar, and Malchijah, and Benaiah.
25 And of the sons of Elam; Mattaniah, Zechariah, and Jehiel, and Abdi, and Jeremoth, and Eliah. And of the sons of Zattu; Elioenai, Eliashib, Mattaniah, and 26 Jeremoth, and Zabad, and Aziza. Of the sons also of Bebai; Jehohanan, Hananiah, Zabbai, and Athlai. And of the sons of Bani; Meshullam, Malluch, and 27 Adaiah, Jashub, and Sheal, and Ramoth. And of the sons of Pahath-moab; Adna, and Chelal, Benaiah, Maaseiah, Mattaniah, Bezaleel, and Binnui, and Manasseh.
28 31 And of the sons of Harim; Eliezer, Ishijah, Malchiah, Shemaiah, Shimeon, Benjamin, Malluch, and Shemariah. Of the sons of Hashum; Mattenai, Mattathiah, 32 Zabad, Eliphelet, Jeremai, Manasseh, and Shimei. Of the sons of Bani; Maadai, 33 35 Amram, and Uel, Benaiah, Bedeiah, Chelluh, Vaniah, Meremoth, Eliashib, 34 37, 38, 39 Mattaniah, Mattenai, and Jaasau, And Bani, and Binnui, Shimei, And 40, 41 Shelemiah, and Nathan, and Adaiah, Machnadebai, Shashai, Sharai, Azareel, 42, 43 and Shelemiah, Shemariah, Shallum, Amariah, and Joseph. Of the sons of 44 Nebo; Jeiel, Mattithiah, Zabad, Zebina, Jadau, and Joel, Benaiah. All these had taken strange wives: and some of them had wives by whom they had children.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-8. This chapter from beginning to end treats of the great results attending the penitential prayer of Ezra in the congregation.

Ver. 1. Now when Ezra had prayed, etc.—Ezra's prayer is properly designated as a confessing. הִתְחַנֵּף, comp. notes on ix. 16. כַּתְּנֵפֶל means: prostrating one's self, lying on the knees, comp. ix. 1.—Before the house of God,—elsewhere also "before the face of God," in the court of the temple. That a great crowd gathered together unto him had its reason in the fact that the people wept very much, that is, for sorrow over the evil circumstances into which so many had plunged themselves, and especially were deeply moved with him also in view of the sins by which they had done it, and accordingly also desired assistance. בְּכָה, which form only occurs here, depends upon its verb, although it is separated from it by the adverb הִנֵּחַ in the manner of an infin. abs.

Ver. 2. And Shechaniah—answered, etc.—That Ezra himself did not step forth with a definite demand, that he waited until one of the congregation should make a proposition, did not have its reason in the fact that his position did not entitle him to make such a demand, but in the circumstance that the reformation could only be of worth and thoroughly carried out when it came forth from the congregation itself. Shechaniah here, the son of Jehiel, is to be distinguished from Shechaniah, the son of Jahaziel, in chap. viii. 5. And Jehiel, his father, is probably not identical with the one mentioned in ver. 26. Were it so, Shechaniah would not have scrupled to make a proposition by which his own father would be compelled to dismiss his wife. The sons of Elam, to whom he belonged, occur in ii. 7; viii. 7, and again in ver. 26. He was, and this is significant, no priest, nor prince, but one of the congregation, so that in and with him the congregation itself promptly arose to vindicate the law. הוֹשִׁיב, cause to dwell, is in our chapter (comp. vers. 10, 14, 17, 18), and so also in Neh. xiii. 23, 27, used for the taking home of wives. Shechaniah confesses: We have acted unfaithfully towards the Lord in taking home foreign women (comp. ver. 10 and Neh. xiii. 27), in order to justify Ezra for his strong condemnation of this intermarriage. At the same time he retains hope, עַל-אִמָּה=at this transgression (comp. ix. 15), or rather in spite of it. עַל in itself sensu medio, may readily have the meaning of "in spite of," comp. Is. liii. 9; Job xvi. 17. בְּקִקְוָה is here=בְּקִקְוָה. Shechaniah is of the opinion that a removal of the evil is still possible, and perhaps he already recognized also the fact that the resolution to carry out this difficult thing might give the impulse to a general reformation.

Ver. 8. Now therefore let us make a covenant with our God—that is, we will obligate ourselves by a solemn covenant and a sworn vow to God (comp. 2 Chron. xxix. 10) to put away.—הוֹשִׁיב is here the opposite of הוֹשִׁיב— all the wives—namely, as a matter of course, all foreign ones—and such as are born of them—also to send away the children. This resolution might almost seem to be unnecessarily severe, yet it is a matter of question whether it would not have been harder still to separate the mothers from their children. The little ones still needed their mothers, and the larger ones might easily be a support for their mothers. Moreover, it was to be feared that the children, if they were retained, would constitute a bond between the men and their banished wives that would soon again reassert its power and render possible the return of the wives. We are by no means to conclude from vers. 11-19 that they contented themselves with reference to this proposition, with the removal of their wives. Comp. against this view ver. 44 and Neh. xiii. 23 sq. Moreover, however, that which Shechaniah here in his zeal so comprehensively proposes might yet not be so recognized and required, without exception. There was no sufficient ground for removing sons who were willing to live in accordance with the law, and who were not necessarily to be cast out on account of the mother. —According to the counsel of the Lord and of those that tremble at the commandment of our Lord.—That the Lord and those who tremble at His command should be brought together in this way is almost remarkable. The Sept. and Estras, and after them also De Wette and Bertheau, read accordingly אֲדָרְיָ, my Lord, which would be Ezra [so A. V. and Rawlinson.]* But Ezra had not yet given any counsel at all, and besides, it is hardly conceivable that Shechaniah should here speak to him in such a reverent tone, and then in the verses immediately following so familiarly and cheerfully. Already the Vulgate has juxta voluntatem domini, and according to De Rossi, quite a number of MSS. read even יְהוָה. The connection of the two expressions, which is in itself somewhat remarkable, would probably say: according to the counsel of the Lord, as it is understood and vindicated by those who tremble at His commandments. Entirely parallel is Acts xv. 28: "for it seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us." The עֲצָה of the Lord is often elsewhere His decree (comp. Is. v. 19; xix. 17; Ps. cvi. 18); here, however, according to the context, the counsel, which He gives, as Ps. cvii. 11; Prov. i. 25; 2 Kings xvii. 13. Thus mildly Shechaniah expresses himself, however, because a specific command to dismiss the wives, and likewise also their children, was not found in the law, and moreover also partly because the law, in so far as it yet gave an impulse thereto, had a counselling, that is, a precautionary significance with the good of the congregation in view. The clause בְּתוֹרַת יְעֻשָּׁהּ is not to be taken in an optative sense [A. V.]—which would be weak—but as a promise: it shall happen according to the law. The fourth verse, moreover, passes over from the tone of comfort to that of promise.—Arise, for upon thee is the matter.—This can only mean: upon thee the matter has to depend; thou must carry it out according to thy judgment and conviction.—And we with thee.—This means in accordance with the foregoing. And we will be with thee, will help thee.

Vers. 5-8. Now Ezra made use of the favorable sentiment: he made the princes, etc., to swear to do נִכְכֵּר יְהוָה, that is, to carry out the proposition of Shechaniah, then however continued his sorrow, and thereby deepened the zeal that had been excited, until he saw the beginning of the execution of the reform.—Ezra arose from before the house of God, that is, he left the place in the court, where he had prayed, and went into the chamber of Johanan, the son of Eliashib, in order to fast and mourn there. This cell was certainly in the wing that the new temple had gained, and which served for the preservation of the garments of the priests and other articles, but likewise for the provisional abode of the priests and Levites; according to Neh. xiii. 4-9 the high-priest Eliashib had erected a cell for the use of the Ammonite Tobias, as his relative, which he used in his frequent visits to Jerusalem. The names of Johanan and Eliashib frequently occur (comp. vers. 24, 27, 36), one of the twenty-four classes of priests had its name from a more ancient Eliashib, 1 Chron. xxiv. 12. But that an apartment or cell of the temple should be named after a subordinate man of the name of Johanan, as Ewald supposes (Gesch. IV., 8. 263), is impossible. It is very likely that we are to think of the later high-priest Johanan, and indeed the more so that he was not, it is true, as the one under consideration, a son, but a grandson of Eliashib. The order of high-priests from the time of Zerubbabel was as follows: Jeshua, Joiakim, Eliashib, Joiada, Johanan, Jaddua, comp. Neh. xii. 10 sq., where it is true Jonathan stands in place of Jaddua; where however, according to Neh. xii. 22, 23, Johanan is meant. In the time of Ezra, Joiakim or Eliashib was high-priest. We must probably suppose that the author used a later designation for the previous times as one more intelligible to his readers. The apartment might have been present already in the time of Ezra, which subsequently, perhaps in consequence of a re-building, was named after the high-priest Johanan. The second וַיֵּלֶךְ is a needless repetition, and cannot be at all compared with the twice-repeated וַיֵּקַם in verses 5 and 6, which at any rate each time receives a special definiteness by an additional clause, (against Keil).* שָׁם is besides, at any rate very seldom used in the sense of "thither," as it must be taken to be in connection with וַיֵּלֶךְ. The supposition of Cler. and Berth. that we are to read instead of it וַיֵּלֶךְ, and he passed the night or remained there, commends itself very much to our judgment. Already Esdras ix. 1 has: καὶ ἀλωσθεις ἐκεῖ, the Syriac: and he sat or remained there; the Sept. however: καὶ ἐπορεύθη ἐκεῖ—Eat no bread nor drink water is to fast. Comp. Ex. xxxiv. 28; Deut. ix. 9.

Ver. 7. Thus they, namely, the princes and elders, who according to ver. 8 took the matter in hand—made proclamation.—וַיִּקְרֹא as i. 1,—and indeed probably whilst Ezra was still fasting and mourning, thus immediately after Ezra's penitential prayer and Shechaniah's proposition—that all the members of the congregation should assemble unto Jerusalem.

Ver. 8. According to the counsel or resolution of the princes and the elders, etc.—וַיִּצְעַק belongs to the following clause—the ban should fall upon every one's substance who should not come in after three days* to Jerusalem, his possessions were to be forfeited for the benefit of the temple† (Lev. xxvii. 28 and Neh. xii. 28), and he himself however should be at once cast forth from the congregation.

Vers. 9-17. The assembling took place on the twentieth day of the ninth month, namely, in the same year which Ezra had arrived in Jerusalem. (comp. chap. ix. 1), and indeed in the square (וּבְרֹחַ) of the house of God, probably on the east or south-east side of the temple court, yet not before the water gate. Comp. notes on Neh. viii. 1. If already the affairs themselves, which naturally had not remained concealed from them, were calculated to excite them to the utmost, and depress them, the stormy weather that had set in made their situation utterly miserable. In December it is not only cold, but the rain is accustomed to fall in torrents. Comp. Robinson's Phy. Geog., p. 287.

Vers. 10, 11. When Ezra now held up before them their error and called upon them to give praise unto the Lord, that is, honor Him indeed by the separation from the people of the land, above all from the foreign wives—וַיִּתְּן הַלְלוּ as Josh. vii. 19—then the entire assembly (ver. 12) announced with a loud voice, accordingly unreservedly resolved—קוֹל נָהָל (the same as קוֹל נָהָל iii. 12) is a closer designation, which is co-ordinated to the subject or the so-called acc. instrum., Gesen., S. 188, Anm. 8, comp. Ps. iii. 5, etc.—according as thy words to us we must do.—Already the Vulgate in accordance with the accents, connects וַיִּתְּן with the foregoing (juxta tunc verbum ad nos, sic fiat); we may however in accordance with ver. 4, Neh. xiii. 13; 2 Sam. xviii. 11, likewise connect וַיִּתְּן with what follows, so that the sense is: thus we are in duty bound to do.

Vers. 13, 14. However, it could not be established in this way, namely, by a general declaration, whether many of the guilty would not be † [Rawlinson is loco: "The Persians allowed generally to the conquered nations that they should be governed by their own laws. dissatisfied with the step concluded upon, and seek to withdraw from their obligation. If the separation was to be carried out energetically and surely, it must be established in detail who were united in marriage with strange women, and it was necessary that the elders or princes in question should undertake to take care that the resolution of the congregation should everywhere have its proper consequences. Thus it was necessary that there should be confirmations and explanations that demanded a long time. Those who had spoken accordingly continue:—But the people are many.—אֲמַל is an adversative particle of limitation. Their meaning is that on account of the large number of the assembly, it is not certain whether they all were really agreed.—And the time is violent rain.—This is briefly for: the time is that of the violent rain, just as “thine eyes are doves” Song of Songs, iv. 1.—And there is no strength to stand without—we cannot longer stand in the cold.—And the business is not for one day and not for two, etc.—There are so many cases that must be established and examined into.

Ver. 14. Let now our princes stand for the entire congregation, etc.—לְכָל-הַקְהָל serves not as a closer designation of the princes as such who belonged to the entire congregation in distinction from the elders and judges of the separate cities (Berth.), as it has already been taken by the Sept., σὴνταςαν δὲ ἀρχοντες ἡμῶν, and Esdras: σὴνταςαν δὲ δι προσηγυμένοι τοῦ πληθους. The ל is rather a designation of the dat. commodi, and here is equivalent to “in place of.” The sense is, let the princes remain in Jerusalem and advise with Ezra; especially however name to him the members of the congregation in question.—And let every one in our cities who has taken home strange wives, come at fixed times, and with them (for, with him) the elders of every city, and the judges thereof.—The princes are to fix the times for the guilty ones named by them to Ezra, when they have to appear with their elders and judges; the guilty are then to promise to dismiss the wives; the elders and judges however are intrusted with the duty of watching over the performance of their vows. Since the various local congregations might be called at different times, it was possible in this way to dispose of them in Jerusalem in a much shorter period. The article before הַלְשִׁיב again represents the relative as in ver. 17; viii. 25. עָתִים מְמִנִּים are appointed terms, only here and Neh. x. 35; xiii. 31. יָמֵי is a Chaldaism.—Until they turn away the fierce wrath of our God from us with reference to this matter.—עַל in the sense of “until,” gives no difficulty. For it might be expected of a God who is ever so gracious, that with the cause of the wrath the wrath itself also would cease. The supposition of Bertheau, that עַל with the following ל in the later language is used for the simple ל, thus stating the purpose, cannot be proved from Jos. xiii. 5; 1 Chron. v. 9; xiii. 5, compared with Num. xiii.

21. Also in the clause עַל לִרְכֹּב הָיָה after wrath, עַל retains its meaning; the sense is: which reaches even to this matter.* Certainly, however, the simple לִרְכֹּב הָיָה would have sufficed here (comp. Gen. xix. 21; 1 Sam. xxx. 24; Dan. i. 14), just as לְמַרְחֹק, 2 Chron. xxvi. 15; Ezra iii. 18, and לְמַרְחֹק, 2 Sam. vii. 19 amount to the same thing. With the first words of the verse, “let our princes stand,” this clause cannot be connected in the sense of “so long as this matter lasts, (Keil); against this is not only the fact that it would be somewhat superfluous, but also that a new clause: And let every one—come—has come in between.

Vers. 15-17. Only Jonathan, etc.—If we follow the clear usage of the language we must regard this as in apposition. אָז properly “only” (then often it is true “in truth”) easily leads to an adversative limitation, and עַל means 1 Chron. xxi. 1; 2 Chron. xx. 28; Dan. viii. 25; xi. 14: stand against any person or thing, as sometimes also עָלַי. Accordingly Jonathan and Jahaziah withstood the adopted resolution, whether they merely had some objection to the proposed method of dealing with the matter, or were also opposed to the banishment of strange wives itself. Only the circumstance that verse 16 is joined on, without an adversative particle, although it treats of the obedience of the congregation, seems to favor the view that here also an agreement is meant, as then already the Vulgate has: steterunt super hoc perfecti sunt huic negotio. But in truth, according to our conception, ver. 16 is not in contrast with ver. 15. All depends upon the emphasis placed upon “only” at the beginning of ver. 16. Not notwithstanding that, but because only Jonathan, etc., withstood, the congregation did, as a whole, as had been proposed. The present reading in ver. 16 וַיִּפְרְדּוּ Ezra, the priest, men as heads of fathers' houses were separated, is not only opposed by the fact that we should expect with the Sept. and Vulg. the copula before אֲנָשִׁים, since an asyndeton would here be very remarkable, but likewise by the fact that a separation of Ezra could hardly be spoken of, for he was already sufficiently set apart by his entire position. We may therefore with Ewald, Gesch. IV., S. 185 and Berth., in accordance with Esdras and the Peschito read וַיִּבְרְלּוּ.—And Ezra separated for himself, or at any rate also וַיִּפְרְדּוּ—there were separated unto Ezra. [So Rawlinson].—After the fathers' house—so that every father's house was represented by its head.—And they all with names, as viii. 20.—And they held a session—so וַיֵּשְׁבוּ here—on the first day of the tenth month, thus ten days after the general assembly of the people, to investigate the matter.—Instead of וַיִּשְׁלַח which is not a Hebrew formation, we are to read the infin. וַיִּרְשָׁ.

Ver. 17. And they made an end with all, etc., אֲנָשִׁים (men who had taken home strange wives) can hardly be in apposition with בְּכָל as the more ancient interpreters would have it; the expression would be too peculiar; moreover the accentuation is against it. No more can אֲנָשִׁים be the object of וַיִּכְלֹוּ and בְּכָל be a designation of place; they brought to an end the men (the hearing of them) in every place (Berth.); אֲנָשִׁים in this case would certainly require the article. The same objection is to be made to the rendering of Keil, "with reference to the men," which in itself moreover already misses the sense. The suspicion that the clause was a title of the following section in ver. 18, and only by mistake was placed here is quite natural, but it is not confirmed by any ancient version. Thus we must regard the entire clause as a brief, loosely attached, closer designation of כָּל, and understand: they were ready with the entire object incumbent upon them, that however was men who, etc.—[Rawlinson in loco: "In some cases, it may be presumed, they had to summon persons before them who did not wish to part with their foreign wives; in all they had to assure themselves that the wives were foreign; finally they had in every case where they decreed a divorce to make out the 'writing of divorcement,' to which the woman put away was entitled as evidence of her having been a wife and having become free."—Tr.]—By the first day of the first month, namely, of the following year. The session thus lasted in all very nearly three months.

Vers. 18–44. Catalogue of the men, who had strange wives, and were obliged to dismiss them. First of all are the priests in vers. 18–22, and indeed in vers. 18 and 19 four of the house of the high-priest.—Of the sons of Jeshua, etc. This evidently means the high-priest Jeshua, who had come to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel. The sons of his brother were probably only his distant relatives; according to ii. 86, they were, if Jeshua there is the high-priest Jeshua, sons of Jedaiah, thus brother in a broader sense.

Ver. 19. They gave their hands, that is, they vowed in a solemn manner by striking hands (comp. 2 Kings x. 15) to dismiss their wives. אֲנָשִׁים might follow as epegesis = and indeed as guilty. But it is more simple to supply: and they were guilty, that is, as they stood there guilty. The more general law of Lev. v. 14 sq. comes into consideration. They must bring a guilt-offering, because they had committed a חַטָּאת against Jehovah, for which a satisfaction was possible, and hence must likewise be given; comp. the different opinions respecting the guilt-offering in Keil's Archäol. I. S. 244. וְעַל-כֵּן is subordinated as an accusative of closer definition to the previous word. In connection with the following persons we are to supply in thought the promise to dismiss the wives and probably also the offering of a corresponding guilt-offering.—Of the names following in vers. 20–22 some occur again in Neh. viii. 4; x. 2–9, which perhaps designate the same persons. In all eighteen priests were guilty; none of the divisions that had returned with Zerubbabel had kept themselves free from the transgression (comp. ii. 86–89).

In vers. 23 and 24 ten Levites follow, among whom Kelaiah, usually called Kelita (comp. Neh. viii. 7 and x. 11); furthermore Jozabad, who again occurs in Neh. viii. 7.

Vers. 26–44 give the names from the rest of Israel. In all there are eighty-six, distributed among ten of the families named in chapter ii. It is singular that the sons of Bani are mentioned twice in ver. 29 and ver. 34, and probably there is an error in the second Bani, although it already occurs in the reading of the Sept. and Esdras. Whilst of every other family only four, six, seven or eight persons are enumerated in ver. 34 sq. not less than twenty-seven are mentioned as of this family. Furthermore it is singular that the inhabitants of the cities adduced in ii. 21–28 and vers. 33–35 are not expressly mentioned, whilst yet in ver. 7 sq. and ver. 14 those outside the city come into consideration as well as the Jerusalemites. Probably the twenty-seven men mentioned in vers. 34–41 belonged to the different districts of Judah.

Ver. 44 concludes the entire catalogue with a summary statement.—All these had taken strange wives.—אֲנָשִׁים must be taken as a participle; probably, however, we should read as the perfect אָשְׁמוּ for the expression אָשְׁמוּ, comp. ix. 2. No admissible sense can be derived from the last words of the verse; the translation: And there were among them women, and they had, or which had brought sons into the world, by which the masc. suffix of אָשְׁמוּ, and so also the masc. form אָשְׁמוּ, is referred to the wives, gives a statement, which is too self-evident to be correct. But a change which Bertheau proposes: "And there were among them those who sent away wives and sons," does not commend itself, partly because it is in too little connection with the text as we have it, partly because such a clause would likewise be too self-evident after ver. 8.—[Rawlinson adopts the former interp. and says: "The fact is noted as having increased the difficulty of Ezra's task."—Tr.]

THOUGHTS UPON THE HISTORY OF REDEMPTION.

Vers. 1–4. 1. It is certainly worthy of remark that it is not narrated of Ezra that he, as we should expect, expressly and severely denounced the men married to strange wives, but that we are only told of his prayer and confession of sin, in which he includes himself in the number of the guilty. Earnest sorrow for the sin to be denounced in others, and especially persevering prayer in their behalf, which in the nature of the case readily includes intercession, generally makes a deeper impression as well upon the persons themselves as their adherents, than castigating sermons, as then likewise here a great crowd of men, women, and children assembled about the praying and sorrowing Ezra, deeply affected by his sorrow.

2. If a head of a community sorrows in true sympathy and anxiety for his people, the better class of the people do not lack the earnest wish to remove his sorrow, and especially its cause: the love and respect which they entertain for him very easily pass over into this wish, and then there is easily found in the congregation itself a spokesman, who, as here Shechaniah, openly acknowledges the guilt, and correctly expresses what it is necessary to do in order to be free from it. Such a voice, moreover, arising out of the congregation itself, such willingness, springing up of itself, is the best result and reward of the sorrowing one. The willingness of the congregation, thus testified, is thereby at the same time still further intensified and enlarged, and the improvement which then takes place as a free act, has a truly ethical significance.

3. Such a one, who stands in the midst of a congregation, has need not only of a strict conscientiousness, but also of great courage and alacrity, in order to openly designate a sin of which many have been guilty as a sin, and demand the putting of it away. But he who is first convinced that the sin in question is really sin, and that the putting it away is really God's will, should not be frightened by any objection from expressing his conviction, and improving the others, who perhaps are only weak, but not hardened. A lack of conscientiousness and courage in this respect is truly lamentable; it is ominous and ruinous for those in question. Joy in God, on the other hand, has its great blessings under all circumstances, even when, instead of good resulting, at first only opposition, scorn, and persecution are reaped. Besides, a good transaction never remains entirely, at least never very long, wholly without results.

Vers. 5-8. It is indeed possible, yea, usually the case, that the first better feelings which dawn at a reformation are transitory. Many let themselves be carried away by the awakening voices of the better spirits, so that they to a certain extent outrun themselves, and regard themselves as capable of the severest self-sacrifices; but afterwards, when they come to realize the difficulties to be overcome, in all their magnitude, they shrink back from them as quickly as they had before resolved to overcome them. Even because they are so great, they deem themselves excused from carrying out their resolution. And the longer they hesitate the more grounds they find to justify the sins that were to be put away. He who would truly improve a congregation should therefore never be satisfied with a first good resolution on their part; his earnestness, his sorrow, his prayer must endure, and it must be felt by all, that he has no rest and no joy until the good resolution has become act and fact. But if anything, such a perseverance will have the power to deepen and render permanent the penitence of the congregation, so that, as in our history, it takes the steps with earnestness and zeal, that are necessary to carry out the good resolution.

Vers. 9-12. The wife was not in such a high station among the Israelites as among Christians. Polygamy was still allowed. Yet the true relation to God and the recognition of the truth, that the woman had been created in the divine image, already involved, that the position of the man towards the woman was much better than among the heathen Asiatics. The demand that wives and children should be dismissed was at any rate, for the most of the parties concerned, one of the hardest that could at all be made. But a true reformer should not hesitate to demand even the hardest things of the congregation of the Lord, and express his demand with clearness and definiteness. His rule is God's word and will alone. Every modification, weakening, and rendering it easy on his part, renders his work of reformation all the more difficult. For it deprives him of his authority as an instrument of God; he thereby abandons the only safe foundation, besides passes over to act in his own name. It renders it difficult for the congregation to follow him. For to do God's pure and clear will there is ever to be found fresh readiness, but to execute the will of a man, or what he may think proper, does not satisfy. The divine will often demands much—very much—but its accomplishment has a corresponding blessing, but this fails if God's demand is weakened by human devices.

Vers. 13-17. 1. We cannot blame the authorities for assembling the people without delay even in the cold and rainy season of the year. The removal of transgressions against God's law and will admits of no delay. But again, it would not have been justifiable for Ezra to have prepared additional unnecessary burdens for the people, who already had besides enough to bear in the burden they had taken on themselves if He exposed them to the injuries of the storm, so to speak, punished them. Towards him who is willing to impose upon himself every self-denial, even the hardest, for the sake of the word of God, every possible forbearance has ever its proper place. And under all circumstances he who would carry out a difficult work of reformation has to take care that everything moves on in order.

2. From our point of view, the dismissal of strange wives with their children, seems extravagantly severe,—without doubt there were also many in the congregation of that time who found the demand of Ezra beyond measure hard, many who might be ruined by this proceeding. Notwithstanding, if we properly estimate all the circumstances of that period, and especially the great dangers that threatened the very existence of the congregation, we will be obliged to regard Ezra as in the right. We are not always to avoid that which may be a stumbling-block. The point of view which alone decides at last, is ever that the communion with the Lord must be re-established or furthered; all communion and friendship with men must stand in the background. If, when we let the latter retire to the background we be regarded as destitute of consideration and the like, we may easily put up with it. Even the opinion of men already prepares a martyrdom, to which Peter's word may be applied, "happy are ye; for the Spirit of glory and of God resteth upon you." 1 Pet. iv. 14. What a thorough success his proceeding without regard to consequences had is clear from Neh. viii.—x.; for it certainly already gave an important impulse to the renewal of the covenant there narrated,—it is clear then moreover from Ps. cxi. and cxii., which praise the Lord still for the redemption given to the people, at the same time, however, already are full of praise of the law and the disposition in accordance with the law, especially also from Ps. cxix., if it originated already in this period where the poet, just as Ezra in chap. ix., refers to deadly peril, from which the Lord only has delivered him, or removed him, and the one thought that only in the keeping of the divine commandments is salvation, is given with variation, comp. especially ver. 37 sq.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-4. The power of sorrow over sin (if it be a true, divine sorrow): 1) It moves the pious to sympathy and sorrow; 2) the more intelligent to the recognition of sin; 3) the guilty, at least in part, to the resolution to put away sin.—The possibility of hope in God: 1) In spite of what circumstances: even when the pious leaders sorrow, and the more intelligent are obliged to admit great transgression; 2) under what conditions: when we are ready to re-establish the communion with God by putting away sin, and again cheer those sorrowing for it.—STARKE: If we have sinned and deserved punishment, we should not despair. or let go every hope, as if we were out and out ruined; but we should confess the sins committed, lament and grieve for them, and take our refuge with the mercy of God.

Vers. 5-8. How will it be better! 1) If he who has to represent the cause of God obligates superiors (fathers and teachers) to do their duty and suffers sorrow so long as they have not accomplished their work.—STARKE: Preachers should be an example for the people (1 Tim. iv. 12), that they should see their good works and be likewise incited to good.—In the example of the great is a great power for evil and also for good. 2) When the superiors earnestly and zealously take heed to remove the general transgression. 3) When those who would not follow are excluded from communion with the others.—STARKE: Those who publicly sin should be publicly chastised, in order that others also may fear. Preachers should chastise with especial earnestness where there is loose conduct in matter of marriage.—In true conversion we must for God's sake renounce that which is hard and difficult for us to renounce.

Vers. 9-12. True willingness to set aside that which separates from God: 1) on the side of the people—they follow the call of their superiors punctually, with zeal, in spite of external difficulties; 2) on the side of the teacher—he sincerely shows the people their sins, and requires of them also confidently the most difficult things; 3) on the side of those who have sinned—they vow to free themselves from their guilt.—The duty of loving God more than our nearest relatives. 1) When we are to follow it—always and under all circumstances, even when to fulfil it is especially difficult. 2) What it means—especially this, that we do wrong in letting our highest good be imperilled by relatives, by our wives or by our children,—that we are therefore bound to choose the wife, above all, with reference to the Lord; 3) upon what it is based—on our having to give the Lord praise and honor (comp. ver. 11).—BRANTIUS: Non est quidem matrimonium sine consensu et sine promissione, at illa non sufficiunt. In contractu matrimonii requiritur legis observatio.

[SOORT: Genuine humiliation before God and sorrow for sin always produce works meet for repentance.—Fervent affections should not be allowed to subside till our most beloved sins have been renounced.—HENRY: Our weeping for other people's sins may perhaps set them a weeping for themselves, who otherwise would have continued senseless and remorseless.—Then there is hope of people when they are convinced not only that 'tis good to part with their sins, but that 'tis indispensably necessary. — WORDSWORTH: Prayer may preach; the sighs and sobs of the penitent are sometimes the best sermons; but prayers and tears avail not without practice.—TR.]

THE BOOK OF NEHEMIAH.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. THE BOOK AND ITS CONTENTS.

THE Book of Nehemiah holds a conspicuous place in the sacred canon as the last historic composition of the ante-christian period. With the exception of the prophecy of Malachi, it gives us the last clear look at the Jewish state before it reappears in the bright light of the gospels. We see the returned people—a small remnant of the children of Jacob—continuing the national line in the ancestral land toward the Messiah, with holy vitality enough (as it were) for this one purpose, but with a general mortification existing throughout the nation. The ark of the covenant was gone, the Shechinah no longer illuminated the holy of holies, the Urim and Thummim had long ceased, the bulk of the people were lost in captivity from Armenia to Elam, and Israel, instead of being an independent commonwealth, with a mighty and magnificent capital, had become a petty province of Persia, while Jerusalem was but a half-rebuilt ruin. Yet, with all this, prophets were still vouchsafed to the Abrahamic line. Haggai and Zechariah had by the use of their prophetic power certified the special presence of Jehovah at the building of the second temple, and Malachi, more than a century later, urged the people to renewed spirituality in the name of the Lord. From Neh. vi. 10, 12, 14, we are led to believe that between Haggai and Malachi many prophets appeared before returned Israel, although some of them prostituted their divine gift to low and false ends.

This twilight age of Jewry is lighted up by the writings of Ezra and Nehemiah as the evening is often re-illuminated by the absent sun's reflection upon a cloud high in the zenith. They give us an inlook into the style of life assumed by the nation in its lingering decadence. We enter the holy city—we see and hear the men—we note their tendencies, and mark the old, strange mingling of patriotism and devotion with a philoxeny that was destructive of both. The narratives bring us into close contact with the people. Nehemiah's words are simple, betraying not the least effort of the rhetorician, but their very homeliness makes the scenes described most life-like. We see throughout the writing of an honest, earnest man,—and through him the history closes with a sublime dignity.

The book of Nehemiah was included by the old Jews with the book of Ezra, and the latter name was given to the two. In the Vulgate the book of Ezra appears as the first book of Esdras, and the book of Nehemiah as the second book of Esdras. The Geneva Bible introduced our present nomenclature, and thus made the Apocryphal third and fourth books of Esdras to be numbered as the first and second.

The language is a pure Hebrew, with here and there such an Aramaism as חָלַל in the sense of "deal corruptly" (chap. i. 7), סָדָה in the sense of "tribute" (chap. v. 4), and שָׁלַח in the sense of "consult." This book, Ezra and the Chronicles offer to us the same general linguistic appearance. Such ἀπαξ λεγόμενα as גִּבּוֹר (chap. vii. 8) and חֲתָלָה (chap. xii. 31) are the peculiarities of the individual writer, and no marks of a different period.

The main subject of the book is the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem, which, in the largest sense, if we include the dedication of the walls and the events occurring during the building, occupies nearly ten chapters of the thirteen which compose the book, namely, chap. iii.—chap. xii. 43. Previous to the wall-building we have the account of Nehemiah's concern for the holy city, his earnest prayer for the divine guidance, his request of the king of Persia, his journey (by royal permission and order) to Jerusalem as its governor, his careful examination of the ruined walls, his encouragement of the people to rebuild them and their consent, and his bold front against the neighboring enemies of the Jews. This preliminary narrative occupies the first two chapters. We may divide the next ten chapters regarding the wall-building and the dedication into—(1) The apportionment of the work, chap. iii.; (2) The opposition from enemies without, chap. iv.; (3) The hindrance from domestic dissensions, chap. v.; (4) The opposition by combination between the outer enemies and their Jewish allies. The wall finished, chap. vi.; (5) The ordering of the city. To this end the genealogies are examined, chap. vii. (6) Religious services follow, to wit: the public reading of the law by Ezra and his assistants. Preparation for and keeping the feast of tabernacles, chap. viii.; (7) Extraordinary fast, with confession, chap. ix.; (8) A covenant sealed touching obedience to the law, separation from foreigners, observation of the Sabbath days and years, and support of the temple service, chap. x.; (9) The settlement of the families in the holy city and the other towns, chap. xi.; (10) A preliminary list of priests and Levites. The dedication of the wall, chap. xii. 1-43.

The remainder of the book, viz., chap. xii. 44—chap. xiii., contains an account of the appointment of officers over the treasures, and the ordering of the singers and porters, the thorough separation of Israel from the strangers, according to the law, and lastly (from chap. xiii. 4), an account of Nehemiah's second visit to Jerusalem, and his stern dealing with Eliashib's family for their alliances with Sanballat and Tobiah, together with his other resolute measures of reform. (See the scheme following.)

§ 2. THE AUTHOR AND HIS TIME.

That Nehemiah is the author of the book, all agree. Much of it is written in the first person, and claims thus to be the writing of Nehemiah himself. But while it is agreed that Nehemiah is the author of the book, yet some learned commentators, such as Archdeacon HERVEY, pronounce a large part of the book to have been inserted by other (though authorized) hands. From chap. vii. 6 to xii. 26 inclusive the matter is supposed to be inserted, as also the passage chap. xii. 44-47. KEIL, on the other hand, stoutly argues for Nehemiah's authorship throughout. The truth is probably between these extremes. The genealogy in chap. vii. 6-73 (virtually the same as that in Ezra ii. 1-70) is undoubtedly an inserted public document, and yet in this we can see Nehemiah's hand making the addition of ver. 65 and ver. 70 b regarding his own (the Tirshatha's) action in reference to matters alluded to in the older document.* So the record in chap. xii. 1-26 is evidently an insertion, giving lists of priests and Levites from Zerubbabel's day to the time of Alexander the Great (Jaddua—vers. 11, 22), a century after Nehemiah. KEIL's attempt to explain away this latter is labored and unsatisfactory. The rest of the supposed inserted portion we take to be Nehemiah's own. The fact that Nehemiah does not there speak in the first person only parallels his book with that of Daniel, where the first person and the third person are interchangeably used. Ezra's prominence in this part of the narrative is simply caused by Ezra's priestly duties requiring him to be the prominent figure,† and only exhibits Nehemiah's modesty in the record. The resemblance to Ezra's style and the different construction of the prayer in chap. ix. from that in chap. i. are arguments of a very frail character. The general likeness of chap. xi. 8-36 and 1 Chron. ix. 2-34 makes nothing against Nehemiah's authorship of that portion. There is no good reason for denying a regular chronological sequence in this part of the book in perfect consonance with the rest, and we cannot but consider the attempts to throw doubt here on Nehemiah's authorship as an effort of the destructive criticism that is so headlong and heedless in its efforts. Nehemiah* (Heb. נְחֵמְיָה, Nehemyah, "compassion of Jehovah") was of the tribe of Judah, and probably of the royal stock. The expressions in chap. i. 6 and ii. 5, together with his special activity in the matter of re-establishing Jerusalem, and his acceptability by his countrymen, and also his high position at the Persian court, all seem to suggest this fact of Nehemiah's birth. His father was Hachaliah, of whom we know nothing. The name Nehemiah was probably a common one. Many have supposed that Nehemiah was a priest, but there is no more satisfactory ground for such a notion than the occurrence of his name, as Tirshatha, before the names of the priests in chap. x. 1. He was cup-bearer to Artaxerxes (Heb. אֶרְטַחְשַׁטָּא, Artahshasta), king of Persia. This position was a very high one at court, and brought him into close and intimate relations with the monarch, whence came his ability (when his soul was stirred for Jerusalem) to carry out his measures of aid and reform for his beloved ancestral country. His character appears to us as faultless. Patriotism, piety, prudence, perseverance, probity and courage equally marked his administration of affairs. He renounced the luxuries of the Persian court for the hardships of what might almost be called a primitive and frontier life, in order to save his country from physical and moral ruin; in all his varied trials he looked up to the guidance and protection of his God; he used methods with careful discrimination, he pursued his determined course unflinchingly, he set an example of self-abnegation and liberal dealing, and met the enemies without and within the nation with equal firmness and success. The time in which Nehemiah flourished was clearly that of Artaxerxes I. (Longimanus). This king's 32d year is mentioned in chap. xiii. 6. Only three kings of Persia had a 32d year in their reigns—Darius I. (Hystaspis), Artaxerxes I. (Longimanus), and Artaxerxes II. (Mnemon). Now this Artaxerxes could not be Darius, for in Ezra vi. 14 the two names are contrasted, as of different monarchs. Whoever the Artaxerxes may be there, his name in that connection shows that Darius was not known as Artaxerxes. The date of Artaxerxes II. is far too late for the chronological position of Eliashib, as high priest. We are therefore shut up to Artaxerxes I. as the monarch mentioned by Nehemiah. Josephus calls the king Xerxes, but the chronology of Joseph is so wretchedly corrupt in the matter of Nehemiah, Ezra, Sanballat, etc., that it is waste time to give him attention.†

* This document, so amended by Nehemiah, has been incorporated in Ezra.

† The Rev. Mr. Haigh has urged a very bold and ingenious theory, but one that will not bear examination,—that Ezra and Nehemiah went to Jerusalem together. (See Transact. of the Soc. of Bib. Arch., Vol. II.)

In Artaxerxes I.'s time Persia was in its zenith of splendor and power, although the elements of decay were already beginning to work in the empire. Artaxerxes had come to the throne through the assassination of his father, Xerxes, by the chief of the guard, Artabanus. At the instigation of Artabanus, he put his brother Darius to death as the murderer of his father, but on discovering the designs of Artabanus against himself, he slew the double traitor. He subdued a revolt headed by his brother Hystaspes, reduced rebellious Egypt, and terminated the long hostilities with Greece by the peace of Callias. The empire then enjoyed a period of quiet, which may be regarded as the culminating point of its glory, during which the events of Nehemiah's history occurred.

The name Artaxerxes is the Greek and Artahshasta is the Hebrew for the old Persian Artakhsbatra from Artā (very) and Khshatra (powerful). Herodotus translates it μέγα ἀπῆτος. Khshatra is allied to the Khshatram (empire) of the Behistun inscription (Col. i. Par. 9, 11, 12, 13, 14) and to Khshayathiya (king). The second element of the name is not identical with the name Xerxes, which is in old Persian Khshayarsha.

* The name Nehemiah occurs twice in the book as referring to others than the author—to Nehemiah, son of Asbuk, in chap. iii. 16, and to Nehemiah, a companion of Zerubbabel in chap. vii. 7.

† Josephus puts both Ezra and Nehemiah in the reign of Xerxes, son of Darius, and speaks of Xerxes' twenty-eighth year! He also makes Nehemiah to be two years and four months building the walls. He puts the story of Esther in the time of Artaxerxes, and makes Sanballat to be appointed satrap at Samaria by Darius Codomannus.

§ 3. SCHEME OF THE BOOK.

I. Before the wall-building (chaps. i, ii.).

1. Nehemiah's sadness (chap. i.).
2. Nehemiah's request of the king (chap. ii. 1-8).
3. Nehemiah's journey (chap. ii. 9-11).
4. Nehemiah's inspection and counsel (chap. ii. 12-20).

II. The wall-building (chap. iii.—xii. 43).

1. The stations (chap. iii.).
2. The opposition from without (chap. iv.).
3. The opposition from within (chap. v.).
4. The craft used by the enemies (chap. vi.).
5. The ordering of the city (chap. vii. 1-4).
6. The genealogy (chap. vii. 5-73).
7. The law-reading on the first of Tisri (chap. viii. 1-12).
8. The preparations for the feast of tabernacles (chap. viii. 13-16)
9. The feast of tabernacles (chap. viii. 17, 18).
10. The extraordinary fast (chaps. ix., x.).
11. The distribution of inhabitants (chap. xi.).
12. The Levitical Genealogy (chap. xii. 1-26).
13. The dedication of the walls (chap. xii. 27-43).

III. After the wall building.

1. Levitical apportionments (chap. xii. 44-47).
2. The separation of the Erev (mixed multitude—chap. xiii. 1-3).
- * * * * *
3. Nehemiah's reforms twelve years later (chap. xiii. 4-31).

THE BOOK OF NEHEMIAH.

CHAPTER I. 1-11.

1 THE words [history] of Nehemiah, the son of Hachaliah. And it came to pass in the month Chisleu, in the twentieth year [of Artaxerxes], as I was in Shushan
2 the palace [the citadel of Susa], that Hanani, one of my brethren, came, he and certain men of Judah; and I asked them concerning the Jews that had escaped [the Jews, the delivered ones], which were left [over] of the captivity, and con-
3 cerning Jerusalem. And they said unto me, The remnant [the left-over ones] that are left [over] of the captivity there in the province are in great affliction and reproach: the wall of Jerusalem also is broken down, and the gates thereof are 4 burned with fire. And it came to pass, when I heard these words, that I sat down and wept, and mourned certain days, and fasted,<sup>1</sup> and prayed before the God of hea-
5 ven, and said, I beseech thee, O LORD God of heaven, the great and terrible God that keepeth covenant and mercy [i. e. the merciful covenant] for them that love him
6 and observe his commandments: Let thine ear now be attentive, and thine eyes open, that thou mayst hear the prayer of thy servant, which I pray before thee now [to-day], day and night, for the children of Israel thy servants, and confess the sins of the children of Israel, which we have sinned against thee: both I and 7 my father's house have sinned. We have dealt very corruptly<sup>2</sup> against thee, and have not kept the commandments, nor the statutes, nor the judgments, which thou
8 commandedst thy servant Moses. Remember, I beseech thee the word that thou commandedst thy servant Moses, saying, If ye transgress, I will scatter you abroad
9 among the nations: but if ye turn unto me and keep my commandments, and do them; though there were of you cast out unto the uttermost part of the heaven, yet will I gather them from thence, and will bring them unto the place that I have 10 chosen to set my name there. Now these are thy servants and thy people, whom 11 thou hast redeemed by thy great power, and by thy strong hand. O Lord, I beseech thee, let now thine ear be attentive to the prayer of thy servant, and to the prayer of thy servants, who desire to fear thy name: and prosper, I pray thee, thy servant this day, and grant him mercy in the sight of this man [i. e. Artaxerxes]. For I was the king's cup-bearer.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 4. וָאֲמַרְתִּי. Here and in 2 Sam. xii. 23 the participle. Here the auxiliary verb expressed. After וָאֲמַרְתִּי supply וָאֲמַרְתִּי, as in Dan. x. 14.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 7. חָבַל חָבַלְנוּ לָךְ. Aben Ezra and most of the Jewish commentators count this a Chel'dalism as in Dan. vi. 23, 24 (22, 23). In Gen. vi. 12 בְּיִהְיֹתָם כָּל-בָּשָׂר is translated by Onkelos אֲרִי חָבַלְתִּי כָּל בָּשָׂרָא. The meaning of "act corruptly" is, however, found in Job xxxiv. 31. It may be an early Aramaic signification.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Tidings from Jerusalem.

Ver. 1. The title of the book is contained in its first four (Hebrew) words, *Divre Nehemyah Ben 'Hachalyah,* i. e., The words of Nehemiah, the son of Hachaliah*.—Even the prophets sometimes begin their books in this way (see Jer. i. 1, and Amos i. 1), although with them the Devar Yehovah (the Word of the Lord) finds its place soon after. The absence of the Devar Yehovah here is nothing against the inspired character of the book. Its presence in the prophets is simply a token of their prophetic character, as they speak to the people directly in God's name with a special message. In the historical books, even in the Pentateuch, the sacred foundation of them all, this phrase very naturally is not found. Here, as in 1 Chron. xxix. 29, and elsewhere, "the words of" are really "the words about," or "the history of." In Jer. i. 1, Amos i. 1, etc., they have the literal meaning. (Dathe rightly "historia Nehemiah"). (For the name and history of Nehemiah, see the Introduction).

The starting-point of Nehemiah's words (or history) is in the month Chisleu, in the twentieth year, in Shushan the palace.—Chisleu was the ninth month, Abib or Nisan (in which the passover fell) being the first. Chisleu would thus answer to parts of November and December. Josephus makes it (Xaolēi) the same as the Macedonian Apellæus (Ant. xii. 7, 6), which was the second month of the Macedonian year, whose first month Dios began at the autumnal equinox. Apellæus would thus be from the latter part of October to the latter part of November. Josephus was probably satisfied in identifying the two months of Chisleu and Apellæus, to find some portion of time belonging equally to both. They certainly did not coincide throughout.

Chisleu is not likely to be a Persian month-name, as has been conjectured. The Behistun inscription gives us eight Persian month-names, to wit, Bagayadish, Viyakhna, Garmapada, At-riyatiya, Anamaka, Thuravahara, Thaigarchish and Adukanish. It is true that in all but the first of these battles are recorded as occurring, so that they are not probably winter months. Yet the style of the names would scarcely warrant us in supposing that Chisleu would be in such a list. As Chisleu appears on a Palmyrene inscription (Chaslul), it may be of Syrian origin. This month-name occurs in the Hebrew only after the captivity, to wit, in this place and in Zech. vii. 1. Fuerst suggests Cheuil (Orion-Mars) as the base of the name, the name being brought from Babylonia by the exiles; but the name is found in the Assyrian, as are the other (so-supposed) Persian month-names of the Jews, which is strong presumptive evidence of their Shemitic origin.

The "twentieth year" is, as in chap. ii. 1, the twentieth year of Artaxerxes (Heb. Artahshasta). who reigned from B. C. 465 to 425. The year designated is therefore parts of B. C. 446 and 445, when the "age of Pericles" was beginning in Athens, and when Rome was yet unknown to the world. (For Artaxerxes, see Introduction). "Shushan the palace" (Heb. Shushan Habbirah) was the royal portion of the "city Shushan" (Esther iii. 15). Shushan or Susa (now Sus) lay between the Eulæus (Ulai) and Shapur rivers, in a well-watered district, and was the capital of Susiana or Cissia, the Scriptural Elam (Isa. xi. 11) the country lying between the southern Zagros mountains and the Tigris. It early furnished a dynasty to Babylonia (Gen. xiv. 1), was conquered by Asshur-bani-pal about B. C. 660, and shortly afterward fell to the lot of the later Babylonian Empire. When the Persians had conquered this Empire, Susa was made a royal residence by Darius Hystaspes, who built the great palace, whose ruins now attract the attention of archaeologists. Artaxerxes (the king of Nehemiah's time) repaired the palace, whose principal features resembled those of the chief edifice at Persepolis, the older capital of the Persian Empire. The present ruins of Susa cover a space about a mile square, the portion of which near the river Shapur is probably "Shushan the palace."

Athenæus (xii. 8) says, Κληθῆναι τὰ Σούσα φησιν Ἀριστόβουλος καὶ Χάρης διὰ τὴν ὑραιότητα τοῦ τόπου· σούσον γὰρ εἶναι τῇ Ἑλλήνων ('Ελυμαίων) φωνῇ τὸ κρίνον. So Steph. Byzant., Σούσα, ἀπὸ τῶν κρίνων, ἃ πολλὰ ἐν τῇ χώρᾳ πεφύκει ἐκείνῃ. If this be true we must accord it a Shemitic origin, which is against other evidence. Shushan may be a Turanian or an Aryan word, whose likeness to "Shushan" (Shemit. for lily) has deceived the old writers. Susa was the court's principal residence, Ecбатана or Persepolis being visited for the summer only, and Babylon being sometimes occupied in the depth of winter.

Ver. 2. Nehemiah is informed of the sad condition of Jerusalem and the colony of Jews in Judea by Hanani and others. His words are Hanani, one of my brethren, came, he and certain men of Judah, etc. Hanani was literally brother to Nehemiah, as we see from chap. vii. 1. He afterward was appointed one of the assistant governors of Jerusalem by Nehemiah (ch. vii. 2). He is not to be confounded with Hanani, a priest, mentioned in chap. xii. 38, and (perhaps the same) in Ezra x. 20. Of Judah may be read from Judah as denoting place rather than tribal distinction. The words would thus refer to the verb "came," and naturally introduce Nehemiah's question. That the colony was called "Judah," see chap. ii. 7.

Nehemiah asked them concerning the Jews that had escaped, which were left of the captivity, and concerning Jerusalem. Heb. happel'etah asher nisharu min hash-shevi (lit. "the deliverance which were left over from the captivity"). The abstract is used as a concrete collective noun. Although the greater part of the Jews preferred to live in the land to which their ancestors had been carried captive, yet to the pious heart those who returned to the old country were recognized as the "deliverance," or the "delivered ones," "escaped ones." The journey from Jerusalem to Susa by Tadmor or by Tiphshah is over a thousand miles long, and at the usual rate of Oriental travelling would take at least 45 days. With the natural causes to retard so long a journey, we may safely call it a two months' travel. Ezra, with his caravan, was four months on his journey from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezra vii. 9).

Ver. 8. Nehemiah's informers tell him that the remnant (han-nishkarim, "the left-over ones") in the province are in great affliction (the general word for adversity) and reproach (the word explaining the cause of the adversity). They were the objects of scorn and contemptuous treatment from the neighboring peoples. The wall of Jerusalem they also represent as broken down and its gates burned. Nebuchadnezzar had broken down the walls a hundred and forty-two years before (2 Kings xxv. 10) and the attempt to rebuild them had been stopped by the Pseudo-Smerdis (the Artaxerxes of Ezra iv. 7) seventy-six years before this embassy to Nehemiah. After that, in the reign of Darius Hystaspes, the temple had been finished, but the walls seem not to have been touched. The burnt gates were also, doubtless, the old wreck from Nebuchadnezzar's time. There is no reason for supposing that the walls had been rebuilt, and again destroyed. Hanani and the men of Judah add to their statement of the affliction and reproach of the province that the walls still remain in their old ruined condition.

Ver. 4. Nehemiah's prayer. The tidings brought by Hanani and the others deeply moved Nehemiah, and led him to a special season of humiliation and prayer. His grief was doubtless increased at the thought that all this evil existed in spite of Ezra's work, for Ezra had gone to Jerusalem thirteen years before. He sat down and wept and mourned certain days and fasted and prayed.—That is, he withdrew from his court duties, and spent a period of retirement (comp. Ps. cxxxvii. 1 for the phrase "sat down and wept") in most sincere sorrow, which compelled his fasting and prayer, as its godly manifestations. The phrase God of heaven (Elohe hash-shamayim) is supposed by some to be only found with the writers of the Babylonish or post-Babylonish period, Daniel, Ezra, Nehemiah, and the author of the 136th Psalm, but we find it in Gen. xxiv. 8, 7, and in Jonah i. 9. The style is repeated in Rev. xi. 13 and xvi. 11 (ὁ θεὸς τοῦ οὐρανοῦ). It was a natural epithet to distinguish Jehovah from the gods of earth, formed of earthly substances. The phrase cannot properly be called Persian, as the reference in Jonah proves. Moreover, it does not occur in the long Behistun inscription. If it was used by the later Persians, it is as likely to have been taken from the Jews as vice versa.

Ver. 5. Terrible is awe-inspiring, מַרְאִי, the Niphal participle of מָרָא (to tremble). That keepeth covenant and mercy.—Lit. That keepeth the covenant and mercy, by hendiadys for "the covenant of mercy," or "the merciful covenant" established in the world's Messiah, but centrally and typically in the Israelitish system. Observe his commandments—or keep his commandments; the same verb as before. God keeps the covenant for them who keep His commandments. This is not a doctrine of meritorious works, but of adhering faith. See its explanation in John vi. 28, 29, where the work of God is a sincere faith. The essence of faith is love, whose definition is given in 2 John 6. "The great and terrible God" is a phrase borrowed from Deut. vii. 21, and "that keepeth—observe his commandments" is from the 9th verse of the same chapter. The Pentateuch has furnished much of the religious phraseology of the nation in all ages. (Comp. Dan. ix. 4.)

Ver. 6. After this address to Jehovah as the awe-inspiring and yet covenant-keeping God, he asks God to hear him as the representative of his nation. The phrase, let thine ear be attentive, and thine eyes open, that thou mayest hear, is peculiar. It is derived from Solomon's prayer (1 Kings viii. 29, 52), and has reference, doubtless, to the greater attention paid by the ear when the eyes are opened towards the source of the sound.

Now, day and night.—Lit. to-day, day and night. His prayer was oft repeated in the course of these days of separation and mourning at hours of the night, as well as at the usual hours of daily prayer. Which we have sinned.—Nehemiah has a clear sense of his identification with his people in sin as in misery. Both I and my father's house have sinned.—From this mention of his father's house we have a strong reason to believe that Nehemiah was of the royal house of Judah. It is hard to understand his special mention of his father's house, unless it had been a conspicuous family in the nation. (See the Introduction.)

Ver. 7. The commandments, nor the statutes, nor the judgments.—Heb.: eth-ham-mitzoth weth-hahukkim weth-hammishpatim. It is almost impossible to draw the distinction between the meanings of these three words. They were probably used in the fulness of the legal style. Commandment, statute and judgment are the nearest English equivalents, but here they are all subjected to the verb corresponding to the first noun ("command"), and we must thus loosely refer them to the various forms of the divine commandments. The 119th Psalm seems to use these words as synonymous. (See on ch. ix. 13, 14.)

Ver. 8. Remember, I beseech thee, the word.—After the confession of sin comes the plea of God's promise. See Deut. iv. 25-31, xxx. 1-10. Not the words, but the spirit of the promise, is given.

Ver. 11. Who desire to fear thy name.—The name of God is His expression in His word or work. The declaration of a desire to fear God is a modest assertion of a true fear of God, but with a consciousness of its imperfection. This man—King Artaxerxes.—Nearness to God enables Nehemiah to think of the "great king" as only a man. The "this" does not indicate that he was in the king's presence when he prayed, but that he was brought into close relations with the king. For I was the king's cup-bearer.—The position of cup-bearer to the king was an exalted one (comp. Gen. xl. 21). Rab-shakeh (the name given to one of Sennacherib's envoys to Hezekiah, 2 Kings xviii. 17) means "chief cup-bearer." The monuments of Egypt, Assyria, and Persia show the high rank of the cupbearer. Nehemiah's high position as cup-bearer is an additional argument for his relationship to the royal family of Judah, for the Oriental despots loved to have men of royal blood to wait upon them. (See Dan. i. 8.) This phrase, "for I was the king's cup-bearer," is added as explanatory of the allusion to the king.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The interest of Nehemiah in the forlorn condition of Jerusalem had a deep religious character. Patriotism and piety were closely related in a people whose land had been the scene of a theocracy, and in a man of Nehemiah's character the piety is conspicuous in every impulse of his patriotism. It is sad to reflect that when such opportunity for a return to the Holy Land had been given by Cyrus, that only 50,000 Jews availed themselves of it, out of, probably, an aggregate of millions. The manner in which the affairs of the Jewish province dragged from Cyrus' day to the time of Nehemiah, a period of nearly a hundred years, was not due only or chiefly to the opposition of local enemies, supported by the Persian government, but had its chief cause in the apathy and self-seeking of the Jewish people. Nehemiah's piety is thus no type of the religious condition of the Jews of his day, but is a conspicuous exception to the general state of his people.

2. Fasting, with the exception of that on the day of atonement, was with the Jews (before tradition supplanted God's word) left to the suggestion of the occasion. It grew out of a deep grief or an anxious foreboding. Nehemiah's fast, continuing for several days, must have been not a total abstinence from food, but a withdrawal from all pleasurable forms of eating, his sorrow rendering him averse to all indulgence in the pleasures of the palate.

3. The "day and night" prayer of Nehemiah was no "vain repetition," as his wounded spirit and his humble faith gave life to every utterance. He had two facts before him—the greatness of God and the sinfulness of God's chosen people. On these he would graft the return of the people and the mercy of God. Some, like himself, were looking Godward, and had not God promised mercy to such? The favor of the Persian monarch would be the expression of God's grace.

4. The rule of obedience ("if ye turn unto me and keep my commandments, and do them," etc.) is not the way of salvation, but of continued prosperity. The love of God is assumed in his children. Their happiness now depends on their obedience. "If ye love me, keep my commandments." The Jews were in covenant with God. Keeping commandments had not brought them there, but keeping commandments would fill them with the blessings of the covenant.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-4. Genuine patriotism. 1) When and where it is roused: both at a distance and in those who, in their prosperity, could easily forget their country and the people to whom they belong. 2) Concerning what it asks: concerning the prosperity of those whom the Lord has preserved or selected, that they should strive for a better future. 3) What it finds the hardest to bear: that its country and people are in distress, and even in reproach, and that they are wanting in power to protect the goods confided to them.

STARKE: In prosperity we should not forget our poor relations or acquaintances, but should ask after them, Gen. xliii. 27. We should make the necessities of the saints our own, and give account of them to others. Rom. xii. 12.

Our greatest and final wish: 1) Concerning what we ask; there remains to us, even in prosperity and high position, if indeed we are godly, still one question, that is, concerning the kingdom of God, and its approach, and indeed only this certainly can satisfy us, that it comes continually more to us, to our families and our people; without it nothing is of worth to us, for without it there is no stability. 2) Concerning what we mourn for; that thus far, always so much the opposite of that takes place which should take place in relation to the kingdom of God. 3) Before whom we bear it: before the Lord with mourning, fasting and prayer.

STARKE: If the saints of God had great love and yearning for their fatherland, the earthly Jerusalem (Ps. li. 20; cxxxvii. 5), how much greater love and yearning should we have for the heavenly Jerusalem! Heb. xii. 22; xliii. 14. Although a Christian is neither bound to the Jewish nor to the Romish fasts of the present day, still he should practice sobriety. 1 Pet. iv. 8. The judgments of God cannot better be averted than by true humiliation, fervent prayer and honest reformation. Gen. xviii. 23 sq.

Vers. 5-11. The nature of the true petition (for Jerusalem, for the Church): 1) It proceeds from true love; is therefore persistent and fervent: Nehemiah prays (ver. 6) day and night for the children of Israel. 2) It rests upon the humble recognition of one's own worthlessness (although standing before God as priest, the petitioner includes himself nevertheless to the inmost with those for whom he prays). 3) It is full of faith, in spite of sin and punishment, on the ground of the divine promise.

The foundations for our faith in the time of oppression: 1) God's promise, after the chastisements which we have merited, to allow mercy again to rule. 2) God's former evident proofs of grace, particularly the greatest, that He has freed us by His great power (shining dead), and has made us His servants. 3) God's divine nature itself, which cannot be false to itself, and cannot leave unfinished that which it has begun.

STARKE: The knowledge of God through the law and through the gospel must be united, otherwise the latter makes confident epicurean and rough people; but the former, hesitating and timid doubters (vers. 4, 5). Neither must we excuse the sins and transgressions of our ancestors. Dan. ix. 16.—Whoever stands in the consciousness of the poverty of his spirit does not exclude himself from sinners, but still always humbles himself before God. Dan. ix. 7; 1 Tim. i. 15; 1 John i. 8. God knows our weakness beforehand, and knows that we will stumble in the future. Matt. xxvi. 31. God's choice is unalterable, and He keeps faith forever. Ps. cxlvi. 6; Jer. iii. 12. We should grasp God's promises and favors by true faith, and base ourselves upon them in prayer. Ps. xxvii. 8; Mark xi. 24. We are God's property and servants, and have been dearly bought and freed.

1 Pet. ii. 9. If we wish to obtain anything from men, especially from those in power, we should first seek it in prayer from God, for their hearts also are in God's hand, and He can incline them as He will. Prov. xxi. 1; Esther iv. 16.

CHAPTER II. 1-20.

- 1 AND it came to pass in the month Nisan in the twentieth year of Artaxerxes the King that wine was before him: and I took up the wine and gave it unto the 2 king. Now I had not been beforetime sad in his presence. Wherefore [and] the king said unto me, Why is thy countenance sad, seeing thou art not sick? this is nothing else but sorrow of heart. Then I was very sore afraid, and said unto
 3 the king, Let the king live for ever: why should not my countenance be sad, when the city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres, lieth waste, and the gates thereof are
 4 consumed with fire? Then the king said unto me, For what dost thou make request? So I prayed to the God of heaven. And I said unto the king, If it please
 5 the king, and if thy servant have found favor in thy sight, that thou wouldest send me unto Judah, unto the city of my father's sepulchres, that I may build it. And
 6 the king said unto me, (the queen also sitting by him,) For how long shall thy journey be? And when wilt thou return? So it pleased the king to send me; and
 7 I set him a time. Moreover I said unto the king, If it please the king, let letters be given me to the governors beyond the river [Euphrates], that they may convey 8 me over [i. e. from country to country] till I come into Judah; and a letter unto Asaph the keeper of the king's forest, that he may give me timber to make beams
 9 for the gates of the palace which appertained to the house [i. e. temple], and for the wall of the city, and for the house [i. e. temple] that I shall enter into [to inspect]. And the king granted me, according to the good hand of my God upon me.
 10 Then I came to the governors beyond the river [Euphrates], and gave them the king's letters. Now the king had sent captains of the army and horsemen with 11 me. When Sanballat the Horonite and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, heard of it, it grieved them exceedingly that there was come a man to seek the welfare 12 of the children of Israel. So I came to Jerusalem, and was there three days.
 13 And I arose in the night, I and some few men with me; neither told I any man what my God had put in my heart to do at Jerusalem: neither was there any beast
 14 with me, save the beast that I rode upon. And I went out by night by the gate of the valley, even before the dragon-well and to the dung-port, and viewed the 15 walls of Jerusalem, which were broken down, and the gates thereof were consumed 16 with fire. Then I went on to the gate of the fountain, and to the king's pool, but 17 there was no place for the beast that was under me to pass. Then went I up in the night by the brook, and viewed the wall, and turned back, and entered by the 18 gate of the valley, and so returned. And the rulers knew not whither I went, or what I did; neither had I as yet told it to the Jews, nor to the priests, nor to the nobles, nor to the rulers, nor to the rest that [afterwards] did the work.
 19 Then said I unto them, Ye see the distress that we are in, how Jerusalem lieth waste, and the gates thereof are burned with fire: come and let us build up the 20 wall of Jerusalem, that we be no more a reproach. Then I told them of the hand of my God which was good upon me; as also the king's words that he had spoken unto me. And they said, Let us rise and build. So they strengthened their hands
 21 for this good work [or rather, for good]. But when Sanballat the Horonite, and Tobiah the servant, the Ammonite, and Geshem the Arabian heard it, they laughed us to scorn, and despised us, and said, What is this thing that ye do? Will ye 20 rebel against the king? Then answered I them, and said unto them, The God of heaven, he will prosper us; therefore [and] we his servants will arise and build: but ye have no portion, nor right, nor memorial [i. e., record of remembrance] in Jerusalem.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Interview with the King.

Ver. 1. The month Nisan (called "Abib" in the Pentateuch, Exod. xiii. 4)—the first month of the Hebrew national year. This name Nisan is found in the Assyrian, but its derivation is obscure. It corresponded to parts of our March and April. The twentieth year of Artaxerxes the king.—Artaxerxes' reign-years counted from some other month than Nisan, for the preceding Chisleu was in the 20th year. The unlikely supposition (as by Bp. PATRIOK) that the "twentieth year" of chapter i. 1 refers to Nehemiah's life, is thus unnecessary. (See on chap. i. 1.) Wine was before him.—It is the custom among the modern Persians to drink before dinner, accompanying the wine-drinking with the eating of dried fruits. (See RAWLINSON's Herod. I. 188, Sir H. C. R.'s note.) Compare the "banquet of wine" in Esther v. 6. Now I had not been beforetime sad in his presence.—Lit. And I was not sad in his presence. That is, it was not his wont to be sad in the king's presence. The exactions of Persian monarchs would not endure any independence of conduct in their presence. Everybody was expected to reflect the sunlight of the king's majesty.

Ver. 2. Wherefore the king said.—Lit. And the king said. The word translated "sad" in vers. 1, 2, 3, and the noun "sorrow" in ver. 2, are very general words for "bad" and "badness." But the bad countenance was the sad countenance (see Gen. xl. 7 for the same phrase).

Ver. 3. Let the king live for ever.—Heb. hammelek 'olam yihyeh. Compare 1 Kings i. 31; Dan. ii. 4; v. 10; vi. 6, 21. The mere formula of address to an Oriental king, so that even a

Daniel used it without compunction. The city, the place of my fathers' sepulchres.—Lit. the city, house of graves of my fathers. This emphasis of "the house of graves" not only seems to prove Nehemiah a Jerusalemite in descent, i. e., of the tribe of Judah, but also of the royal house. An obscure person would scarcely have chosen such a way of designating the city before the king. (Comp. on chap. i. 6.)

Ver. 4. For what dost thou make request?—Lit. On what account this thou art asking? The king takes for granted that the look of sadness is an assumed preliminary to asking a favor. There is a true Oriental touch in this. So I prayed to the God of heaven.—A beautiful mark of Nehemiah's piety. He first addresses the King of kings, and then the earthly monarch. He knew in whose hands were kings' hearts. For the phrase "God of heaven," see on chap. i. 5.

Ver. 5. That I may build it.—This was Nehemiah's first great aim, to rebuild the city. Without walls and fortifications, it was but a large village, exposed to sudden ruin. Could the walls be re-built, its permanence would be secured, and the province of Judah have a strong centre. That Nehemiah saw that this was the true course to conserve the special interests of God's people, there can be no doubt. A man of his piety could not rest in the mere external view of things.

Ver. 6. The queen also sitting by him.—We have a good illustration of this scene in a sculpture from Asshur-bani-pal's palace (Koyunjik). The king reclines on one side of the table, and is in the act of drinking. The queen sits upright in a chair of state at the side of the table, near the king's feet, but facing him. She is also in the act of drinking. Attendants with large fans stand behind each. (See copy of this interesting scene in RAWLINSON's Ancient Monar- chiefs, Vol. I., p. 498). That the word "shegal" refers to the principal wife of the king seems clear from its use in Pa. xlv. 10. The chief wife of Artaxerxes at one time was Damaspia, according to Ctesias.

Ver. 7. The governors.—Heb. pahawoth, from pechah, the modern pacha, the Oriental name for a viceroy used by Assyrians, Babylonians, and Persians. Beyond the river, i. e., the river Euphrates. The course to Judea would leave the Euphrates probably at Tiphshah, 700 miles from Susa or Shushan, whence there would be 400 miles of travel through the Syrian countries before reaching Jerusalem. They were letters to governors or pachas in this Syrian region that Nehemiah requested.

Ver. 8. Asaph, the keeper of the king's forest, may have been a Jew, as the name is Israelitish. It may, however, be a form of Aspatha (Esther ix. 7), from the Persian Aspa (horse). The word translated "forest" is pardes, which is our familiar paradise. It is an Aryan word (Zend, pairidaeza), and signifies a walled round place, a preserve of trees and animals. There was probably a royal park set off for the king in the neighborhood of Jerusalem, and Asaph was its keeper. The word pardes is found in the Scriptures only here and in Sol. S. iv. 18 and Eccl. ii. 5. As it is not an old Persian word, but found in the Sanscrit and Armenian, no argument for the late date of Solomon's Song and Ecclesiastes can be derived from it. In Solomon's day, with that king's extensive connections with distant countries, the word may readily have entered into his vocabulary from any Aryan source. The palace which appertained to the house.—It is supposed by some that this is the well-known Birah or Baris (afterward Antonia) at the north side of the temple-area. But that was probably constructed at a later date. Nehemiah sought simply to reconstruct the old buildings. Now the palace next to the house (i. e., to the temple, the house, as the house of God) was Solomon's palace, inhabited by all the kings after him, which was situated at the south-east corner of the temple-area. (See 2 Chron. xxiii. 12-15). The house that I shall enter into.—Not Nehemiah's own house (he was too high-minded to think of that), but the house of God, spoken of before. He desired timber (1) for the palace gates, (2) for the walls, and (8) for the house of God. "That I shall enter into" means "which I shall visit and inspect."

According to the good hand of my God upon me.—For this beautiful expression of piety, compare Ezra vii. 9 and viii. 18. In ver. 18 of this chapter we see it again, slightly varied in form.

The Journey to Jerusalem.

Ver. 9. The king had sent captains of the army and horsemen with me.—Nehemiah's high rank made this a matter of course.

—Ver. 10. Sanballat the Horonite.—There were two Horons ("Beth-horons" in full) in Palestine, a few miles north of Jerusalem. There was also a Horonaim (lit. "the two Horons") in Moab (Isa. xv. 5). Sanballat was probably from the latter, and was a Moabite, as we find his associate is Tobiah, an Ammonite. He was probably satrap or pacha of Samaria under the Persians, and Tobiah was his vizier or chief adviser. The hatred of the Moabites and Ammonites toward Israel, and the equal hatred of the Israelites to Moab and Ammon appear to have grown stronger in the later ages of the Jewish state. In David's time, his family found refuge in Moab, as Elimelech's family had done long before, and Ruth a Moabitess was ancestress of the line of kings in Israel and Judah. After the attack upon Moab by Jehoshaphat and the terrible scene upon the wall of Mesha's capital (2 Kings iii. 27), there was probably nothing but intense bitterness between the children of Lot and the children of Israel. Sanballat and Tobiah represented the Moabitish and Ammonitish hatred.* The origin of the name Sanballat is uncertain. It seems akin to the Assyrian Assur-uballat, and may be, in its correct form, "Sinuballat," Sin being the moon (comp. Sin-akhi-irib or Sennacherib), or it may be San-uballat, San being the sun.

Tobiah, the servant, the Ammonite.—Tobiah is a Jewish name (see Ezra ii. 60 and Zech. vi. 10). We could scarcely expect to find the element Jah in the name of an Ammonite. Tobiah was probably a renegade Jew, who had become a slave among the Ammonites, and, by his talents and cunning, had risen into prominence, and was now chief adviser of Sanballat. Hence the epithet, which probably his enemies had fastened on him: "Tobiah the slave."—It grieved them.—Samaria had become the leading state west of the Jordan, and any restoration of Jerusalem would threaten this predominance.

Ver. 11. And was there three days.—Days, probably, of prayer and observation before any determinate action. (See Ezra viii. 32, for a precisely similar conduct on Ezra's part thirteen years before.)

The Inspection.

Ver. 12. In the night—few men—neither told I any man.—These facts and that of only one animal being used in the night-survey show the prudence of Nehemiah, who would avoid calling the attention of Sanballat to any survey of the walls until all was ready for building. Any formal survey made in the day-time would soon have reached Sanballat's ears, for he and Tobiah were both closely allied by marriage-alliances with the Jerusalem Jews (ch. vi. 18 and xiii. 28).

Ver. 13. The gate of the valley, Sha'ar hag-gai (2 Chron. xxvi. 9; Neh. iii. 13), was probably a gate overlooking the great valley of Hinnom, which is called in Jer. ii. 23 simply "the valley." It was between the Tower of the Furnaces (Migdal hat-tannurim) and the Dung-gate. We may place it about twelve hundred feet south of the present Jaffa Gate.—The dragon-well (Ain hattannin) is perhaps the present great pool, Birket Sultan, along the eastern side of which and above it would be Nehemiah's course southward from the Jaffa-gate. The strange name (Fountain of the Sea-monster) may have been given to it because some curious large water-snake or crocodile was kept in it in Nehemiah's time.—The dung-port (Sha'ar ha-ashpoth) is rather the rubbish-gate, and was probably the gate in the valley before which the rubbish of the city was cast and burned. It was the "east gate" (lit. pottery-gate) of Jer. xix. 2. So the Jewish authorities. We may suppose this gate was at the southern extremity of Zion. The false rendering of "dung-port" has given rise to the idea that it was near the temple; that through it the filth from the animals offered in sacrifice was carried. It is possible that this filth may have been carried over the bridge to Zion, and through this gate to the brink of Hinnom's deepest portion, and there dumped with the other rubbish. But the rubbish-gate or dung-port was only one thousand cubits from the valley gate (see ch. iii. 13), and no gate near the temple could have been thus near the valley-gate, if the valley-gate were anywhere on the west of the city. We should consider the Rubbish-gate as directly before that part of Hinnom known as Tophet (Jer. vii. 31, 32, and xix. 6, 11, 12, 13, 14). (But see Excursus.)

Ver. 14. The gate of the fountain, Sha'ar ha-ayin, is certainly a gate in front of the pool of Siloam (see ch. iii. 15). It would be where the ancient wall turned northward beyond its south-eastern corner.—The king's pool, berrechath hammelek, must be the pool of Siloam. Comp. ch. iii. 15. The "virgin's fountain" of to-day is too far away. It probably received this name from its watering the king's garden (ch. iii. 15). See Joseph. Ant. 7, 14, 4. Also Jerom. Com. on Jer. vii. 30.

There was no place for the beast that was under me to pass.—The ruin was so great, and the rubbish so accumulated, along Ophel, that Nehemiah could not pursue his course along the wall any further (ver. 15), but was obliged to go down into the valley of the Kidron (the brook, nachal), up which he went and surveyed the wall, and then turned back and pursued the same route back again to the valley-gate. It is evident that this survey was confined to the southern and eastern walls, which were perhaps the most ruined and the most neglected, as being on the sides of greater natural defence.*

Ver. 16. Neither had I as yet told it to the Jews.—Rather: Neither did I, until I had done thus, tell it to the Jews.—The rulers (seginim, a Persian word) were the executive officers of the colony. Neither to the Jews in general nor to the rulers, priests or nobles specially had Nehemiah communicated the fact of his survey. He, however, now summons an assembly, and urges them to build the walls, showing them as arguments God's mercies to him and the king's favor.—The rest that did the work, i. e. the others engaged in the public service. Or (more probably) it may be proleptic for "those that afterward engaged in the wall-building."

Ver. 18. So they strengthened their hands for this good work, or for good, i. e., for a prosperous time.

Ver. 19. Gashem or Gashmu (vi. 6), who was third with Sanballat and Tobiah in hostility to the Jews, was perhaps chief of those Arabs whom Sargon had settled in Samaria (see Rawlinson's Anc. Mon., Vol. II., p. 146).

Ver. 20. Ye have no portion nor right nor memorial in Jerusalem.—This was Nehemiah's firm protest against the slightest interference on the part of these heathen chiefs. He will not acknowledge their right even to complain, and refuses to answer their false charge implied in their question. With such enemies there should be a clear understanding from the first. One of the strong points of Nehemiah's character was his uncompromising and prompt method in all things.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Like Joseph and Daniel, Nehemiah carried into a high office near the throne of an Oriental despot the vigor of a holy life. It did not make him a recluse, nor yet a sad-faced servant of the king. His sad visage at this time was a thing remarkable. He had been an acceptable officer of the court, and the king's treatment of his request shows the high favor in which he stood. True religion does not incapacitate one from office, but furnishes the man with a power to please, while it preserves him from the temptations of rank.

2. No doubt there had been from the foundation of the Persian empire a sincere sympathy on the part of the Persians with the Jews. The monotheism of the Jews gained them favor with the Persian throne, and was, doubtless, the chief reason of Cyrus's edict concerning their return to Jerusalem. By the twentieth year of Artaxerxes this sympathy had probably diminished (as under Magian influences it had been previously hindered), and yet the king's readiness to send an escort with Nehemiah (chap. iv. 23), and to make his way easy, may be attributed in part to this traditional regard for the Jewish hostility to polytheism.

3. Nehemiah's secrecy was a part of his executive ability. Although he had the king's endorsement, he knew the value of keeping his own counsel, for there were jealous foes around the Jews ready to throw hindrances in his way. Moreover these had allies among the Jews themselves—men high in rank and position—and the distance was so great from the Persian capital that Nehemiah's firman needed great wisdom on his part to make it efficient.

4. The encouragement which Nehemiah held out to his countrymen to rebuild the walls was not simply the king's willingness, but the guiding hand of God. He saw behind the throne of Persia the power of Israel's Jehovah, and sought to strengthen his brethren by the same view. Piety teaches the heart to see second causes as only indicators of the Divine will and action, and law, whether it be from man's mouth or in the forces of external nature, is rightly referred to an overruling Providence that guides and guards the people of God. It was this consideration that formed Nehemiah's answer to Sanballat, Tobiah, and Geshem.

* It is generally thought that Nehemiah made the full circuit of the walls; but, although the language might allow such an interpretation, the want of any hint of another way back (no mention of the Fish-gate or Old-gate or any other prominent landmark on the north and west side) seems to force us to take shuv in the sense of going back in the way he went out.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-9. Love towards suffering Jerusalem:

1) Its sorrow (vers. 1, 2), in spite of personal prosperity, and even in the midst of the enjoyments of the royal banquet. 2) Its confession (vers. 2, 3): it is not ashamed of belonging to the congregation of the Lord; neither is it ashamed of its poor brethren, but declares itself candidly as love, and indeed in spite of the danger of displeasing in a very hazardous way. 3) Its petition (vers. 4, 5): it begs for help, first indeed of God the Lord, and then also of men, but particularly for the permission to give its own aid, and that too with self-denial. 4) Its joy (vers. 6, 9): its prayer is not only granted, but it receives almost more than it could hope for. BRENTIUS: Hæc enim est vera amicitia, quæ in afflictionibus perdurat. Exemplum imitandum: si quid petendum est ab homine, primum a Deo petamus, qui hominis cor nobis amicum reddere potest.

STARKE: To speak to princes of weighty matters demands great precaution. 2 Sam. xiv. 2. O Soul, if a heathen lord takes a servant's griefs so tenderly to heart, how should not the Father of mercy allow thy griefs to penetrate His heart! Jer. xxxi. 20, 25. The sighs of the godly are powerful petitions before God. Ps. xii. 6. One should not frighten timid supplicants still more, but speedily encourage their petition by generous bounty. Matt. v. 32; Rom. xii. 8. Princes and lords should willingly listen to the complaints of their subjects, and grant as much as possible. 2 Sam. iii. 16. God gives according to His great goodness more than we can hope or ask for. Eph. iii. 20; 1 Kings iii. 18.

The sorrow for suffering Jerusalem: 1) In spite of our own prosperity; 2) On account of the sad position of the congregation; 3) In presence of those who are able to help, and must be gained over.—The self-denial of a patriot: 1) He grieves in spite of his own prosperity, for the misery of his country; 2) He risks his position by a frank confession; 3) He wishes to relinquish his position, in order to aid his fatherland.

STARKE: It is a token of a godless spirit when one does not reverence his fatherland; but it is villainy when one desires to injure it. 2 Macc. v. 8.

Ver. 10. The conduct of the worldly-minded towards the congregation of the Lord: 1) Their latitudinarianism: Sanballat and Tobiah maintained friendship with the Jerusalemites. Chap. vi. 10, 17; xlii. 4-9, 28. 2) Their narrowness: they cannot endure that any one should seek to advance the welfare of the congregation of the Lord, as such.

VENERABLE BEDE: Notanda animarum rerumque diversitas, quia supra quidem dicti sunt hi, qui remanserunt de captivitate in Juda, in afflictione magna et opprobrio fuisse; sed et Nehemiam longum cum fletu et precibus duxisse jejunium, eo quod muros

Vers. 11-18. Bright zeal in the concerns of God: 1) It foresees (vers. 11, 12) and hastens at times because dangers threaten; 2) It looks around (vers. 13-15) to fully estimate the difficulty of the work to be performed; 3) it looks, and points, on high (vers. 17, 18), to God's help, to the hand of God, which is extended in favor above it, and therefore succeeds with those whose help is necessary.

VENERABLE BEDE: *Diversæ urbis destructæ loca lustrando pervagatur. . . . STARKE: When one has suitable means at hand for avoiding the danger, he must not despise them. Josh. ii. 15; 2 Cor. xi. 38. When something is granted to us by the authorities through favor, we must ascribe it to God. When one will perform anything great, he must keep it secret. 1 Sam. xiv. 1. When the Church sleeps, God awakens pious people, who work and watch for its welfare. There is a time for speaking and a time for silence. Well begun is half gained.

Vers. 19, 20. In our work for the kingdom of God what position must we take towards the objections of the world? 1) We must be prepared for scorn, contempt, and anxiety. The worldly-minded consider the aim which we truly have as foolish, as it is too elevated for them; they therefore attribute to us another aim, which is foreign to us; and in this way they give a most suspicious look to our activity. 2) We must not, however, lay any importance upon this; that which they consider foolish is our highest task, that we should keep ourselves unspotted from the world, and therefore conceal to them, in so far as they are the world, no part or right in our intercourse.

Vers. 17-20. The admonition to build up the kingdom of God. 1) It complains: you see the distress, etc., for it always finds again the reason that it may pass beyond to the demand: come, let us build, resting upon the former proofs of the Lord, who also has known how to make the kings of the earth serviceable to His ends. 2) It excites the ridicule and the suspicions of the world, but overcomes them through reference to the God of heaven, who causes His people to succeed, but never allows the evil to prevail.—VENERABLE BEDE: Doctores sancti, immo omnes, qui zelo Dei fervent, in afflictione sunt maxima, quamdiu Hierusalem, hoc est, visionem pacis, quam nobis Dominus reliquit et commendavit, per bella dissensionum cernunt esse desertam, et portas virtutum, quas juxta Esaiam laudatio occupare debuerat, prevalentibus inferorum portis dejectas atque opprobrio habitas contuentur.—STARKE: It is a good sign when envious people combat a work; for one can conclude from that that it provokes the devil, and that makes us the more joyful. Gen. xxvii. 4; 1 Sam. xvii. 28. The devil is never idle: therefore when he can undertake nothing actively against the people of God, he makes use of poisonous tongues; but whoever fears God has a secure fortress. Sir. xiv. 26, 31. One should be firm in his confidence in God, and allow nothing to be abstracted from it.

CHAP. III. 1-32.

- 1 THEN Eliashib, the high-priest, rose up with his brethren the priests, and they builded the sheep-gate; they sanctified it, and set up the doors of it; even unto the
- 2 tower of Meah they sanctified it, unto the tower of Hananeel. And next unto him [lit. at his hand] builded the men of Jericho. And next to them [rather, next
- 3 to him, i. e., next to Eliashib] builded Zaccur the son of Imri. But [and] the fish-gate did the sons of Hassenaah [sons of Senaah] build, who also laid the beams thereof, and set up the doors thereof, the locks [sockets] thereof, and the bars thereof.
- 4 And next unto them repaired Meremoth the son of Urijah, the son of Koz [Hakkoz], and next unto them repaired Meshullam, the son of Berechiah, the son
- 5 of Meshezabeel. And next unto them repaired Zadok, the son of Baana. And next unto them the Tekoites repaired; but their nobles put not their necks to the
- 6 work of their Lord. Moreover [and] the old gate repaired Jehoiada the son of Paseah and Meshullam the son of Besodeiah; they laid the beams thereof, and set
- 7 up the doors thereof, and the locks [sockets] thereof, and the bars thereof. And next unto them repaired Melatiah the Gibeonite, and Jadon the Meronothite, the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah [the Mizpah which belonged] unto the
- 8 throne of the governor on this side the river. Next unto him repaired Uzziel the son of Harhaiah, of the goldsmiths. Next unto him also repaired Hananiah the son of one of the apothecaries [the son of Shelemiah of the apothecaries (?)], and
- 9 they fortified Jerusalem unto the broad wall. And next unto them repaired Rephaiah the son of Hur, the ruler of the half part [half the circuit] of Jerusalem.
- 10 And next unto them repaired Jedaiah the son of Harumaph, even over against his
- 11 house. And next unto him repaired Hattush the son of Hashabniah. Malchijah the son of Harim, and Hashub the son of Pahath-moab, repaired the other piece
- 12 [a second piece], and the tower of the furnaces. And next unto him repaired Shalum the son of Halohesh, the ruler of the half part [half the circuit] of Jerusalem.
- 13 The valley-gate repaired Hanun and the inhabitants of Zanoah; they built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks [sockets] thereof, and the bars thereof, and a
- 14 thousand cubits on the wall unto the dung-gate [rubbish gate]. But [and] the dung-gate [rubbish gate] repaired Malchiah the son of Rechab, the ruler of part [the circuit] of Beth-haccerem; he built it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks
- 15 thereof and the bars thereof. But [and] the gate of the fountain repaired Shallum the son of Col-hozeh, the ruler of part [the circuit] of Mizpah; he built it, and covered it, and set up the doors thereof, the locks [sockets] thereof, and the bars thereof, and the wall of the pool of Siloah [Shelah] by [that appertained to] the
- 16 king's garden, and unto the stairs that go down from the city of David. After him repaired Nehemiah the son of Azbuk the ruler of the half part [half the circuit] of Beth-zur, unto the place over against the sepulchres of David, and to the
- 17 part that was made, and unto the house of the mighty. After him repaired the Levites, [under] Rehum the son of Bani. Next unto him repaired Hashabiah the
- 18 ruler of the half part [half the circuit] of Keilah in his part. After him repaired their brethren, [under] Bavai the son of Henadad, the ruler of the half part [half
- 19 the circuit] of Keilah. And next to him repaired Ezer the son of Jeshua, the ruler of Mizpah, another piece [a second piece] over against the going up to the armory

20 at the turning of the wall [armory of the corner]. After him Baruch the son of Zabbai earnestly repaired the other piece [a second piece], from the turning of the wall [from the corner] unto the door of the house of Eliashib the high-priest. After him repaired Meremoth the son of Urijah the son of Koz [Hakkoz] another piece [a second piece] from the door of the house of Eliashib even to the end of the house 22, 23 of Eliashib. And after him repaired the priests, the men of the plain. After him repaired Benjamin and Hashub over against their house. After him repaired 24 Azariah the son of Maaseiah the son of Ananiah by his house. After him repaired Binnui the son of Henadad another piece [a second piece] from the house of Azariah unto the turning of the wall [unto the corner], even unto the corner [and unto 25 the turret]. Palal the son of Uzai [repaired] over against the turning of the wall over against the corner], and the tower which lieth out from the king's high house, that was by the court of the prison. After him Pedaiah the son of Parosh [repaired.] Moreover [and] the Nethinim dwelt in Ophel unto the place over against 26 the water-gate towards the east, and the tower that lieth out. After them [him] the Tekoites repaired another piece [a second piece], over against the great tower 28 that lieth out, even unto the wall of Ophel. From above the horse-gate repaired the priests, over against his house. After them (him, i. e., the last one of these 29 priests) repaired Zadok the son of Immer over against his house. After him repaired also Shemaiah the son of Shechaniah, the keeper of the east gate. After him 30 repaired Hananiah the son of Shelemiah, and Hanun the sixth son of Zalaph, another piece [a second piece]. After him repaired Meshullam the son of Berechiah 31 over against his chamber. After him repaired Malchiah the goldsmith's son unto the place [house] of the Nethinim and of the merchants over against the gate 32 Miphkad [gate of the visitation] and to the going up of the corner [turret]. And between the going up of the corner [turret] unto the sheep-gate repaired the goldsmiths and the merchants.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

9. פָּלַל. In this sense of "circuit" the word is Chaldee. See Targum on Josh. xvii. 11. In Heb. it means "staff," or "distaff." See 2 Sam. iii. 29; Prov. xxvi. 19.

13. שְׁפֹתָי. The omission of the ה is to be noted as comp. with ver. 14. Gesenius considers the ה as prosthetic, and makes the root שִׁפַּח, but it is as likely to be שָׁפַח.

30. שֹׁנִי, a lappus for שֹׁנִי.

לְשֹׁכָי, here and in ch. xii. 44 and ch. xiii. 1, seems to be a varied form of לְשֹׁכָי.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Wall-Building.

Ver. 1. Eliashib the high-priest.—This man was afterwards closely allied to Jerusalem's enemies, one of his grandsons having married Sanballat's daughter (ch. xiii. 28). His alliance with Tobiah became so close that he prepared a room for Tobiah in the temple (ch. xiii. 4, 7). Eliashib may have excused this desecration on the ground that Tobiah was a Jew by birth. (See on ch. ii. 10.) Eliashib was grandson of Jeshua, who, with Zerubbabel, led the original return. Notwithstanding the unworthiness of this high-priest and his probable want of sympathy with Nehemiah's piety and patriotism, he could not refuse to take the lead in the wall-building. Public opinion was too strong under the appeals of Nehemiah.

The sheep-gate, Sha'ar hats-tzon, must have been by the temple, or else the priests would not have been selected to build it. It is probably the προβαταί of John v. 2, translated in E. V. "sheep-market." It seems to have been at the north-eastern corner of the temple-area, in the neighborhood of the present St. Stephen's gate. It might derive its name from the fact that through this gate the sheep and goats (for the word refers to all small cattle) destined for the sacrifices were driven. (See Excursus.)

They sanctified it and set up the doors of it.—This gate is the only one which is said to be sanctified (kidshuhu), and we cannot tell whether it was done at once, so soon as it was built by the priests, or afterwards when the doors were set up (ch. vi. 1). The other gates were purified (another verb, taher) after the completion of the wall (ch. xii. 30). This seems to indicate a special connection with the temple. It probably opened into the temple-area. The setting up of the doors was not done until afterwards, but is here anticipated.* (See ch. vi. 1.)

The tower of Meah, migdol ham-meah, . . . the tower of Hananeel, migdol hananeel.—These two towers were between the sheep-gate and the fish-gate. They may have occupied the north-eastern corner of the temple-enclosure, and the corner west of that, where the city-wall from the north joined the wall of the temple-enclosure. Hence they would (like the sheep-gate) be both connected with the temple, and hence they were sanctified. (See Excursus.) (They sanctified it in the second occurrence seems to refer to the wall including the two towers.)—The tower of Meshah may have been the place where the nobles and rulers collected their hundredth (ch. v. 11), Meshah being the Heb. for the "hundredth:" but?

* This gate and the water-gate and horse-gate and gate Miphkad (vers. 28, 28, 31) all appear to have been within the temple-precinct or its neighborhood, and all appear to have been destitute of locks and bars; for these are spoken of with regard to all the other gates (vers. 3, 6, 13, 14), but not with regard to these. These gates may have been kept constantly open, but guarded by an armed force.

Ver. 2. And next unto him builded the men of Jericho. And next to them builded Zaour the son of Imri.—This should read literally: And at his hand builded the men of Jericho, and at his hand builded Zaour the son of Imri.—Zaour may have been leader of the men of Jericho. The English version misleads.

Ver. 3. The fish-gate, Sha'ar had-dagim, was east of the present Damascus-gate in the north wall. It is mentioned 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14 and Zeph. i. 10. (See Excursus.)

The sons of Hassenaah.—Rather: the sons of Senaah. (See Ezra ii. 85.) Senaah was a city, or more likely a large territory (if we are to judge from the large numbers in Ezra, i. c.), near Jericho. In the Onomasticon we find a Senna, seven miles north of Jericho.—The locks thereof were probably the sockets into which the bars fitted.

Ver. 4. Meremoth, the son of Urijah, is the same who is called in Ezra viii. 38 "Meremoth, the son of Uriah the priest." (See ch. x. 5.) He was of the family of Hakkos, written wrongly in E. V. in this place Koz. See 1 Chron. xxiv. 10.

Meshullam, the son of Berechiah, the son of Meshezabeel.—This Meshullam was allied to Tobiah, for Tobiah's son Johanan had married Meshullam's daughter (ch. vi. 18). Nehemiah made the Jews, allied to the enemies of Judah, to commit themselves to the welfare of the city, as against their chosen intimates of the heathen. The "Meshezabeel" may be the same mentioned in ch. x. 21 and xi. 24.—Zadok, the son of Baana, seems to be the same as the Zadok of ch. x. 21. Both Meshullam and Zadok were probably of the tribe of Judah.

Ver. 5. The Tekoites.—Tekoa (still bearing its old name) is nine miles due south of Jerusalem, and about two miles south-west of the conspicuous Frank Mountain.—Their nobles put not their necks to the work of their Lord.—Nehemiah's task was an immense one, to unite a people, in many of whom there was no sympathy with the cause, for a rapid and successful movement. The fashionable part of Jerusalem was in virtual league with the enemies of God. Some of these were constrained (as Eliashib) by circumstances to take part in the work of rebuilding the Holy City, but others (as these Tekoite nobles) resolutely kept aloof.

Ver. 6. The old gate must have been in the north wall, east of the present Damascus-gate. Keil reads: "gate of the old wall" with Arnold and Hupfeld, as referring to the old wall in distinction from the "broad wall," which was newer. If we are to read Jeshanah as a genitive, it is possible that the gate was "the gate of Jeshanah" as leading to that town (2 Chron. xiii. 19). (See Excursus.)

Ver. 7. Meronthite.—Here and in 1 Chron. xxvii. 80 only. Meronth may have been a dependent village of Mizpah.—Unto the throne of the governor on this side the river.—They did not repair unto (i. e. as far as) the throne, etc. Then the preposition would have been 'ad, but it is l (i. e. ol). It connects the description with Mizpah, and describes this Mizpah as belonging to the throne (or sway) of the governor beyond the river (i. e. beyond the river from Susa and the empire's centre), or as our version has it "the governor on this side the river." Perhaps this was to distinguish it from the Gilead Mizpah, which was under another governor (Judg. x. 17, etc.). In this case the "river" would be the Jordan. Some place Mizpah at Neby Samwil, some at Scopus.

Ver. 8. The son of one of the apothecaries.—Probably the name Shelemiah (ver. 30) has dropped out here. The goldsmiths and apothecaries (makers of spices, ointments and perfumes) worked under these leaders. These apothecaries are supposed by some to have been priests (1 Chron. ix. 80).

Fortified Jerusalem.—Here and at ch. iv. 2, the Heb. word 'azab is translated in E. V. "fortify." Fürst derives it from an original meaning of "knot" or "bind;" hence "fasten" or "repair." Ewald gives it the meaning of "shelter." But in Ex. xxiii. 5 it seems to mean "help," though Fürst there gives it the meaning of "loosen." A common meaning of the word is "to forsake" as in Deut. xxxi. 16. This last meaning Fürst and Gesenius retain in ch. iv. 2 by translating: "will they (the governors) forsake the matter to them?" or "will they allow them?" May not this general notion be intended here: "they loosened (i. e. freed from exposure and peril) Jerusalem?" Keil retains the common meaning of azab, and reads: "they (the builders, or else the Chaldeans) left Jerusalem untouched as far as the broad wall."

The broad wall, hahomah harkayah (ch. xii. 38) seems to have been a special fortification at the north-west corner of the city. Keil would identify it with the four hundred cubits destroyed by Joash, and afterward rebuilt by Uzziah. (See Excursus.)

Ver. 9. Ruler of the half part of Jerusalem.—Compare vers. 12, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18. Pelek means a circuit, and is a governmental term. Rephaiah was ruler of half the circuit of Jerusalem, and Shallum (ver. 12) was ruler of the other half. The circuits of Beth-zur and Keilah had each two rulers also (see vers. 16, 17, 18). These circuits were probably districts deriving their names from their chief towns.

Ver. 11. The other piece, middah shenith, "a second piece," as in vers. 19, 21, 27, 30. The first piece ("first," perhaps, because first assigned to them) which they repaired is mentioned in ver. 23, where Malchijah is called Benjamin. The Harim and the Pahath-moab, who are mentioned as the fathers of Malchijah and Hashub, who repaired this second piece, were probably remote ancestors, Harim being the third of the twenty-four who in David's time gave name to the priestly divisions or courses (1 Chron. xxiv. 8), and Pahath-moab being one of the chiefs of families who came back with Zerubbabel a century before (see ch. vii. 11). The name Pahath-moab (governor of Moab) is one of the evidences of a close connection with Moab on the part of some of the families of Israel. Elimelech's residence in Moab and David's use of Moab as a place of safety for his family are other evidences. (See also 1 Chron. iv. 22 for another allusion.)

The Tower of the Furnaces, Migdal hatannurim would naturally fall into the neighborhood of the Jaffa Gate, and may be represented by the north-eastern tower of the citadel, which Dr. Robinson identifies with Herod's tower of Hippicus. (See Excursus.)

Ver. 12. Shallum, the son of Halohesh. Halohesh, or Hallo'hesh, is another ancestral name, and not that of an immediate father. (See ch. x. 24.) He and his daughters not ruling, but building. The seal of these women is emphasized.

Ver. 13. The valley-gate. See on ch. ii. 13. Hanun and the inhabitants of Zanoah.—Hanun is called in ver. 30, "the sixth son of Zalaph." Zanoah was about twelve miles west of Jerusalem.

The dung-gate. See on ch. ii. 13.

Ver. 14. The ruler of part of Beth-hacerem, or the ruler of the circuit of Beth-hacerem. Beth-hacerem was near Tekoa, and was a height where a beacon could be displayed (Jer. vi. 1). It is identified by modern travellers with Jebel Fureidis, or the Frank Mountain.

Ver. 15. Gate of the Fountain.—See ch. ii. 14. Shallum the son of Col-hozeh, a Judahite (ch. xi. 5). The ruler of part of Mizpah, or the ruler of the circuit of Mizpah. The circuit of Mizpah, and Mizpah itself, had different rulers. (See ver. 19.) Covered it. Probably equivalent to "laid the beams thereof" of vers. 3, 6. The pool of Siloah, by the king's garden, Berchath hash Shelah, legan ham-melek. It is Shiloh in Isaiah, and Shelah here. The pool is the present Birket Silwan, and probably includes the Birket el-Hamra. It was outside the city, near the Tyropseon valley, where it enters the valley of the Son of Hinnom. Just at this junction was the king's garden (see 2 Kings xxv. 4, and Joseph., A. J. 7, 11), watered by this pool. It receives its water through a subterranean canal under the lower end of Ophel (the ridge running south from the temple-area) from the Fountain of the Virgin, on the west side of the Kidron valley. The old wall probably embraced all Zion, running along its southern brow, and stretched over to Ophel, in the neighborhood of the pool of Siloam, the fountain-gate being near by.

The stairs that go down from the city of David would then be an access to the Tyropseon from Zion, ending in this neighborhood of the pool. (See Excursus.)

Ver. 16. The ruler of the half part of Beth-zur, or the ruler of half the circuit of Beth-zur. Beth-zur is about four miles north of Hebron. Unto the place over against the sepulchres of David, and to the pool that was made, and unto the house of the mighty.—The sepulchres of David were probably the same as the sepulchres of the kings (2 Chron. xxviii. 27, et al.), and we may place them somewhere on Zion (1 Kings ii. 10). The part of the wall here designated would be that on Ophel, opposite that portion of Zion where the sepulchres were, the valley of the Tyropseon being between. The "pool that was made" may be the present fountain of the Virgin, which perhaps Hezekiah formed with its remarkable galleries (see Capt. Warren's account in "the Recovery of Jerusalem") for the supply of Ophel (see 2 Kings xx. 20). The "house of the mighty" (beth-hag-geborim) we have no clue to.

Ver. 17. The ruler of the half part of Keilah in his part, or the ruler of the half circuit of Keilah for his circuit. Those of the other half-circuit of Keilah are next mentioned.

Ver. 19. The ruler of Mizpah another piece.—The first piece is given in ver. 7. Over against the going up to the armory at the turning of the wall.—Rather, from opposite the ascent of the armory of the corner. The armory of the corner was perhaps at an angle in the eastern Ophel wall.

Ver. 20. Baruch the son of Zabbai is honorably mentioned for his distinguished zeal. He worked at a second piece from the corner mentioned above to the high-priest's house, which seems to have been on Ophel. Perhaps this Baruch's first piece of work has slipped from the text. Zabbai may be the same mentioned in Ezra x. 28. Baruch may be the priest of ch. x. 6.

Ver. 21. Meremoth, the son of Urijah, the son of Koz.—See on ver. 4. As a conspicuous priest, it was appropriate that he should be connected with the work on the wall in front of the high-priest's house.

Ver. 22. The men of the plain.—The word translated "plain" is kikkar, which is generally used for the Jordan valley, but in ch. xii. 28 it is used of the environs of Jerusalem. It literally signifies a circuit. As no qualifying word or phrase is found here, this kikkar is probably the Jordan valley.

Ver. 23. Benjamin (see on ver. 11) one of the descendants of Harim. (See Ezra x. 32.) Hashub was son (or descendant) of Pahath-moab. (See on ver. 11.) Their house may refer only to Benjamin, who was a priest (one of the Bene-Harim), Hashub, perhaps, being in some way allied to him.

Azariah may be the Levite mentioned in ch. viii. 7.

Vers. 24, 25. Binnui is the Levite mentioned in obs. x. 9 and xii. 8. Unto the turning of the wall, even unto the corner.—Or, unto the corner of the wall and unto the turret. By this seems to be intended the corner, where the "tower which lieth out" (ver. 25) formed a projection. Capt. Warren found about four hundred feet south-west of the south-east corner of the temple area the remains of an outlying tower to the wall, which he conjectures may be the "tower which lieth out." This tower is described in the next verse as the tower which lieth out from the king's high house.—Solomon's palace, doubtless, occupied the south-east corner of the present Haram. It probably had a high fortified position extending south to the Ophel wall (see Capt. Warren's map). This part was perhaps built by Jotham (2 Chron. xxvii. 8), or Hezekiah (2 Chron. xxxii. 5), or Manasseh (2 Chron. xxxiii. 14). The height of Manasseh's building is especially mentioned.

The court of the prison is spoken of in Jer. xxxii. 2 as appertaining to the king's house.

Ver. 26. Moreover the Nethinim dwelt in Ophel. Some with the Syriac, insert the relative and read, "the Nethinim who dwelt in Ophel," and then supply the verb "repaired." This is not needed. We may count this an interjected statement, showing what an important site had been given to the Nethinim. See, moreover, the נְתִינִים of ver. 27, referring to Pedaiab. The water-gate was, perhaps, a gate opening into the subterranean water galleries, lately discovered by Capt. Warren. If so, then the Nethinim dwelt in all Ophel from a point a little north of the Fountain of the Virgin to this "tower which lieth without," that is, along a distance of about eight hundred feet. This position of the water-gate answers to the narrative in ch. xii. 37. (See Exoursus.)

The Nethinim (i. e., dedicated ones) were servants of the temple, who performed the menial duties of the precinct. In Josephus they are ιερόδουλοι (temple-servants). They were appointed by David (Ezra viii. 20), as another guild of service (Solomon's servants, or Andhé Shelomoh) was appointed by Solomon (Ezra ii. 58). The Levites, as compared with the priests, were called Nethunim (Num. viii. 19), a word of the same signification as Nethinim. (Comp. the K'tib of Ezra viii. 17.) Perhaps David's Nethinim were the Gibeonites (hewers of wood and drawers of water) restored to their service in a regular manner, after a dispersion of their number in Saul's time. (See 2 Sam. xxi. 2.)

Ver. 27. The Tekoites repaired their first piece near the old gate (ver. 5).

The great tower that lieth out is probably the same as "the tower that lieth out" of ver. 25.

The wall of Ophel would be the southern wall of the temple-area where it joined the district of Ophel.

Ver. 28. The horse-gate was where Athaliah was slain. It was between the temple and the palace. This would put it about 200 feet north of the present S. E. corner of the Haram. (See 2 Chron. xxiii. 15, and Jer. xxi. 40). The part from the "wall of Ophel" to the horse-gate (Sha'ar Has-susim) was probably in good order, as it was the wall of the old royal palace, and had been occupied by the governors of the city. Hence it is not mentioned as rebuilt at this time, but the next builders to the Tekoites begin from above (i. e., up the Kidron) the horse-gate. (See Exoursus.)

Ver. 29. The keeper of the east gate.—This Sha'ar ham-misrah is the sha'ar hak-kadmoni of Ezek. xi. 1, one of the inner temple-gates, not a city gate. If this Shemaiah, the son of Shechaniah, is the same as the one mentioned in 1 Chron. iii. 22, then he was a descendant of the kings, and his title may have been one of honor only. He may, however, have been another and a Levite.

Ver. 30. Hananiah. See on ver. 8. Hanun another piece.—See on ver. 13. Meshullam the son of Berechiah. See on ver. 4.

Ver. 31. The place of the Nethinim and of the Merchants over against the gate Miphkad and to the going up of the corner. Lit. The house of the Nethinim and the traders opposite the gate of the visitation even to the ascent of the projecting turret. The "house" of the Nethinim and traders was not their dwelling-place, but, we suppose, the place where under the direction of the Nethinim the traders (see Matt. xxi. 12) brought their doves, etc., for sale to worshippers. We may place it near the north-east angle of the Haram. For the gate Miphkad, see Exoursus. The ascent of the turret would be the stairs at the north-east angle leading up to a corner-tower, not far from the sheep gate.

Ver. 32. The goldsmiths may have been also connected with these matters of the Nethinim and traders.

For a plan of the walls of the city, see Exoursus.

From this outline it will be seen that only those gates whose bars and locks and doors are mentioned do we consider as belonging to the city wall, to wit:

1. Sheep-gate, ver. 1.
2. Fish-gate, ver. 8.
3. Old-gate, ver. 6.
4. Valley-gate, ver. 13.
5. Dung-gate, ver. 14.
6. Fountain-gate, ver. 15.

The other gates are not spoken of as now constructed, and we take them to be inner gates belonging to the inner temple and palace divisions, to wit:

1. Water-gate, ver. 26.
2. Horse-gate, ver. 28.
3. East-gate, ver. 29.
4. Gate Miphkad, ver. 31.

We also consider the wall along the southern brow of Zion to have continued across the Tyropœon to Ophel near the pool of Siloam.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Eliashib's connection with Sanballat and Tobiah (chap. xiii. 7, 28) must have taken place at a later date, when Nehemiah had returned to Susa, and was not expected to revisit Jerusalem. If the high-priest had already made those scandalous alliances, Nehemiah certainly would have taken him to task, and the record of such reprimand would have been here given. With a heart disaffected, Eliashib nevertheless takes his place in the rebuilding of the wall. His prominence in the work was doubtless a great help to Nehemiah.

2. It is an interesting feature of this wall-building that those whose local interests were far off, as at Jericho, Tekoah, and Beth-zur, took such deep interest and such conspicuous part in the work. The old love for Zion and for the temple was still warm in the breasts of the returned Jews. They felt that the true life of the nation flowed from Jerusalem as the central heart. Their union in this work was a powerful means of renewing their patriotic affection and strengthening the interests of the commonwealth. Co-working for defence always brings souls together; and when the co-working is in defence of the citadel of religion and country, the strongest bond of union is formed. The wall-buildings formed a strong basis, on which Nehemiah could introduce his reforms.

8. However, there must have been many who refused the service, and were apathetic, if not hostile to the work. Otherwise we should not see some of them engaged doing a second piece of the wall, and perhaps a longer list of leaders in the service would be recorded. It is not to be believed that, if the high-priest himself was inclined to ally himself to Sanballat, there were not many others who had no hearty interest in the restoration of Jerusalem's glory. The nobles of Tekoah (ver. 5) were but samples of a large number.

4. And yet, again, the thirty-four leaders whose names are given us cannot be considered as the only chief men engaged in the wall-building. Other prominent men whose names occur later in the book may have held office under them, and hence are here unmentioned.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. The importance of Zion's walls. 1) For uniting the congregation, the congregation must be able to shut itself off and secure itself to protect its peculiar goods. 2) For exclusion of the world,—the world must be kept at a distance, so long as it only strives to rob the goods of the congregation.

Vers. 1, 2. The precedence of the high-priest in making the city of God secure. 1) He himself is the first to build. 2) By this he consecrates the work of the others. 3) He is a pledge for the success of the work.—The duty of building the walls of Zion. 1) For those in authority (as Nehemiah), who have to incite and uphold the priests and people in their work. 2) For the priests who are not exalted above the common obligation.—3) For the people whose members must not forget in their household and inferior cares, those which are higher and more universal.—BEDÉ: Qui portas et turrez edificant, per quas vel cives ingrediantur vel arceantur inimici, ipsi sunt prophete, apostoli, evangeliste, per quos nobis forma et ordo fidei ac recte operationis, per quam unitatem ecclesie sancte intrare debeamus, ministrata est, quorumque verbis, qualiter adversarios veritatis redarguamus ac repellamus, discimus. Qui vero reliquis verbis extruunt, ipsi sunt pastores et doctores.—STARKS: The clergy should set to work first in building the city of God, and precede others by a good example. The memory of those who have rendered services to the church and to the commonwealth remains, justly, blessed. Prov. 10:7. The most powerful and richest people do, generally, the least in the temporal and spiritual edifice of the city of God. Happy he who willingly puts on the light and easy yoke of Christ at the building of the spiritual Jerusalem.

Ver. 31. The honor of the mechanics and artists. 1) They may be, and shall be at the same time priests of God. 2) Their products can and shall serve for God's honor. 3) Their doing has in itself worth and reward.

Vers. 38-35. Why the world so easily pretends that our work will have no result. 1) Because in truth of ourselves we are not capable of great efforts: only the sacrifice and the power of Christ can make us willing and endow us with perseverance. 2) Because in truth the work is indeed altogether too lofty and glorious,—only the Spirit of Christ can consecrate us to it. 3) Because the world only sees that which is before its eyes; there is, however, something higher.—STARKS: Fleshly-minded spirits consider the undertaking and the work of God's children as contemptible and small, and measure it according to their standard. Wisd. v. 8; 2 Kings xix. 10. There are different degrees among the godless, in regard to their wickedness. The worst are those who not only do wickedly themselves, but also cannot bear to see others doing good, and express their rage in poisonous jeers. John x. 32; Ps. cix. 4.

Vers. 36-38. Prayer is the most powerful weapon against the enemy. 1) It secures to us the best allies. 2) It makes us sure of the weakness of the enemy. If they are God's enemies at the same time, they have God's holiness opposed to them, before which nothing which is evil can endure. 3) It pledges the final victory to us. They can only escape by change of heart.—STARKS: When we are in the greatest straits, there God is our safety, our rock, our strength and refuge, and we must fly to Him in prayer. 2 Chr. xx. 12; Prov. xviii. 10; Nah. i. 8.

Ver. 38. The blessing of the oppression which the scorn of the world exercises upon us. 1) We work the more steadily under it, we do not indeed know how long the evening will permit us to work. 2) The joy in the work increases as surely as it is elevating to bear the disgrace of Christ. 3) The work advances so much the better. STARKS: In the work of the Lord we must confidently proceed, heedless of all opposition. 2 Tim. iv. 3-5. At pleasure's call all work seems small, therefore be not slothful in what you should do. Rom. xii. 11; Prov. vi. 6. If God has given us successful progress in our work, this should be an admonition to us that we should the more boldly persist in pursuing our calling.

CHAPTER IV. 1-23.

1 BUT [and] it came to pass that when Sanballat heard that we builded the wall,
 2 he was wroth, and took great indignation, and mocked the Jews. And he spake before his brethren and the army of Samaria, and said, What do these feeble Jews?
 Will they fortify themselves? Will they sacrifice? Will they make an end in a day [by day, i. e., openly]? Will they revive the stones out of the heaps of the 3 rubbish which are burned? Now [and] Tobiah the Ammonite was by him, and he said, Even that which they build, if a fox go up, he shall even break down their 4 stone wall. Hear, O our God; for we are despised [a contempt]: and turn their reproach upon their own head, and give them for a prey in the land of captivity.
 5 And cover not their iniquity, and let not their sin be blotted out from before thee; for they have provoked thee to anger before [they have acted vexatiously against] 6 the builders. So built we [and we built] the wall; and all the wall was joined together unto the half thereof: for [and] the people had a mind [heart] to work.
 7 But [and] it came to pass, that when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and the Arabians, and the Ammonites, and the Ashdodites, heard that the walls of Jerusalem were made up [that a bandage was applied to the walls of Jerusalem], and that the breaches 8 began to be stopped, then they were very wroth, and conspired all of them together to come an' to fight against Jerusalem, and to hinder it [to do wickedness to it].
 9 Nevertheless [and] we made our prayer unto our God, and set a watch against them 10 day and night, because of them. And Judah said, The strength of the bearers of burdens is decayed, and there is much rubbish; so that [and] we are not able to 11 build the wall. And our adversaries said, They shall not know, neither see, till we 12 come in the midst among them, and slay them, and cause the work to cease. And it came to pass, when the Jews which dwelt by them came, they said unto us ten times, From all places whence ye shall return unto us they will be upon you [they said unto us ten times, i. e., frequently, from all places, Ye shall return unto us].
 13 Therefore [and] I set in the lower places [lowest parts] behind the wall [at the place behind the wall], and in the higher places [in the exposed parts], I even set 14 the people after their families with their swords, their spears, and their bows. And I looked, and rose up, and said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, Be not ye afraid of them: remember the Lord, which is great and terrible, and fight for your brethren, your sons, and your daughters, your wives, 15 and your houses. And it came to pass when our enemies heard that it was known unto us, and God had brought their counsel to nought, that we returned all of us to 16 the wall, every one unto his work. And it came to pass from that time forth [from that day], that the half of my servants wrought in the work, and the other half of them held both the spears, the shields, and the bows, and the habergeons; and the 17 rulers were behind all the house of Judah. They which builded on the wall and they that bare burdens, with those that laded, [while carrying] every one with one 18 of his hands wrought in the work, and with the other hand held a weapon. For
 [and] the builders, every one had his sword girded by his side, and so builded.
 19 And he that sounded the trumpet was by me. And I said unto the nobles, and to the rulers, and to the rest of the people, The work is great and large, and we are 20 separated upon the wall, one far from another. In what place therefore ye hear 21 the sound of the trumpet, resort ye thither unto us: our God shall fight for us. So
 [and] we labored in the work: and half of them held the spears from the rising of 22 the morning till the stars appeared. Likewise at the same time said I unto the people, Let every one with his servant lodge within Jerusalem, that [and] in the 23 night they may be a guard to us, and labor on the day [by day]. So [and] neither I, nor my brethren, nor my servants nor the men of the guard which followed me, none of us put off our clothes, saving that every one put them off for washing.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

16. The  $\text{וְהָיָה}$  seems to be misplaced. It should be with  $\text{וְהָיָה}$ , and not with  $\text{וְהָיָה}$ . Or the words may have changed places.

17. In  $\text{וְהָיָה}$  the  $\text{ו}$  takes the place of  $\text{ד}$ .

22. Note the absence of  $\text{ל}$  with  $\text{וְהָיָה}$  and  $\text{וְהָיָה}$ .

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Hindrances (1) From Sanballat and his allies.

(N. B.—Vers. 1-6 are in the Heb. vers. 83-88 of ch. 8).

Ver. 1. Mocked the Jews.—Sanballat was evidently afraid to use violence directly on account of the favor shown by the Persian monarch to the Jews. His great rage could exhibit itself only in mockery.

Ver. 2. Before his brethren, i. e., Tobiah and his brethren in council. The army of Samaria.—It is likely that Sanballat had actually brought an armed force in sight of the city to intimidate the Jews. In a speech to his officers he uses the language of mockery here given, Will they fortify themselves?—Perhaps, will they help themselves? Keil, comparing Pa. x. 14, reads it "will they leave it to themselves?" which is harsh. (See on ch. iii. 8 for the use of this word asab). Will they make an end in a day? Rather, will they make an end (i. e., accomplish it) by day (i. e., openly). So bay-gom in Gen. xxxi. 40; Prov. xii. 16; Judg. xiii. 10.

Ver. 3. Now Tobiah the Ammonite was by him.—The style of phrase in this verse suggests what we have already supposed, that when Sanballat addressed his armed men he was in sight of Jerusalem, looking with Tobiah and others at the Jews' work.

Ver. 4. Hear, O our God.—Eight times in this book Nehemiah interjects a prayer. They are prayers while writing, not while acting. The grounds of this prayer are, (1) God's people are despised; (2) excited to fear by the enemy. As in the imprecatory psalms, there is a prophetic power in this prayer. The prayer anticipates God's justice.

Ver. 5. They have provoked thee to anger before the builders. Rather, they have vexed (with alarm) the builders. So kaas in Ezek. xxxii. 9. The leneged is that of hostility as in Dan. x. 13.

Ver. 6. Unto the half thereof in height. The people had a mind to work.—The disaffected (including probably the high-priest or at least many of his family) were a few, and they had to yield to the zeal of the great mass. Patriotism, piety and security made the wall-building a popular work. (The fourth chapter in the Heb. divisions begins here).

Ver. 7. The Arabians.—Those in Samaria. See on ch. ii. 19. The Ammonites.—Tobiah's influence had probably induced many Ammonites to take active part with Sanballat in opposing the Jews. If Sanballat was a Moabite (as we suppose), that fact would account for an Ammonitish alliance, as the two nations of Moab and Ammon were always closely united, especially against Israel. The Ashdodites, with the Philistine traditional hatred, remained hostile to the Jews until Jonathan, brother of Judas Maccabeus, three hundred years after this, destroyed Ashdod at the defeat of Apollonius.

That the walls of Jerusalem were made up.—Lit., that a bandage was applied to the walls of Jerusalem. So in 2 Chron. xxiv. 18.

Ver. 8. To hinder it.—Lit., to do wickedness to it. (So the word po'ah in Isa. xxxii. 6). These various nationalities might suppose that by acting in concert, they could show to the Persian king they were only acting in his behalf for the safety of the empire against an insurrectionary movement of the Jews. An attack of Sanballat alone might readily be understood at court as a matter of personal jealousy and aggrandizement. Hence the confederacy.

Vers. 10-12. And Judah said . . . and our adversaries said . . . the Jews which dwelt by them said. Here were three sources of discouragement: (1) The severity of the work. (2) The threat of destruction by the confederacy. (3) The recall of the country Jews from the work by their timid fellows.

They said unto us ten times, From all places whence ye shall return unto us they will be upon you.—Rather, They said unto us ten times (i. e., frequently), From all places ye shall return unto us. The Jews from the outside towns that were near the enemy came to Jerusalem and endeavored to make their townsmen desist, through fear of injury from Sanballat. [The Heb. Asher as in Esther iii. 4.]

Ver. 13. Therefore set I in the lower places behind the wall and on the higher places I even set, etc.—Rather, Therefore set I in the lowest parts at the place behind the wall, in the exposed parts, I even set, etc. Nehemiah placed detachments, properly armed, at such points of the wall as had attained the least height and were thus most exposed to attack. These detachments were formed of the families who had been working at the portions of the wall where these gaps were. There was a temporary cessation from the work. "The lowest parts" and "the exposed parts" are in apposition. "The higher places" (E. V.) is a mistaken rendering. The word tschih means "a dry or bare place" (comp. Ezek. xxvi. 4-14), and hence by a metaphorical use, an exposed part of the wall.

Ver. 14. And I looked.—Implying perhaps an observation of some fear on the part of the different classes of the community. Or it may refer to a simple review of the defenders in their positions.

Ver. 15. We returned all of us to the wall every one unto his work.—This shows that there had been a cessation of the work at the first alarm.

Ver. 16. My servants cannot be equal to "my subjects" as some hold, for naar could not be so used by Nehemiah, nor would he consider the people of Judah in the light of subjects. Nehemiah had probably a special band of men attached to his person, either by order of the king of Persia, or by the will of the people at Jerusalem. To these we suspect reference is here made. There is a distinction made between these and the others. These divided themselves into two parts, the one working while the other kept guard; but the others held a weapon while they wrought (ver. 17). Habergeon. Old English for "coat of mail." From hals (neck) and bergen (to protect).

Ver. 17. Read The builders of the wall and the burden-bearers while carrying. The builders and the burden-bearers each bore a javelin (shelah) in one hand, the builders (as distinct from the burden-bearers) also wearing a sword, as we see in ver. 18.

Ver. 18. For.—Read "And." The signal trumpet was directly under Nehemiah's order, as commander of the defence.

Ver. 22. Lodge within Jerusalem.—That is, during the alarm, those that had their homes in the villages and distant towns should now continue night and day in the city.

Ver. 23. Only Nehemiah and his immediate family and attendants are here referred to as not putting off their clothes. It became them to be patterns of watchfulness and diligence to the rest.—Saving that every one put them off from washing.—A puzzling sentence. It is literally "man his weapon the water." The rendering of the E. V. is in accordance with the old Jewish authorities who regard shilho as a verb of equivalent meaning with pashat (to put off). Probably some words are lost.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The wrath and great indignation of Sanballat prove the insincerity of his taunts. If the Jews were so feeble a folk in his estimation, he would not have sought an alliance (ver. 8) to fight against them. He had good reason to fear the sudden restoration of the Jewish power, and was merely exercising that which is praised as political wisdom when he used every energy to thwart Nehemiah's purpose. It is probable that in Galilee there existed a growing remnant of Israel (the men of Babylon, Cuthah, Ava, Hamath and Sepharvaim (2 Kings xvii. 24) having been settled by the King of Assyria in Central Palestine), who, of course, sympathized with the movement at Jerusalem. Sanballat, situated between these two fragments of Israel, was the more alert to see danger in Israel's growth. Hence his forwardness to move in the matter, for he was evidently the chief mover, although Arabians, Ammonites and Ashdodites were ready enough to take part.

2. The prayer of Nehemiah that the enemy's reproaches might be turned upon their own head, and that their sin might never be forgiven (comp. Ps. lxxix. 27, 28, and Jer. xviii. 28), can only be understood by the soul that is so allied to God as to see His judgments proceeding forth from His holiness. The final judgment by the saints as assessors with God (Ps. cxlix. 6-9 and Rev. iii. 21) has the same character. Where the natural mind can only imagine revenge, the spiritual mind sees faith and holiness.

8. Prayer did not slacken the energy of the Jews. They experienced the redoubled zeal and activity which all true prayer produces. They made their prayer to God, and set a watch against their foes day and night. All the natural means whether of mind or matter form channels through which God conveys His grace in answer to prayer. To stop these channels is to cancel prayer. Prayer was never intended to foster idleness or diminish responsibility.

4. The remembrance of the Lord is the sure safe-guard against our afflictions. David says: "I have set the Lord always before me; because He is at my right hand, I shall not be moved" (Ps. xv. 8).

Remembering the Lord is an act of faith, a new grasp upon His divine help, and, at the same time, a purification of the heart. Forgetfulness of God is the unguardedness of the soul.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-17. Our abiding tasks. 1) From work to conflict. (Vers. 1-8.) a) On account of defying enemies from without and within. b) In spite of faint-hearted friends. c) With faith in the Lord. 2) From conflict to work. Vers. 9-17.) a) Work remains the principal task. b) It can and must be advanced even during the preparation for conflict; the preparation for conflict does not hinder, but makes us active, zealous, and strong. c) Laziness and ease must be renounced, with self denial. STARKE: We must guard ourselves well on all sides, that the devil may not make a breach, for he goes about us like a roaring lion, 1 Pet. v. 8. In the common struggle against Satan and his hosts we must support and help one another. True builders of the church of Christ must not only industriously build, i. e., teach and preach, but also diligently act on the defensive, and resist all the powerful incursions of the devil, and all godless conduct, Tit. i. 9. In the church militant we must work in full armor, and have the sword of the Spirit at hand, that we may be a match for temptations, Eph. vi. 16, 17. God can easily put to naught the crafty attacks of the enemy, Job v. 12.

Vers. 1-8. The assaults of the people of God. 1) How they originate against it. a) Through enemies who threaten to undo His work. b) Through weak friends, who, in spite of, or, on account of watching and prayer, become depressed and dissuaded from the work. 2) How they are to be overcome. a) By readiness for the conflict. b) By confidence in the great, only-to-be-fared God, who fights for His people.—BEDÉ: Plane hac ira hereticorum, hac verba eorum sunt, qui se Samaritanos, hoc est, custodes legis Dei, frustra cognominant, cum sint maxime Deo contrarii ac legibus ejus, ut pote jamdudum a domo David, hoc est, ab unitate Christi et ecclesie per hæreses aut schismata aut mala opera segregati; qui ne sua forte impugnetur atque excludatur impietas, muros fidei ædificari metuunt. . . . Tales solent imbecilles appellare Judæos, hoc est, confessores fidei, et facile a gentibus superandos, dum in quotidiano animarum certamine plus amant vitia quam virtutis victoriæ palam obtinere.—STARKE: To pray and keep good watch are the best means in the time of danger, Eph. vi. 18. This is the way of many people; they make, indeed, a good start in the Lord's work, but when it becomes hard they draw back, and wish to take no trouble, Matt. xiii. 20, 21. Honest souls should not allow themselves to be frightened back by them. Nothing makes one more courageous in war than to be entirely assured that God is with us, and fights for us, Rom. viii. 31; Ps. xxvii. 1.—Our task at the time of attack. 1) Towards defying enemies—to pray and watch, i. e., to be prepared for conflict (vers. 1-3). 2) Towards depressed friends, who yet increase the defiance of the enemy—to confirm their confidence in Him who alone is to be feared, and to sharpen their consciousness of the duty of the conflict (ver. 8).—What attacks befall the servants of the Lord (as Nehemiah) in their work for the honor of God. 1) Through dangers on the part of defiant enemies, who cannot endure the difference between the kingdom of God and the world. 2) From the dejection, hesitation, and foolishness on the part of weak friends, who easily interrupt the work and put it back. 3) Through the breaches in the walls of Jerusalem, which render the defences of the city difficult.—Our duty to watch and pray. 1) Its cause—the malice of the enemy, their power, their aim, the whole attitude of their hearts towards the kingdom of God. 2) Its result: its fulfilment is difficult to many, certainly faithlessness, increased defiance of the enemy, and dissuasion from the work on the part of weak friends are excited; but in contrast to these are a) watchfulness—b) readiness for the conflict—and c) the increasing the confidence in the Lord.—BEDD: Hoc est unicuique adversus hostes universos ecclesie suffugium oratio videlicet ad Deum, et industria doctorum qui die noctuque in lege ejus meditantes corda fidelium contra insidias diaboli ac militum ejus prædicando, consolando, exhortando præmuniant.

Vers. 9-17. What obligation does the enmity of the world against the building of the kingdom of God lay upon us? 1) To advance the building with all our might, in spite of dangers (vers. 9, 10). 2) To be armed while at work (vers. 11, 12). 3) To heed the signal of the leader, when he calls to conflict (vers. 13, 14). 4) Perseverance in the preparation for war (ver. 15); joyful, sacrificing zeal in the work (ver. 16). In all positions severity towards ourselves, particularly towards our love of ease, and laziness.—STARKE: The church always needs those distinguished people, who can comfort the weak in faith, and timorous, and can give them a certain hope in the help of God, 1 Thes. v. 14. In Nehemiah the rulers of the city, and heads of the church, have an example of godliness in his confidence in God—of foresight and diligent watchfulness in his management of this important work, and his arrangement of such good order and war discipline, also of courage and boldness in his proved heroic spirit in the midst of such great fear, danger, and difficulty as that with which he was surrounded on every side in this difficult work. Also in the spiritual conflict it is obligatory upon teachers and watchmen of the church that they should set the example in watchfulness and perception of the public good, and not allow themselves to be annoyed by any trouble. Rev. xvi. 15; Luke xii. 35.

Vers. 11, 12. The preparation for war of the Christian. 1) Why it is necessary the Christian has to build. His building is an attack upon the world, which is irritated by it to the conflict. 2) In what it consists. The Christian bears, even at work, the right weapons. 3) At what it aims. We must and will secure the continuance of the work, and cultivate the feeling of joy and assurance. God will exercise us at the same time in sobriety, self-denial, and activity. Vers. 18-21. The voice of our general in face of the enemy 1) What it takes for granted—that we are prepared for the conflict, even when at work. 2) Of what it reminds us—of the greatness of the work which imposes upon us the building of the kingdom of God in others, and particularly in ourselves; and on the many dangers connected with it. 3) What it demands—that we should heed the signal for conflict, and join ourselves with all the faithful in the strife. 4) What it promises—that God will fight for us, and finally cause our work to succeed.

CHAPTER V. 1-19.

1 AND there was a great cry of the people and of their wives against their brethren
2 the Jews. For there were that said, We, our sons and our daughters are many;
3 therefore we take up corn [perhaps, our sons and our daughters we mortgage, that 4 we might buy corn] for them, that we may eat and live. Some also there were that 5 said, We have mortgaged our lands, vineyards, and houses, that we might buy
6 corn, because of the dearth. There were also that said, we have borrowed money 7 for the king's tribute, and that upon our lands and vineyards. Yet [and] now our flesh is as the flesh of our brethren, our children [sons] as their children [sons]: and lo, we bring into bondage our sons and our daughters to be servants, and some of our daughters are brought into bondage already: neither is it in our power [and our hand is not to God] to redeem them; for [and] other men have our lands and vineyards. And I was very angry when I heard their cry and these words. Then I consulted with myself, and I rebuked the nobles, and the rulers, and said unto them, Ye exact usury, every one of his brother. And I set a great assembly against them. And I said unto them, We, after our ability, have redeemed our brethren the Jews, which were sold unto the heathen; and will ye even sell your brethren? or shall they be sold unto us? Then held they their peace, and found nothing to answer [and found no word]. Also [and] I said, It is not good that ye do: ought ye not to walk in the fear of our God because of the reproach of the heathen our enemies? [And] I likewise, and my brethren, and my servants might exact of [have lent] them money and corn: I pray you, let us leave off this usury. Restore, I pray you, to them, even this day, their lands, their vineyards, their olive yards, and their houses, also the hundredth part of the money, and of the corn, the wine and the oil, that ye exact of [lent] them. Then [and] said they, We will restore them, and will require nothing of them; so will we do as thou sayest. Then [And] I called the priests, and took an oath of them, that they should do according to this promise. Also I shook my lap [bosom], and said, So God shake out every man from his house, and from his labour, that performest not this promise [word], even thus be he shaken out and emptied [empty]. And all the congregation said, Amen, and praised the LORD. And the people did according to this promise [word]. Moreover from the time that I was appointed [he (Artaxerxes) appointed me] to be their governor in the land of Judah, from the twentieth year even unto the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes the king, that is, twelve years, I and my brethren have not eaten the bread of the governor. But [And] the former governors that had been before me were chargeable unto the people, and had taken of them bread and wine, besides forty shekels of silver; yea, even their servants bare rule over the people: but [and] so did not I, because of the fear of God. Yea, also I continued in the work of this wall, neither bought we any land: and all my servants were gathered thither unto the work. Moreover [And] there were at my table a hundred and fifty of the Jews and rulers, besides [and] those that came unto us from among the heathen that are about us. Now [and] that which was prepared for me (i. e., at my expense) daily [for one day] was one ox and six choice sheep; also fowls were prepared for me (i. e., at my expense), and once in ten days store [large quantity] of all sorts of wine: yet [and] for all this required not I the bread of the governor, because the bondage was heavy upon this people. Think upon [remember to] me, my God, for good, according to [om. according to] all that I have done for this people.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 5. The E. V. rightly supplies an equivalent to לְפָנַי.

2 Ver. 6. וְיִצְחָק. This Niphal evidently carries the Chaldee, Syriac, and Samaritan meaning of the verb. Comp. Dan. iv. 24 (27) where the derivative noun is used. The literal translation here is "and my heart was consulted upon me." Why the lexicographers give it a Kal meaning I know not.

3 Ver. 15. וְאֵלֶיךָ is rightly rendered "besides." After the forty shekels salary they received the bread and wine.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Hindrances (2) from the Tyranny of Jews over one another.

It might at first sight seem as if this episodic chapter was out of place, and should properly follow chap. viii.; but there is no sound reason why we should not consider the complaint to have been made while all were engaged in the important work of fortifying the city, as a time when it would be the easier to remedy the evil under the pressure of the common danger.

Ver. 2. We, our sons and our daughters, are many, etc. The error of the Heb. text here in writing rabbim for orebim (requiring only one letter prefixed in the Hebrew) is very evident (according to Houbigant), so that it should read in English, we have mortgaged our sons and our daughters that we might buy corn. Compare the structure of the next verse. The complaint was three-fold: 1. We mortgage our children for food. 2. We mortgage our estates for food. 3. We mortgage our estates for the royal tribute. In all these their brethren were the exactors, not only acting tyrannically towards them, but breaking the written law of God in its spirit (Ex. xxii. 25-27) as well as in its letter (see ver. 7).

Ver. 5. Neither is it in our power. Lit. "and our hand is not to God." So Gen. xxxi. 29.

Ver. 7. Then I consulted with myself.—The Niphal use of malak (wayyimmalek) is peculiar, and suggests a peculiar sense in this place. The Syriac use of the word as "consult" (see Dan. iv. 24, 27) is probably the right one here. Ye exact usury.—The words refer both to the pledges and the interest (ver. 11). And I set a great assembly against them.—In the midst of the necessity of the wall-building Nehemiah summons a great mass-meeting of the Jews (see the word Kehillah in Deut. xxxiii. 4) to have this fraternal outrage stopped instantly by the force of public opinion.

Ver. 8. The Jewish colony had probably often redeemed Jews from captivity.

Ver. 9. Because of the reproach of the heathen.—That is, so as to avoid giving them an opportunity to reproach us.

Ver. 10. I likewise, and my brethren and my servants might exact of them.—Rather: I likewise, that is, my brethren and my servants exact of them, or rather "lent them." It is a confession of Nehemiah that he too was implicated from the fact that he had found his own family engaged in the oppression. Hence he says: "let us leave off this usury." The law expressly forbade lending money to Jews on interest. See Ex. xxii. 25; Lev. xxv. 36; Deut. xxiii. 19. All the lands those rich men had acquired had been obtained in this way.

Ver. 11. This hundredth part was probably a monthly interest, that is, an interest at the rate of twelve per cent. per annum. That ye exact of them. Rather: "that ye lent them."

Ver. 12. The moral force of the great assembly produced an immediate conformity to Nehemiah's demand. His action was a master-piece of management. The oath would have greater solemnity as administered by the priests.

Ver. 13. My lap.—This is the bosom of the outer garment (sinus togæ), which was used as a pocket. (See for this significant action Acts xviii. 6.)

Ver. 14. This verse and those which follow form an interruption of the narrative. They show that Nehemiah was for twelve years governor of Judah, and did not write this history till the expiration of that time. The parallel between Nehemiah and Washington in refusing salary while saving the nation is striking.

Ver. 15. Forty shekels of silver.—This (like the interest in ver. 11) is probably to be reckoned for the month. The former governors had received their table and 480 shekels a year as salary. The 480 shekels would be only $360 in amount of silver; but this would represent in value a large official salary in that day.

Ver. 16. A second point to which Nehemiah refers with satisfaction and as a proof of his disinterested conduct is his allowing no speculation in land on his own part or that of his immediate attendants.

Ver. 17. A third point is his free entertainment of a hundred and fifty Jews, and besides this visitors from surrounding nations.

Ver. 18. The bondage.—The service needed to the king of Persia and also that which was needed for the restoration of their national welfare.

Ver. 19. Think upon me, my God, etc.—Rather: Remember to me for good all which I have done to this people. It becomes necessary sometimes for a man of God to declare his integrity against the oppositions and insinuations of enemies. In such cases he can without presumption expect God to vindicate His faithfulness. See Paul's words before the Sanhedrim (Acts xxiii. 1), and compare also 2 Cor. i. 12; iv. 4; 2 Tim. i. 8; Heb. xiii. 18.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The advantage taken in troublous times for men to prey upon their associates and kindred exhibits the deep depravity of human nature. The violence of open enemies and the presence of surrounding dangers should have encouraged the virtue and piety of the Jews by the odiousness of the opposite and their sense of weakness and need of the Divine help. But as often sailors on a wreck, or as men (s. g. the Florentines) in the midst of the plague, have given themselves up to debauchery and reveling, so the Jewish remnant, persecuted and straitened, oppressed one another. It was no little bravery in Nehemiah to face these tigers of his own nation, while guarding Jerusalem from the foreign foe. A weak spirit would have reasoned that it was enough to do the latter, and that domestic evils must be endured until a more propitious time for their cure. That "great assembly" was a grand token of Nehemiah's marvellous energy and fertile resources.

2. Nehemiah's refusal of official salary was, like Paul's refusal of support at Corinth and Thessalonica (2 Cor. ii. 9; 1 Thess. ii. 9; 2 Thess. iii. 8), a waiving of an undoubted right for the sake of the higher good. Summum jus summa injuria is a sentiment which every tender conscience must often put into exercise. It sees that the only right is to give up right. A sublime spirit discerns when lex, no longer rex, becomes rex.

3. Nehemiah's soul was frank with God. There is freedom of access to a throne of grace for every believer (Heb. iv. 16). "Think upon me, my God, for good, according to all that I have done for this people." is not a presumptuous conceit, but a child-like simplicity. The gross mind of the world would confound the two. Where we know that God has led us in paths of righteousness, we may well use that knowledge and encourage our souls by it. Nehemiah had but few around him who could reach high enough to sympathize fully with him, and it was thus his great comfort to pour out his soul, according to truth, before the God, whose good hand had guided him. God wishes no mock modesty from us. His grace in our hearts and lives should be acknowledged (comp. 1 Tim. i. 12).

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-18. The most powerful hinderances to the development of the congregation. 1) That they are discords and separations, but especially the complaints of the poor against the rich. 2) Whence they arise: from want of love. 3) What do they teach: they challenge to a more powerful proving of love, and lead, when such proof is given, to a new impulse in the life of the congregation, but particularly to new praising of the Lord in common.

The old, and ever new, need 1) In what it consists; want, poverty, and misery are ever in the Lord's congregation. 2) Whence this arises, a) From sin (that of others, but also our own), from laziness, discontent, ingratitude, etc. b) From God's wise intention: He knows the sins, and wishes to remove them; He wishes to give opportunity to the rich to exercise their love, and to the poor to struggle against their discontent. 3) How it is removed: not through all sorts of new social regulations and laws—not through home missionary societies, in so far as their work is scarcely experienced by the poor as a mark of love, and is easily looked upon by them as help owed to them, but through an awaking of the heart to the proving of true love and benevolence as the Lord ever anew renders possible.—STARK: God scourges not alone with a single, but also at times with a double rod, and sends one cross and misfortune upon another. Job x. 17. But the godly have great consolations and promises on the other hand. Ps. xxxiii. 19; Ps. xxxvii. 19, 25. Usury against our poor brethren is forbidden. Lev. xxv. 36; Ps. xv. 5; Ez. xviii. 13; xxii. 12; for whoever builds his house with the property of others, gathers stones for his own grave. Sir. xxi. 9. It is a bad case when we show ourselves to our fellow-Christians in such a way that they must sigh and cry to God against us. Gen. xviii. 21; Sir. iv. 6.

Vers. 7-13. What renders the admonition to exercise love effective? 1) Mildness in example. 2) Readiness of the preacher and his friends to take precedence in the example of love (ver. 10). 3) The assurance that God rejects the unloving from His communion, and robs him of His blessing (ver. 18).

STARK: Anger in office is not, indeed, forbidden, yet one should be angry so as not to sin, Ps. iv. 5, and moderate himself properly. Sir. xxx. 26. As storming showers beat down the grain to the earth, but gentle drops, on the contrary, revive and ripen it, so it is also with speech. Friendly language has more effect than severe rebuke, particularly with the irascible and people of rank, who cannot submit to hard reproof.

Vers. 7-19. How important, but how difficult it is to go forward as an example in true proving of love. 1) How important (vers. 7-13). a) When one condemns hard-heartedness, but is himself hard-hearted, he shows that he was not in earnest in his condemnation. b) When one makes claim to the God of love against the unloving, but is himself unloving, he shows that he does not really possess the fear and faith of God, but hypocritically pretends to have it. c) Those who support their word by their actions always make the greatest impression. 2) How difficult. It is not sufficient to exercise love in that one particular in which one desires proofs of love, much more must love, self-denial, and self-sacrifice be shown in every relation (ver. 14), and indeed beyond common obligations (ver. 15), in spite of particular deeds, on account of which one could be entitled to make claims (ver. 16) in spite of the great sacrifice which the willingness for immolation imposes (vers. 17, 18). SCHLUS: The example of true deeds of love is (ver. 19) particularly also so important on this account because it gives us the assurance and the joyful sentiment of the love and care of God, but it is always on this account so difficult because with sin is joined such want of love, so that we Christians can only find the prayer of Nehemiah (ver. 19) justified in the mouth of Christ, and only for Christ's sake are allowed to dare to beg for God's care and love.—STARK: When necessity or other cogent reasons demand it, one should willingly forego that which otherwise he would with good reason demand and take. Matt. x. 10; 1 Cor. ix. 18; 1 Tim. v. 18. He never rules well who does not do everything he can. God will reward good works, not according to the worthiness of the merit, but from grace. Luke xvii. 18.

CHAPTER VI. 1-19.

- 1 Now [and] it came to pass, when Sanballat, and Tobiah, and Geshem the Arabian, and the rest of our enemies, heard that I had builded the wall, and that there was no breach left therein; (though at that time I had not set up the doors upon
- 2 the gates); that Sanballat and Geshem sent unto me, saying, Come, let us meet together in some one of the villages in the plain of Ono. But [and] they thought
- 3 to do me mischief. And I sent messengers unto them, saying, I am doing a great work, so that [and] I cannot come down: why should the work cease, whilst I
- 4 leave it and come down to you? Yet [and] they sent unto me four times after this sort [word]; and I answered them after the same manner [after this word].
- 5 Then [and] sent Sanballat his servant unto me in like manner [after this word] the

- 6 fifth time with an open letter in his hand; wherein was written, It is reported among the heathen [i. e., nations] and Gashmu [i. e., Geshem] saith it, that thou and the Jews think to rebel: for which cause thou buildest the wall, that thou mayest be their king [and thou art to them for king] according to these words.
- 7 And thou hast also appointed prophets to preach of thee at Jerusalem, saying, There is a king in Judah, and now shall it be reported to the king according to these words. Come now therefore [and now come], and let us take counsel together.
- 8 Then [and] I sent unto him, saying, There are no such things done as thou sayest [there is not according to these words which thou sayest], but [for] thou feignest them out of thine own heart. For they all made us afraid, saying, Their hands shall be weakened from the work, that it be not done [and it shall not be done].
- 10 Now therefore, [And now], O God, strengthen my hands. Afterward [and] I came unto the house of Shemaiah the son of Delaiah the son of Mehetabeel, who was shut up; and he said, Let us meet together in the house of God, within the temple, and let us shut the doors of the temple: for they will come [are coming] to slay thee; yea [and], in the night will they come [are they coming] to slay thee.
- 11 And I said, Should such a man as I flee? and who is there that being as I am
- 12 would go into the temple to save his life [and live]? I will not go in. And lo, I perceived that [And I perceived and lo] God had not sent him, but that [for] he pronounced this prophecy against me, for [and] Tobiah and Sanballat had hired
- 13 him. Therefore was he hired, that I should be afraid, and do so, and sin, and that they might have matter for an evil report [name], that they might reproach me.
- 14 My God, think thou upon [remember] Tobiah and Sanballat according to their works, and on the prophetess Noadiah, and the rest of the prophets, that would
- 15 have put me in fear. So [and] the wall was finished in the twenty and fifth day
- 16 of the month Elul, in fifty and two days. And it came to pass that when all our enemies heard thereof, and all the heathen that were about us saw these things, they were much cast down in their own eyes: for [and] they perceived that this work was wrought of our God.
- 17 Moreover in those days the nobles of Judah sent many letters unto Tobiah [multiplied their letters passing to Tobiah] and the letters of Tobiah came unto them
- 18 [and those which of Tobiah came unto them]. For there were many in Judah sworn unto him, because he was the son-in-law of Shechaniah the son of Arah; and his son Johanan had taken [to wife] the daughter of Meshullam the son of Berechiah. Also they reported his good deeds before me, and uttered my words to him. And Tobiah sent letters to put me in fear.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 6. שָׁמָּה, for שָׁמָּה, not after the analogy of the prop. names in יִדְדָה (where the variation is owing to a form of the divine name), but rather to be compared with יִדְדָה (Ex. iv. 18) and יִדְדָה (Ex. iii. 1).

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 13. לְיֵצֵא is properly "to the intent that." The first one here anticipates the other two, thus "To this intent he was hired, to the intent that, etc."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

(8) Hindrances from the Heathen and their Jewish Confederates.

Ver. 2. The omission of Tobiah's name is an indication that he was merely an attaché of Sanballat. Notice also (in the Heb.) that the prep. is not repeated before Tobiah, as it is before Geshem.—Villages.—Some take this as a proper name, Chephirim.—Ono, with Lod and Hadid, is mentioned in ch. vii. 87 between Jericho and Sennah, as if it might be in the Jordan depression; but the name of Lod is generally identified with Ludd or Lydda in the Sharon plain, twenty-five miles north-west of Jerusalem. If so, the ordinary siting of Ono in that plain is doubtless correct. Eusebius places it at three miles from Lydda.

Why Sanballat should select so distant a spot is puzzling, unless he happened to be stationed there himself at the time. Otherwise he would know that the invitation would arouse Nehemiah's suspicions. There may be another Ono near Chephirah, which is ten miles north-west of Jerusalem, and Chephirim (villages) may stand for Chephirah.

Ver. 5. An open letter, that its contents might alarm all the Jews, and create opposition to Nehemiah.

Ver. 6. Gashmu, i. e. Geshem.—According to these words.—Sanballat throughout makes no accusation, but refers to rumor. Nehemiah's answer is (ver. 8): There is not according to these words which thou sayest, i. e. there is no such rumor.

Strengthen my hands.—This interjected prayer must be taken from Nehemiah's journal at the time. When he writes the narrative, he quotes his ejaculation, as showing where his dependence was at that trying time.

Ver. 10. Shemaiah evidently (see ver. 12) was a prophet. The gift of prophecy did not prevent a man from selling himself to lie for others (see 1 Kings xxii. 22).—Shut up.—See Jer. xxxvi. 5. He was shut up perhaps in performance of a vow; Keil suggests as a symbol of his charge to Nehemiah. This use of 'asar is related to the derivative 'asarrah (a court).

The temple, i. e. the innermost building, the temple proper.

Ver. 11. Would go into the temple to save his life.—Lit.: "would go into the temple and live." The last clause may refer to the death of any one violating the sanctity of the temple. See Num. xviii. 7. It may also mean what our translators give.

Ver. 13. Do so and ain, i. e. shut myself up in fear, and enter the holy place, into which only the priests could enter.

Ver. 14. Sanballat evidently had a strong party in Jerusalem, and among them many of prophetic rank hired with his money.

Ver. 15. Elul was the sixth month corresponding to parts of August and September.—Fifty and two days.—Hence the work was begun on the fourth of Ab, the fifth month. The work went on during the hottest part of the year (say, from July 19th to Sept. 8th).

Ver. 16. The marvellously short time in which the work had been done, and that, too, by Jews, whom Sanballat knew to be divided into mutually hostile parties, impressed him and his co-adjutors with the sense of a divine co-operation with Nehemiah.

Josephus turns the fifty-two days into eight hundred and forty days, probably in his desire to tone down the marvellous for his readers.

Ver. 18. Meshullam. See ch. iii. 4.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Nehemiah, when persistently declining the invitation to meet Sanballat at the plain of Ono, exposed himself to the charge of opposing peace measures. This is one of the hardest trials of virtue, to continue steadfast in a true course at the risk of impugned motives and damaged reputation. Sanballat's fifth message and open letter sought to endanger Nehemiah with the king, while it seemed to show Sanballat's devotion to the king's interests. The refusal now to attend a conference would appear the worse. Yet the sturdy patriot and man of God rests upon his integrity and trusts in God. This perseverance in the right, come what would, makes Nehemiah a great man as well as a good man.

2. "Shemaiah" was such a common name among the Jews, that it is impossible to identify this prophet with any other person of his name (as e. g. the one in Ezra x. 21). He must, however, have been a man of prominence, and one, too, who had been in Nehemiah's confidence, or else the attempt would never have been made by Tobiah and Sanballat through him. It may have been the high position and reputation of Shemaiah that led the prophetess Noadiah and the rest of the prophets (ver. 14) into the false dealings with Nehemiah.

3. The expression of Nehemiah's soul for their punishment from God is the outcry for vindication, which one's very purity of heart demands. In such outcry the persecuted and innocent soul finds rest. Let none confound this with revenge.

4. It is not strange that Sanballat saw that the wall-building was wrought of Israel's God. The trouble with God's enemies is not that their knowledge is defective, but that their hearts are alienated. Evidences are multiplying constantly before them, but produce no change in their opposition. Sanballat was vexed because he was thwarted by the Lord God of Israel. Those fifty-two days of wall-building were clearly to his mind a token of divine assistance; but this knowledge did not stop his opposition.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-3. Can the enticements of the disssembling world really make any impression upon us? 1) What are they? They all come to this one thing in the end, that we shall care before all for ourselves, that is, for our temporal well-being, and therefore shall descend from our due height as children of God, and they aim not towards our salvation, but towards our destruction. 2) What have we to place in opposition to them? That we have a great work to do, the building of the walls of Jerusalem, that is, the securing the kingdom of God in others, and particularly in ourselves, the spreading and the improvement thereof, only through the most faithful performance of this great, infinite work, can we reach the high goal of our salvation.—BEN: Nehemias personam fidelium doctorum tenens, nequaquam ad profanos descendere neque eorum hostiis inquinari sentit, sed in conceptis virtutum operibus devotus persistit; et quo acrius terrere nitebantur inimici, eo magis ipse bene operando terribilis eisdem inimicis fieri contendit.

Vers. 1-9. The behaviour of those who grudge independence to the congregation. 1) They act as if they wish to aid it. 2) They seek to intimidate, as if the representatives of freedom were rendering themselves worthy of suspicion in a dangerous way. 3) Their only design is to rob the congregation of its capable leaders.

Vers. 10-19. The friends of the enemy. 1) They pretend that they are caring for the well-being and the security of the good. 2) They serve the enemy. 3) They only aim at destroying the good leaders.

Vers. 16-19. The most repulsive enemies. 1) They are not those from without who are grieved when the independence of the congregation is secured, and its work crowned with success. 2) They are much rather the false brethren, who always desire to incite the outside enemy anew to disturbing interference by smooth words.—BADÉ: Semper habent electi foris pugnas, intus timores; nec solum apostolis, sed et prophetis periculis ex genere, periculis ex gentibus, periculis ex falsis fratribus suspectam vitam agebant. STARKE: What Paul writes concerning false brethren (2 Cor. xi. 26) that has Nehemiah also experienced for his portion. And it is indeed one of the heaviest griefs of the true servants of God, when they must see that those connected with them in religion, yes, indeed at times their colleagues, who labor with them in the same work, stand in prejudicial intercourse with the enemies of Christ and His church, and yet wish to be considered as co-members, striving for the honor of God. Those whom God awakens for spiritual building should conduct themselves circumspectly and courageously against the snares of the enemy, and not allow themselves to be frightened off by their slander, but cheerfully proceed. In the end the enemy will be cast down with fear in their consciences, and must acknowledge that the work is of God. Acts v. 39. When we wander in the midst of anxiety God refreshes us, and stretches His hand over the rage of His enemies, and helps us with His right hand. Ps. xvii. 11.

Vers. 1-19. Concerning the most critical and saddest hinderance which opposes us in defence of the congregation. 1) From whom it proceeds. Not principally from the outside enemy, not even then when they feign friendship, and, under the pretence of helping us, aim at the worst, but much more from false prophets, who make common cause with the outside enemy, and yet pretend that they wish to protect us from their snares. They excite our humanity to allow ourselves, for our security or ease, that which can become ruinous to us. 2) How it serves us. Our zeal, our fidelity and perseverance, and our watchfulness must be so much the greater; we shall have opportunity to keep ourselves in sufferings, not for our injury, but for our salvation. 3) How it is to be overcome. Through precaution and fearlessness, through the fear of God in which are united humility and genuine high courage, also through great watchfulness.—STARKE: Great lords, who seek to further the good of the church of God and of the commonwealth, are a thorn in the devil's eye. The cross is often never lifted from the godly, that they may live in continual communion with God. Ah, my God, I have also a great business to perform, namely, to save my soul, and better that of my neighbor. Grant that I may be faithful therein, then shall it go on well and succeed.

CHAPTER VII. 1-73.

1 Now [AND] it came to pass when the wall was built, and I had set up the doors,
 2 and the porters and the singers and the Levites were appointed, that I gave my brother Hanani and Hananiah the ruler of the palace, charge over Jerusalem, for
 3 he was [as] a faithful man, and feared God above [i. e. more than] many. And I said unto them, Let not the gates of Jerusalem be opened until the sun be hot; and while [until] they stand by, let them shut the doors and bar them: and appoint watches of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, every one in his watch, and every 4 one to be over against his house. Now [And] the city was large [broad on both hands] and great; but the people were few therein, and the houses were not builded.
 5 And my God put into my heart to gather [and I gathered] together the nobles, and the rulers, and the people, that they might be reckoned by genealogy. And I found a register of the genealogy of them which came up at the first, and found
 6 written therein. These are the children [sons] of the province, that went up out of the captivity of those that had been carried away [of the carrying away], whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away, and [who]
 7 came again to Jerusalem and to Judah, every one unto his city; who came with Zerubbabel, Jeshua, Nehemiah, Azariah, Raamiah, Nahamani, Mordecai, Bilshan, Mispereth, Bigvai, Nehum, Baanah. The number, I say, of the 8 men of the people of Israel was this; The children [sons—so everywhere in this list] of Parosh, two thousand and a hundred seventy and two. The children of Shephatiah, three hundred seventy and two. The children of Arah, six hundred fifty 10 and two. The children of Pahath-moab, of the children of Jeshua and Joab, two 12 thousand and eight hundred and eighteen. The children of Elam, a thousand two

- 13 hundred fifty and four. The children of Zattu, eight hundred forty and five.
 14, 15 The children of Zaccai, seven hundred and three-score. The children of Bin-nui, six hundred forty and eight.
 16, 17 The children of Bebai, six hundred twenty and eight. The children of Azgad, 18 two thousand three hundred twenty and two. The children of Adonikam, six 19 hundred three score and seven. The children of Bigvai, two thousand three-score 20, 21 and seven. The children of Adin, six hundred fifty and five. The children 22 of Ater of Hezekiah, ninety and eight. The children of Hashum, three hundred 23 twenty and eight. The children of Bezai, three hundred twenty and four.
 24, 25 The children of Hariph, a hundred and twelve. The children of Gibeon, ninety 26 and five. The men of Bethlehem and Netophah, a hundred four-score and eight.
 27, 28 The men of Anathoth, a hundred twenty and eight. The men of Beth-azma- 29 veth, forty and two. The men of Kirjath-jearim, Chephirah, and Beeroth, seven 30 hundred forty and three. The men of Ramah and Gaba, six hundred twenty and 31, 32 one. The men of Michmas, a hundred and twenty and two. The men of 33 Beth-el and Ai, a hundred twenty and three. The men of the other Nebo, fifty 34 and two. The children of the other Elam, a thousand two hundred fifty and four.
 35, 36 The children of Harim, three hundred and twenty. The children of Jericho, 37 three hundred forty and five. The children of Lod, Hadid, and Ono, seven hun- 38 dred twenty and one. The children of Senaah, three thousand nine hundred and thirty.
- 39 The priests: The children of Jedaiah, of the house of Jeshua, nine hundred 40, 41 seventy and three. The children of Immer, a thousand fifty and two. The 42 children of Pashur, a thousand two hundred forty and seven. The children of Harim, a thousand and seventeen.
- 43 The Levites: The children of Jeshua, of Kadmiel, and of the children of Hodevah, seventy and four.
- 44 The singers: The children of Asaph, a hundred forty and eight.
- 45 The porters: The children of Shallum, the children of Ater, the children of Tal-mon, the children of Akkub, the children of Hatita, the children of Shobai, a hundred thirty and eight.
- 46 The Nethinim: The children of Ziha, the children of Hashupha, the children of 47 Tabbaoth, the children of Keros, the children of Sia, the children of Padon, 48 the children of Lebana, the children of Hagaba, the children of Shalmal, 49, 50 the children of Hanan, the children of Giddel, the children of Gahar, the 51 children of Reaiah, the children of Rezin, the children of Nekoda, the children
 52 of Gazzam, the children of Uzza, the children of Phaseah, the children of Besai, 53 the children of Meunim, the children of Nephishesim, the children of Bakbuk, 54 the children of Hakupha, the children of Harhur, the children of Bazlith, the
 56 of Sisera, the children of Tamah, the children of Neziah, the children of Hatipha.
 57 The children of Solomon's servants: The children of Sotai, the children of So-58 phereth, the children of Perida, the children of Jaala, the children of Darkon, 59 the children of Giddel, the children of Shephatiah, the children of Hattil, the 60 children of Pochereth of Zebaim, the children of Amon. All the Nethinim and 61 the children of Solomon's servants, were three hundred ninety and two. And these were they which went up also from Tel-melah, Tel-haresha, Cherub, Addon, and Immer: but they could not show their father's house, nor their seed, whether they 62 were of Israel. The children of Delaiah, the children of Tobiah, the children of Nekoda, six hundred forty and two.
- 63 And of the priests: The children of Habaiah, the children of Koz, the children of Barzillai, which took one of the daughters of Barzillai the Gileadite to wife, and 64 was called after their name. These sought their register among those that were reckoned by genealogy, but it was not found: therefore were they, as polluted, put 65 from the priesthood. And the Tirshatha said unto them, that they should not eat of the most holy things, till there stood up a priest with Urim and Thummim.
- 66 The whole congregation together was forty and two thousand three hundred and 67 three-score. Besides their man-servants and their maid-servants, of whom there were seven thousand three hundred thirty and seven: and they had two hundred 68 forty and five singing men and singing women. Their horses, seven hundred thirty 69 and six: their mules, two hundred forty and five: their camels, four hundred thirty and five: six thousand seven hundred and twenty asses.

 70 And some of the chief of the fathers gave unto the work. The Tirshatha gave to the treasure a thousand drams of gold, fifty basins, five hundred and thirty 71 priests' garments. And some of the chief of the fathers gave to the treasure of the work twenty thousand drams of gold, and two thousand and two hundred pounds 72 of silver. And that which the rest of the people gave was twenty thousand drams of gold, and two thousand pounds of silver, and three-score and seven priests' gar-73 ments. So the priests, and the Levites, and the porters, and the singers, and some of the people, and the Nethinim, and all Israel, dwelt in their cities; and when the seventh month came, the children of Israel were in their cities.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 8. וְיָנִיעוּ for יִסְגְּרוּ, ἀναγ. ἀναγόμενον. The Targum Jonathan on 2 Kings iv. 4. וְיִסְגְּרוּ הַיְּהוּדִים is וְיָנִיעוּ הַיְּהוּדִים.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Ordering of the City.

Ver. 1. The setting up of the doors on the gates is anticipated in the description in chap. iii. (See ch. iii. 1, 8, 6, 18, 14, 15.) It occurred after the wall was completed. (Comp. chap. vi. 1.) The porters and the singers and the Levites (comp. ch. xii. 45-47). For the temple-porters in David's time, see the accounts in 1 Chron. ix. 17-27, and xxvi. 1-19. The Korhites or descendants of Korah, who were porters, were also singers, to whom are inscribed so many psalms. All of these porters and singers were Levites. Hence the threefold titles might not indicate distinct classes, but we might read it as a hendiatris "the Levitical singing porters." Yet from the later portions of this book (ch. x. 28; ch. xi. 15-19) we may gather that the singers and porters formed two distinct guilds, separate from one another and separate from the other Levites. Hence the three terms here represent three bodies of men. It is probable that the opening and shutting of the temple-gates were made with song. Perhaps some of the psalms inscribed to the Bene-Korah were so used.

Nehemiah seems to have set these Levitical porters at all the city gates, perhaps to give a more religious aspect to his work of defending Jerusalem.

Ver. 2. Hananî.—See ch. i. 2. Hananîah's position as ruler of the palace (sar habbirah) was probably the old office of the monarchy ('al-habbayith) which Eliakim held (2 Kings xviii. 87) and which Jotham held while Uzziah still lived ('al beth-hammelek, 2 Chron. xxvi. 21). See note on ch. ii. 8. The old office was probably retained and its incumbent acted as vizier or prime officer to the governor. Nehemiah probably contemplated temporary returns to Persia, and therefore consolidated the government in this way, putting faithful men in the highest positions.

Ver. 8. While they stand by.—Rather, until they stand by. The command is, not to open the gates till high day, and not even then, unless the guard is ready to stand by and defend them.

The watchers were stationed throughout the city. These were formed of the inhabitants generally.

Ver. 4. The houses were not builded.—A general expression. The city was full of waste places.

Ver. 6. Here begins a copy of the list of Zerubbabel's company of ninety years before. See Ezra ii. It continues through this chapter. Verses 6 and 7 form the title of the list. Province.—Judea was now a province of the Persian empire.

That went up out of the captivity of those that had been carried away whom Nebuchadnezzar, etc.—Rather, that went up from exile, the captives whom Nebuchadnezzar, etc.

Ver. 7. Nehemiah.—Not the Nehemiah of this book. Asariah.—In Ezra ii., Seraiah. Raamiah.—In Ezra ii., Reelaiah. Nahamani.—Not mentioned in Ezra ii. Perhaps a mistaken repetition of Nehemiah. Mispereth.—In Ezra ii., Mizpar. Nehum.—In Ezra ii., Rehum.

Ver. 10. The 652 of this verse is 775 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 11. The 2318 of this verse is 2312 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 13. The 845 of this verse is 945 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 15. Binnui.—In Ezra ii. Dani. The 648 of this verse is 642 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 16. The 628 of this verse is 623 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 17. The 2322 of this verse is 1222 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 18. The 667 of this verse is 666 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 19. The 2067 of this verse is 2056 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 20. The 655 of this verse is 454 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 22. The 328 of this verse is 228 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 23. The 824 of this verse is 826 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 24. Hariph.—In Ezra ii. Jorah.

Ver. 25. Gibeon.—In Ezra ii. Gibbar.

Ver. 26. The 188 of this verse is 179 in Ezra ii., and divided into two parts. At this verse, when "children" changes to "men," the names of towns (instead of those of fathers) begin.

Ver. 28. Beth-asnaveth. In Ezra ii. Asnaveth.

Ver. 32. The 128 of this verse is 223 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 33. The other Nebo (Nebo A'ker). In Ezra ii. Nebo simply.

Ver. 34. The word "children" resumed, but the names of fathers are resumed for two verses only.

Ver. 37. The 721 of this verse is 725 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 38. The 3980 of this verse is 3680 in Ezra ii. In Ezra we find "the children of Magbush a hundred fifty and six," which is omitted in this copy of Nehemiah.

Ver. 43. Hodevah.—In Ezra ii. Hodaviah.

Ver. 44. The 148 of this verse is 128 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 45. The 188 of this verse is 189 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 46. Hashupha.—Heb. Hanupha.

Ver. 47. Sia.—In Ezra ii. Siaha.

Ver. 48. In Ezra we find "the children of Akkub, the children of Hagab," which is here omitted. Shalmal.—Heb. Salmal.

Ver. 52. In Ezra we find "the children of Asnah," which is here omitted. Nephisheaim.—In Ezra ii. Nephusim (K'ri).

Ver. 54. Bazlith.—In Ezra ii. Bazluth.

Ver. 57. Perida.—In Ezra ii. Peruda.

Ver. 59. Amon.—In Ezra ii. Ami.

Ver. 60. Thirty-five families of Nethinim were represented, and ten of Solomon's servants. Hence there was an average of less than nine to each family.

For the Nethinim see on ch. iii. 26.

Solomon's servants were doubtless those whom Solomon enslaved of the Canaanites. (See 1 Kings ix. 20, 21). Their descendants were probably regarded as engrafted into Israel, as were the Gibeonites.

Ver. 61. Addon.—In Ezra ii. Addan.

Ver. 62. The 642 of this verse is 652 in Ezra ii.

Ver. 65. The Tirshatha.—This title is given expressly to Nehemiah in ch. viii. 9, but in this list of those who came with Zerubbabel nearly a century before, it, of course, cannot refer to Nehemiah, unless we suppose that both in Ezra's list and in this of Nehemiah's there had been interpolated in the original record this 65th verse, to show a decision made by Nehemiah in his time. If that be the case, which is perfectly possible, then the latter part of the 70th verse is also an interpolation of Nehemiah to show his gifts to the work of separation in his time. If we do not accept this explanation, we must believe that Zerubbabel was the Tirshatha of Nehem. vii., and Ezra ii. Fuerst derives the word from tarash, and supposes this root means "to fear," or "to reverence," and refers Teresh (Esth. ii. 21) to the same. But may it not be from the more common root yarash (to possess)? The Persian torsh (revere) is in favor of the former. It is used as synonymous with pe'hah (governor). See ch. xii. 26.

Till there stood up a priest with Urim and Thummim.—This seems to be a circumlo-cution for "forever." The Urim and Thummim (whatever they were) were connected with the High-priest's breastplate (Ex. xxviii. 30) and with the oracular response of God on application by the High-priest (comp. Num. xxvii. 21 and 1 Sam. xxviii. 5). When these responses ceased or when the Urim and Thummim were lost, we cannot tell. We hear nothing of them after David's reign. The prophets seem to have taken their place. The Urim and Thummim being absent, there was no authority in Israel to determine the priestly status of these unregistered ones.

Ver. 66. The whole congregation together was forty and two thousand three hundred and threescore.—The numbers given in this chapter, up to this verse, amount to only 81,089. In Ezra ii. the amount is 29,818. If we add to the former sum the number of servants given in ver. 67, we have only 89,671, or 8,689 less than the gross amount of this verse. We have noted the omission in this list of four families. The differences in the numbers of the two lists also show how liable are numbers to be changed in transcription. The grand total, being the same in both lists, is probably correct.

Ver. 67. Singing men and singing women, meshorerim umeshoreroth. Comp. Eccl. ii. 8. These were probably a guild of servants, dating from Solomon's day.

Ver. 70. The work of restoration. The Tirshatha.—See on ver. 65.

Ver. 71. The repetition of the chief of the fathers seems to support the view of the Tirshatha sentence being an interpolation by Nehemiah. The 20,000 drams of gold here is 61,000 in Ezra ii., and the 2200 pounds here are 5000 pounds there, but if we add the people's gift of ver. 72 (not found in Ezra) we have here 40,000 and 4200 against 61,000 and 5000 there. So the sixty-seven priests' garments here are one hundred there. See remark on numbers in ver. 66.

The children of Israel were in their cities.—This seems to be the real ending of the quotation from the old register of Zerubbabel's day, and then Nehemiah's narration begins again, using almost the same words as Ezra's concerning the first migration. In Ezra it is wayyeasphu ha'am keish e'hadh, and in Nehemiah it is wayyeasphu khol ha'am keish e'hadh. This likeness was doubtless designed.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The walls were not to be substitutes for, but encouragements of, watchfulness. A perfect system of opening, shutting, barring and guarding the gates was to follow the successful up-building of the city-bulwark. Faithful men were to be put into the highest positions, and a larger number of Jews were to be induced to dwell in Jerusalem in order to its defence. The order, security and growth of Jerusalem, as the city of the Great King, Jehovah of Israel, formed the undivided aim of the son of Hachaliah.

2. The genealogies occupied an important place in Israel. They contained the certificate of church-membership for each Israelite. They also contained the claims to official dignity that belonged to priest and Levite. The family-idea thus received a marked emphasis in God's redemptive government—an emphasis which is echoed by Malachi (Mal. iv. 6) and the angel that appeared to Zacharias (Luke i. 17). The appearance of the Nethinim in the genealogies is a forcible illustration of the impartial grace of God. That grace which would bring in all the Gentiles as children was foretold by the brotherly position of the Nethinim (of Gentile blood) among the people of God, the children of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob.

3. Those priests whose names were not in the lists were counted the same as polluted, that is, not simply as having a blemish (see Lev. xxi. 17-21), for such priests could eat of the holy things, but as having an uncleanness (see Lev. xxii. 8-6), which prevented all contact with holy objects. This shows the prominence of externals in the Jewish religion—a necessary prominence where the externals had a precise spiritual significance. For, after all, it was the spiritual truth which was the basis of such exactness, and by no means the mere intrinsic value of externals.

4. The entire number of Jews who returned in Cyrus' day to Jerusalem was small—about 60,000, out of millions. Piety, patriotism and desire for change were three motives at work in the 60,000. But what a vast mass were unmoved by any of these motives, and were well satisfied with their exile! Some, however, like Daniel, remained from high and holy motives. The Jewish people is a remnant.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

The Lord, on His side, appoints watchmen on the walls of Jerusalem, who must allow themselves no rest day or night, and must not even give the Lord Himself any rest until He fortifies Jerusalem, and makes it for a praise in the earth. Isa. lxii. 6, 7. But now, when Jerusalem is scantily rebuilt, Nehemiah appoints watchmen, who shall guard the city and its gates. The first thing necessary for the congregation is praying hearts, whose petitions shall not slacken until the Lord is persuaded; these the Lord Himself must give. But when the prayers have been granted care must be taken for the preservation and using of that which has been granted. That the congregation itself must see to. And that they themselves can and must watch, that they must remain separated from the world, and that they will be secured in the maintenance of their peculiarity and independence, is their honor and joy. 2. There are always two tasks in the congregation, or church, of the Lord. As there are always enemies remaining

(so long as the kingdom is not of God and of His Christ), who cannot endure the spread of the blessing, which might proceed from the church, who would much rather indeed win its possessions and gifts, and would wish to make it like the world, so these enemies, especially then, when the powers of life are most active in it, come out to attack it most energetically, and fall upon its representatives most sharply in word and deed, therefore it must always have some to keep watch, to protect it, and fight the enemy. But again: so long as everything is in embryo, and the conclusion has not been reached, and there are yet those to be found capable of receiving and becoming participants in the goods and gifts of the church and in the salvation of the Lord, that is, those who can and will enter the congregation of the Lord, and increase and extend the Lord's kingdom, therefore, just on this account, such are necessary as will be engaged in the winning and reception of new members to the kingdom, who understand the situation, and can point out the spot where they also can build. 8. As Jerusalem, in Nehemiah's time, extended far on both sides, and was scantily populated, so also the city of God in all times has had space for new additions to its population. For, in truth, the rich possessions which God has prepared in His church for mankind, would only then be sufficiently turned to profit when every one called man should enjoy them, and it were itself full and sufficiently built out, and all had entered in. For that God, who has made all things for Himself, and for that Lord who has redeemed all, the totality alone, from which none is lost, forms a sufficiently great people.—BEDE: Præcepit autem Nehemias, ne aperiantur portæ Hierusalem usque ad calorem solis, hoc est toto tempore noctis, ne videlicet aut oblectus tenebris hostis erumpat, aut certe aliquis incautus exiens ab hoste captus pereat. Quod etiam in hujus sæculi nocte tota custodes animarum debent soliter agere, ne observantia piæ conversationis neglecta diabolus aut cohortem fidelium perturbaturus subintret aut de ipsorum numero fidelium quempiam perditurus rapiat. Apparente autem sole justitiæ et clarescente luce futuræ beatitudinis jam non opus erit claustris continentis; quia nec adversariis ultra dabitur facillus impugnandi sive tentandi fideles, utpote sempiterna cum suo principe ultione damnatis. Unde in Apocalypsi sua Joannes de futura ejusdem sanctæ civitatis gloria dicit; et portæ ejus non clauduntur per diem; nox enim non erit illis.—STARKE: This is the final cause why cities and countries, kingdoms and principalities are founded, and filled with people that God may dwell there, and His church may have a certain shelter. God provides help, protection, and rest for His church, and as human protection is very insignificant, God with His angels is the best watchman.

CHAPTER VIII. 1-18.

1 AND all the people gathered themselves together as one man into the street that was before the water-gate; and they spake unto Ezra the scribe to bring the book 2 of the law of Moses, which the LORD had commanded to Israel. And Ezra the priest brought the law before the congregation both of men and women, and all that could hear with understanding [that understood in hearing] upon the first 3 day of the seventh month. And he read therein before the street that was before the water-gate from the morning until midday [from the light until half of the day], before the men and the women, and those that could understand [and the understanding]; and the ears of all the people were attentive unto the book of the 4 law. And Ezra the scribe stood upon a pulpit [tower] of wood, which they had made for that purpose; and beside him stood Mattithiah, and Shema, and Anaiah, and Urijah, and Hilkiash, and Maaseiah, on his right hand; and on his left hand Pedaiash, and Mishael, and Malchiah, and Hashum, and Hashbadana, Zechariah 5 and Meshullam. And Ezra opened the book in the sight [to the eyes] of all the people; (for he was above all the people;) and when he opened it, all the people 6 stood up. And Ezra blessed the LORD, the great God. And all the people answered, Amen, Amen, with lifting up their hands: and they bowed their heads, 7 and worshipped the LORD with their faces to the ground. Also [and] Jeshua, and Bani, and Sherebiah, Jamin, Akkub, Shabbethai, Hodijah, Maaseiah, Kelita, Azariah, Jozabad, Hanan, Pelaiah, and the Levites, caused the people to under-8 stand the law: and the people stood in their place. So [And] they read in the book in the law of God distinctly, and gave the sense, and caused them to under-9 stand the reading. And Nehemiah, which is the Tirshatha, and Ezra the priest the scribe, and the Levites that taught the people, said unto all the people, This day is holy unto the LORD your God; mourn not, nor weep. For all the people 10 wept, when they heard the words of the law. Then [And] he said unto them, Go your way, eat the fat [fat things], and drink the sweet [sweet things], and send portions unto them [him] for whom nothing is prepared: for this day is holy unto 11 our Lord: neither be ye sorry; for the joy of the LORD is your strength. So
 [And] the Levites stilled all the people, saying, Hold your peace, for the day is 12 holy; neither be ye grieved. And all the people went their way to eat, and to drink, and to send portions and to make great mirth, because they had understood 13 the words that were declared unto them. And on the second day were gathered together the chief of the fathers of all the people, the priests and the Levites, unto 14 Ezra the scribe, even to understand [consider] the words of the law. And they found written in the law which the LORD had commanded by [by the hand of] Moses, that the children of Israel should dwell in booths in the feast of the seventh 15 month; and that they should publish and proclaim [cause the voice to be heard and to pass] in all their cities, and in Jerusalem, saying, Go forth unto the mount, and fetch olive branches, and pine [oil-tree] branches, and myrtle branches, and palm branches, and branches of thick [thick-leaved] trees, to make booths, as it is 16 written. So [And] the people went forth, and brought them, and made themselves booths, every one upon the roof of his house [upon his roof], and in their courts, and in the street [square] of the water-gate, and in the street [square] of the gate 17 of Ephraim. And all the congregation of them that were come again out of the captivity made booths, and sat under the booths: for since the days of Jeshua, the son of Nun unto that day had not the children of Israel done so. And there was 18 very great gladness. Also [And] day by day, from the first day unto the last day, he read in the book of the law of God. And they kept the feast seven days; and on the eighth day was a solemn assembly according unto the manner [statute].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 6. יָקְרוּ וַיִּשְׁתַּחוּ. This frequent combination, the former verb being never without the latter, indicates the two steps of the movement: "they stooped and bowed down." The verbs שָׁחָה and שָׁחָה are stronger than קָרַךְ.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 7. The Hiphil of כָּיִן is used in vers. 7, 8, 9, with the true Hiphil force; but in vers. 2, 3, 12, it has the Kal sense.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 10. לֹאֲשֶׁר אֵין נָכוֹן לוֹ for לֹאֲשֶׁר אֵין נָכוֹן לוֹ, by suppression of the relative, which is far harsher than the Eng suppression of the antecedent, e. g. "Honor to whom honor is due." Comp. 1 Chron. xv. 12.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 17. Notice the alliterative use of the three roots שָׁחָה, יָשַׁב and שָׁנָה.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Instruction of the People.

Ver. 1. Street.—Rather "square" or plaza. The water-gate, according to our view (see on ch. iii. 26 and xii. 87), was an inner gate connected both with the temple and with the subterranean water galleries of Ophel, by which there seems to have been a large open square for public assemblies. (See Excursus). Esra the scribe, Esra hassopher. In the next verse it is Esra the priest, Esra hakkohen. This is the first mention of Esra in the book of Nehemiah. He had come to Jerusalem thirteen years previously, with about three thousand returning Jews (1754 males), holding a commission from Artaxerxes to appoint magistrates in Judæa. He had forced the Jews to separate from their heathen wives, and had then probably returned to Persia, as we find the Jews had relapsed into their former condition. As we do not meet with his name in Nehemiah till now, it is probable he followed Nehemiah to Judea to assist him in another movement of reform.

Ver. 2. All that could hear with understanding.—Lit., All that understood in hearing, i. e., those old enough to understand. The first day of the seventh month.—This was a special "Sabbath, a memorial of blowing of trumpets, a holy convocation." (Lev. xxiii. 24). A specific offering was appointed for that day, beside the burnt-offering of the month. (Numb. xxix. 1-8).

Ver. 8. From morning.—Lit., from the light, i. e., from daylight or an hour as early as was available. The reading must have occupied at least six hours. About one-quarter of the Pentateuch might be read in that time.

Ver. 4. Pulpit.—Probably the same that is called stairs in ch. ix. 4. The word here is strictly tower and there ascend. It was doubtless a very high platform so as to overlook a large crowd. (Comp. ver. 5). Ananiah.—See chap. x. 22. Urijah.—See ch. iii. 4. Hilkiah.—Not the Hilkiah of xii. 7. He lived in Zerubbabel's day. Maaseiah.—See xii. 41. Malchiah.—See x. 3. Zechariah.—See xii. 41. Mesheulam.—See x. 7. All these named as standing with Esra may have been priests. If so, the Ananiah of ch. x. 22 must be a different one from this one here named. As far as we can trace the other names, they appear to be priests.

Ver. 7. Jeshua.—See ch. x. 9. Bani.—See ch. x. 13. Sherebiah.—See ch. x. 12. Jamin.—Perhaps the Benjamin of ch. iii. 23.

Akkub.—See ch. xii. 19. Shabbethai.—See ch. xi. 16. Hodijah.—See ch. x. 10. Maaseiah.—Probably not the Maaseiah of ver. 4, or of ch. x. 25, or of ch. xi. 5, but possibly the Maaseiah of ch. iii. 23. Kelita.—See ch. x. 10. Azariah.—Perhaps the priest mentioned ch. x. 2. Jozabad.—See ch. xi. 16. Hanan.—See ch. x. 10. Pelaiah.—See ch. x. 10. And the Levites, i. e., and other Levites, for the thirteen mentioned were Levites. These Levites seem to have read after Esra and to have explained it to different parts of the crowd, while the Amens, the lifting up of the hands, the bowing and the worshipping (in ver. 6) occurred at intervals during the reading. The explanation may have been principally of archaic Hebrew words.

Ver. 8. So they read.—That is Esra read and the Levites re-read and explained where necessary.

Ver. 9. The Tirshatha.—See on ch. vii. 65. The holiness of the day is used as an argument against mourning. Note the fact that the high-priest on whose mitre was written "Holiness to the Lord," was forbidden to mourn. (See Lev. xxi. 10. Comp. Lev. x. 6).

Ver. 10. Send portions.—See the spirit of this enjoined in Deut. xvi. 11, 12, with regard to the Pentecost season.

The joy of the Lord is your strength, i. e., a mirthfulness which springs from right relations to God is an element and sign of spiritual strength.

Ver. 13. To understand.—Rather, "to consider."

Ver. 14. In the feast of the seventh month, i. e., the feast of tabernacles. See Lev. xxiii. 34-43.

Ver. 15. This is a pregnant sentence, thus: And that they should publish and proclaim in all their cities (Lev. xxiii. 4); so they proclaimed in Jerusalem, etc. The order is given on the 2d of Tisri, and the work is done in readiness for the 15th. The narrative runs the two together, confusing the time to the careless reader. Unto the mount, i. e., mount of Olives. Pine branches, 'als 'ets shemen, branches of the oil-tree (Isa. xli. 19). Mr. Houghton (in Smith's Dict.) thinks it may be the Zackum or Balanites Ægyptiaca. Branches of thiek trees, 'als 'ets avoth; either specifically "branches of the Avoth tree," or branches of tangled trees."

In Lev. xxiii. 40, the command is to use,

1. The fruit of goodly trees.
2. The leaves of palm trees.
3. The boughs of Avoth trees.
4. Willows of the brook.

Here the olive tree, the oil tree, and the myrtle would come under the first head ("fruit" being used for any produce), while the willow-tree is omitted, perhaps because there happened to be none near Jerusalem at that time.

Ver. 16. Street of the water-gate.—See on ver. 1. Street of the gate of Ephraim.—From 2 Kings xiv. 13 and Neh. ch. xii. 39, we see that this gate was near the north-west corner of the city, between "the broad wall" and the "old gate," the "old gate" and "corner-gate" being perhaps the same. According to Keil, the Gate of Ephraim may have been attached to the broad wall and not have been destroyed. Hence it is not mentioned in chap. iii. There was, we may suppose, a large open place in the N. W. part of the city, corresponding to that by the water-gate in the S. E. part.

Ver. 17. Done so.—That is, kept the feast of Tabernacles with such gladness.

Ver. 18. He read, i. e., Ezra.

They kept the feast, i. e., of tabernacles. They had been from the second day (ver. 13), to this the 15th day of Tisri (Lev. xxiii. 34) preparing for it. The solemn fast-day of the 10th of Tisri had doubtless been excepted. It is passed over without mention in the narrative. A solemn assembly, atzereth (comp. Lev. xxiii. 36; Num. xxix. 35; Deut. xvi. 8; Jer. ix. 2; Amos v. 21). It seems to have been something more than the "mikra-kodesh" (holy convocation), and yet what more we cannot say. It is applied to the last day of the feast of tabernacles and to the last day of the passover week. JOSEPHUS (Ant. 8, 10, 5) applies it to Pentecost (in the Greek form Asarth), as especially belonging to that day, which is the use of the word by the later Jews.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The constant study of God's word by the people was always, and is still, a distinguishing characteristic of the Jewish nation. The Levites were originally entrusted with the duty of reading the law before Israel every seventh year (Deut. xxxi. 9-13), and when Jehoshaphat (2 Chron. xvii. 7-9) sent Levites throughout all the cities of Judah to teach the people from the book of the law of the Lord, he was doubtless using the Levites in a way familiar to the nation from the first. God's people were to keep in mind that they were not to follow the light of nature, but to consult the divine oracles for all their guidance (Rom. iii. 2).

Redemption was a plan, and the Church was a scheme, and the soul of the scheme was the written word of God.

2. The tears of penitence naturally lead to joy. When men mourn for sin, the Lord comforts them, saying: "Go your way, eat the fat and drink the sweet." The sinful woman who bathed our Saviour's feet with tears heard him say: "Go in peace" (Luke vii. 50). There may have been much that was only mere excitement, without a religious basis, both in the weeping and the merriment of this month of Tisri; yet we cannot but believe that there was a nucleus of true devotion in the movement, a mark of the holy succession that reached down to Simeon and Anna.

8. The booths of the tabernacle-feasts were memorials of the booth life of Israel (on leaving Egypt) that began at Succoth. The memory would encourage humility and gladness, bringing the thoughts of the people back to first principles, and making them to feel the Divine presence and protection (see Lev. xxiii. 43). The roofs of the houses were battlemented so as to preclude danger (Deut. xxii. 8) and the houses were low. The building of booths on the roofs was therefore a very natural thing. They would not be in the way of the multitude, and would have in each case somewhat of domestic privacy.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-12. The holiday of the Lord's congregation. 1) Its cause: the exterior one lies in the time, it is the seventh month, the true one in the proofs God has given, since He has secured the existence of the congregation before the world, fortified their city, etc. 2) Its celebration. The congregation shows a longing for God's word, uses it in good order, and listens to it with reverence. 3) Its blessing: sadness turned into joy. The ever permanent elements in the true service of God. 1) On the side of the congregation: hunger for the word of God. 2) On the side of the teachers—the right handling of the word of God—commences with the praise of God, which awakens the assenting acknowledgment of the congregation, communication of the divine word, the explanation and application of the same. On both sides resignation to God's word and being.—BENDE: Rogaverunt ipsi pontificem suum, ut allato libro mandata sibi Legis, quæ agerē debeant, replicaret, ut cum civitate sedificata, operis quoque placiti Deo structura consurgeret, ne sicut antea propter negligentiam religionis civitatis etiam ruina sequeretur.—STARK: Even the common people must take care that they shall have the word of God pure and clear. Young people should be made to listen to the divine word from their childhood, that they may learn to fear God. If in the Old Testament all without exception have been obliged to listen to the law, how inexcusable it is if the papacy does not allow this to the people. Hearers should not become tired and impatient even if the sermon is rather long. The principal part of the service of God consists in praise, and in this we resemble the God-praising angels. The singing of Collects, prayers and Thanksgivings should be in an intelligible language, that the hearer may understand and be able to respond Amen. The Amen in a public assembly should be sung by each and all. If we should bow the knees of our hearts in particular before the Lord, it is proper that in outward gestures also we should show our humility before God. Preachers must not forget prayer in the arrangement of divine service. If teachers publicly kneel down and pray to God, it is proper that the hearers also should fall upon their knees with them. Teachers should aim at lucidity in explaining the word of God. If God gives us a joyful day we should not forget the poor.

Rejoice in the Lord always! That is 1) possible, for in communion with the Lord we have consolation, promise, help, refreshment, etc., in spite of all the calamities and difficulties of earth. 2) Necessary; for every day is holy to the Lord, and our conduct must always honor the Lord. 3) Wholesome; for joy in the Lord is our strength, and puts us in the position to wait with patience, makes us skilful, and guards us from all straying. Joy in the Lord is our strength, for 1) in ourselves we are weak and hesitating. 2) In the fulness of the Lord is grace for grace. 3) Precisely the joy in the Lord is fitted to cause us to have all that is comprehended in strength. With the prayer, gladden me with Thy help, and let my joy in Thee be my strength, can one gain anew each day consolation and joy, whatever task be before him.

Vers. 13-18. The festival of the people. 1)

Its foundation—the divine command—God wishes that the congregation should celebrate the holiday. 2) Its form; it exhibits itself also externally; in the Old Testament by booths, which have their signification; in the New Testament through other ceremonies, which are not less full of meaning. 3) Its effect. Resignation to God's word and will, and from that a glorification of the entire life.—STARKER: Christians have in the world no continuing city, and their life is vain and fleeting. Well for them, then, if they strive to dwell in the eternal tents. Heb. xiii. 14. As the Jews had their holidays and festivals, so have we Christians, but upon the condition of Christian freedom. Coloss. ii. 16. The exercise of true religion gives a tranquil heart and joyful conscience; but false worship gives much annoying trouble, and tortures the conscience.

CHAPTER IX. 1-88.

- 1 Now [And] in the twenty and fourth day of this month the children of Israel were assembled with fasting, and with sackclothes, and earth upon them [i. e., upon
- 2 their heads]. And the seed of Israel separated themselves from all strangers [sons of strangeness], and stood and confessed their sins, and the iniquities of their fathers.
- 3 And they stood up in their place and read in the book of the law of the LORD their God one fourth part of the day; and another fourth part they confessed, and wor-
- 4 shipped the LORD their God. Then [And] stood up upon the stairs of the Levites, Jeshua, and Bani, Kadmiel, Shebaniah, Bunni, Sherebiah, Bani, and Chenani, and
- 5 cried with a loud voice unto the LORD their God. Then [And] the Levites Jeshua, and Kadmiel, Bani, Hashabniah, Sherebiah, Hodijah, Shebaniah and Pethahiah said, Stand up and bless the LORD your God for ever and ever [from eternity to eternity], and blessed be [they blessed] thy glorious name [the name of thy
- 6 glory], which [and it] is exalted above all blessing and praise. Thou, even thou, art LORD alone; thou hast made heaven, the heaven of heavens, with all their host, the earth, and all things that are therein, the seas and all that is therein, and thou
- 7 preservest them all; and the host of heaven worshippeth thee. Thou art the LORD the God, who didst choose Abram, and broughtest him forth out of Ur of the Chal-
- 8 dees, and gavest him the name of Abraham; and foundest his heart faithful before thee and madest a [the] covenant with him to give the land of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Jebusites, and the Girgashites, to
- 9 give it, I say, to his seed, and hast performed thy words; for thou art righteous: and didst see the affliction of our fathers in Egypt, and heardest their cry by the
- 10 Red Sea [Sea of weeds]. And shewedst signs and wonders upon Pharaoh, and on all his servants, and on all the people of his land: for thou knewest that they dealt proudly against them. So didst thou [and thou didst] get thee a name, as it is this
- 11 day. And thou didst divide the sea before them, so that [and] they went through the midst of the sea on the dry land; and their persecutors thou threwest into the
- 12 deeps, as a stone into the mighty waters. Moreover [and] thou leddest them in the day by a cloudy pillar; and in the night by a pillar of fire, to give them light in
- 13 the way wherein they should go. Thou camest down also [And thou camest down] upon Mount Sinai, and spakest with them from heaven, and gavest them right
- 14 judgments and true laws [laws of truth], good statutes and commandments: and madest known unto them thy holy Sabbath, and commandedst them precepts,

15 [and] statutes, and laws, by the hand of Moses thy servant: and gavest them bread from heaven for their hunger, and broughtest forth water for them out of the rock for their thirst, and promisedst them that they should go in to possess the land
 16 which thou hadst sworn [lifted up thy hand] to give them. But [And] they and our fathers dealt proudly, and hardened their necks, and hearkened not to thy 17 commandments, and refused to obey, neither were mindful of thy wonders that thou didst among them; but [and] hardened their necks and in their rebellion appointed a captain to return to their bondage [in place of "in their rebellion," in Egypt]; but thou art a God ready to pardon [a God of pardons] gracious and merciful, slow to anger, and of great kindness, and forsookest them not. Yea, when they had made [Yea, they even made] them a molten calf, and said, This is thy God that brought thee up out of Egypt, and had wrought [and wrought] great provocations; yet [and] thou in thy manifold mercies forsookest them not in the wilderness: the pillar of the cloud departed not from them by day, to lead them in the way; neither the pillar of [the] fire by night, to show them light, and the way
 20 wherein they should go. Thou gavest also [And thou gavest] thy good Spirit to instruct them, and withheldest not thy manna from their mouth, and gavest them
 21 water for their thirst. Yea forty years [And forty years] didst thou sustain them in the wilderness, so that they lacked nothing; their clothes waxed not old, and 22 their feet swelled not. Moreover [And] thou gavest them kingdoms and nations, and didst divide them into corners [or districts]: so they possessed the land of Sihon, and the land of the king of Heshbon [perhaps, the land of Sihon, the king of Heshbon], and the land of Og, king of Bashan. Their children also multipliedst thou [And their children thou didst multiply] as the stars of heaven, and broughtest them into the land, concerning which thou hadst promised to their fathers, that 24 they should go in to possess it. [So [And] the children went in and possessed the land, and thou subduedst before them the inhabitants of the land; the Canaanites, and gavest them into their hands, with their kings, and the people of the land, that 25 they might do with them as they would. And they took strong cities, and a fat land, and possessed houses full of all goods, wells digged [cisterns hewn], vineyards and oliveyards, and fruit trees in abundance: so [and] they did eat, and were filled,
 26 and became fat, and delighted themselves in thy great goodness. Nevertheless [And] they were disobedient, and rebelled against thee, and cast thy law behind their backs, and slew thy prophets which testified against them to turn them to thee,
 27 and they wrought great provocations. Therefore [And] thou deliveredst them into the hand of their enemies who vexed them: and in the time of their trouble when they cried [their oppressors who oppressed them: and in the time of their oppression they cried] unto thee, [and] thou heardest them from heaven; and according to thy manifold mercies thou gavest them saviours, who saved them out of the hand
 28 of their enemies [oppressors]. But after they had rest, they did evil again [they returned to do evil] before thee: therefore ledest thou [and thou ledest] them in the hand of their enemies, so that they had the dominion over them yet when [and] they returned, and cried unto thee, [and] thou heardest them from heaven; and many times didst thou deliver them according to thy mercies; and testifiedst against [to] them, that thou mightest bring them again unto thy law: yet [and] they dealt proudly, and hearkened not unto thy commandments, but [and] sinned against thy judgments, which if a man do, he shall live in them [which a man shall do and live in them], and withdrew the shoulder [gave a resisting shoulder], and hardened their neck, and would not hear [did not hear]. Yct [And] many years didst thou forbear them [i. e., act forbearingly towards them], and testifiedst against [to] them by thy Spirit in thy prophets [by the hand of thy prophets]; yet would they not give ear [and they did not give ear] therefore gavest thou [and thou 31 gavest] them into the hand of the people of the lands. Nevertheless [And] for thy great mercies' sake [in thy great mercies] thou didst not utterly consume them, nor forsake them; for thou art a gracious and merciful God. Now therefore [and now], our God, the great, the mighty, and the terrible God, who keepest covenant and mercy [the covenant and the mercy], let not all the trouble [distress] seem little before thee, that hath come upon us [found us], on our kings, on our princes, and on our priests, and on our prophets, and on our fathers, and on all thy people, since the time of the kings of Assyria unto this day. Howbeit [And] thou art just in all that is brought [comes] upon us; for thou hast done right, but [and] we have done wickedly: neither have our kings, our princes, our priests, nor our fathers kept [done] thy law, nor hearkened unto thy commandments and thy testimonies, wherewith thou didst testify against [to] them. For they have not served thee in their kingdom and in thy great goodness [blessings of prosperity] that thou gavest them, and in the large and fat land which thou gavest before them, neither turned they from their wicked works. Behold, we are servants this day, and [as] for the land that thou gavest unto our fathers to eat the fruit thereof and the good thereof, behold, we are servants in it: and it yieldeth much increase unto the kings whom thou hast set over us because of our sins: also [and] they have dominion over our bodies, and over our cattle, at their pleasure, and we are in great distress. And because of all this we make a sure covenant, and write it; and our princes, Levites, and priests seal unto it [are on the sealed covenant].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 8. כָּרִית inf. abs. for כָּרַת.

2 Ver. 22. וְעַמֵּימִים. This Aramaean form is found in Judges v. 14, where it is poetical.

3 Ver. 26. וְנָס, in this phrase (see 1 Kings xiv. 9; Ezra xxiii. 35, and here) the Tseré becomes Patiah'h, as if from נָס not נָס.

4 Ver. 28. עָתִידִים רְבוֹת for רְבוֹת עָתִידִים.

5 Ver. 38. אֲנִיָּה. That this is not an adjective with בְּרִית understood is evident from its use in chapter xi. 23.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Confession.

The confession recorded in this chapter uses largely the language of the older Scriptures. For ver. 6 see Ps. lxxxvi. 10; Ex. xx. 11, and Deut. x. 14. For ver. 9, see Ex. iii. 7. For ver. 10, see Jer. xxxii. 20. For ver. 11, see Ex. xv. 5, 10. For ver. 12, see Ex. xiii. 21. For ver. 13, see Ex. xix. 20. For ver. 15, see Ps. cv. 40, 41. For ver. 16, see 2 Kings xvii. 14. For ver. 17, see Ps. lxxviii. 11; Ex. xxxiv. 6. For ver. 25, see Deut. vi. 10, 11. For ver. 27, see Judg. ii. 14, 18. For ver. 29, see Lev. xviii. 5. For ver. 33, see Ps. cvi. 6. For ver. 35 and ver. 36, see Deut. xxviii. 47, 48.

Ver. 1. The twenty and fourth day of this month.—The 'Atzereth was the 22d day of Tisri. Two days after is this special day of fasting and confession. It must not be confounded with the Yom-hak-kippurim or Day of Atonement, which was the 10th of Tisri.

Barth upon them, i. e., on their heads (see 1 Sam. iv. 12). Both earth and ashes were used on the head as a sign of sorrow. Comp. 2 Sam. xiii. 19. Our Eng. version has written here sackclothes, but everywhere else has used sackcloth for the Heb. plural.

This fasting, mourning and confession was not a swing of the pendulum to the other extreme from the joy and gladness of the Tabernacle's feast, but the action of the same religious spirit which recognized God's great favors, but which at the same time recognized the great errors of the people.

Ver. 2. The Bene-nechar or strangers were foreigners who had become mixed with the Jews for commercial interest or by marriage. Comp. chap. xiii. 3, 27.

Ver. 3. And read.—Probably as before, Ezra reading from the high platform to the great multitude, and the Levites explaining in different parts of the crowd. One-fourth part of the day.—Probably half way to noon. Another fourth part.—Probably the rest of the time till noon. Comp. chap. viii. 8.

Ver. 4. Stairs.—See on chap. viii. 4. Jeshua, Bani, Kadmiel, Shebaniah, Sherebiah appear again in ver. 5, but Bunni, Bani (2) and Chenani are replaced there by Hashabniah, Hodijah, and Pethahiah. So there appears to have been two movements. The Levites mentioned in the fourth verse opened the service with a loud cry, perhaps a doxology, and then the Levites mentioned in the fifth verse began the confession. Bunni is perhaps Binnai of chap. x. 9. Bani (2) is perhaps Benina of chap. x. 13. Chenani is probably Hanan of chap. x. 10.

Ver. 5. Hashabniah.—In chap. x. 11 Hashabiah. Hodijah.—See chap. x. 10. Pethahiah.—Perhaps Pelaiah of chap. x. 10. The only Levites mentioned as sealing in chap. x. who are not mentioned here are, then, Kelita, Micha, Rehob, Zaour, Shebaniah (2), Hodijah (2).

Stand up and bless the Lord your God for ever and ever.—This the eight Levites cry out to the people (some having perhaps seated themselves), and then they make the confession to God, doubtless from a written document prepared for the occasion, so that all the eight speak together, and so make a strong voice to be heard by all. The Hebrew of this confession is quite pure and largely borrowed from the older books.

And blessed be thy glorious name.—Here the Fut. Piel is, with wav conversive, an asserion made by Nehemiah himself in an ejaculatory form to God, thus: "The Levites said, Stand up and bless the Lord, etc., and they [i. e., the people] blessed thy glorious name, which is exalted above all blessing and praise." The words of the people then begin with ver. 8.

Ver. 6. Heaven of heavens.—Intensive, for the unseen as well as seen heaven. Host of heaven—i. e., the angels.

Ver. 7. Ur of the Chaldees cannot be Mugheir by the Persian gulf, as is the present prevailing theory. The Chaldees or Casdim in Abraham's day (or in Moses' day) were not so far south. Ur was more likely in northern Mesopotamia, though scarcely so near to Haran as Oorfa. The Semitic stock to which Abraham belonged seem to belong to northern Mesopotamia.

Ver. 8. The Hivites are left out of this enumeration, perhaps to please their descendants, the Nethinim. (See Josh. ix. 7.)

Ver. 11. Mighty—in the sense of violent. Comp. Ex. xv. 5 for the figure.

Vers. 13, 14. Judgments, laws, statutes, commandments, precepts.—In Hebrew the words are (in the singular)  mishpah, torah, hok, mitzwah. The last word is translated in E. V. by "commandments" and "precepts." The  mishpah has the idea of discrimination and decision in it. The  torah is a code. The  hok is a separate decree. The  mitzwah is a simple order. The adjectives "right," "true," and "good," are exactly appropriate.

Ver. 17. Appointed a captain.—In Num. xiv. 4 it is only stated that they proposed to appoint one. The proposition had been really carried out. In their rebellion.—LXX.: ἐν Αἰγύπτῳ, reading מִצְרַיִם for מִצְרַיִם. The LXX. is probably right. Comp. Num. xiv. 4. The words in Heb. come after "to their bondage."

Ver. 18. This is thy God.—Here "this thy Elohim," and in Exod. xxxii. 4 "these thy Elohim." In each case only one God is referred to. The plural style of the sentence in Exodus, both as to the demonstrative and the verb, is simply a conformity to the plural form of Elohim. The molten calf may have been a copy of Apis or Mnevis, or it may have been a cherub. Indeed Apis and Mnevis may have been Egyptian forms of the primeval cherubim.

Ver. 19. To show them light and the way wherein they should go.—Better: to shed light on them and the way, etc.

Ver. 20. Thou gavest also thy good Spirit.—Referring to the event described in Numb. xi. Comp. Isa. lxiii. 11.

Ver. 22. And didst divide them into oorners.—Rather: And didst distribute them into districts. The words "and the land of the,"  weth eretz, before "king of Heshbon," seem to be an error of transcription. "The land of Sihon, king of Heshbon, and the land of Og, king of Ba-han" is probably the right reading (comp. Dent. ii. 26, 30, and 36), or the old formula may have been corrupted, "the land of Sihon, king of the Amorites, who dwelt at Heshbon," Dent. iii. 2, etc.

Ver. 24. With their kings.—Rather, both their kings.

Ver. 25. Became fat.—This is Hiphil as in Isa. vi. 10, and must be strictly rendered "made fat," i. e., themselves.

Ver. 26. Slew thy prophets.—See 1 Kings xviii. 4; 2 Chron. xxiv. 21.

Ver. 27. Their enemies who vexed them, and in the time of their trouble.—Better: their oppressors, who oppressed them, and in the time of their oppression.

Ver. 29. Testifiedst against.—Rather, testifiedst to.—So in ver. 30 and ver. 34.

Ver. 32. Since the time of the kings of Assyria, i. e., the days of Pul and Tiglath-pileser (2 Kings xv. 19, 29). This time was more than three centuries before Nehemiah's day.

Ver. 35. In thy great goodness that thou gavest them.—That is, in the great prosperity (from thee) which thou gavest them. So in ver. 25. "Thy goodness" is not God's moral attribute, but the prosperity He gave them.

Ver. 38. This verse is the first of the tenth ch. in Heb. Although the word "covenant" is inserted, it is warranted by the use of the verb "carath," the full expression being "carath berith."

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. If we marvel at the readiness of Israel to fall away into alliances with the heathen, we must also marvel at their readiness to return to their separation before the testimony of their law. There is no greater wonder displayed to us in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah than the speediness of the work of these reformers in drawing away the people of Israel from alliances, where pecuniary interest and personal affection had formed a double and most potent bond. There must have been a prodigious vitality in the old Mosaic commonwealth. No mere philosophic reformers would have dared to venture on so radical a movement against the deep-seated tendencies of the people, and no people but those who had a truly divine side to their life would have hearkened to such a proposition. With all their errors, how much there is to admire in Israel!

2. Every covenant with God must, on man's side, be founded on penitential confession of sin. For God's grace, which is the content of His part of the covenant, cannot enter a soul that harbors its wickedness. When David acknowledged his sin unto God, God's forgiveness poured in upon his soul. (Ps. xxxii. 5.) After this chapter of confession comes the chapter of the covenant, with its natural issues of reform.

3. This confession is a prayer, although it has no petition in it. It is the laying of the soul before God in the attitude of awaiting. Often the best part of a prayer is its rehearsal of God's goodness and our own short-comings. This increases the receptivity of the soul. It removes worldliness, increases faith, makes the spiritual eye-sight clearer, and brings it en rapport with heaven.

4. The distresses of Israel under its political burdens is recognised as part of the discipline which God had exercised over the nation through its entire history. The covenant is not considered as broken by God in all this. He had been faithful. In this way Israel sees God's grace in the midst of the afflictions. An infidel heart would have regarded God as abandoning

His people, and have seen in their vicissitudes only the ordinary fate of nations. Events are to be judged not by their outward appearance, but by the subjective truth, on which they really depend. A godly soul understands this secret, and draws from it great peace and strength.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-3. The penitential and fast-days of the I. or t's congregation. 1) Their time and cause. They must alternate with facts and festivals; even God's favors must prompt us to observe them. 2) Their aim—to confess sins, our own as well as those of our ancestors, and to praise God's mercy as contrasted with them (ver. 2). 3) The manner of their celebration. Occupation with God's holy law forms the foundation which helps us to a right understanding of sin, and a right appreciation of the grace. The aim is penitence, as also faith, which worships the Lord (ver. 3).—BEDÉ: Manifestus ostenditur, quanta gratia devotionis omnes eorum personas novum post festa skenopœgia conventum fecerint, ut videlicet se tota intentione a scelorum contagio expurgatos divino fœderi conjungerent, ipsamque sancti fœderis conditionem et sermone confirmarent et scripto, acsi ab impiorum consortio separati securiores implerent opus, quod jam dudum ceperant; id est, congruos factas urbis cives de numero piorum instituerent.—STARKE: Confession of our sins before God is an effect of true contrition for the same. Such confession is necessary 1). As regards God who demands it (Jer. iii. 12, 13), who also wishes to be recognised by men as holy, just, and true, and will not forgive any sin without confession. (Ps. xxxii. 5.) As regards the Mediator; for as He confessed our sins and the sins of the whole world before God, with words and deed through suffering punishment for His people, so must we, much more, confess our own sins, if indeed we wish to be partakers of the merit of Christ. (1 John i. 7, 8.) 3) As regards the Holy Spirit's office of correction, whose work it is to convince the sinner. 4) As regards ourselves, for if we will not confess we remain under God's wrath. (1 John i. 8.) 5) As regards our neighbor: for if we have provoked him, such provocation must be done away, and thereby the honor be given to God. God wishes that public assemblies should be held in the church. Heb. x. 16. When we keep penitential and fast-days, or go to the holy communion, we should fast, lay aside all adornment, and appear in plain dress, with honest, humble hearts.

Vers. 4-15. God's faithfulness to the covenant. 1) Its preparative activity. It lets itself far down, and gives the prospect of great and glorious things (vers. 4-8). Its saving activity (vers. 9-11). It takes pity upon misery, overcomes the oppressor, and removes hinderances and perplexities even in nature. 3) Its preserving and perfecting activities. It shows the way, and provides for God's flock, in body and soul, and incites it to appropriate the promises (ver. 8.) The goal of the Old and New Testament covenant life is, the earthly and heavenly inheritance. 1) The promise of the same. At the calling of Abraham; then in the gospel. 2) The way to it. Through the wilderness of Arabia; then through the wilderness of life. 3) The power which proceeds from it, particularly for Israel after it had obtained the same for us already, while we yet hope for it.—STARKE: Our good, heavenly Father gives earthly goods in possession to His children, in order that they may have good hope of the heavenly inheritance.

Vers. 16-25. God's pardoning grace. 1) He does not refuse it in spite of our disobedience (ver. 16), in spite of faithlessness (ver. 17), in spite of open backsliding (ver. 18). Much more, He shows His gracious presence to lead us to the high prize of the calling (ver. 19), gives His good and Holy Spirit for instruction; gives also the bread and water of life for hunger and thirst (ver. 20). 2) He punishes indeed, but affords, even in the time of punishment experiences, proofs, and advances of grace (vers. 21-23). 3) He brings us richly blessed to the prize of the calling (vers. 24, 25).

Vers. 20, 21. God's gracious care. 1) He provides both for bodily and spiritual necessities. 2) He provides it by great and small, startling and insignificant miracles. 3) He provides it during the march through the wilderness, that He may bring His people into Canaan.

Ver. 21. The wisdom of the divine care. 1) Its manner: God often helps, not in a startling, but in an insignificant way, quietly, yes, secretly blessing. 2) Its reason. The faith of His people is best tried, exercised, and strengthened in this way. 3) Its aim. That the godly may accustom themselves in all things, even in the insignificant, to perceive God's helping father hand, and shall learn the art to let all and everything, even the daily common-place, be a cause of thanks and of joy.—STARKE: God punishes the persecutors of His people energetically. Our pillar of cloud, which shows us the way to our everlasting fatherland, is the ministry of the gospel, in which God is truly present and powerful. Although God does not immediately place all the godly in fruitful and pleasant places, nor give them bread from heaven, nor water from the rock, still He gives them, notwithstanding, necessary nourishment and clothing wherewith they should be satisfied. Matt. vi. 81, 82; 1 Tim. vi. 8. The wickedness of mankind is so great when left to itself, that they are not bettered by the divine benefits, but indeed become worse, and in the highest ingratitude towards our God, return evil for good. Although with us is a multitude of sins, with God is plenteous redemption. Ps. cxxx. 7. Let no one therefore say with Cain, My sins are greater than it is possible to forgive. Gen. iv. 13.

Vers. 26-31. God's educating wisdom. 1) God indeed chastises, but He again has mercy (vers. 26, 27). 2) God has mercy many times, but He also admonishes to follow His precepts, in the observance of which man has his life (vers. 28, 29). 3) He admonishes a long while, and punishes and increases His punishment to the utmost if He is not listened to, but nevertheless He never gives him entirely up whom it is possible to help (vers. 30, 31).

Vers. 28-37. The grounds for the petition for forgiveness and mercy. 1) God's unwearied mercy in the past (vers. 26-31). 2) God's justice and our guilt in the present, particularly as they are to be recognised in connection with our troubles (verses 32-35). 8) The greatness of our need and trouble (vers. 36, 37).

Vers. 32-37. The debasement of the congregation at the present time. 1) Wherein it consists. 2) What is its cause. 3) What its aim.—STARK: It is very consoling to think of the mercy of God which He has shown to our ancestors, for the same God lives yet. We must hold ourselves in true faith to the promises of God, for they will never fail. When the godly are involved in the greatest danger God cares for them the most, and knows how to rescue them. We are chastised by God that we may not be condemned with the world. When God wishes to deliver His people, He does not look at what they have deserved, but at what His immeasurable mercy demands. Those who have provoked God to anger by their sins have little happiness to expect so long as they go on without penitence. True confession—confession of the name of God and believing prayer, are the right means by which the enemy are again to be driven away. Lord, when trouble is present, they seek thee, etc. Isa. xxvi. 16. Although a false religion may have a great appearance of sanctity and piety before people, yet is it in the sight of God a great abomination. What beautiful surnames has God. Oh soul! mark them well, that thou mayest remember them when conscience accuses, and when thou art in trouble, that thou mayest not despond.

CHAPTER X. 1-39.

1 Now those that sealed [and on the sealed documents] were Nehemiah, the Tir-
2 shatha, the son of Hachaliah, and Zidkijah [i. e., Zedekiah] Seraiah, Azariah, Je-3, 4, 5 remiah, Pashur, Amariah, Malchijah, Hattush, Shebaniah, Malluch, Harim, 6, 7 Meremoth, Obadiah, Daniel, Ginnethon, Baruch, Meshullam, Abijah, Mijamin,
8, 9 Maaziah, Bilgai, Shemaiah: these were the priests. And the Levites: both Je-10 shua the son of Azaniah, Binnui of the sons of Henadad, Kadmiel; and their bre-
11 thren, Shebaniah, Hodijah, Kelita, Pelaiah, Hanan, Micha, Rehob, Hashabiah, 12, 13, 14 Zaccur, Sherebiah, Shebaniah, Hodijah, Bani, Beninu. The chief of the 15, 16 people: Parosh, Pahath-moab, Elam, Zatthu, Bani, Bunni, Azgad, Bebai, Ado-
17, 18 nijah, Bigvai, Adin, Ater, Hizkijah [i. e., Hezekiah], Azzur, Hodijah, Hashum, 19, 20, 21 Bezai, Hariph, Anathoth, Nebai, Magpiash, Meshullam, Hezir, Meshezabeel, 22, 23, 24 Zadok, Jaddua, Pelatiah, Hanan, Anaiah, Hoshea, Hananiah, Hashub, Hal-
25, 26 lohesh, Pileha, Shobek, Rehun, Hashabnah, Maaseiah, and Ahijah, Hanan, 27 Anan, Malluch, Harim, Baanah.

28 And the rest of the people, the priests, the Levites, the porters, the singers, the Nethinim, and all they that had separated themselves from the people of the lands unto the law of God, their wives, their sons, and their daughters every one having 29 knowledge and having understanding; they clave to their brethren, their nobles, and entered into a curse and into an oath, to walk in God's law, which was given by [the hand of] Moses the servant of God, and to observe and do all the com-30 mandments of the LORD our Lord, and his judgments and his statutes; And that we would not give our daughters unto the people of the land, nor take their daugh-31 ters for our sons: And if the people of the land bring ware or any victuals on the Sabbath day to sell, that we would not buy it of them on the Sabbath or on the holy day: and that we would leave [i. e., leave the land to lie untilled] theseventh 32 year and the exaction [loan] of every debt [hand]. Also [And] we made ordinances for us, to charge ourselves yearly with the third part of a shekel for the ser-33 vice of the house of our God; for the shewbread [the bread of arrangement], and for the continual meat-offering, and for the continual burnt-offering of the Sabbaths, of the new moons, for the set feasts, and for the holy things, and for the sin-offerings, to make an atonement for Israel, and for all the work of the house of our God.
34 And we cast the lots among the priests, the Levites, and the people, for the wood-offering, to bring it into the house of our God, after the houses of our fathers, at times appointed year by year, to burn upon the altar of the LORD our God, as it is 35 written in the law: And to bring the first-fruits of our ground, and the first-fruits

- 36 of all fruit of all trees, year by year, unto the house of the LORD: also the first-born of our sons, and of our cattle, as it is written in the law, and the firstlings of our herds and of our flocks, to bring to the house of our God, unto the priests that minister in the house of our God: and that we should bring the first-fruits [beginning] of our dough [groats], and [of] our offerings [oblations], and [of] the fruit of all manner of trees, of [new] wine and of oil, unto the priests, to the chambers of the house of our God; and the tithes of our ground unto the Levites, that the same Levites might have the tithes [perhaps, and they the Levites pay tithes] in all the cities of our tillage [service]. And the priest the son of Aaron shall be with the Levites, when the Levites take [perhaps, pay] tithes: and the Levites shall bring up the tithe of the tithes [tithe] unto the house of our God, to the chambers, into
- 38 [belonging unto] the treasure house. For the children [sons] of Israel and the children [sons] of Levi shall bring the offering [oblation] of the corn, of the new wine, and [of] the oil, unto the chambers, where are the vessels of the sanctuary, and the priests that minister, and the porters, and the singers: and we will not forsake the house of our God.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

- 1 Ver. 31. וְהָיָה אֲתֵנָה הַשְּׂבִיעִית [אֲשֶׁמָּה] or אֲשֶׁמָּה [אֲשֶׁמָּה]. The ellipsis is to be filled from Ex. xxiii. 11. וְהָיָה אֲתֵנָה הַשְּׂבִיעִית הַשְּׂבִיעִית, where the pronoun refers to אֲתֵנָה of the preceding verse.
- 2 Ver. 37. הֵן הַמְּעִשִׂים here וְהָיָה in ver. 38. (Piel part. and Hiph. inf. of עָשָׂה), if we follow the analogy of Deut. xiv. 22, and xxvi. 32, must refer to the paying and not to the receiving tithes.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Covenant.

Vers. 1-8. Because of these twenty-three names fifteen are supposed to be found in the list (ch. xii. 1-7) of the priests who came with Zerubbabel in the preceding century, it is held by many that this list contains only family names, and that these families were represented by descendants in the signing, Ezra, for example, signing for his ancestor Seraiah. But as we find Nehemiah in the list, and also the very Levites (vers. 9-18), who individually stood upon the stairs on the 24th of Tisri (chap. ix. 4, 5), it is better to suppose that the similarity of the names is accidental, and that family names only occur in the list of the people, vers. 14-27, if even there. The only alternative is harsh in two features: first, that the Levites on the stairs should be called, in a plain historical statement, by their family names; and secondly, that family names and personal names should be so strangely mixed. Moreover, it is to be noted that the family names of chap. vii. and of Ezra ii. are not all repeated here. We have abundant evidence of the very common use of the same names among the Israelites, and a theory, which that fact will explain, seems the easier one here.

Vers. 9-27. See above note.

Ver. 28. The rest of the people, i. e., besides the chiefs given in vers. 14-27. The word rest (Heb. shear) seems to carry its force to the other classes enumerated, to wit, the rest of the priests, etc.; that is, besides those enumerated. Every one having knowledge and having understanding.—This evidently qualifies the general phrase before it. Not all the rest, but those who had knowledge and understanding, joined their brethren in the reform.

Ver. 29. Clave to their brethren, their nobles.—That is, to their brethren, the chiefs above mentioned. Commandments, etc.—See on chap. ix. 13, 14.

Ver. 31. We would leave the seventh year and the exaction of every debt.—The verb natash (leave) here seems to have a pregnant meaning. We would leave follow the land each seventh year (comp. Exod. xxiii. 11), and remit at that time (lit.) the debt of every hand. See Deut. xv. 2.

Ver. 32. The third part of a shekel.—This tax, thus first laid, became afterward a half shekel. (See Matt. xvii. 24, where the Greek is didrachma, i. e., a half shekel.) The half shekel tax of Ex. xxx. 13 is another matter, not an annual tax, but ransom money to be taken at a census as a mark of the Lord's ownership.

Ver. 33. The shew-bread.—Heb. lehem hammaareketh (bread of arrangement). The older phrase is lehem happananim (bread of the face). The continual meat-offering.—Heb. minhath hattamidh.—The continual burnt-offering.—Heb. olath hattamidh. So the shew-bread is called lehem hattamidh (Num. iv. 7). So called as oft-recurring in distinction from the occasional offerings. Here, as we see, the offerings are those of each day, of the sabbaths, and of the new moons.—The set feasts are mentioned separately with lamedh (for).

Ver. 34. For the wood-offering.—Heb. kurban haetsim. The feast of the wood-offering (Josephus, B. J., II. 17, 6) on the 14th of Ab arose from this institution of Nehemiah. It was the day when those assigned to the duty brought in the wood for the altar. (See Lev. vi. 12.)

Ver. 35. The first fruits of all fruits of all trees.—See Lev. xix. 24 and comp. Deut. xxvi. 2.

Ver. 36. The first born of our sons.—That is, by bringing redemption-money, as ordered in Numb. xviii. 15, 16. Cattle.—Heb. behemoth. Here unclean beasts, as contrasted with the herds and flocks below. These were also redeemed. (See Num. i. c.)

Ver. 37. First fruits of our dough (groats or ground meal).—See Num. xv. 20. Offerings—i. e., all special offerings. Chambers.—Heb. lishcoth. The cells or chambers in the courts of the temple. Might have the tithes.—Many read might pay tithes, anticipating the statement of the next verse. Tillage.—There may be a reasonable doubt whether anodhah ever means tillage, unless, as in 1 Chron. xxvii. 26, it is qualified by another noun. It may mean here "service" in the relation of servants to God, as elsewhere. To suppose that the cities of work or service must mean the country towns, is scarcely credible.

Ver. 38. To the chambers, into the treasure house.—Rather, to the chambers of the treasure house, one of the buildings in the temple area. The tithe of the tithes belonged to the priests (Num. xviii. 26-28), the children of Aaron.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The natural leaders of a people are largely responsible for the people's conduct. The priests, Levites, and chiefs, the nobles of the nation readily find a following. Nehemiah, as Tirshatha, puts his own name first to the solemn reform-document, and then he causes the nobles to set their names to the instrument. A reform begun the other way in the lower circles of society is apt to degenerate into the excesses of revolution. The healing salt should be thrown in at the sources of the streams, if the waters are to be cured.

2. The points specially indicated, wherein the reform was most pressing, are (1) marriage alliances, (2) Sabbath-observance, (3) usury, (4) temple-taxes of the third part of a shekel, of first-fruits and of tithes. On these points we may believe the people had been especially remiss. They were the points where their covetousness would operate to undermine their piety, and thus the integrity of the commonwealth. Was not that, which has become a distinctive trait of the Israelitish race, already in Nehemiah's time beginning to develop itself?

3. When a people grow remiss in the support of religious privileges, the foundations of society are shaken. The moral tone of any people can only be cultivated and sustained by systematized methods, for natural depravity must take advantage of the lack of discipline, and prove too strong for morality. Religion, in any true and high sense, is an exotic, and must be tenderly cared for in this sin-grown earth. The seal of Nehemiah and other reformers for the thorough establishment of religious rites is a wise example to all who come after them. Where the state cannot enforce such a result, public opinion can be made.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Ver. 1. To what the consideration of the Lord's faithfulness to the covenant leads us: 1) To penitence and conversion which shows itself through obedience. 2) To faith—particularly in the fact that the Lord always keeps His covenant with us, and that it is only necessary that we on our part should confirm and maintain it. 3) To hope that the Lord will set us free, and evermore aid us to the glorious liberty of the children of God.

Vers. 31, 32. The principal duties of the congregation and its members: 1) To keep themselves unspotted, and particularly separated from the world. 2) To practice communion with the Lord, and especially in the way that is beneficial to us in this mortal state. BEDZ: Porro sabbatismus orationum ac devotionis nostræ, in qua vacamus a temporalibus agendis, ut æternitatis gaudia dulcius gustare mereamur, recte diei septimo adsignatur quia futuræ quietem vitæ ac beatorum laudationis imitatur: sed diem sabbathi alienigenæ quærunt profanare, cum terrenæ cogitationes in tempore nostræ orationis importune nos conturbant, et memoria sive delectatione temporalium rerum ab amore intimo nituntur extrahere.—Imponunt asinis vinum, uvæ et ficus et omne onus, et incurrunt in Hierusalem, cum oblectamentis carnalibus stultos animi nostri motus onerantes, per hæc et hujusmodi tentamenta quietem nostri cordis deo debitam violare conantur. Comp. chap. xiii. 15.

Vers. 38-40. The tasks to which each member of the congregation must submit himself. 1) The offerings which must be made directly to the Lord for the erection of His buildings, expenses of the service, etc. 2) The doing that which assists the servants of the Lord. STARKE: My God! I remember that I too made a covenant with Thee at my baptism. I beseech thee seal the same also in me, and give me in my heart the pledge, the Holy Spirit (2 Cor. i. 21, 22; 2 Cor. v. 5). We must not only ourselves have a Christian zeal for true religion, but also incite others to it, and admonish them (Heb. x. 24; Ps. xlix. 2). Marriages with the godless are displeasing to God, and dangerous (1 Tim. ii. 14). Nothing must be so near to us that it withdraws us from the service of God.

CHAPTER XI. 1-36.

- 1 AND the rulers of the people dwelt at Jerusalem: the rest of the people also [and the rest of the people] cast lots, to bring one of ten to dwell in Jerusalem, the 2 holy city, and nine parts to dwell in [the] other cities. And the people blessed all the men that willingly offered themselves to dwell at Jerusalem.
- 3 Now [And] these are the chief of the province that dwelt in Jerusalem: but in the cities of Judah dwelt [and which dwelt in the cities of Judah] every one in his possession in their cities, to wit, Israel [i. e., the people], the priests, and the Le-4 vites, and the Nethinim, and the children [sons] of Solomon's servants. And at Jerusalem dwelt certain of the children [sons] of Judah, and of the children [sons] of Benjamin. Of the children [sons] of Judah; Athaiah, the son of Uziah, the son of Zechariah, the son of Amariah, the son of Shephatiah, the son of Ma-
 5 leel, of the children [sons] of Perez (i. e., Pharez): and Maaseiah, the son of Baruch, the son of Col-hozeh, the son of Hozaiah, the son of Adaiah, the son of Joa-
 6 rib, the son of Zechariah, the son of Shiloni [Shelah's family]. All the sons of Perez that dwelt at Jerusalem were four hundred three-score and eight valiant men.
- 7 And these are the sons of Benjamin; Sallu the son of Meshullam, the son of Joed, the son of Pedaiah, the son of Kolaiah, the son of Maaseiah, the son of Ithiel, the son of Jesaiah [i. e., Isaiah]. And after him Gabbai, Sallai, nine hundred 8 twenty and eight. And Joel the son of Zichri was their overseer: And Judah the son of Senuah was second over the city [was over the second city]. Of the priests:
 11 Jedaiah the son of Joarib, Jachin. Seraiah, the son of Hilkiyah, the son of Meshullam, the son of Zadok, the son of Meraioth, the son of Ahitub, was the ruler of the house of God. And their brethren that did the work of the house were eight
 12 hundred twenty and two: and Adaiah, the son of Jeroham, the son of Pelaliah, the son of Amzi, the son of Zechariah, the son of Pashur, the son of Malchiah, and his 13 brethren, chief of the fathers, two hundred forty and two: and Amashai, the son of Azareel, the son of Ahasai, the son of Meshillemoth, the son of Immer, and their 14 brethren, mighty men of valour, a hundred twenty and eight, and their overseer was Zabdiel, the son of one of the great men [son of the mighty].
- 15 Also [And] of the Levites: Shemaiah the son of Hashub, the son of Azrikam, the son of Hashabiah, the son of Bunni; and Shabbethai and Jozabad, of the chief 16 of the Levites had the oversight of [were over] the outward business of the house of God. And Mattaniah, the son of Micha, the son of Zabdi, the son of Asaph, was the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer [perhaps, the chief of the praise-song who gave thanks at prayer-service]: and Bakbukiah the second among his 17 brethren, and Abda the son of Shammua, the son of Galal, the son of Jeduthun.
- 18, 19 All the Levites in the holy city were two hundred fourscore and four. Moreover [And] the porters, Akkub, Talmon, and their brethren that kept the gates, were a hundred seventy and two.
- 20 And the residue of Israel, of the priests, and the Levites, were in all the cities of Judah, every one in his inheritance. But [And] the Nethinim dwelt in Ophel:
 22 and Ziha and Gispa were over the Nethinim. The overseer also [and the overseer] of the Levites at Jerusalem was Uzzi, the son of Bani, the son of Hashabiah, the son of Mattaniah, the son of Micha. [Some] Of the sons of Asaph, the singers
 23 were over the business of the house of God. For it [there] was the king's commandment concerning them, that a certain portion should be for the singers [and a sure ordinance concerning the singers] due for every day [the thing of a day on 24 its day]. And Pethahiah, the son of Meshezabeel, of the children of Zerah, the son of Judah, was at the king's hand in all matters concerning the people.

- 25 And [As] for the villages with their fields, some of the children [sons] of Judah dwelt at Kirjath-arba and in the villages [daughters] thereof, and at Dibon, and in the villages [daughters] thereof, and at Jekabzeel and in the villages thereof, and at Jeshua, and at Moladah, and at Beth-phetel, and at Hazar-shual, and at Beer-sheba, and in the villages [daughters] thereof, and at Ziklag, and at Mekonah, and in the villages [daughters] thereof, and at En-rimmon, and at Zarcash, and at Jar-muth, Zanoah, Adullam, and in their villages, at Lachish and the fields thereof, at Azekah, and in the villages [daughters] thereof. And they dwelt from Beer-sheba into the valley of Hinnom.
- 31 The children also of Benjamin [and the sons of Benjamin] from Geba dwelt at Michmash [dwelt from Geba to Michmash] and Aija, and Bethel, and in their villages [daughters], and at Anathoth, Nob, Ananiah, Hazor, Ramah, Gith, 33, 34, 35 taim. Hadid, Zeboim, Neballat, Lod, and Ono, the valley of craftsmen.
- 36 And of the Levites were divisions in Judah, and in Benjamin [divisions of Judah were to Benjamin].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

1 Ver. 17. התחלה instead of being an error for התחלה, may be for בְּתוֹכָהּ, "chief at the beginning of prayer he gave thanks."

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

*The Places of Abode.**

Ver. 1. The rest of the people also.—And the rest of the people—that is, other than the rulers.

Ver. 2. That willingly offered themselves—i. e., those of the people, beside the tenth part chosen by lot, who also consented to dwell in Jerusalem as the place of greatest danger and need. (See chap. vii. 4.)

Ver. 3. The relative construction should be used with both clauses, thus: now these are the chiefs of the province who dwell in Jerusalem, and those who dwell in the cities of Judah (every one in his possession in their cities)—to wit, Israel, etc. Israel—i. e., the people of Israel as contrasted with priests, Levites, etc. The children of Solomon's servants.—See on chap. vii. 57.

Ver. 4. Athaliah was chief of the Bene-Pharrets, or children of Peres (Pharez). See Gen. xxxviii. 29; 1 Chron. iv. 1. In 1 Chron. ix. 4 he is called Uthai, and his genealogy traced by a different line.

Ver. 5. Maaseiah was chief of the Shilonites or children of Shelah. His grandfather Colhoseh is probably the same as the father of Shallun in chap. iii. 15. He is called Asaiah in 1 Chron. ix. 5. Shiloni.—Heb.: hash-shiloni. Not a man's name, but a family's title, to wit, the children of Shelah, Judah's son. See 1 Chron. ix. 5. These descendants of Shelah are counted with those of Pharez. Athaliah and Maaseiah were thus the chiefs of Judah. Jeuel of the sons of Zerach, mentioned in 1 Chron. ix. 6, is omitted here.

Ver. 6. This verse appears to be out of its place. It should precede ver. 5.

* This chapter is intimately connected with chapter vii. 4, showing Nehemiah's plan of increasing the population of the city. The genealogies and then the confession and covenant came in parenthetically—the former as part of the process in the plan, and the latter as chronologically happening while Nehemiah was maturing the plan.

Ver. 7. The family of Jesaliah in Benjamin, of which Sallu was chief, is not otherwise known. Sallu's pedigree is differently reckoned in 1 Chron. ix. 7. The text in Chronicles is probably defective.

Ver. 8. Gabbai and Sallai are other Benjaminite chiefs.

Ver. 9. Joel the son of Zichri was overseer (Heb.: pakid, ἐπισκοπος) over both the Judahites and Benjaminites of the city. His office was possibly a police one. Judah the son of Senuah was over the second city (not second over the city).—The second city was a well-known part of Jerusalem. It was there Huldah the prophetess lived in Josiah's time. See 2 Kings xxii. 14, where the Eng. vers. has "college" for the Heb. mi-shneh. In Zeph. i. 10 the Eng. vers. has "second." It was probably the part of the city built up north of the temple. The parallel chapter in 1 Chron. (chap. ix.), which seems to be very corrupt in its reading, appears to have "Joel, the son of Zichri," in "Eliab, the son of Uzzi, the son of Michri," and to have "Judah, the son of Senuah," in "Hodaviah, the son of Hasenuah," the former a Benjaminite, and the latter an ancestor of Sallu. That list also introduces as Benjaminites "Ibneiah, the son of Jero-ham," and "Meshullam, the son of Shephatiah, the son of Reuel, the son of Ibnijah."

Joel and Judah were the two inspectors or overseers over the Judahites and Benjaminites in the entire city.

Vers. 10, 11. There is great confusion in this part of the record, and we are not helped much by 1 Chron. ix. Both lists have been copied probably from a defective record. Jedaiah, Joiarib and Jachin were the heads of three of the twenty-four courses of priests in David's time (1 Chron. xxiv. 7, 17). Seraiah was high-priest before the captivity (1 Chron. vi. 14). These names appear to be fragments of a record which in its fulness showed the heads of these families in Nehemiah's time. The phrase "ruler of the house of God (negid beth ha-elohim)" can belong to Ahitub or Seraiah. The Eng. vers. wrongly inserts "was." It is a title of the high-priest. See 2 Chron. xxxi. 13. Also compare 1 Chron. ix. 11. Also see 1 Chron. xii. 27, where Jehoiada (negid of the Aaronites) seems to be the same as Abitub the father of Zadok.

In ver. 10 Jedaiah, the son of Joiarib, is doubtless wrong, and the form in 1 Chron. ix. 10 should be followed, to wit, Jedaiah and Jehoiarib. In ver. 11 (as in 1 Chron. ix. 11) the words the son of Meraioth are out of place and should follow "Ahitub," as Meraioth was grandfather (1 Chron. vi. 7) or great-grandfather (Esra vii. 3) of Ahitub. For this last discrepancy we may suppose the two sequences in the high-priesthood of "Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok" (one before Solomon, and the other after Solomon) are the occasion. One list has taken the latter, where Ahitub's grandfather is Azariah, and the other has taken the former where Ahitub's grandfather is Meraioth. [We use "father" and "grandfather" in the formal sense, denoting the proximity of the names in the records, not the actual relationship.]

Ver. 12. And their brethren—i. e., the brethren or kinsfolk of the chiefs of the priests whose names are lost in the above record (as we have seen in the preceding note). Adaiah was chief of the children of Malchiah, the head of the fifth course in David's day (1 Chron. xxiv. 9).

Ver. 13. Chief of the fathers.—This clause seems to be out of place, for we can hardly suppose that the Malchiah family were all chiefs. Adaiah had 242 in his kinsfolk, over whom he was chief, just as the representatives of the high-priest's family and the families of Jedaiah, Joiarib and Jachin had 822 in their kinsfolk (ver. 12). This phrase "chief of the fathers" belongs to all these head men of families, and was probably at the head of the list originally. It may have found its place here from the analogy of the phrase "mighty men of valour" in ver. 14. See 2 Chron. xxvi. 12 for a collocation of the two phrases. Amashai (Maasiah in 1 Chron. ix. 12) was chief of the children of Immer, the head of the sixteenth course in David's time. His pedigree in 1 Chron. ix. is merely a corruption of this one.

Ver. 14. Their brethren.—Probably an error for "his brethren"—that is, Amashai's. Their overseer was Zabdiel.—He was pakid (see on ver. 9) of all the priests. He is called son of the mighty ones—a phrase that seems to denote a remarkable ancestry. The numbers here and in 1 Chron. ix. 13 differ by 568. Errors in numbers and in names are almost necessities in transcribing.

Vers. 15-17. This list of Levites omits the names of Heresh, Galal and Berechiah, given in 1 Chron. ix. 15, 16; but contains the names of Shabbethai and Jozabad not mentioned there. In this list (ver. 14) we have the son of Bunni (i. e., Bani, one of the families of Merari), where in 1 Chron. ix. 14 we find "of the sons of Merari." Bakbukiah here is Bakbakkar there. Zabdi here is Zichri there. Abda here is Obadiah there. Of the Levitical chiefs, Shabbethai and Jozabad had the oversight of the outward business of the house of God.—That is, attended to the secular department of service as directors therein (comp. 1 Chron. xxvi. 29). The principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer.—Literally "the chief of the beginning gave thanks to prayer." Some would read tehillah instead of tehillah, a most natural correction. We should then have "the chief of the praise-song [who] gave thanks (as introductory) to prayer."

Ver. 18. These six (or nine) Levitical chiefs had a constituency of 284.

Ver. 19. Akkub, Talmon.—The list in 1 Chron. ix. adds Shallum (as chief of all) and Ahiman, and makes the number 212 instead of 172. The account in 1 Chron. is much more extended on this matter of the porters, thus showing that this record (as is that also) is but a fragment of an older document. Both copies have been marred in the transcribing.

Ver. 20. This verse belongs between ver. 24 and ver. 25, after Jerusalem is disposed of.

Ver. 21. Nethinim—Ophel.—See on chap. iii. 26.

Ver. 22. The pakid (see on ver. 9) of all the Levites, including the Nethinim, was Uzzi. The last clause should read: The singers of the sons of Asaph (or some of the sons of Asaph, the singers,—see same construction in ver. 25) were over the business of the house of God. This "business" is not the "outward business" of ver. 16. If (with Keil) we disregard the Athnabh, we may consider Uzzi's pedigree as going on in this last clause, thus: "the son of Micha, of the sons of Asaph the singers in the service of the house of God." In this case the parallel with ver. 17 would be striking. There may be an omission in that verse before Mattaniah, and this Uzzi may be the first of the three leading singers—Bakbukiah and Abda being the other two. But see next note.

Ver. 23. Read: for it was the king's commandment concerning them and a sure ordinance for the singers for each day's duty (lit. "the thing of a day on its day"). Uzzi was pakid of the Levites generally, but the Asaphites took turns in directing the Levitical work. This 23d verse—making the singers (in the plural) the main subject, seems to show that our E. V. is right in stopping Uzzi's genealogy (in ver. 22) at Micha, and then beginning a new passage. The Masorites took this view, as the Athnabh with Micha shows. There is probably some confusion between ver. 22 and vers. 15 and 17, if we may judge from the names. Compare the passage in 1 Chron. ix.

Ver. 24. Pethahiah of the Zerahites (or Zarhites) was at the hand of the king.—This does not mean that he was at Susa, but that he was the king's special agent. Comp. 1 Chron. xxiii. 28, where the Levites are said to be at the hand of the sons of Aaron. Pethahiah's office may have taken him often to Susa, and he would thus be the go-between between the king and Nehemiah.

Ver. 25. Kirjath-Arba—i. e., Hebron (Josh. xiv. 15). The villages thereof.—Lit. the daughters thereof. The word is a different one from that at the beginning of the verse (hatsér). It is repeated after Dibon, but the other word returns after Jekabzeel. This use of daughters for dependent towns is common in the earlier books. Dibon.—Doubtless the Dimonah of Josh. xv. 22. Jekabzeel.—The Kabzeel of Josh. xv. 21.

Ver. 26. Jeshua.—Probably the Shema of Josh. xv. 26, the letters in Hebrew being easily mistaken in transcription. Moladah is El Milh. Beth-phelet.—The Beth-palet of Josh. xxi. 27.

Ver. 27. Hazar-shual—like all the above, except Hebron and Moladah, is unknown.

Beersheba is Bir es-Seba, twenty-five miles south-west of Hebron, and ten miles west of Moladah.

Ver. 28. Ziklag, conspicuous in David's history (1 Sam. xxx.), is supposed to be Asluj, on the road from El Milh to Abdeh. Mekonah—possibly a mistake for Madmannah of Josh. xv. 80. It only requires a mem dropped and a daleth changed to a kaph.

Ver. 29. En-rimmon is spoken of in Josh. xv. 82 as two places. Keil supposes them two towns closely neighboring which finally grew into one. Zareah.—Zoreah (Josh. xv. 83) or Zorah (Judg. xiii. 2) is Zurah, fourteen miles west of Jerusalem. Jarmuth is 16 miles south-west of Jerusalem, on the slope of the mountain country, and about eight miles from the Shephelah or Philistine plain. It is 15 miles from Hebron.

Ver. 30. Zanoah is Zanua, or, perhaps, Kh. Sanut. Adullam—identified by GANNEAU with Sh. Mudhkur, on the east side of Wady Sur, near Socoh. Laishah—36 miles south-west of Jerusalem. Asekah is Deir el Aashek. From Beersheba unto the valley of Hinnom (or valley of the sons, or son, of Hinnom) is a distance of nearly 50 miles.

Ver. 31. Read: and the children of Benjamin dwell from Geba to Michmash and Ajja and Bethel and her villages. Geba is Jeba. Michmash is Mukhmas. Ajja or Ai is probably Tell el Hajjar, as VAN DE VELDE thinks. Bethel is Beitin.

Ver. 32. Anathoth is Anata, Jeremiah's birth-place. Nob is probably Neby Samwil, according to Lieut. CONDER's suggestion (Quarterly Statement of Pal. Exp. Fund. London, Jan. 1876). Ananiah is unknown.

Ver. 33. Hazor is not identified. Ramah is Er-Ram. Gittaim is unknown.

Ver. 34. Hadid is supposed to be near Lydda. Zeboim is not identified. Neballat is Beit Nebala, near Lydda.

Ver. 35. Lod is Lydda (Ludd). Ono is believed to be near Lydda, at Kefr Auna. (See VAN DE VELDE.) The valley of craftsmen—i. e., Charashim (see 1 Chron. iv. 14) was probably in the vicinity of Lydda.

Ver. 36. Read: And of the Levites divisions of Judah went to Benjamin. These Levites were transferred from former stations in Judahite towns to stations in Benjamite towns.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Jerusalem was peculiarly the post of labor and danger,—of labor, because the fortifications would require constant guarding, and of danger, because the enemies of the Jews would naturally concentrate their efforts against the holy city. A willing offering of any to dwell in Jerusalem was therefore a mark of self-denial for the sake of country and religion. The popular blessing fell upon such. Even those who did not so volunteer could not but admire this devotion, and join in the general admiration. Happy is the people, where there is such a cause for the public favor.

2. The additional population of Jerusalem included men of Judah, men of Benjamin, Levites, and Nethinim. There were, doubtless, remnants of the ten tribes with preserved pedigrees mingled with the returned Jews, as we find four centuries later Phanuel mentioned as of the tribe of Asher (Luke ii. 36), but none of these seem to have been reckoned in the public genealogies. They had not come back with Zerubbabel, for it is not probable that many (if any) from the remnant of the ten tribes went into captivity under Nebuchadnezzar, unless we consider the coming to Jerusalem of "divers of Asher and Manasseh and Zebulun" in Hezekiah's day (2 Chron. xxx. 11) was a coming for a permanent abode. But we may believe, that, after the return, stragglers from the remnant of the northern kingdom joined the Jews at Jerusalem, for that in the north a remnant preserved the truth against all the immigration of heathen nations is evident from the appearance of Galilee in the New Testament period, which could not be owing simply to the Maccabean influences, such as are described in 1 Maccab. v. 21, seq.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1, 2. It might be very difficult for the poorer families of the congregation to find means of subsistence in Jerusalem, as there was no longer a royal court there, and a troop of higher officers, who could afford work and gain to the lower classes. They might find it much easier to get along in the country, where they could cultivate the ground. Nevertheless Nehemiah and the heads of the congregation had to insist upon it that as many as possible should settle again in Jerusalem. For this there were very urgent reasons. It was not the consideration alone that the congregation would only then be worthily represented to the neighboring people, and would only be in part secure, if it possessed a large, mighty, and flourishing chief city, to which, in times of danger, it could withdraw as to a trustworthy asylum. The main point was, that as many as possible of the congregation must live in direct proximity to the Temple and its service, that their connection with God could the better be furthered and fortified, and be promoted and consecrated, which was so desirable for it. There was the consideration that above all upon Zion and the mountain of the house of the Lord rested the promises of the prophets, and that especially from them the law and the word of the Lord should go forth. (Isa. ii. 2-4; Micah iv. 1.) The congregation should feel itself called upon, as much as lay in its power, to help in the fulfilment of such promises, also to further as much as possible, the honoring of the Lord there in Jerusalem. It had certainly in the prophetic word a warrant that the Lord would here protect and bless it. At least equally urgent calls has Christendom not to scatter itself hither and thither into all sorts of sects and communities, neither to be satisfied with the observance of religion in their houses, but to hold faithfully to the one church, which is founded on God's word and provided with His promises, and instead of despising it on account of its insignificance, poverty, and needs, all the more to raise it by all self-consecration and gratitude, even if one should thereby suffer disadvantages, and even dangers, in worldly things, and should draw upon himself slights and persecution. "And let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering, for He is faithful that promised; not forsaking the assembling of ourselves together, as the manner of some is." (Heb. x. 23-25.) That in which a sect has appeared to be preferable in power of love and sanctity has proved itself generally, in great part to be mere empty appearance.

Vers. 3-19. It is very worthy of notice that in the numbering of the inhabitants of Jerusalem, not the priests but the tribes of Judah and Benjamin take the lead, and only then follow the priests and Levites; so much the more worthy of notice, because in the new congregation, following the captivity, according to the entire direction which its development took, and according to everything which was considered as of the greatest moment, the high-priests, and the priesthood in general, had a particularly high significance. It is as if the consciousness were indicated, that the priests and Levites, in spite of their distinction, which the Lord had apportioned to them in the affairs of Israel, had been nevertheless nothing at all, if they had not had a congregation near and around them, and if they had not succeeded in obtaining satisfactory fruit for their activity, namely, a genuine and true piety, which should substantially prove they were not there in vain. Would also that Christian priests, that is, preachers of the gospel, might preserve a lively consciousness that it is not enough for them to have fellowship with their brethren in office, that they are nothing, and can profit and signify nothing, if not some, if only a small congregation stand by them, in whom the seed which they sow, springs up, grows, and bears fruit. STARKS: Ver. 8. In every time there are some pious and God-fearing people who separate themselves from the world, and seek the good of their souls rather than of their bodies.

Vers. 25-36. When one looks at the space which the Jewish congregation inhabited round Jerusalem, how very small was the territory occupied by the people of God, the only race which possessed a clear knowledge of the only true and holy God! A few miles, from three to six, north and south, east and west, comprised the entire district. Compared with our countries, yes, even with our provinces, this district appears to us almost as a vanishing nothing. And nevertheless what powers for the subjugation of entire humanity, for the transformation of all its relations, and for the subduing of all circumstances, has God the Lord been able to put in the people of this oasis, in the, at the same time insignificant, and in many respects miserable race, which cultivated the ground there or raised cattle! If any where surely here arises a testimony for Paul's word, "God hath chosen the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty." (1 Cor. i. 27.) A consoling promise also for Christendom in those times in which it appears as though it were being compressed on all sides, and when it is in truth losing position after position. Let it lose in length and breadth, in order afterwards to gain so much the more in height. Even the gates of hell cannot swallow up the church of the Lord.

STARKS: Ver. 25. God collects to Himself a church from among many peoples by the word of the gospel, that the heavenly Jerusalem may be filled.

CHAPTER XII. 1-47.

1 Now [And] these are the priests and the Levites that went up with Zerubbabel
2 the son of Shealtiel and Jeshua : Seraiah, Jeremiah, Ezra, Amariah, Malluch, Hat-
3 4, 5 tush, Shechaniah, Rehum, Meremoth, Iddo, Ginnetho, Abijah, Miamin, Ma-
6, 7 diah, Bilgah, Shemaiah, and Joiarib, Jedaiah, Sallu, Amok, Hilkiyah, Jedaiah.
These were the chief of the priests and of their brethren in the days of Jeshua.
8 Moreover [And] the Levites : Jeshua, Binnui, Kadmiel, Sherebiah, Judah, and 9 Mattaniah, which was over the thanksgiving, he and his brethren. Also [And] 10 Bakkukiah and Unni, their brethren, were over against them in the watches. And Jeshua begat Joiakim, Joiakim also [and Joiakim] begat Eliashib, and Eliashib 11, 12 begat Joiada, and Joiada begat Jonathan, and Jonathan begat Jaddua. And in the days of Joiakim were priests, the chief of the fathers : of Seraiah, Meraiah ;
13, 14 of Jeremiah, Hananiah ; of Ezra, Meshullam ; of Amariah, Jehohanan ; of Me-15 licu, Jonathan ; of Shebaniah, Joseph ; of Harim, Adna ; of Meraioth, Helkai ;
16, 17 of Iddo, Zechariah ; of Ginnethon, Meshullam ; of Abijah, Zichri ; of Minia-18, 19 min, of Moadiah, Piltai ; of Bilgah, Shammua ; of Shemaiah, Jehonathan ; And

- 20, 21 of Joiarib, Mattenai; of Jedaiah, Uzzi; of Sallai, Kallai; of Amok, Eber; of 22 Hilkiab, Hashabiah; of Jedaiah, Nethaneel. The Levites in the days of Eliashib, Joiada, and Johanan, and Jaddua were recorded [according to the] chief of the 23 fathers: also [and] the priests, to the reign of Darius the Persian. The sons of Levi, the chief of the fathers, were written [recorded] in the book of the Chronicles [book of the events of the times], even until the days of Johanan, the son of Elia-24 shib. And the chief of the Levites: Hashabiah, Sherebiah, and Jeshua the son of Kadmiel with their brethren over against them to praise and to give thanks, according to the commandment of David the man of God, ward over against ward.
 25 Mattaniah, and Bakkukiah, [and] Obadiah, [were singers]. Meshullam, Talmon, Akkub, were porters keeping the ward at the thresholds [treasuries] of the gates.
 26 These were in the days of Joiakim the son of Jeshua, the son of Jozadak, and in the days of Nehemiah the governor, and of Ezra the priest, the scribe.
 27 And at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem, they sought the Levites out of all their places to bring them to Jerusalem, to keep the dedication with gladness [to keep the dedication and festivity], both with thanksgivings and with singing, 28 with cymbals, psalteries and with harps. And the sons of the singers gathered themselves together, both out of the plain country [circuit] round about Jerusalem, and 29 from the villages of Netophathi; also [and] from the house of Gilgal [Beth-gilgal], and out of the fields of Geba and Azmaveth: for the singers had builded their vil-30 lages round about Jerusalem. And the priests and the Levites purified themselves, 31 and purified the people, and the gates, and the wall. Then [And] I brought up the princes of Judah upon the wall, and appointed two great companies of them that gave thanks, whereof one went on the right hand upon the wall toward the dung 32 gate [rubbish gate]. And after them went Hoshaiab, and half of the princes of 33, 34 Judah, and Azariah, Ezra, Meshullam, Judah, and Benjamin, and Shemaiah, 35 and Jeremiah, and certain of the priests' sons with trumpets; namely [the priests' names have fallen out—here follow the Levites' names] Zechariah the son of Jonathan, the son of Shemaiah, the son of Mattaniah, the son of Michaiah, the son of Zaccur, 36 the son of Asaph: And his brethren, Shemaiah, and Azarael, Milalai, Gilalai, Maai, Nethaneel, and Judah, Hanani, with the musical instruments of David the 37 man of God, and Ezra the scribe before them. And at the fountain gate, which was over against them, [and over the fountain gate and in front of them], they went up by the stairs of the city of David, at the going up of the wall, above the house of David, even unto the water gate eastward.
 33 And the other company of them that gave thanks went over against them, and I after them, and the half of the people, upon the wall from beyond [past] the tower 39 of the furnaces even unto the broad wall; and from above [past] the gate of Eph-raim, and above [past] the old gate, and above [past] the fish gate, and the tower of Hananeel, and the tower of Meah, even unto the sheep gate: and they stood 40 still in the prison gate. So [And] stood the two companies of them that gave thanks 41 in the house of God, and I, and the half of the rulers with me: And the priests;
 Eliakim, Maaseiah, Miniamin, Michaiah, Elioenai, Zechariah, and Hananiah with 42 trumpets; and Maaseiah, and Shemaiah, and Eleazar, and Uzzi, and Jehohanan, and Malchijah, and Elam, and Ezer. And the singers sang loud [made their voice to be heard], with Jezrahiah their overseer.
 43 Also [And] that day they offered great sacrifices, and rejoiced: for God had made them rejoice with great joy: [and] the wives also and the children rejoiced:
 so that the joy of Jerusalem was heard even afar off.
 44 And at that time were some [men] appointed over the chambers [which were] for the treasures, for the offerings, for the first fruits, and for the tithes to gather into them out of [according to] the fields of the cities the portions of the law [i. e., appointed by the law] for the priests and Levites: for Judah rejoiced [the joy of Judah was] for the priests and the Levites that waited [that stood at their posts].
 45 And both the singers and the porters kept the ward of their God, and the ward of the purification [And they kept the ward (or charge) of their God, and the ward of the purification, and so did also the singers and the porters keep their ward], ac-46 cording to the commandment of David, and of Solomon his son. For in the days of David and Asaph [see note] of old, there were chief of the singers, and songs of 47 praise and thanksgiving unto God. And all Israel in the days of Zerubbabel, and in the days of Nehemiah, gave the portions of the singers and the porters, every day his portion [the thing of a day on its day], and they sanctified [dedicated, as in 1 Chron. xxvi. 28] holy things unto the Levites; and the Levites sanctified them unto the children of Aaron.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 38. לְמִנְיָן for כְּמִנְיָן from the root מָנָה, according to Ewald. The usual form is מִנְיָן or מִנּוּל. May it not be from מָנָה, formed like a Hoph. participle?

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The Dedication of the Walls.

Before the ceremony of the dedication is rehearsed, a preliminary statement regarding the priests and Levites, as chief actors in the dedication, is made.

Vers. 1-9. This is a list of the principal priests and Levites who came with Zerubbabel from Babylon in the preceding century.

We have already spoken of the accidental identity of names, in many of these, with those who sealed the Covenant (ch. x. 1-8). If the question is here asked, "Why, then, are not the names of the sealers put down in vers. 12-21, as the representatives of the old priestly houses of Zerubbabel's day?" the reply is that the sealers were in Eliashib's day, but the representatives of the priestly families in vers. 12-21 were of Joiakim's day, Eliashib's father. The persons were not the same, and hence we do not look for the same names. We have three sets of names. In ch. xii. 1-7 we have those of Jeshua's time (i. e., Zerubbabel's); in ch. xii. 12-21, we have also those of Joiakim's day. In ch. x. 1-8 we have those of Eliashib's day.

But another question is raised by the fact that in Ezra ii. 36-39 and Neh. vii. 39-42 only four orders of priests are said to have come up with Zerubbabel, to wit, those of Jedaiah, Immer, Pashur, Harim, i. e., the 2d, 3d, 5th and 16th orders, Pashur representing Malchijah, (see Neh. xi. 12), while here are twenty-two families. The answer is suggested by Keil that those four represent grand families (and not the four priestly orders) and these represent an inferior division into twenty-two, two of the names, Jedaiah and Harim, being accidentally the same with two of the four. I know not, however, why the four courses or orders may not be intended in ch. vii. 39-42 and the twenty-two families belong to these four. Keil's reasoning seems defective.

Ver. 7. And of their brethren.—This does not refer to the Levites, for they are especially mentioned immediately afterward. It is a phrase in apposition, thus "chief of the priests, namely, their brethren."

Jeshua or Joshua, the high-priest at the return from Babylon under Cyrus (B. C. 536), nearly a hundred years before.

Ver. 8. We have already shown that the identity of names here with those in ch. x. is accidental. See notes on ch. x. 1-13, and the first note in this chapter. Hence the identification of Judah, Mattaniah and Bakbukiah with Hodijah (ch. x. 10), Mattaniah of ch. xi. 17, and Bakbukiah of ver. 25 (which identification Keil suggests) is an error, as these last three were men of Nehemiah's time (see ver. 26), while the first three were of Jeshua's day, (see vers. 1, 7).

This Mattaniah and his brethren were over the thanksgiving ('al huyyedo'h) in Jeshua's day. The Mattaniah of ch. xi. 17 was "the principal to begin the thanksgiving in prayer" (rosh hat-tehillah yehodheh lat-tephillah) in Nehemiah's day. The phrases are not identical. One refers to several men, the other to one.

Ver. 9. Bakbukiah and Unni were chiefs of the Levitical relays, who, in Jeshua's day, kept the watches over against the Levites commissioned to sing the thanksgivings. Mishmar must mean a watch or guard, even in ch. xiii. 14 and in Ezek. xxxviii. 7.

Vers. 10, 11. The pedigree of the high-priests from Zerubbabel's time to the time of Alexander the Great, i. e., from B. C. 536 to B. C. 332. As Nehemiah's government of Jerusalem was B. C. 440-434, we have this genealogy carried a century beyond him by a later hand. Jonathan is evidently a mistake in transcription for Johanan, as in vers. 22 and 23.

Vers. 12-21. A list of the representatives in Joiakim's day of the priestly houses whose names are obtained from those chiefs of the priests who came with Zerubbabel, as given in vers. 1-7.

Mellou = Malluch. Hattush is omitted (see ver. 2). Shebaniah = Shechaniah. Harim = Rechum. Meraioth = Meremoth. Miniamin = Miamin. Miniamin's representative is omitted,—dropped accidentally in transcription. Sallai = Sallu. These changes in a list evidently intended to be a copy of one immediately preceding form a good instance of the uncertainty of names in these old genealogical registers.

Vers. 22, 23. An interjected statement by the later hand. The Levites were regularly to the time of Alexander the Great recorded by the names of their chiefs, and the priests also, that is, to the reign of Darius (Codomannus). But the book of the Chronicles (1 Chron. ix.) only contained their names to Johanan's high-priesthood. That is, probably in Jaddan's time the record was no longer engrossed. Keil's effort to make these verses refer to Nehemiah's time as the ultimate is ingenious but forced. The days of Johanan and the days of Jaddan cannot mean the days in which they were living as young men or boys, but the days of their active high-priesthood. Hence the Darius is not Nothus, but Codomannus.

Vers. 23-26. The Levites in Joiakim's day and in Nehemiah's time. Hashabiah = Hashab-niah in ch. ix. 5.

Sherebiah (see ch. ix. 5). Jeshua, the son of Kadmiel. See ch. ix. 4, where Jeshua and Bani and Kadmiel is probably for "Jeshua ben Kadmiel." These were leaders of the singing Levites.

Mattaniah is put probably by mistake among the porters. He was a singer. (see ch. xi. 17). The same remark may be made of Bakbukiah and Obadiah (Abda). See, as before, ch. xi. 17.

Meshullam is Shallum in 1 Chron. ix. 17. Porters keeping the ward at the treasuries of the gates.—See 1 Chron. xxvi. 15, 17. These were the store-chambers attached to the various gates, inner and outer, belonging to the temple.

Ver. 26. Joiakim was probably high-priest when Ezra arrived at Jerusalem, Eliashib his son soon succeeding.

Ver. 27. The preliminary statements regarding the priests and Levites being ended, here begins the account of the dedication of the walls. Out of all their places, for the Levites were scattered throughout the province (see ch. xi. 8). To keep the dedication with gladness.—Instead of supposing a preposition wanting, we may take sim'hah as a concrete and read to keep the dedication and festivity.

Psalteries and harps differed but slightly from one another. The nebel or psaltery had more strings than the kinnor or harp. They both rather resembled our guitar than our harp.

Ver. 28. The sons of the singers.—Heb. Benê hamshorerim. That is the guild or company of singers of the three great Levitical families of Asaph, Heman and Jeduthun. The plain country round about Jerusalem.—Heb. hukkikkar sevivoth yerushalayim. There is no plain country round about Jerusalem. The kikkar must here be simply "circuit" (περίχωρος). Compare ver. 29.

If kikkar is to have here its specific meaning of "the valley of Jordan" (as Kcil insists), then we must insert umin 'hatzrâ between hukkikkar and sevivoth (for an omission likely to happen) and read "the valley of Jordan and from the villages round about Jerusalem." The idea that the valley of Jordan at Jericho could be said to be sevivoth yerushalayim (round about Jerusalem) is absurd.

Netophathi, the gentile noun without article, seems to be for Netophah, a place near Bethlehem (ch. vii. 26). Beit Netif, which is fourteen miles west of Bethlehem, seems too far off.

Ver. 29. And from the house of Gilgal.—Rather, and from Beth-haggilgal or Beth-Gilgal. Although we should look for a Jiljilia or a Boit-Jiljilia for the modern name of this place, yet as no such name occurs near Jerusalem, we may suppose Beit-Jala close to Bethlehem to be the modern representative.

Geba is now Jeba, six or seven miles north of Jerusalem. Asmaveth is not identified.

Ver. 30. The purification of priests, Levites, people, gates and wall was accomplished, doubtless, by a series of prescribed sacrifices.

Ver. 31. Read literally, appointed two great thankgivings, i. e., two great thanksgiving-companies. Perhaps the thodhoth in ver. 27 has this concrete meaning.

Judah is used in this verse for the whole people of Israel.

Whereof one went on the right hand.—Literally, and processions on the right hand. The whole passage should read, and appointed two thanksgiving-companies and processions. On the right hand, etc. (i. e., the one on the right hand).

Although it is not mentioned, yet it is clear that the two processions started at the valley-gate, the same at which Nehemiah had started to examine the ruined walls of the city on his arrival (chap. ii. 13). The valley-gate was at or south of the present Jaffa Gate (see on chap. ii. 13). Dung-gate.—(See l. c.)

Vers. 32-34. There followed the one thanksgiving company of Levites to the right (i. e., to the South) one-half the princes of Judah (i. e., chiefs of the entire Jewish people) with Hoshaiah at their head. The names in vers. 33 and 34 are the names of these princes. The names of Judah and Benjamin are not the tribal names.

Ver. 35. And certain of the priests' sons with trumpets.—This should close a section, as the names that follow are not of priests but of Levites. The priests' names have probably dropped out. In the corresponding list of the other procession the priests' names are given (see ver. 41). Priests' Sons, i. e., sons of the priests, i. e., priests.

Zechariah, an Asaphite, is leader of those who bear the Davidic instruments of music.

Ver. 36. Zechariah had eight with him, as Jeremiah had eight with him in the other band (see ver. 42).

Ezra the scribe went before all except the thanksgiving-company of ver. 31, just as Nehemiah took this position in the other band (see vers. 38, 40).

Ver. 37. The fountain-gate we believe to have been near the pool of Siloam, and the water-gate to have been an interior gate not far from the present south wall of the Haram. (See for these and the stairs of the city of David the notes on ch. iii. 15, 26; also see Excur.). We may read this verse, and over the fountain gate and in front of them they went up over the stairs of the city of David at the going up of the wall above the house of David even unto the water-gate eastward. We explain this description thus: that the procession kept along the south wall of Zion until it reached a point on the descent of that wall over against the fountain-gate and the pool of Siloam. There it would be over the fountain-gate. At this point it turned north ("in front of them"), leaving the main wall and passing up over the line of the great stairs that led up to the city of David (Zion), where an inner wall ran up and along the eastern crest of Zion. This inner wall had a place called Beth-David below it on the side of the Tyropæon valley. (Or if me'al be translated "past," then the Beth-David may be placed above). The procession would thus pass along Zion's eastern front and cross over to Ophel and the water gate at a point where the Tyropæon was not so deep and broad.

Ver. 38. And the other company of them that gave thanks. (See on ver. 31).

Read and the second thanksgiving company which went in the opposite direction, and which I followed and half the people (went) upon the wall past the tower of the furnaces even to the broad wall. By "the people" are meant those who formed the procession, not the people at large. The Heb. me'al here when used before "the tower of the furnaces" must mean "past." We cannot conceive the procession's passing over a tower. (See note on ver. 37, where the phrase "above the house of David" occurs). For "the tower of the furnaces" and "the broad wall," see on ch. ii. 8, 11. Also see Excursus.

Ver. 39. The gate of Ephraim must have been at the north-eastern extremity of the broad wall. The prison gate was on the north side of the temple, not connected with the palace prison of Jer. xxii. 2. See Excursus. (For the other localities here mentioned, see on chap. ii. and Excursus.)

Vers. 40-42. The latter part of ver. 40 and verses 41 and 42 belong before the former part of ver. 40. There may have been an error of transcription, or it may be a roughness of rhetoric.

Comp. ver. 41 with the first part of ver. 35, and verse 42 with vers. 35 and 36.

Ver. 43. Great sacrifices, i. e., thank-offerings which were eaten by the offerers in a happy feast, after "the food of the offering made by fire unto the Lord" (Lev. iii.)

Ver. 44.* At that time.—Evidently the time of the dedication. Some.—Heb. "men." The treasures (or stores) comprised the three sorts enumerated, to wit, the first-fruits, the tithes, and the free-will offerings. Out of the fields.—Rather, according to the fields. The portions of the law, i. e. the portions appointed by the law (as in margin). For Judah rejoiced for the priests and Levites that waited.—Rather, for Judah rejoiced in the priests and Levites who stood at their posts. The people gladly gave the prescribed offerings for the priests and Levites, so that there was no sense of burden upon them, nor any friction between the Levites and the people.

Ver. 45. The singers and the porters formed two important bodies of Levites. They kept the ward, that is, performed their appointed duties. The verse is improperly divided in the E. V. It should read, And they (the priests and Levites of ver. 44) kept the ward of their God and the ward of the purification, and so did also the singers and the porters keep their ward. The priests and Levites attended to their duties of public worship and purifying, and the singers and porters observed their appropriate functions.

Vers. 46, 47. The was before "Asaph" is generally supposed an error, and the verse is read "for in the days of David, Asaph of old was chief." This will explain the singular "chief," (the plural K'ri being unsupported). But still it is difficult to see why Asaph's headship should be mentioned just here. It may be suggested that the Masorites are wrong, and that the 46th and 47th verses (Silluk being removed) should run together, "all Israel" being subject in both, anticipated in ver. 46, from ver. 47, thus: for in the days of David and Asaph, of old, chief of the singers and songs of praise and thanksgiving unto God,—and all Israel in the days of Zerubbabel and in the days of Nehemiah gave, etc. From David's day to Nehemiah's the care of Israel for the Levitical singers and porters was marked.

* The opinion that vers. 44-47 are an insertion by another hand than Nehemiah's is founded on the change from the 1st person to the 3d person, and from the assumption that here is described the same transaction as in ch. xiii. 10-13. The former argument is too weak to trust anywhere. (How would it apply to Ezra ch. vii. 1) The latter argument is baseless, for the passage xiii. 10-13 refers to a different event.

Sanctified, i. e., Brought as consecrated or dedicated. As in 1 Chron. xxvi. 28.

The Levites brought as dedicated to the priests the tithes of that which was dedicated to them. (Num. xviii. 26.)

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. Both the Heb. hanukkah and the Greek enkaenia define a "dedication" as the initiation or beginning of a new thing. There is no notion of consecration in the word. There is no grace conferred or new nature implanted. Even in the dedication of the temple, it was only the Lord's miraculous presence which consecrated the place. The dedication of the walls of Jerusalem by Nehemiah and his brethren was simply a joyful religious celebration of the work achieved under the gracious providence of God. The priests indeed purified the walls, but so they purified the people. Everything Jewish was purified; so that this purification is no distinct part of the dedication. The primal element in the dedication was joy, exhibited in music, vocal and instrumental, and in thanksgiving. There was a formal recognition of God's mercy and loving-kindness by the assembled people.

2. The culminating point in the day's observance was certainly when the two processions, after each passing over half the wall, met at the temple and united their praises with new emphasis, while "great sacrifices" were offered on the brazen altar. The high position of the temple would add much to the imposing character of this service.

3. The ministers of religion were not considered as useless, "non-producing" men by the godly Jews. Even the singers were reckoned worthy of a public support. It is a low, materialistic philosophy that cannot see the moral importance of leaders and teachers of religion in a community, and that without them material accumulation will only expedite national destruction.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

Vers. 1-26. It was without doubt a matter of piety that in the time after the exile, they restored more and more the old classes of priests and Levites which had existed before the exile. It was a necessity for the congregation, which deserved all consideration, to have again an equally manifold-numbered, complete equipment for the establishment of the beautiful service of the Lord, as before the exile. It was also for the priests and Levites themselves most important and wholesome that they should find themselves together again in the old divisions, and should also acknowledge their venerable ancestors as their heads. Who can estimate the blessing there is, when descendants remain conscious that they are preceded by many and ancient ancestors in piety and the service of God, when in families piety too becomes a matter of tradition, when the children know that parents and grandparents have prayed for them, and particularly for their spiritual prosperity, and when they feel themselves called upon by this to pray again in turn for their children and grandchildren. It was an enviable time when in the Christian church likewise there were Aaronic families, when the children received an impulse from the example of parents and ancestors to devote themselves to the service of the word, and when the parents knew no higher joy than to see their children advancing to the same high office which their fathers had occupied. The first condition of a proper, worthy exercise of the office, which shall be rich in blessing, is indeed the pouring out of the Spirit, and the Spirit breathes where He listeth, but even in the Christian church the ordained ways hold an important position by the side of extraordinary ones. In connection with the fact that the number of the priests' classes was about the same as before the exile, Bede's remark is applicable: "Sic sepe sancta ecclesia ex detrimentis suis majora recepit incrementa, cum uno per incuriam lapsa in peccatum plures exemplo ejus terribi ad persistendum in castitate fidei sunt cautiores. Sepe idem ipsi, qui peccaverunt, majores post aetnam penitentiam bonorum operum fructus ferre incipiunt, quam ante incursum peccati ferre consueverant. Sepe ab hereticis ecclesia vastata, postquam instantia catholicorum doctorum lucem veritatis recepit, plures ad cognoscendam tuendamque rationem recuperantes ejusdem veritatis filios procreavit. Neque enim unquam beati patres Athanasius, Ambrosius, Hilarius, Augustinus, et ceteri tales tot et tam magnificos in sanctam scripturam tractatus conderent, si non contra fidem rectam tam multifarius hereticorum fuisset error ortus."

Vers. 27-43. The feast of dedication. 1. Whose part is it? The congregation's, to which God has anew given protection and power against its enemies, but also the individual believer's, when the Lord has secured to him his position, and has even enclosed it with a wall. 2. How is it to be celebrated? In that we purify ourselves from all that displeases the Lord, that we thankfully consecrate His gifts, that is, put them at His service, that we rejoice in them as a proof of the grace that desires our salvation, and thereby cause our faith to be strengthened, etc. 3. What blessing has it? It appropriates thus truly God's gifts to us, and enkindles thus our zeal to honor God with new desire by consecration, devotion, and homage.—BEDA: Facta autem civitas sancta dedicatur, cum, completo in fine seculi numero electorum, ecclesia universaliter in caelis ad visionem sui conditoris introducitur.—How must the congregation celebrate the feast of dedication? 1. With joyful thanks, that the power and salvation of the Lord has surrounded them as a wall for their protection against the world, and for their separation from the same. 2. With firm trust, that the Lord will still farther protect them. 3. With the sincere vow to hold themselves separate from the world, and to live to the Lord. True joy. 1. Its right, the God who has given us life, wishes also that it shall move joyfully; the God who always anew overwhelms us with favors, wishes that they should fulfil their mission, that is, make us happy, in the end holy. 2. Its occasion is God's grace, which has strengthened, protected, assured, or elevated our lower or higher life. The chief sites in Jerusalem testified to this, and in the Christian church, yes, indeed, in our lives, all the heights testify thereof. 3. Its kind—it raises itself to God, is a joy in Him, that is, becomes a service to God and our neighbor.—BEDA: Requiruntur et Levites spirituales, hoc est, assumpti in sortem regni de omnibus locis suis, quando mittet filius hominis angelos suos et congregabit electos suos a quatuor ventis, a summo terræ usque ad summum cæli. Faciunt illi dedicationem in litiis, cantico, gratiarum actione, atque in organis musicorum variis, cum in perceptione æternæ vitæ invicem gaudebunt.—STARKE: Dedications shall take place with praise and thanks, singing and praying, not with sins and wantonness. That should be the delight and joy of our hearts when we see that the city of God, that is, the Christian church, is protected by God within by the defence of faithful authorities. (Ps. lviii. 2.) Christian joy, at the proper time, does not displease God.

Vers. 44-47. What is also needful: 1. That there should be teachers and servants in the church. 2. That they should perform their service without being hindered in it by lower cares. 3. That the congregation should joyfully supply them with what is necessary for their support.—BEDA: Hujus autem capituli nobis expositio allegorica in promptu est; quia dominus statuit eos, qui evangelium annuntiant, de evangelio vivere. Sed vix illis sacerdotibus ac ministris sanctorum, qui sumptus quidem cum gaudio debitos sumere a populo delectantur, sed nihil pro ejusdem populi salute laborare, non aliquid sacri ducatus ei recte vivendo præbere, non de suavitate regni cælestis ei quæpiam dulce prædicando canere, sed nec janua in supernæ civitatis aperire, municipatum in caelis habendo, verum potius occludere perversæ agendo probantur.—STARKE: It is God's will and command that with the treasure of the godly word and for the maintenance of the same, we should make a provision that churches, schools, and those who serve in them may be supported. (1 Chr. xxvii. 20; 2 Chr. xxiv. 8; xxxi. 4; xxxiv. 9.)

CHAP. XIII. 1-30.

1 On that day [of dedication] they read [it was read] in the book of Moses in the audience [ears] of the people; and therein was found written, that the Ammonite and the Moabite should not come into the congregation of God for ever; because they met not the children of Israel with bread and with water, but [and] hired Balaam against them, that he should curse them: howbeit [and] our God turned the curse into a blessing. Now [And] it came to pass, when they had heard the law, that they separated from Israel all the mixed multitude.

[Events of 12 years' later date].

4 And before this, [in the face of this], Eliashib the priest, having the oversight of [being set over] the chamber [chambers] of the house of our God was allied unto Tobiah: And he had prepared [and he prepared] for him a great chamber, where aforetime they laid the meat-offerings, the frankincense, and the vessels, and the tithes of the corn, the new wine, and the oil, which was commanded to be given to the Levites, and the singers, and the porters; and the offerings of the priests. But [and] in all this time was not I at Jerusalem; for in the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes, king of Babylon, came I unto the king, and after certain days [at the end of days] obtained I leave of the king: And I came to Jerusalem, and understood of the evil that Eliashib did for Tobiah, in preparing him a chamber in the courts of the house of God. And it grieved me sore: therefore [and] I cast forth all the household stuff of Tobiah out of the chamber. Then [and] I commanded, and they cleansed the chambers: and thither brought I again the vessels of the house of God, with the meat-offerings and the frankincense. And I perceived that the portions of the Levites had not been given them: for [and] the Levites and the singers, that did the work, were fled every one to his field. Then [and] contended I with the rulers, and said, Why is the house of God forsaken? And I gathered <sup>9</sup> them [i. e., the Levites and singers] together, and set them in their place. Then brought all Judah [And all Judah brought] the tithe of the corn and the new wine and the oil unto the treasuries. And I made treasurers over the treasuries, Shelemiah the priest, and Zadok the scribe, and of the Levites, Pedaiah: and next to them [at their hand] was Hanan the son of Zaccur, the son of Mattaniah: for they were counted faithful, and their office was [and it was upon them] to distribute unto their brethren. Remember me, O my God, concerning this, and wipe not out my good deeds [kindnesses] that I have done for the house of my God, and for the offices thereof. In those days saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses; as also [and besides] wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought [and bringing them] into Jerusalem on the sabbath day: and I testified against them in the day wherein they sold victuals. There dwelt men of Tyre also therein [And the Tyrians dwelt therein], which brought fish, and all manner of ware, and sold on the sabbath unto the children of Judah, and in Jerusalem. Then [And] I contended with the nobles of Judah, and said unto them, What evil thing is this that ye do, and profane the sabbath day? Did not your fathers thus, and did not our God bring all this evil upon us, and upon this city? yet [and] ye bring more wrath upon Israel by profaning the sabbath. And it came to pass that when the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark [were shaded] before the sabbath, I commanded that the gates should be shut [and the gates were shut], and charged [commanded] that they should not be opened till after the sabbath, and some of my servants set I at the gates, that there should no burden be brought in on the sabbath day. So [and] the merchants and sellers of all kinds of ware lodged without Jerusalem once or [and] twice. Then

- [and] I testified against them, and said unto them, Why lodge ye about [before] the wall? if ye do so again, I will lay hands on you. From that time forth came they no 22 more on the sabbath. And I commanded the Levites that they should cleanse themselves, and that they should come and keep the gates, to sanctify the sabbath day. Remember me, O my God, concerning this also, and spare [pity] me according to the greatness [abundance] of thy mercy.
- 23 In those days saw I also [the] Jews that had married [carried to dwell with them]
 24 wives of Ashdod, of Ammon, and of Moab: and their children spake half in the speech of Ashdod (and could not speak [were not acquainted with speaking] in the Jews' language), but [and] according to the language [tongue] of each people [of 25 people and people]. And I contended with them, and cursed them, and smote certain [men] of them, and plucked off [tore out] their hair, and made them swear by God, saying, Ye shall not give your daughters unto their sons, nor take their 26 daughters unto your sons, or for yourselves. Did not Solomon, king of Israel, sin by these things? yet [and] among many nations was there no king like him, who [and he] was beloved of his God, and God made him king over all Israel: nevertheless even him did outlandish [foreign] women cause to sin. Shall we then [and 27 shall we] hearken unto you to do [hear that ye do] all this great evil, to transgress against our God in marrying [carrying to dwell with us] strange wives? And one
 28 of the sons of Joiada, the son of Eliashib the high-priest was son-in-law to Sanballat the Horonite; therefore [and] I chased him from me. Remember them, O
 29 God, because they have defiled [on account of the defilings of] the priesthood, and the covenant of the priesthood, and of the Levites. Thus cleansed I [And I
 30 cleansed] them from all strangers, and appointed the wards of the priests and the Levites, every one in his business; and for the wood-offering, at times appointed, and for the first-fruits. Remember me, O God, for good.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 6. נִשְׁאַלְתִּי. The lexicographers interpret this Niphal as Kal. But both here and in 1 Sam. xx. 6, 23 (the only places where the Niph. occurs), the meaning "to receive permission" seems to be necessary. It would be a quasi passive of the Kal meaning.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 24. וְנִבְרָא stands absolutely, for כְּדִבְרֵךְ being singular takes וְנִבְרָא as its nominative.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Ver. 1. On that day, i. e. the day of dedication of the walls, as in xii. 43, 44.

The part of the law which forbade mingling with the other nations was specially read on the dedication-day. Deut. xxiii. 8 would naturally be read, as also Deut. vii. 1-6. The reference to the former passage here uses the words adh olam (forever), which are not found alone in Deuteronomy. There it reads: "Even to their tenth generation shall they not enter into the congregation of the Lord forever," where the "forever" seems to signify the perpetuity of this ordinance, and not the perpetuity of their exclusion. It is quoted here in brief, without any design to change the meaning. No Moabite or Ammonite family could be admitted to the privileges of Jewry until in the tenth generation after quitting heathenism and formally allying itself with Israel.

Ver. 2. The reference to Deut. xxiii. 8-5 continues through this verse, the passage being condensed throughout. In the Heb. we have the singular, he hired (i. e. Balak) as in Deut. xxiii. 4.

Ver. 3. The result of this reading was a careful exclusion of the mixed multitude (erev) from Israel. This was a different act from that of the 24th of Tisri. Then Israel separated itself from the strangers. Now they separate the erev from Israel. The former was a withdrawal; this an expulsion. For erev, see Ex. xii. 38.

Ver. 4. Before this.—This should be "in the presence of this" (in conspectu ejus), with the circumstantial and not the temporal signification of liphne mizzeh. For Eliashib's evil conduct occurred while Nehemiah was away on his visit to Susa in Artaxerxes' thirty-second year, and not before the dedication-day. The meaning is, that Eliashib, the high-priest, notwithstanding all this reform wrought by Nehemiah in Artaxerxes' twentieth year, in the face of it all, dared, twelve years after, when Nehemiah was far away, to introduce Tobiah into the courts of the temple.

Nehemiah closes his record with a brief sketch of a new reform movement which he had to make twelve years later, owing to a long absence from Jerusalem at the Persian Court, in which time evil men had sought to undo his former work.

Between ver. 8 and ver. 4 we have therefore a gap of twelve years in the chronology.

We have no reason to suppose that Eliashib allied himself with Tobiah or (through his grandson) with Sanballat until this season of Nehemiah's absence, when Eliashib may have supposed that he would never return.

Nehemiah in all probability did not write this book of his doings at Jerusalem till late in life, when his second visit to Jerusalem was a thing of the past, as well as his first visit.

Eliashib, the priest (i. e. the high-priest), having the oversight of the chamber of the house of our God.—The participle is being set over (as in the margin). The "chamber" (lishkah) is used collectively for the "chambers." As high-priest, he would have control of all the various buildings in the temple-courts where the treasures of corn, oil and wine were preserved.

Was allied to Tobiah.—In what way we know not. Karov letoviyah. A predicate adjective after so long a sentence, not in apposition ("being allied"), but as in E. V. a distinct assertion ("was allied"). A new fact is stated, and we are led to believe that this alliance marked a fearful period of falling away, after Nehemiah had turned his back. If it had existed before, we should have had mention made of it.

Ver. 5. A second fact in the miserable business. The high-priest prepared for Tobiah a great chamber, probably by knocking many into one (see ver. 9), in which Tobiah resided when at Jerusalem (see ver. 8). This desecration Eliashib may have defended on the score of Tobiah being by blood a Jew (see on ch. ii. 10), and the necessity of keeping on good terms with the influential men of the surrounding provinces.

These chambers had held all the unbloody sacrificial offerings and the tithes.

The Levites are distinguished from the singers and porters, although the singers and porters were Levites. So, on the other hand, the Levites are distinguished from the priests, although the priests were Levites. The Levites, as here designated, were those engaged in the more immediate sacrificial services, in attendance on the priests.

Ver. 6. In the two and thirtieth year of Artaxerxes, king of Babylon, i. e. in B. C. 434-3. Probably the "time set" by Nehemiah and approved by the king (ch. ii. 6) was twelve years. At the expiration of this term he was obliged to leave the superintendence of affairs at Jerusalem and return to the court. Artaxerxes is called "king of Babylon," instead of "king of Persia," probably because at this time of Nehemiah's return the court was removed to Babylon for some special state reason.

After certain days.—Lit. at the end of days, a very general expression, and may here mean several years.

Obtained I leave, to wit, to return to Jerusalem.

Ver. 8. This decided action shows that Nehemiah returned with full powers from the Court.

Ver. 9. The chambers. See on ver. 5. The tithes are omitted in the enumeration, because, as we see by the next verse, the people had ceased paying tithes, and hence there were none to put in the store-chambers.

Ver. 10. For the Levites, etc., were fled. Rather: and the Levites, etc., were fled. They fled to their own fields to work for their living, because their tithes were withheld. Their own fields were those belonging to the Levitical cities.—The singers, that did the work, is a pregnant phrase for "the singers and porters who performed service."

Ver. 11. The rulers (seginim). The Pers. word does not necessarily refer to rulers set over the people by the Persians, although it may include such, but extends to all who might exercise authority by birth, election or otherwise. The Pers. word is used as a familiar term for magistrates.

Set them in their place.—That is, put the Levites back into their positions.

Ver. 12. Unto the treasuries (or store-houses). Or for stores.

Ver. 13. I made treasurers.—The Hiphil of Atsar, "to store." Lit.: "I caused to store over the store-houses." That is: "I placed men over the store-houses, whom I caused to store the stores in them."

Shelemiah.—See ch. iii. 80.

Zadok.—See ch. iii. 29.

Pedaiah.—See ch. iii. 20 and ch. viii. 4.

Next to them.—Lit. at their hand, as their assistant.

Ver. 14. This prayer is not one of self-glorification, but of faith in God's truth. A man who knows he is doing right in the sight of God can say so to God without presumption. It is a testimony of God's grace, and he can rejoice in it.

Ver. 15. In those days of my return to Jerusalem. The Sabbath had become desecrated in Nehemiah's absence, so that in some cases the works of the farm were wrought on that day, and produce brought to Jerusalem, and there sold on the Sabbath.

Ver. 16. Tyrian traders in fish and other products were plying their trade in the city on the Sabbath.

Ver. 17. The nobles (horim), not the "rulers" of ver. 11, but the higher classes generally.

Ver. 18. See Jer. xvii. 20-27.

Ver. 19. When the gates of Jerusalem began to be dark before the Sabbath.—This seems to show that the day among the Jews did not begin at sunset. For here after sunset when it began to be dark, it was before the Sabbath. Only a special Sabbath was counted from the evening before. See Lev. xxiii. 82.

Ver. 20. The merchants, or traffickers.—On arriving with their wares, according to their wont, they find the gates shut, and are obliged to pass the night outside the walls until the Sabbath is over.

Ver. 21. When this hint was not enough, Nehemiah sends them word that if they make their appearance again before the gates on the Sabbath to lodge there, they will be arrested. This broke up the evil.

Ver. 22. Cleanse themselves, as for a holy service, and so guard the Sabbath by guarding the gates. For the prayer, see on ver. 14.

Ver. 23. In those days of my return from Jerusalem. As at ver. 15.

Jews that had married.—With the article, the Jews that had married. As the children's speech was affected, these Jews must have lived on the outskirts of the Jewish province near the Philistines, Ammonites and Moabites. For children will always know the prevailing language of a district. Ashdod seems to stand for all Philistia, at this time probably the most conspicuous Philistine town.

Ver. 24. And could not speak in the Jews' language.—A parenthetical phrase.—The succeeding "but" should be "and."—Of each people, i. e. Ammon and Moab.

Ver. 25. Here is described the action not of a private man in his ungovernable rage, but of a public officer in the faithful use of his power. Notice the word contended. In ver. 11 Nehemiah contends with the rulers regarding the neglect of the tithes; in ver. 17, he contends with the nobles regarding the profanation of the Sabbath, and here he contends with the Jews who had married heathen wives for this open disregard of the law.

Ver. 26. Beloved of his God.—Comp. 2 Sam. xii. 24. This does not imply saving grace on God's part or holiness on Solomon's part. It only denotes special favor and privilege. Compare Mark x. 21.

Outlandish, i. e. foreign.

Ver. 27. Shall we then hearken unto you to do, etc. (welakhem hanishma laasoth).—Lit.: And for you is it heard to do, etc., i. e. "do we hear that you do all this great evil?"

Although it is not stated expressly, it is implied in ver. 30, that Nehemiah insisted on a separation from the "outlandish" wives, as did Ezra many years before (Ezra x. 8).

Ver. 28. Finding that Eliashib's grandson had married Sanballat's daughter, Nehemiah makes a public example of so glaring a case of defiance to the law, for here the special sanctity of the priesthood was desecrated (Lev. xxi. 6-8).

I chased him from me (abrihehu me alai). Lit.: "I made him flee from off me." Nehemiah forced him to leave Jerusalem, and be no longer a burden to his government.

Ver. 29. The covenant of the priesthood and of the Levites was, first, the general covenant with the tribes as Israel's teachers and God's special servants (Deut. xxxiii. 8-11), and, second the special covenant of priesthood (Lev. xxi. 6-8).

Ver. 30. Thus cleansed I them from all strangers—The irregularities regarding tithes, the Sabbath, and the marriages were all attributable to connection with strangers. When this was stopped, the careful ordering of the priestly and Levitical work was made easy, which had all been disarranged and much neglected in Nehemiah's absence.

Ver. 31. The wood-offering (see on ch. x. 34) and the first-fruits are mentioned for all the offerings, as those most apt to be neglected.

Remember me, O my God, for good.—See on ver. 14.

HISTORICAL AND ETHICAL.

1. The severe exclusion of the Moabite and Ammonite was an enacted token against sin. Even these blood relations of Israel were to be kept away as polluted, because they showed no sympathy with Israel, and made a deliberate and vile attempt to plunge Israel into sin. A permanent horror was to be erected between Israel and these monsters of iniquity. The key to many of the stern Mosaic statutes is to be found in the necessity of holding up the heinousness of sin, which men are ever ready to make light of. (See the exegetical commentary for an explanation of this statute.)

2. The lapse of Israel on Nehemiah's return to Persia throws into clear light the immense work which Nehemiah had wrought, and the remarkable power of the man. His influence had worked the reform and had upheld it, and when his presence was removed the structure at once began to crack and crumble. A generation later Malachi lamented over the spiritual waste that Judah presented. Great as Nehemiah was, he could not make healthy the diseased body of Jewry. He could only, by the force of his character, rouse the people to a decent semblance of righteousness. And yet, while he was powerless to renew the nation, we may believe that his influence ran down private channels in families and humble houses to the very time of the Messiah, making green lines of spiritual growth amid the arid desert of Judaism.

3. Ezra had effected a reform a dozen years before Nehemiah came to Judah. He had separated the Jews from the heathen people, and in this reform had forced the highest in the land to dissolve their wicked matrimonial alliances. The book of Ezra concludes with this statement. When Nehemiah arrived there was a new separation from strangers effected. (Ch. ix. 2.) Whether the mingling with the heathen had again amounted to marriage alliances we may not say. It may have only involved mercantile partnerships. A dozen years later again on Nehemiah's second visit, there is a necessity for a most stern application of Nehemiah's personal and official power to cure the same old evil, which seems to have been bolder than ever.

4. There are times when good men must assume great severity of manner and allow a holy indignation to fire their souls. Gentleness of style before barefaced villany is weakness and inefficiency. Had Nehemiah acted with a soft and effeminate method, the offenders would have laughed at him. God loves to guide with His eye, but sometimes He uses the thunderbolt.

HOMILETICAL AND PRACTICAL.

- Vers. 1-3. The duty of the church to purify itself constantly anew. 1. In regard to those with whom they assimilate themselves; in the Old Testament, in regard to the Ammonites, etc., not on account of their nationality, but on account of their ways; in the church, in regard to those who not only go astray, but also who will not allow themselves to be bettered, and who thus exclude themselves. 2. Whereon it grounds itself; not only on the right of self-preservation, but also upon God's word. 8. What it aims at; namely, that the church set forth more and more what it should be as Christ's spotless bride.

STARKE: One cannot read or preach God's Word too often, for one always finds something which one had not noticed or known before.

What God has commanded one must perform, even though it may seem hard to us, and we may draw upon us the enmity of others in its performance.

Vers. 4-9. The sanctity of holy places. 1. That upon which it is grounded; in the Old Testament, upon the fact that God had connected His peculiar presence with the temple; in the Christian dispensation, upon the fact that God's honor dwells in the churches, that is, is cherished there. 2. What it binds us to; to uphold the churches in a condition corresponding to their aim, or where they are lacking to restore them in a worthy manner. 8. What blessing it has for us; it reminds us of the holiness, the majesty and the glory of our God, and fosters our regard therefor; it works frequently by elevating and edifying, whereas an unworthy desecration of churches only promotes the crudity from which it has sprung. BEDÆ: Et tu quidquid inter fideles infidelitatis et immunditias reperis continuo projice foras, ut immundalis credentium cordibus, quæ sunt gasophylacia Domini, cum virtutum fuerint plena divitiis, vasa Domini inferantur; hoc est, illa ipsa corda quæ paullo ante vasa erroris fuerant per culpam denuo vasa Domini fiant per correctionem; ibique sacrificium bonæ operationis et thus puræ orationis, ubi pridem spelunca erat latronum, inveniat.

Vers. 80, 81. The retrospect of a servant of God upon his life and his usefulness. 1. It elevates him, because God's grace was with him, and made him worthy to engage in the cause of God and the salvation of mankind. 2. It humbles him, because he was so unworthy of this grace, and moreover because he has fallen so far short of what he might have been able to accomplish through its means. 8. It drives him to prayer, that God would also be merciful to him at the last for Christ's sake, whose righteousness is also his.

EXCURSUS ON THE GATES, ETC.

1. The Sheep-Gate.—Heb. שַׁעַר הַצֹּאן. LXX. ἡ πύλη ἡ προβατική. It is mentioned in Neh. iii. 1, 82, and xii. 89. It is probably the same as ἡ προβατική of John v. 2. In Nehemiah it is mentioned as near to the tower of Meah, and that is near the tower of Hananeel. From the fact that it seems to have had no locks and bars (see Neh. iii. 1, and comp. iii. 8, 6, 18, 14, 15), we conjecture that it led directly into the temple-precinct, where a Levitical guard was always present in place of locks and bars. Its name was doubtless given because through it the flocks were driven for the sacrifices, or because they were kept in pens by this gate. The present St. Stephen's gate is usually supposed to mark the site of the sheep-gate, and if so, the Bethesda pool (John v. 2) would be the Birket Israil, which is now satisfactorily proved not to be a moat. Eusebius describes Bethesda as two pools, and the Bordeaux pilgrim (about the same time) speaks of it as twin fish-pools. The Birket Israil may have been divided into two by a transverse wall in their day, or they may have counted the Birket Hammam Sitti Mariam, just north of the St. Stephen's gate and outside the walls, as one of the two pools; or, again, they may have intended by Bethesda the twin-pools under the convent of the Sisters of Sion near the north-west corner of the Haram, the position defended by Mr. Geo. Williams. The account in Nehemiah makes it necessary to place the sheep-gate somewhere in the region of the St. Stephen's gate; but if our argument concerning the absence of locks and bars is worth anything, we must put the gate to the south of Birket Israil. To add to this necessity, we may doubt if the city wall extended further north than the temple-precinct corner, until long after Nehemiah's day, when Agrippa built the third wall. If the Fountain of the Virgin is Bethesda, as Dr. Robinson thinks, then the προβατική of John v. 2 is another gate than that of Nehemiah, situated on Ophel.

On the whole, we are inclined to place the Sheep-Gate in the north wall of the temple-precinct, and in close neighborhood to the Birket Israil. In that case the two towers of Meah and Hananeel would be parts of the old Baris or fortification north of the temple, which afterward became altered and enlarged into Antonia.

2. The Fish-Gate.—Heb. שַׁעַר הַדָּגִים. LXX. ἡ πύλη ἡ ἰχθυηρά (ἰχθυρά, xii. 89: ἰχθυῦν, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 14; in Zeph. i. 10, it is πύλη ἀποκνυόντων, gate of the stabbers, probably ἰχθυῶν being read for ἰχθυῶν). It is mentioned in II. cc. It was between the sheep-gate and the old gate, as we see from the Nehemiah passages. The Zephaniah passage does not help us. The passage in 2 Chronicles seems to describe the building of the second wall (comp. Joseph. v. 4, 2) by Manasseh ("on the west to Gihon in the valley, and on the east to the entering in at the fish-gate"). If so, it would put the fish-gate near the Baris, where that wall ended (Jos. l. c.).

8. The Old Gate.—Heb. שַׁעַר הַיְשָׁנָה LXX. ἡ πύλη Ἰασηνᾶ. Keil insists that הַיְשָׁנָה is genitive, and follows Arnold in supplying הַיְשָׁנָה, thus calling it "the gate of the old wall." Schultz says: "the gate of the old town." If we take it as a genitive, it may be "the gate of Jeshanah," a name given because the road through it led to Jeshanah in Ephraim (2 Chron. xiii. 19), mentioned by Joseph. Antiq. 3, 11, 8, and 14, 15, 12. The LXX. seem to have taken this view. But it need not be a genitive, as we have in Is. xiv. 81 הַלִּילִי שַׁעַר (the שַׁעַר being treated as feminine) and שַׁעַר הַפְּנִימִית (Ezek. viii. 8).

We are inclined to identify this gate with the "corner gate" of Zech. xiv. 10 and Jer. xxxi. 38 שַׁעַר הַפְּנִימִית or שַׁעַר הַכֹּנֶן, and so to let it mark the north-east corner of the city-wall. The cited passages in Zechariah and Jeremiah seem to put the gate in relation with the tower of Hananeel. If the Fish-gate were close to that tower, then it would be very natural to mention the Old Gate or Corner Gate next to the tower, in describing a section of the wall. In 2 Kings xiv. 18 the "corner gate" is only four hundred cubits from the gate of Ephraim, but in which direction we cannot tell. If eastward, then it was very likely the same as the Old Gate; but if westward, then the gate of Ephraim, and the corner-gate may be unmentioned in Nehemiah's account of the rebuilding, because belonging to the undestroyed portion of the wall on the western end of the north wall, which part many suppose is the "broad wall" of Nehemiah. Of course in this case, the corner gate and the old gate are different gates. We can, at any rate, quite confidently claim that the corner-gate was at either the north-east or the north-west corner of the city.

4. The Valley-Gate.—Heb. שַׁעַר הַנָּחַל—LXX. ἡ πύλη τῆς φάραγγος. In ch. ii. 18 ἡ πύλη τοῦ ὠλεῖλαι (by joining מַנְיָ and לִילָה as one word). This gate (mentioned in ch. ii. 18, 15; iii. 18; 2 Chron. xxvi. 9) was evidently north of the dragon-well (שֶׁן הַדְּרָכִים), wherever that was. If the Birket Sultan is the Dragon well (which is very doubtful), we may put the valley gate about a thousand feet south of the present Jaffa Gate. The "tower of the furnaces" would correspond to the north-east tower of the present citadel, perhaps is identical with this very ancient piece of masonry. It does not seem possible by any scheme to identify the valley-gate with the Gate Gennath of Josephus, for that must have been east of the western starting-point of the first wall, where the name of valley-gate would have been a misnomer. If the valley-gate were just north of the northern end of the Birket Sultan, the Dung-gate would come exactly at the southern extremity of Zion, over the deep ravine of Hinnom. The name of valley-gate was doubtless derived from the broad and deep Wady er Rababi (Hinnom), out to which it led.

The most natural point for a gate on this side the city is where the present Jaffa Gate is. If we put the Valley-gate there, then the Dung-gate will come opposite the Birket Sultan.

5. The Dung-Gate.—Heb. שַׁעַר הָאֵשֶׁת. In Neh. iii. 18, שַׁעַר הָאֵשֶׁת LXX. ἡ πύλη τῆς κοπρίας. The Heb. is not so strong a word as the Greek, and may be rendered Rubbish-gate.* This gate was a thousand cubits from the Valley-gate (ch. iii. 18). The extreme southern point of Zion would be a very natural place, from which to empty rubbish down into the deep valley below. Here we might place the Dung-gate, making it the same as the (later) Gate of the Essenes. With Robinson, we would consider the Bethso of Josephus the Heb. בֵּית צֹאנָה or Dung-place. The Dung-gate, however, must be opposite the Birket Sultan, if the Valley-gate is placed at the present Jaffa Gate. See the preceding note.

6. The Fountain-gate.—Heb. שַׁעַר הָעֵין LXX. ἡ πύλη τῆς ἀνῆρας. In Neh. ii. 14 ἡ πύλη τοῦ Ἀν (untranslated). In Neh. xii. 37 τοῦ ἀνείν by a gross error. That this was close to the pool of Siloam (the "King's pool" of ch. ii. 14, the "pool of Siloam by the king's garden," comp. ch. iii. 15), there can be no doubt. In 2 Kings xxv. 4 it is called "the gate between two walls, which is by the king's garden." It was a gate down in the Tyropæon Valley, and at a corner, as the expression in 2 Kings xxv. 4 indicates.

7. The Water-gate.—Heb. שַׁעַר הַמַּיִם LXX. ἡ πύλη τοῦ ὕδατος. At this gate one procession halted at the dedication-service, while the other halted at the Prison-gate (ch. xii. 37, 39). This would place the Water-gate at the south of the temple, and the Prison-gate at the north of the temple. They could scarcely have been in the city-wall, but were probably gates leading from the inner temple-enclosure to the outer. The water-gate may have derived its name from its leading to the remarkable cisterns lately discovered by Capt. Warren south of the Haram. It will be noticed that nothing is said of rebuilding either of these gates. We would put the Water-gate at the southern limit of the "mountain of the house," near the present entrance to El-Aksa. This accords with the Talmud, Mid. 2, 6.

8. The Prison-Gate.—Heb. שַׁעַר הַפְּסָרָה. This is referred to in the last section. It was probably the same as the שַׁעַר הַפְּסָקָה of ch. iii. 31 (i. e. gate of visitation of punishment).

If we follow the course of the second dedicative company (ch. xii. 38, 39), we are constrained to put this gate between the sheep-gate and the temple, probably at the north limit of the "mountain of the house." But in ch. iii. 25 we find the "court of the prison" mentioned, as in Jer. xxxii. 2; xxxiii. 1, and xxxvii. 21. This was attached to the king's palace, and was therefore at the south of the Haram. This prison, into which Jeremiah was cast, was probably the State-prison, while another prison, near the "prison-gate" (whence it derived its name), was a temple-prison, for offenders against the worship.

9. The Gate of Ephraim.—Heb. שַׁעַר אֶפְרַיִם. LXX. ἡ πύλη Ἐφραίμ. Neh. viii. 16; xii. 89; 2 Kings xiv. 18. This gate was four hundred cubits from the corner-gate (wherever that was), and had an open square near it like that at the water-gate. It was also between the broad wall and the old gate. So much the cited passages show. It doubtless derived its name from the fact that the main northern road to the Ephraimite country led through it. For a like reason it may have been called the "gate of Benjamin" (Jer. xxxvii. 18; Zech. xiv. 10), the Benjamite country lying north of the city, and the road through this gate leading to its chief cities. This gate was not rebuilt by Nehemiah, because, probably, it was in the "broad wall" (i. e., as Keil and others hold, in that 400 cubits of wall which Joash broke down, and which Uzziah rebuilt in a stronger manner. 2 Chron. xxvi. 9). It probably coincided with the modern Damascus Gate, at which ancient substructions are found.

10. The first Gate. Heb. שַׁעַר הָרִאשׁוֹן. LXX. ἡ πύλη ἡ πρώτη. (Zech. xiv. 10). From this only mention of this gate, we would naturally place it between Benjamin's gate and the corner gate. If the Old Gate and Corner Gate are the same, then we should have to suppose an important gate on the north of the city not elsewhere mentioned. But may not the peculiar phraseology of the Zechariah passage lead us to identify the first gate and the corner gate? The words are "unto the place of the first gate unto the corner gate." That may mean "unto the place where the first city gate is, beginning at the north, to wit, unto the corner gate." The adjective "first" seems more appropriate to distinguish one of a series, than to represent the peculiar name of a gate.

11. The High Gate. Heb. שַׁעַר הָעֵלִי. LXX. ἡ πύλη ἡ ὑψηλή (in Jer. xx. 2, πύλη τοῦ ὑπερύψου; in 2 Chron. xxiii. 20, ἡ πύλη ἡ ἐκτετρα). The passage in Jeremiah calls this the "high gate of Benjamin by the house of the Lord." "The passage in 2 Chron. xxvii. 8 calls it the 'high gate' of the house of the Lord." In 2 Chron. xxiii. 20, we see that it was between the temple and the palace. Of course, then, it was not a gate of the city wall. It is called "gate of the guard" in 2 Kings xi. 6, 19.

12. The Inner Gate. Heb. שַׁעַר הַפְּנִימִית. (Ezek. viii. 3).

13. The New Gate. Heb. שַׁעַר הַחֲדָשׁ. (Jer. xxxvi. 10).

14. The Middle Gate. Heb. שַׁעַר הָאֶמֶת. (Jer. xxxix. 8).

15. The Gate of Sur or of the foundation. Heb. שַׁעַר הַסֹּר or שַׁעַר הַיְסוֹד. (2 Kings xi. 6; 2 Chr. xxiii. 5).

16. The Fast Gate. Heb. שַׁעַר הַמְּצוּרָה. (Neh. iii. 29).

17. The Horse Gate. Heb. שַׁעַר הַסּוּסִים. (2 Chron. xxiii. 5; Jer. xxxi. 40. Comp. 2 Kings xi. 16).

These six, together with the gates mentioned by Ezekiel in his vision of the temple, are very evidently, like No. 11, gates of inner walls, and do not belong to the circuit of the city fortifications.

18. The Corner Gate. See above, under Nos. 8 and 10.

19. The Gate of Benjamin. See above under No. 9.

20. The Gate Miphkad. See above under No. 8.

21. The Tower of Meah.

22. The Tower of Hananeel.

These were evidently near one another, and stood between the Sheep Gate and the Fish Gate. We have supposed that they were towers of the special fortification north of the temple, known afterwards as Baris, and in Roman times as Antonia (Neh. iii. 1; xii. 89; Jer. xxxi. 38; Zech. xiv. 10).

23. The Tower of the Furnaces. Heb. מִנְּהַר הַתְּנֹרִים. LXX. πύργος τῶν θανούριμ. The natural point in the circuit for this would be anywhere between the second wall's beginning and the valley gate. What is more likely than the very old N. E. tower of the present citadel (the supposed Hippicus) should be it?

24. The Broad Wall. Heb. הַחוֹמָה הַרְחֹבָה. LXX. τὸ τεῖχος τὸ πλατὺ.

Keil supposes with much probability that this was that four hundred cubits of wall broken down by Joash from the gate of Ephraim to the Corner Gate (2 Kings xiv. 18) and afterwards rebuilt of greater breadth by Uzziah.

25. The stairs that go down from the city of David. Heb. הַמַּעֲלֹת הַיּוֹרְדוֹת מִקֵּצֵר דָּוִד. These, mentioned in Neh. iii. 15, are again referred to in ch. xii. 37. From the latter passage we should gather that the company marched around the wall as far as the neighborhood of the fountain of Siloam, and then left the wall and passed up the stairs to Zion and along Zion's eastern edge till they crossed over to the water-gate at the temple. We suppose, therefore, that these stairs ascended from the king's gardens to his palace, (the Davidian palace) on Zion (ch. xii. 37, "the house of David").

26. The Sepulchres of David. Heb. קְבֻרֵי דָּוִד. The places of sepulture of David's family were probably near his own palace on Zion. We should place them at the S. E. corner of the present Zion wall. The wall along Ophel is marked by reference to sites on the opposite side of the Tyropæon.

27. The Pool that was made. Heb. הַבְּרִיקָה הַחֲשִׁיבָה. This may be the Fountain of the Virgin, about which there has been so much careful work of human hands in the galleries and cisterns connected with it.

28. The House of the Mighty.

29. The Armory.

To these we have no clue. They may have been both on Ophel.

The destruction of the city was so complete by Titus, and then by Hadrian, that the gates of the later city can be no guide to the position of those of the ancient city. We must depend on the Scriptures and Josephus, with perhaps a little help from Rabbinical tradition. It seems very clear that the main city wall in Nehemiah's day ran directly from the southern brow of Zion over to Siloam, and then northward along Ophel to the S. E. corner of the Haram. On Ophel there may have been an intricacy of wall, by reason of which the topography in the latter part of ch. iii. is very difficult to explain. As Ophel was a fortress, there may have been several angles in the wall there for strategic purposes.

We have given a crude sketch of the walls, gates, etc., as we suppose them to have existed in the days of Nehemiah, as a help to the understanding of the 8d and 12th chapters.

1. Tower of Meah.
2. Tower of Hananeel.
3. Prison Gate (Miphkad).
4. Water Gate.

5. Tower of the Furnaces.
6. Pool of Siloam.
7. Horse Gate.

INTRODUCTION.

§ 1. CONTENTS AND COMPOSITION.

THIS book, which in the subscription of many of the old manuscripts of Alexandria (as subjoined to chap. ix. 26) is designated as ἡ ἐπιστολὴ τῶν Φουράμ, and briefly as מִסְכָּר, 'Εσθήρ or as מִסְכָּר מְגִלָּת, and by the rabbins is called simply מְגִלָּה [the roll], stands peculiar in more than one respect in the Old Testament canon. Compared with the historical books of the Canon, it towers far above them, if we examine its composition—which may be said to be nearly perfect—while it falls behind them, if viewed as to the spirit of its statement. First, then, let us consider its composition. The history which it portrays, appears like a well-planned drama; developing scene after scene in rapid succession, and progressing by fascinating movements, to a consummation which we may compare to the tying of a knot. But when the ἀκμή is reached, the solution is also near at hand. There ensues a highly successful and impressive péripétie, a sudden turn of fortune, and all difficulties, though seemingly impossible, that stand in the way of a desirable conclusion, are continually and completely overcome as chapter succeeds chapter. The first chapter gives us the introduction to the whole, and the last gives us a supplement. Of the eight main chapters, the first four are devoted to the tying, and the last four to the untying of the knot. Two out of these eight regularly belong together in the first part, because of the relation of the plot to the counterplot; in the second part, because they refer to the removal of an identical difficulty.

Ahasuerus (Achashverosh), the powerful king of Persia, who has dominion from India to Æthiopia, i. e., over one hundred and twenty-seven provinces, in the third year of his reign prepares a feast for the magnates of his kingdom, which lasts a half year. In this feast he exhibits to his subjects—and thus to the readers of the book likewise—the wealth and magnificence of his kingdom. The reader might readily anticipate the significance of the enmity or friendship of such a ruler with respect to the Jews and the honor accruing to Esther when he selects her as his consort. Neither are we likely to lose sight of the distinction that Mordecai receives by being made his all-powerful representative. When finally the king would parade the beauty of his wife Vashti (Vashti), she declines to appear before him and his guests, and the consequence is that, by the advice of his seven counsellors he repudiates her. This is the substance of the first chapter; the real point of issue of the history is developed out of the second chapter. Ahasuerus prefers the Jewess Esther, who is to be a substitute for Vashti, before all other virgins. He solemnly elevates her to Vashti's position; at the same time Mordecai, her uncle, from whom her elevation removed her, remains near the court. She does not reveal her Jewish origin, and Mordecai makes the king his debtor by discovering a conspiracy against the life of Ahasuerus. One would think that now better days would dawn upon the Jews in all the lands of Persia (chap. ii.). The first elevation is followed by a second. Haman, who on account of his name and descent might be called a declared heathen and enemy to Judaism, is by Ahasuerus made his prime minister. Irritated by Mordecai's disrespectful attitude, he procures a decree which, so far as human foresight can predict, must inevitably result in the complete termination of the Jewish name. Haman loses no time in promulgating this decree in all the provinces (chap. iii.). In the fourth chapter we find in consequence that, in the entire Persian domain all who are called Jews are in deep distress, covered with sackcloth and ashes. Conspicuous among them is Mordecai in a mourning suit, standing with loud lamentation at some distance from the king's portal, so as to draw the attention of the female servants and eunuchs of queen Esther. By great exertions he finally succeeds in obtaining her promise that she will dare the utmost for the salvation of her people; and she is even ready to perish in the attempt. She induces him, together with all the Jews in Susa (the palace) to join her and her maids in preparation for the decisive event by a strict fast of three days' duration (chap. iv.). But she is graciously received by her consort, whom she approaches without previous permission; yet she deems it expedient to first invite the king to dine with her once or twice, and this in company with Haman, who is thus even by her highly honored and distinguished. Here although the reader begins to anticipate, that just this distinction will become, in the artfulness of fortune, the beginning of his end, nevertheless Haman himself does not yet perceive it, but puffs himself up, as those often do who are delivered over to the divine judgment, against his mortal enemy Mordecai. Just as he departs from the first of Esther's banquets, in order to go to his home, and by this manifest distinction having become of greater self-importance, and especially having already received a second invitation, it happens that he finds Mordecai again sitting in the gate of the king's palace and still refusing to give him the required homage. After he has taken counsel with his wife and friends, and finds that the only drawback to his great fortune is this disrespect of the hated Jew, he resolves, in order that he may enjoy the happiness and honor of the next banquet without alloy, to remove this proud Mordecai out of his way the very next morning. He causes a gallows fifty cubits high to be constructed, on which, in order that the punishment might be the more terrifying and disgraceful, he would have Mordecai hung. In short, while the Jews themselves are prostrated in mourning, fearing the very worst, nor yet hoping a more fortunate turn of affairs to be brought about by the intercession of Esther, their mortal enemy, purposely and in consequence of Esther's intercession carries his head especially high, thinking that his highest triumph is now near at hand, (chap. v.). But in the succeeding night sleep flees the pillow of the king. In consequence he calls his scribe to read to him from the annals of the kingdom. In these is recorded how Mordecai disclosed the conspiracy against him, thereby saving his life, and precisely this passage is read to him. This occasions the question, how Mordecai had been rewarded for having made himself so greatly deserving of his favor; or rather, since hitherto he had not been rewarded, how or what reward should now be given him? Hence, just as Haman enters in the early morning, with the design of obtaining permission for the execution of Mordecai, he has this question put to him, and an immediate answer is required. As the question is quite general and indefinite, namely, what should be done to a man whom the king would delight to honor; and as no doubt arises in the mind of the self-conceited Haman that his own preference is spoken of, it so happens as the point of culmination of this effective development that, in the same moment in which he expects to annihilate his mortal enemy, he both pronounces his own doom and elevates his enemy to the highest honor. The king forthwith instructs him to carry out his own sentence (chap. vi.). But upon this first blow, which of course naturally falls heavily upon him, and which even to his wife and friends presages his downfall, there follows in the seventh chapter the second. In the second banquet he is boldly confronted by Esther, and Ahasuerus, extremely incensed against him, has him hung on the same gallows which was erected for Mordecai. Thus in chapters vi. and vii. the originator of the danger that threatened the Jews is removed. Now the question remains, whether and how the special regal decree, which ordered the destruction of the Jews, can be made ineffective, in spite of the irrevocableness which it has as the king's decree. Chapter viii. relates how little Mordecai and Esther are content with that which they had gained in Haman's downfall, and how Esther now entreats the king for her people, and how Mordecai, to whom the king assigns the matter, adopts counter measures, by which the Jews are restored to their rights and protected. Mordecai gave them permission to assemble and defend themselves in the day in which they were to be attacked. Chapter ix. adds how fortunate the Jews were in consequence, as they averted the calamity from themselves and threw it upon their enemies. Indeed they succeeded so well that the day in which they apprehended their destruction, became a day of rejoicing; and Mordecai, as well as Esther, by means of letters and ordinances established this day to be celebrated annually as a day of joy, solemn reflection and memorial. With a view to indicating not only their deliverance, but likewise the elevation and honor, which both Mordecai and Judaism experienced, chapter x. is added as a supplement. There also it is stated how powerful was the sway of Ahasuerus over land and sea, and how Mordecai, still promoting the welfare of his people, was the second in the kingdom. If we briefly condense the whole matter, we have the following summary:—

PART FIRST. The origin and increase of danger to the Jews (chaps. i.—v.).

Introduction. The occasion of the history. The State-banquet of Ahasuerus and the rejection of his spouse Vashti (chap. i.).

First Section. The rise and meeting of the contrasts (chaps. ii., iii.).

Esther takes the place of Vashti, and Mordecai deserves well of Ahasuerus (chap. ii.).
Haman attains to consequence and power, and irritated by Mordecai, resolves and decrees the destruction of the Jews (chap. iii.).

Second Section. The conflict between the contrasts, (chaps. iv., v.).

Mordecai, deeply mourning for his people, urges upon Esther to beseech the king for mercy, and obtains her consent (chap. iv.).
Esther is graciously received by the king. Haman, highly honored by the queen, resolves to have Mordecai hung (chap. v.).

PART SECOND. The removal of the danger (chaps. vi.—x.).

First Section. Haman's downfall (chaps. vi., vii.).

Haman, while expecting the highest distinction for himself, is deeply humiliated, in the very act of seeking the destruction of Mordecai, his mortal enemy, by being obliged by his own judgment to concede, and even with his own hand to impart to him the greatest distinction (chap. vi.).

Accused by Esther, he is hung on the same tree which he had erected for Mordecai (chap. vii.).

Second Section. The removal of the danger which threatened the Jews in consequence of the decree of annihilation issued against them (chaps. viii., ix.).

Esther and Mordecai obtain permission for their people to defend themselves, (ch. viii.).
The Jews rid themselves of their enemies and resolve, by the advice of Mordecai and Esther, annually to celebrate the day of their deliverance, as the feast of Purim (chap. ix.).

ADDENDA. Authority, consequence and power of Mordecai the Jew in the powerful Persian world-monarchy (chap. x.).

§ 2. AIM AND HISTORICAL CHARACTER OF THE BOOK.

Could authentic evidence be brought to show that there was a custom, in order to enhance the attractiveness of the annual celebrations, of publicly reading a festival-book (such as in the last Mazzoth day, Solomon's Song; on the second of the Feast of Weeks, the book of Ruth; on the 9th of Ab, as being the day of the destruction of Jerusalem, the Lamentations of Jeremiah; on the third day of the Feast of Tabernacles, Ecclesiastes), and could this be traced back to the time of the authorship of our book, then we should be apt to suppose that the book of Esther was written for the express purpose which it afterward served, viz. as the festival-book (the Megillah or volume) of the feast of Purim.

It is manifestly the intention of the author to exhibit the reason for the feast of Purim, i. e. to narrate the remarkable events to which that feast had reference. He is so engrossed with this festival of Purim, that he declares to us in the ninth chapter how it came that not only the 14th, but even the 15th, of Adar was celebrated as a festival; and in vers. 24 sqq., he again briefly condenses the chief facts of the history, in order to give them in a definite and comprehensive manner as the ground of the feast; and finally he makes the name Purim conspicuous as having special reference to these events. Of course, the occasion of the feast receives from him particular attention, because it is of such moment to the history as well as faith of the Jews, and in order to show that there is in the government of the world a justice which protects Judaism and preserves it amid the greatest dangers.

It is a manifest design of the book to promote a revival of the Jewish faith, for the strengthening of which this feast of Purim was designed, and to demonstrate that the heathen enemies fall themselves into the pit which they dug for Judaism, and that the Jewish people have an easy rise to the surface though they may have fallen for a time into abjectness and dependence.

Now the question arises, whether, in order to attain this object, the author has treated his theme historically or poetico-didactically; and if the latter be true, whether he has employed a free poetic style or merely given to historic facts a poetic adornment. The historic treatment has tradition on its side. This view obtains not only with the Rabbins, but universally in the Christian Church also. In its defence even CLERICUS (in his Dissert. de scriptoribus librorum hist., § 10) says: "It is a truly wonderful and paradoxical history (who will deny it?); but many wonderful things and foreign to our customs formerly obtained among orientals as also among many other peoples." The first attacks upon its credibility were made by SEMLER (Apparatus ad liberaliorem V. Test. interpret., p. 152 sq.), by OEDER (Untersuchungen über einige Bücher des Alten Testaments, p. 12 sqq.), and CORRODI (Beleuchtung des jüdischen und christlichen Bibel-Kanons I., p. 64), and later by BERTHOLDT (Einkl. V., p. 24 sq.), DE WETTE, GRAMBERG (Gesch. der Religionsideen I., p. 317), VATKE (Bibl. Theol. I., p. 580), and also by BLEEK (Einkl. zum Alten Testament); but they were aimed against details, which are not definite; and they do not therefore much militate against a correct understanding of the plan and method of our book. Historical investigation, however, cannot reject such doubts because they seem to contradict the received opinions respecting the canon. The latter may possibly be corrected. Even conservative theology has been compelled to make the concession that the book of Job, indeed even its introduction and conclusion, although having the form of a historical statement, are nevertheless to be received as poetical works, and that the declarations of Solomon in Koheleth have a poetical garb. It has been conceded that the book of Jonah has not so much value as a historical book, but rather as a book of doctrine, since otherwise it would not stand in the same category with the prophetic books.*

We must, therefore, not pass too hastily the question, whether in the later periods of canonical literature there had not a new branch of literary activity developed itself, which might be termed, in some sense at least, as that of religious romance. In the Greek-Alexandrian period as is shown by our Apocrypha, this was very rife. It might also occasion the thought, that in all public readings on festival days, only those writings were selected to be read which belonged fully to poetry, such as Canticles and Lamentations, or which at least in a certain sense pass over into poetry, as the books of Ruth and Ecclesiastes.

One circumstance especially and primarily caused doubts as to the strictly historical character of this book, namely, that, in the real turning-point of the whole story, as if in order to raise the interest of the reader to a high pitch, and also to make a satisfactory conclusion as regards Mordecai and the Jews, the timely and fitting nature of many of the incidents seems to translate the reader involuntarily from the world of reality to that of ideality. Haman must take revenge upon Mordecai in the very moment of his anger, and cause the gallows upon which he himself should be hung in the morning to be erected over night. But in this very night, when Mordecai has so much at stake, the king is made to have a disturbed sleep, and thereupon cause the state documents (chronicles) to be read to him, by the means of which he is reminded of the desert of Mordecai. The question of the king, which is quite indefinite, is accordingly misunderstood by Haman, and thus misleads him, so that he applies it to himself, and in consequence of this self-deception, awards to his mortal enemy the highest distinction, and that too in the very moment when he is intent on his destruction. In order to explain such facts one must have recurrence to the special divine Providence, which rules over Mordecai and over the Jewish nation in general.

* [The author has made this admission too vaguely and unguardedly. The result of modern criticism has been not to overthrow the historical basis of the books referred to, but only to confirm the opinion early broached, and not unfrequently entertained, that their dress and language is poetical.—Ta.]

However intent God may be in a plan where the salvation or protection of His own people depends upon it; and though at times He may bring about occurrences in their favor, which are so wonderful as to make His special interference manifest to the believer, nevertheless the facts are not usually so artistically arranged by Him, as appears here. Besides, it is remarkable that Mordecai should not ere this have received some suitable reward for his meritorious act; so likewise that Esther did not at the first feast bring her particular request before the king. It would really seem as if Esther had been enjoined to wait, at least until Haman should gain time to determine the execution of Mordecai. Above all, semblance is given to the thought that Mordecai's reward is purposely postponed, in order that it might be accorded to him in the supreme and decisive moment of the whole proceeding.

But if we must acknowledge the influence of a transformative and embellishing imagery in this chief stage of the drama, this would be inconsistent if it were not possible to hold the same in other places, where it comes within the didactic purpose of the author, and where by a change in form of the transmitted material the intended impression could be more seriously brought about.

Possibly it may be assumed that Esther did not—at least permanently—occupy the position of first (chief) wife, but held only a subordinate one, as a preferred concubine before several others in Vashti's stead. Indeed, our book hints at such a fact; since even after Esther's elevation, there is mention in chap. ii. 19 of another collection of virgins, which appears to have had the same significance as the first one. It is well known that the profane writers are not only silent in reference to Esther, but they also relate several things as regards the chief wife of Xerxes, which have no application to Esther. They call the former Amestris, and say in reference to her, not only that she was a daughter of Otanes (HEROD. VII. 64), or of Onofas (CTESIAS, § 20), but also that Xerxes was married to her even previous to the expedition to Greece (HEROD. IX. 109). Further on it states that he married off Darius his oldest son by her, in the year 479, or immediately after the march to Greece (HEROD. IX. 108), while Esther, as we shall presently see, was raised to be queen after the Grecian expedition. To this may be added that, according to HERODOTUS III. 108, the real queens were selected only from the seven chief Persian families. Moreover, according to the Zend-Avesta (comp. KLEUKER, Anhang., I. 78), marriage proper with women of any other tribe was, to the Persians, strictly forbidden.

Perhaps it may further be stated, indeed one might safely affirm that, Haman was not really an Agagite, i. e., a descendant of the Amalekite king Agag, but that this designation was only given in a symbolical way. Hence, according to his whole manner, as is affirmed by the Targums prius et posterius, he would as the arch-enemy of Israel, hold a relation to Edom intrinsically identical, but varied in its outward expression, by being opposed to Mordecai, who had sprung from the family of Saul. Thus the name Haman, as well as that of his father (comp. on chap. iii. 1), might be of significance in this relation.

The remark, that Shushan, the city (not usually the Jews resident there, but the city itself), fell into consternation and alarm at the announcement of the first regal decree, which commanded the destruction of the Jews (comp. chap. iii. 15) may perhaps be somewhat exaggerated. So likewise at the publication of the second decree, in which the Jews were permitted to defend themselves, the assertion that the city rejoiced exceedingly (comp. chap. viii. 15) is not to be accepted as strictly true. This remark, perhaps, has its ground in the intention of the author, to bring into prominence the cruelty of the first decree, and the justice of the second, as also the greatness both of the threatened misfortune and of the following good fortune. Finally, the statement given in chap. ix. that, on that decisive day seventy-five thousand persons perished at the hands of the Jews, doubtless does not rest upon an actual count; but it is rather the design of the author to represent the victory of the Jews as grand and extensive. Of course in all these points we are necessitated to content ourselves with a bare "possibility," or even "probability." Yet we must not forget that a judgment may in such things be rendered merely from a subjective and individual point of view, and that we lack objective criteria. Finally, the conditions and circumstances of the case are to be regarded, of which we now have not sufficient knowledge.

The anti-traditional view, as held by SEMLER, OEDER, CORBODI, and among later critics HIRTZIG (Gesch. Isr. I. p. 280), and ZUNZ (Zeitschrift d. D. M. G. XXVII. 4, p. 684), which is that the history of our book is in several places not only poetically adorned, but really invented as a whole, in order to represent naturally a truth that seems to require statement in a historical form—is a view which would incline us to accept the theory of an apologetical tendency in reference to our book, could we thus be enabled to look upon it as actual, if not in all respects, yet at least in the cardinal points, especially as regards the persons treated of, in their manner, their destiny, or even in their names, intentions, and thoughts. Under that view Esther, who had grown great in lowly circumstances, herself poor but amiable, might represent the later Jewish nation growing up in exile, and not distinguished from other peoples by its external greatness, but rather by its internal importance and effectiveness. Esther's name is really Hadassah, or "Myrtle." In Zech. i. 8 the post-exilic nation is compared to the myrtles on the shore of the roaring sea, a symbol of the moving masses of humanity. Her assumed name Esther (aster, "a star"), on the other hand, might point to the reflection of light, which flows from the fulness of salvation as from the Lord, notwithstanding the tribulation inflicted upon her nation. Or she might have simply pointed to the hope which the older generation, in the midst of the night of the tribulation of their exile, placed in the younger. This nation stands under the lead and care of the old and serious Mordecai, who perhaps derived his name from the Chaldee god Merodach. But even he desires to conduct himself according to the Jewish laws in the midst of Chaldaea and Persia, though it be at the risk of his life, defying the power of the heathen potentate. Thus as an exile, carried to Chaldaea, he might represent a type of the old generation, which, as it were, had fallen a prey to Merodach, and yet, even in this heathen land, maintained a strong repugnance against heathen morals and laws, and opposed them with an unbending inflexibility. Esther's father, Abihail, i. q., "the man of power and skill," had long since departed. Thus the fathers, to whose freedom and dignity the younger or rising generation would gladly have aspired, was gone. But the real fathers still remained, to whose covenant rights and inheritance a claim might still be laid. Or, if we would be guided by certain analogies in the book of Daniel, we might regard Esther as the image of a guardian angel, who, where the destinies of nations are decided, makes intercession for Israel (comp. Dan. x. 13, 20). Mordecai would then certainly represent the Jews who, above all others, are loyal and trustworthy; and he accordingly shows his loyalty to Ahasuerus, by opposing the scheme to take away the life of that ruler. Haman, on the other hand, i. q., "the one sacrificing to Somao," the son of Hamadatha, as "belonging to the moon," i. e., the chief heathen deity, the Agagite and the Amalekite, would be a type of the principal heathen potentates who hate and seek to destroy the people of God. Vashti's rejection and Esther's acceptance in preference to many others, rather would signify that Israel has long been preferred before other peoples, though this has as yet been a secret to the world. But that Haman comes to power and forthwith designs the destruction of the Jews, would indicate that in spite of the election of Israel the world is still the principal enemy to the kingdom of God. Indeed, this, which might be called, as in the N. T., the anti-Christian world, has dominion over the people of the covenant, as is strikingly evinced in the Jewish exile in contrast with the theocracy. What is stated of Ahasuerus, as being the Lord of the then known world, would remind us of the mode in which Providence seems to govern the world, leaving full liberty to the rulers inimical to God. This ruler is found to be indifferent to the distress of the oppressed and threatened people (comp. chap. iii. 15), indeed he is bound by an irrevocable edict of persecution against the people of God. The troubles of this exile had been inflicted by divine justice and now the question remained how grace could have scope again (comp. Isa. xlix. 24). But grace ever active, makes itself known, and remembers those who are recorded in the great book of life as God's faithful ones. The fall of Haman would then picture forth the removal of Anti-Christ. The destruction of the remaining enemies would shadow forth the overthrow of those who are not actively hostile, but simply not receptive of the kingdom of God. Both would foreshadow the judgment of God in its negative aspect. The conversion of many in Persia (chap. viii. 17) would indicate the conversion of heathen people as the positive side of the divine judgment upon the world. In short the whole would be an allegory, which would teach those who in later times are oppressed, that a higher Power is fighting for Israel; that its bitterest enemies are, by reason of their hostile machinations, the cause of their own destruction; that the faithful ones will yet get the victory, in spite of all their tribulations. This would be a vivid representation of what would come to pass after the sufferings of the exile, by way of contrast, and especially the judgment to be brought about by the coming of the Messiah, and even that which shall yet come at the end of time. Hence many things, which according to the letter of our history, seem low and worldly, indeed repulsive, would, if viewed in this aspect, contain a high religious truth, and our book would be regarded with far greater favor than has hitherto been given it. Every one feels that Esther, Mordecai and Haman have in fact a higher and more general signification. There are, however, many positive traits, which cannot be explained by this allegorical theory. Especially noteworthy is the circumstance that our book at its close (chap. ix. 16), in relating the inauguration of the Feast of Purim, explicitly claims to give real facts. The occurrences which lie at the basis of the story have been apprehended by the author much more clearly than he could have done the future history of the Jews, and yet in such a light as to make them the mirror of grander developments thereafter. The chief persons, of whom he speaks, have as it were gained representative positions, so that at their mention we think also of other persons. But these are not mere pictures, and the material employed is not to be regarded as poetically invented, but as historically given.

Should we even regard the substantial part of the history of Esther as unhistorical, still the question would necessarily arise, how to account for the history of the Feast of Purim. According to 1 Macc. vii. 40 sqq. Judas Maccabæus defeated the Syrian general Nicanor on the 13th Adar, a day before the Feast of Purim, near a place called Adasa, which might possibly be interpreted as Hadassah, "the myrtle." As a memorial of this victory the 13th of the month Adar was to be celebrated annually as a national holiday. The fact that on this occasion the Feast of Purim was not mentioned, has been taken as a proof by J. D. MICHAELIS, that the author of the 1 Maccabees had no knowledge as yet of the Feast of Purim. One might even go farther and assume that the Feast of Purim took its rise from the day of the defeat of Nicanor. The author of the apocryphal additions of our book designates Haman as a Macedonian (comp. § 4), in which case a relation to Nicanor might be established. Certain it is that the day of Nicanor's defeat gradually went over into that of the Feast of Purim.

Although the former is still mentioned in the Mishnic tract Taanith (ch. xii.), also in the Babyl. Talmud (Tannit, seq. 18 b), and in Massachet Sophrim (ch. xvii. 4), yet, according to GRIMM (on 1 Macc. vii. 49), it has not been celebrated as a memorial of Nicanor for at least one thousand years back. For the so-called Feast of Little Purim has nothing at all to do with it; but the latter is merely the usual Feast of Purim, occurring on the 14th and 15th days of the 12th month in a leap year, when the Feast of Great Purim falls on the same days of the 13th month. Still there was required more time for such a metamorphosis, by which a Nicanor was transformed into a Haman, than is thus allowed. Even the author of 2 Macc., according to ch. xv. 36, recognizes Purim as the Μαρδοχαίου ἡμέρα, and he then distinguishes the Feast of Nicanor as quite another. In agreement with him Josephus, in his Ant. xi. 6, 13, also affirms that Purim was celebrated by the Jews of the whole world as a remembrance of the occurrences detailed in our book. Indeed he himself is fully convinced that it was so celebrated since the time of Persia. Haman and Nicanor are entirely different persons, and the deliverances which the Jews enjoyed with respect to them are too different in nature to favor the idea of a transformation of the one into the other.

HITZIG (Gesch. Israels I., p. 280) supposes that Purim had been originally the New Year's Feast of the Persians. They began their year in the Spring, when Purim was celebrated; and in Arabic the New Year is still called Pur. Hence he also takes into account the Persian Purdeghan (Leap-year), to which HAMMER had already referred as being a foundation for the Jewish festival. ZUNZ also (l. c.) thinks that the Jews had appropriated to themselves the Persian Spring-festival which corresponds to the German Christmas festivities. The authorities, not able to abolish this feast, or perhaps unwilling to do so, took care to legitimize it as a day of rejoicing, and hence gave it a Jewish origin and import. HITZIG also assumes further that a fact of the Parthian period first gave the significance of Purim as being that of lot ("loose"); the Parthians of Scythian origin probably had such words as Pur, lot (loose), and Agha whence Haman probably derived his epithet of Agagite (ch. iii. 1); for even they also without a doubt had a Kislar-Agha (comp. ch. ii. 3). But that the custom of celebrating a day of rejoicing in the month of Adar had not only crept in here and there from heathen surroundings, but that it should also have attained to recognition by those who were strict in their national observances, and even with the authorities themselves, is not to be conceived of as possible under the then existing circumstances, unless it took its rise in a historical occasion adequate to account for its adoption into Judaism. Hence the necessity of recognizing the fact which our book relates, as the real foundation, in any case. To suppose that the festival could everywhere have gained currency independently of this basis, would be to confound those ancient times, in which an inflexible opposition to Judaism was predominant, with our modern age, in which this has to a great degree ceased. Besides, the festival of Purdeghan has but little resemblance to that of Purim. The former lasted ten days. The first five were devoted to the memory of the dead, and hence were a season of mourning (comp. HERZFELD, Gesch. Israels, II. 1, p. 183). If HITZIG finds it improbable that the feast of Purim took its name from the casting of lots over Haman, on the ground that the latter retreats out of sight in the history, on the other hand we should consider that the lot of Haman was the voice of God. The day selected for the casting of the lot, if it had brought the destruction of the Jews, would have been the day of the victory of heathen gods over the God of Israel. But since that event did not occur, it became a day of the refutation of the heathen deities, i. e., of the victory and triumph both of Judaism and the Jewish law and God over them.

That such a history is basal to the Feast of Purim, as our book relates it, will always remain by far the most probable view, and hence is maintained in more modern times by such men as BAUMGARTEN (De fide libri Estheræ, 1839), after HAEVERNICK; also by KEIL and J. A. NICKES (De Estheræ libro et ad eum quæ pertinent vaticiniis et Psalmis libri tres, Romæ, 1856). These defend the historical character of our book in its strictness, and are reinforced by STAEHELIN (Spec. Einl. in d. Kan. Büchern. d. A. T.), BERTHEAU, and especially by EWALD (Gesch. Israels, IV., p. 296), who hold our book to be substantially historical.

Several things, which in our present condition seem to us very improbable, could perhaps be easily explained by reference to the peculiar circumstances, customs and usages of the ancient Persian empire, especially from the characteristic traits of Ahasuerus (Xerxes). We do not propose to enter upon this subject, so much for the purpose of directly corroborating the historical character of the book as in order to show that the attacks made against it are very doubtful. If DE WETTE thinks he finds a marked weakness in the narrative in the circumstance that Esther is represented as keeping secret her Jewish descent, not only at ch. ii. 20, where she is chosen queen by the king, but up to the very time of the catastrophe, and that even Haman does not suspect her relation to Mordecai, while the king himself is surprised at her request to be saved (comp. vii. 5); on the other hand we may consider that a great king, such as Xerxes, doubtless was too highly elevated to concern himself about the personal circumstances of his female favorites, and that Haman, in his official relation, had nothing to do with the harem of the king.

But the main fact that Ahasuerus at Haman's request resolved to issue an edict which ordered the destruction of all the Jews in the entire Persian empire, is not without analogy. Mithridates, king of Pontus, in his war against Rome, issued secret orders to all the satraps and chief local authorities of his kingdom, to murder on a certain day all Romans without distinction of sex or age, whereby eighty thousand, or as some estimate, one hundred and fifty thousand persons lost their lives. Mehmed, a pasha of Zaid, in the sixteenth century, surprised the entire nation of the Druses, and caused all that were met with to be killed (ARVIEUX, Merkw. Nachr., I., p. 391). A similar thing occurred also in Europe. At the time of "the Sicilian vespers" there fell eight thousand Frenchmen in Catania alone. Ferdinand the Catholic drove out of Spain over three hundred thousand Jews, and Louis XIV. drove out of France several hundred thousands of Protestants, after causing thousands more to be murdered (comp. ROSENMUELLER, Bibl. Alterth., I., p. 379). The Parisian massacre of St. Bartholomew's night is another specially analogous case. KEIL very justly makes prominent the point in reference to these facts, that Greek and Roman authors are unanimous in their portrait of Xerxes, and paint him as a very riotous, licentious monarch, and an extremely cruel tyrant. The commentator last cited goes on to say: "Xerxes was the despot who, after the wealthy Lydian Pythius had most richly entertained the Persian army in its march against Greece, and offered an immense sum of money as a contribution to the costs of the war, on his making a petition to have the oldest of his five sons then in the army given to him as a solace for his old age, became so enraged that he caused the son asked for to be cut in pieces, and laid the pieces on both sides of the way, and ordered his army to march through between them (HEROD. VII. 37-39; SENECA, De ira VII. 17); the tyrant, who caused the heads of those to be cut off who built the pontoon bridge over the Hellespont, because a storm had destroyed the bridge, and who ordered the sea to be lashed with whips and bound with chains sunk under the waves (HEROD. VII. 35); the debauchee, who after his return from Greece, sought to drown the vexation of his shameful defeat by means of sensuality and revelry (HEROD. IX. 108, 599). Such a frantic tyrant was he as to be capable of all that is related in our book of Ahasuerus." SPIEGEL, in his Iranischen Alterthumskunde (II., p. 402), gives a very mild judgment concerning Xerxes, yet even he says: "There is no question that he fell far behind his predecessors in regard to energy and other capabilities; he seems to have been of a sanguine nature;" and the same writer also proves the great thoughtlessness of that king, especially in his relations to his uncle Artabanus (HEROD. VII. 10, 11, 48, 49), and in regard to Demaratus (HEROD. VII. 101-104).

Haman's publishing of the decree of extermination eleven months previous to the day appointed for the butchery was perhaps less foolish than it would appear to us in our circumstances. Besides it is very questionable whether so short a time as a month would have been sufficient to carry the edict to the remotest parts of the empire, as BERTHEAU seems to suppose. Mordecai, who issued the counter-edict three months later, urged (as is expressly stated in chap. viii. 10-14) the greatest speed. This was done not only to remove the terror of the Jews as soon as possible, but also to prevent any acts of oppression. To us of to-day it would indeed appear as if Haman would have made the destruction of the Jews only the more difficult, if not impossible, by what might seem to us an untimely and hasty publication of his decree. But to a Persian despot his subjects were never out of reach. The Jews might here and there have made an attempt at flight. But this might not have been very unwelcome to Haman, since the goods of the fugitives could have easily been confiscated. To Haman it was a matter of great importance to cause the decree of the king to become very early a fixed irrevocable law; and this doubtless would be attained most certainly by its publication. Besides, it was a gratification to himself to torment those detested Jews long before the blow was to be struck, and especially to let them see that their enemies were deliberate and easy in their preparation for the final blow.

The success of the orders issued by Mordecai, which appears from the statement that, in the various parts of the Persian dominion 75,000 persons perished in their attack on the Jews, will seem less doubtful than it might at first, if we consider the great extent of Persia, reaching from India to Æthiopia. The aggressors might very easily have overestimated the sympathy which they received from their own people and religious associates; and the power of resistance on the part of the Jews might easily have been underestimated. Hence it is not to be wondered at if the former were badly vanquished and perished. The number seventy-five thousand can, of course, be only assumed as an approximation, and the intention of the author may have been influenced to its acceptance by reason of the facts above stated.

The circumstance that Ahasuerus granted a new edict at the request of Esther, in which the Jews resident in Shushan were permitted to continue the massacre on the following day also, even when no new attack was attempted upon them, might be explained by the assumption that, in such a large city there was a great rabble element which had fallen upon the Jews the first day, and which would recommence the conflict after they had come forth from their temporary hiding-places. To such as had begun the conflict, and regarding whom the Jews were on the defensive, this second decree had equal reference. It only permitted them to fulfil what the first edict ordered, (chap. ix. 18).

A favorable opinion is created with regard to the historical veracity of the author, in that he correctly knows and vividly describes the customs and arrangement at the Persian court, in so far as they have interest for him; and that he calls by name those persons who enter into the history portrayed by him, such as courtiers (chapter i. 10), the seven Persian princes (chap. i. 14), the keepers of the women's houses (seraglios) (chap. ii. 8, 14), the chamberlain whom Esther sent out to Mordecai (chap. iv. 5), the wife and ten sons of Haman (chapters vi. 18; ix. 7-9). Further, he makes reference to the annual records of the Medo-Persians, as to the source in which were described, not only the deeds of Ahasuerus, but also Mordecai's greatness and power (chap. x. 2). Of course, a poet should correctly represent the manners and conditions which he would portray; and our author might very properly have been in possession of sufficient learning, or he may have written in a time and place where one could easily and almost intuitively learn about Persian matters. On this account we would naturally expect the absence of vulgar mistakes. Still it was not the habit with the Jewish authors of the last centuries B. C. to distinguish themselves by correct historical knowledge, or by an accurate apprehension of those far-off times. The contrary was of such common occurrence and fault that our book, in this regard, is entitled to the more distinction. It has been asserted that the office of Grand Vizier, such as was held by Haman, and afterwards by Mordecai, was not properly Persian. But ENGER (Zeitschr. d. D. M. 1859, p. 239 ff.) has conclusively shown that the office of vizier really originated and had its development in Persia. To resign the proper functions of government to a favorite, must have been a chief concern to a weakling like Xerxes, who lived only for sensual pleasures. Thus also the Merovingians had their major domus who finally usurped the government and power of the kingdom.

It is especially remarkable that the events related in the narrative can, according to their historical dates, which the author gives, be very appropriately inserted in the rest of the history of Xerxes as given by Greek historians. This is of the greater importance, since the author does not at all refer to previous history. It was in the third year of his reign that Ahasuerus gave the great feast in Shushan, which lasted one hundred and eighty days (one half of a Persian year). According to Herod. vii. 8, Xerxes proclaimed an edict in the third year of his reign, after the termination of his war against Egypt; and in that edict he convoked all the princes of his empire to Shushan, in order to plan the campaign against Greece. Such deliberations were generally accompanied with festivities by the Persian kings (comp. WINER, Realwörterbuch, II., p. 229, and BAUMGARTEN, I., p. 139). Vashti's rejection, therefore, occurred in the third year of Ahasuerus, and soon afterwards the choice of a new queen was made. Yet Esther, according to chap. ii. 16, was chosen near the close of the seventh year; and, according to chap. ii. 19, another assembly of virgins was ordered, from which a further selection was to be made to take the place of Vashti. This remarkable postponement may be explained by the fact that between Ahasuerus' third year and his seventh the time of preparation and the war against Greece intervened. Xerxes returned to Persia in the Spring of his seventh year. Thus his special history becomes, as it were, a commentary for our book.

§ 3. CANONICAL DIGNITY.

It seems as if the canonicity of our book had at first been doubted among the Jews. In the Jerusalem Talmud (Megilloth, lxx. 4) and in the Midrash (Ruth, 45 c.) we find the statement that eighty-five elders, among whom were thirty or more prophets, combated the introduction of the Feast of Purim, though they finally gave it their sanction. It is also intimated that these men were contemporaries of Mordecai. This remark has really nothing to do with the book of Esther as such, but has only reference to the precepts in regard to the fasts, which were ordered by both Esther and Mordecai, (chap. ix. 29-32). Still, to combat the latter would be to indirectly attack the genuineness of our book. Such an opposition to the institution of Purim, however, does not well harmonize with the reverence paid to the book as belonging to the Canon. The opinion of HERZFELD (II. 1, p. 358), that this tradition was a conclusion derived from the statement of chap. ix. 29 merely, from which it was inferred that Mordecai and Esther had written a second time in reference to the introduction of the feast of Purim, is very improbable, as is also his supposition that the number of the elders was taken by mistake from Nehem. viii.—x. grouped together. There are no other oppositions found among the Jews in this regard. Even JOSEPHUS reckoned our book as certainly belonging to the Canon (comp. c. Ap. I. 8); otherwise he would not have made the remark that the history therein described reached down to Artaxerxes, who to him was none other than the Ahasuerus of our book. But the later transactions which took place with reference to the Canon, namely, at the Synod of Jerusalem, A. D. 65, where a determination was called for between the Hillelites and the Shammaites, and also at the Synod at Jamnia, A. D. 90, had reference more especially to Ecclesiastes, and next to the Canticles, and lastly to the book of Ezekiel, which some would have withdrawn from public use, because it seemed to diverge in its legal requirements from those of the Pentateuch. (121). Moreover, our book has been very highly esteemed among the Jews (comp. GRAETZ on Kohleth, Appendix I.), which may easily be seen by its designation as "the Megillah" by eminence. Indeed it has been preferred to the "Kethubim," and even to the "Nebiim," and has finally been placed by the immediate side of the "Torah" itself. MOSES MAIMONIDES thought that in the days of the Messiah all the Nebiim and Kethubim would be abolished; and that only the book of Esther and the Torah, together with the oral law, would be perpetual (comp. CARPZOV, Introd., I., p. 366). This special regard, however, was simply owing to the mournful circumstances under which the Jews learned to value the consolation derived from Haman's destruction and their own victory over their opponents, events to them at the time important and precious. In our book, accordingly, these incidents are given from a nationally limited point of view.

As regards the ancient Christian teachers, MELITO, bishop of Sardes (about 172) does not give the book of Esther in his list of the canonical books. Neither are the Apocrypha nor Pseudo-apocrypha mentioned by him. He was importuned by his Christian brother Onesimus to give him a more specific and correct statement with regard to the number and order of the O. T. books, since he had made researches respecting them in his journey to Palestine. The book of Nehemiah, concerning which he is also silent, he doubtless includes in Esther. But that he should thus have embraced the book of Esther likewise, as belonging to that of Ezra, although he himself never included the one in the other, as was the case with Nehemiah, is not, with EICHHORN, HAEVERNICK, and others, to be supposed (comp. EUSEBIUS, Hist. Eccl., VI. 25). EPIPHANES (died about 402) (in his De mens. et ponder. c. 22, 23), HILARY (in Prol. in Psalm.) and JEROME (in Prol. Gal.) all include Esther in the Canon, but place it at the end. ORIGEN places it after the prophets and Job, which he brings in as the last. EPIPHANIUS places it after the prophets and i. and ii. Ezra. JEROME places it after the other Kethubim, especially after Chronicles and Ezra. HILARY places it after the prophets and Job. ATHANASIUS in his Epist. Test. omits it from the list of the canonical books, and assigns it to the ἀναγνώσκόμενα, i. e., the books to be read before the congregation, which, with him, form a middle class between the canonical and apocryphal books. In the Iambi ad Seleneum written between 350 and 400, it is also omitted; yet the remark is made at the end, "Some add the book of Esther to these." True, the Synopsis (probably by the Alexandrian church and after to ATHANASIUS) remarks that some say that Esther was regarded by the Hebrews as belonging to the Canon; but this also proves that it did not have canonical authority in the Christian church, at least not in that of Alexandria. Still more, JUNILIUS (De partibus legis div., c. 3) writes that in his time (in the sixth century) it was very much doubted whether the book of Esther belonged to the Canon. It was, of course, not the former vacillating treatment of this book by the Jews that caused the opposition of Christians to its reception, but rather its high estimation with the later Jews. Its contents might very easily be objectionable to Christian views and sentiments. This is evinced by LUTHER, if indeed we can justly apply his harsh judgment to the Hebrew book* of Esther. As the passage referred to is somewhat ambiguous, we quote it in the original Latin: "Licet recusare possim jure hunc liberum (Ecclesiasticum), tamen interim recipio, ne cum jactura temporis me involvam disputationi de receptis libris in canone Ebraeorum, quem tu non nihil mordere ac rides, dum Proverbia Solomonis et Canticum (ut scommate ambiguo vocas) amatorum comparas cum libris duobus Esræ, Judith, historia Susannæ et Draconis, Esther, quamvis hunc habeant in canone, dignior omnibus, me judice, qui extra canonem haberetur." [We translate as follows: "Although I might justly reject this book (Ecclesiasticus), yet for the present I admit it, lest with a loss of time I involve myself in the dispute concerning the books received in the canon of the Hebrews, which you not a little attack and deride, while the Proverbs of Solomon and the amatory canticles (as by an ambiguous sneer you call them) you compare with the two books of Ezra, Judith, the history of Susanna and the Dragon, and Esther; though this last they have in their canon, yet it is, in my judgment, more worthy than all the others to be kept out of the canon"]. In his Tischreden (ed. Walch, xxii, p. 268) Luther had also to do with the apocryphal books. He undertook to correct the second book of Maccabees, and he then uttered these words: "I am," said he, "so inimical to this and the book of Esther, that I could wish they did not at all exist; for they are excessively Jewish, and contain many disreputable heathen practices." It is, therefore, not at all improbable that he had reference not so much to the Hebrew, but rather to the Greek book of Esther, which was so greatly corrupted by other additions. Besides, he had just made the remark, "The third book of Esther I will throw into the Elbe. In the fourth book, in which are noted what Esther dreamed, there are many pretty and otherwise very good jests, such as: Wine is strong, the king stronger, women still stronger, but truth is the most powerful of all." Here he doubtless clearly mistook Ezra for Esther, and the fourth book of Ezra for the third (comp. p. 13). It is clear, also, that the apocryphal books were in his mind. The remark that his objection had its ground in the contents of the Hebrew book of Esther, instead of the comparatively innocent apocryphal additions, is opposed by the fact that the second book of Macc., of which he had just spoken, is placed before it. His objection to it seems to have consisted more in the fabulous than in the morally objectionable elements of both books.

What makes us especially suspicious with regard to the canonical dignity of this book is the fact that there is wanting in it the religious patriotic spirit which we find in the other Old Testament historical books. The author makes prominent the attractions of Esther in the eyes of Ahasuerus over all other virgins, and thus she became the guardian genius of her people. If he had written his book after the manner of the older canonical books, we might have reasonably expected that he would first of all speak of her piety. Indeed we should have looked that he would treat of it as the reason why God gave her favor in the king's sight, and that he would regard it as the source of her gracefulness and loveliness. But we find no trace of this. Least of all is there a reference to a joyful confession on her part to Jehovah. But we rather discover that Mordecai shrewdly advises her to keep secret her Judaistic descent from Ahasuerus. And she faithfully follows this injunction. Nor does she point to the Lord as being the Almighty Protector and Avenger of those who do him homage, even when she is compelled, in order to save her people, to declare her Jewish origin to the king. She seems rather to aid her nation, not because it is God's people, but because it is her people.

* In his De servo arb. (ed. Jen. III., p. 182; ed. Erlang. XII., p. 194) LUTHER censures ERASMUS for regarding the book of Ecclesiasticus (Jesus Sirach) as authoritative (canonical), and for placing it on the same level with the book of Proverbs, in contrast with both books of Ezra (doubtless the third and fourth), Judith, the history of Susanna and the Dragon. Hence he fought against degrading the books handed down in the Hebrew Bible as canonical, and placing them on a level with those contained in the Greek Bible, which he afterward cast out as apocryphal. When he furthermore states that in his opinion the book of Esther deserved to be thrown out of the Canon, by this, as CARPZOV remarked (Introd. I., p. 370 sq.), he does not mean the Hebrew but the Greek book of Esther. In other words, he objected to JEROME'S apocryphal additions to the book.

So also, according to our author, Mordecai refuses to bow the knee to Haman. A more ancient author would no doubt have faithfully given a clear and definite religious reason for his conduct. But our author gives it so little space, that most interpreters have misunderstood him. He rather permits us to guess the reason, so to speak, by designating Haman as an Agagite. And of Mordecai he testifies that he braced himself by his Judaism in his conduct. Hence that fact which would, we might imagine, have added the proper interest to the book, and should really have been the soul of it, and would have given it the best dedication—the truth that reverence for man does not militate against the honor due to God, and yet should not be given to those condemned and rejected by God—does not very clearly appear, and indeed might easily be wholly overlooked. The entire proceeding almost assumes the appearance of a common court-intrigue, in which Mordecai would hardly rank higher than his opponent.

As regards the measures taken by Mordecai and Esther for the deliverance of their people, we should naturally have judged that our author ought to have made their necessity more apparent, in order not to be misunderstood in a moral aspect. He should have called especial attention to their necessity for the maintenance of true religion. The first edict of the king against the Jews was irrevocable. Hence the authorities could not be called on for their protection. There remained, therefore, only the one way, namely, for the Jews to assemble and stand for their lives in a common self-defence. This was virtually a war in the time of peace. Still it was forced upon the Jews, and although thus premeditated and organized, it was, under the circumstances, their only available mode of defence. But instead of making prominent the fact that this deplorable conflict could not be avoided, and instead of showing that upon it depended the defence of law and religion, the author speaks only of the honor which Mordecai attained by adopting these measures with the king's sanction. He states that Mordecai passed out from the regal palace dressed in royal apparel, having a large golden crown upon his head, and that the whole city of Shushan, especially the Jews throughout the empire, rejoiced exceedingly (ch. viii. 15-17). Indeed, instead of telling us definitely that only a common defence was intended and permitted against anticipated hostile attacks, he employs the same expressions as when speaking of Haman's edict in ch. iii. 13, namely, the jus talionis. In this edict it was permitted the Jews to destroy, to kill and plunder the whole of the people and country, or whoever should attack them; and they were not even to exempt women and children. The measures thus have the appearance of having been adopted, not as being the only ones at hand, but because they were most agreeable to the Jews. Nor does it appear as if the author had in any wise regretted or disapproved of them, but rather that the joy of Mordecai and of the Jews was shared also by him. He is equally liable to misconstruction as regards the petition of Esther by virtue of which the Jews were permitted to repeat also on the second day the same self-vindication exercised on the first. He contents himself with the satisfaction experienced from the great success which attended the measures of Esther and Mordecai on the first and second day, namely, that in Shushan five hundred fell on the first day, and three hundred on the second (ch. ix. 11-15).

One thing, however, he repeatedly and pointedly makes reference to, namely, that the Jews did not lay hands on the spoil of their enemies (ch. ix. 10, 15, 16). This trait nevertheless can only be regarded as redounding to their honor if all the other transactions had a higher religious import. But if these are to be understood as having merely a common national meaning, they exclude indeed a base covetousness, but do not negative a passionate eagerness and vindictiveness which are but little removed above the desire of gain.

That the Jews should also slay defenceless women and children while attacking the men, and that they did actually kill such a great number as seventy-five thousand persons (ch. ix. 16), was too common a characteristic of ancient warfare, to deserve a specially severe censure. But the author had quite other intentions than to regard the war as being conducted in the interest of higher principles, and as absolutely necessary; indeed he has expressed himself in terms which lead to quite a different conclusion. (Comp. ch. ix. 5: "Thus the Jews smote all their enemies with the stroke of the sword, and slaughter, and destruction, and did what they would unto those that hated them.") His narrative creates quite a different impression and gives greater offence than if he had stated that the Lord had given a great victory to His people, in the course of which seventy-five thousand perished. This might easily have been done in a way and by a connection in which the greatness of the danger and the persecutions of the people of Jehovah would have been strongly manifested.

The satisfaction which the author, together with Mordecai and the Jews, felt we can easily enough excuse, because of the greatness of the defeat of the attacking enemies, inasmuch as they suffered great insults and injuries, of which their heathen enemies were by no means sparing. It was in fact only the natural instinct of a worm, when in danger of having its life trodden out under the march of the peoples of the world, and therefore only escaping with life when its destroyers were themselves destroyed. But the author would have given us a much more satisfactory justification of these things had he designated his own people as the people of Jehovah, in opposition to the heathen as such, instead of terming them Jews merely, of whom one does not anticipate a higher task or even a higher principle.

But with all the foregoing criticisms we have not yet looked at the chief point of the discussion. It is remarkable that we do not even once find mention made of the name of God, much less of Jehovah. If under other circumstances, this would perhaps be something external or accidental; here it is closely connected with the general view of things.*

There seems to obtain another kind of historical portraiture in this book from that of those of the more ancient histories. The latter are very properly called sacred history, because their purpose was to derive the incidents which they describe from God, or from His justice, or yet from His gracious intentions towards man. They also seek to show the bearing of that which has been attained upon the ultimate honor of God. But our book appears to give us a different mode of historical description, in that it takes up the lower facts and things lying nearer, be they causes or aims. We find it nowhere distinctly stated that at the very beginning a higher Power was at play, which finally placed Esther in her high position. In this position she could become the intercessor for her people. This power was likewise manifest later in causing Ahasuerus at the proper time to remember Mordecai, and to reward him. Thus also the great and threatening danger to the Jews was averted, and victory leaned to the side of the people of God in their conflict with their enemies. Nowhere do we discover expressions of religious feelings or thoughts in the persons of whom the author speaks. Even in Mordecai these are not manifest, since he is not a representative of Jehovah-worship; nor yet do those principles appear to have actuated him which his religion would have enjoined him to observe. On the contrary his motives and sentiments are indefinite and scarcely national. It is simply because of his Judaism that he refuses to do reverence to Haman. Neither are any such feelings or thoughts as we might have presumed perceptible in Esther, who, in common with Mordecai, instead of employing the office of prayer for the removal of the danger, brings into requisition the Jewish custom of fasting. Certainly Mordecai expresses a firm assurance that help would come to the Jews from some source; but it would hardly do to suppose that he thought of God, when in ch. iv. 14 he expects deliverance even if Esther should not venture to petition the king. He might easily have meant another human person instead of Esther, who would have taken her place. There is never a mention made of prayer, pressing as were the occasion and circumstances that justify our expectation of its employment.

* Even the rabbins took notice of this fact, and sought an explanation for it. Comp. what AUGUST PFEIFFER has written with reference to the canonicity of the book of Esther and its programme. ARNOLD EXER held that Mordecai, being the author of the book, had purposely expunged the names of God in it, in order that they might not be desecrated by the Persians, if they made use of them.

Now it is very necessary for a correct estimation of our book to place the above-cited phenomena in their proper light. Without doubt we would do great injustice to the author if we were to hold him to be religiously indifferent or entirely irreligious because of his non-religious mode of statement. To a man enthusiastic for Judaism and Judaistic law, irreligious feelings are hardly possible. Even if his enthusiasm had been pre-eminently national, so that in his eyes Esther, Mordecai and the Jewish nation, in short all that was Jewish, deserved, as such, preference and distinction, it would still have shown some religious side. This would have been nationally religious, since it would have based itself on the preference of Israel on the part of God. Even though it would have led to a certain religious externality, in which a more intimate relation to God would not have been possible, this would not exclude the fact that the name of God would have received mention now and then. The reason why our book is silent with respect to God demands another explanation. The subject of which the author treats points to the preference or choice of Israel on the part of God. The fact of his belief in the continuance of Israel, as it is expressed by Mordecai, is proved too plainly and definitely for him to have placed no meaning or merit in it. We may add to this, that the rule of a higher providential Power, although nowhere noticed particularly as such, is nevertheless sufficiently expressed, both in the entire plan of the book and in the facts themselves.

If we regard Haman as representing the enemies of the people of God and thus as carrying out their plans of destruction against Israel; if in Mordecai and the Jews the people of true religion as such suffered; if in Ahasuerus the higher government of the world was awake, and if in Esther the good Spirit, which ever watched over Israel, brought his petitions before the throne of the highest decisive tribunal; if the battle of the Jews against the Persians is the conflict of the oppressed and deeply humiliated kingdom of God against heathendom, and if the destruction of these enemies is the removal of all that is unimpressible, and past improvement, and is the means by which the true happiness of mankind is to be prepared,—in short, if the author intended to speak in such far-reaching pictures rather than to write history, then a sufficient explanation is discovered of his seemingly irreligious tendency and of this parabolic method. What would otherwise appear as having no reference to religion, would then be full of the religious element. It would be like a N. T. parable, where there is no express reference to God and His kingdom, since the higher is the lower. We may, indeed, be compelled to admit that the intention of the author is not clear; nor do we plainly see how far the author has sought to employ this parabolic mode of statement. Whether or not he intended to make these representative persons transparently illuminated types, cannot be certainly known. But this much may possibly be affirmed, indeed it can be proved, that he is in this religious aspect reticent, because he desires to call in the attention of the reader,—to point out, as from afar, what was yet to come—and also to bring into requisition the expanding, even advisory activity of the reader, since he seems to have thought he could thus write the more appropriately and advantageously.

A similar phenomenon, and one which is entirely appropriate as yielding the proper explanation, is found in the first Book of Maccabees. In it the mode of writing history is not that of the more ancient authors, any more than in our book. "One nowhere reads how God had awakened or directed the hearts and minds in this sacred warfare for the faith, as one can still find in the books of Ezra or Nehemiah (Ezra viii. 31; Neh. ii. 8, 12, 20; iv. 9; vii. 5). Of none of the heroes arising in this war is it said that he was inspired by the Spirit of God. According to chap. xiii. 7 the spirit of the people again revived, but the people was not influenced by the Spirit of God. It would almost seem as if the author had lost sight of the fact that the immediate indwelling and governing presence of Jehovah in and among His peculiar people, was essential to the Hebraistic conception." (GRIMM on 1 Macc. p. xviii.). As in the books of Ezra and Nehemiah we miss that theocratic pragmatism which throws a supernatural illumination over the events transpiring, the same can be much more truly affirmed of the first book of Maccabees. In like manner with the author of our book, the writer of that history also avoids the mention of the name of God, and it is not found even once, whether by the term θεός or κύριος. Those passages of several of the editions of the Alexandrian text, which have θεός, (chap. iii. 18; iv. 24; vii. 37, 41), are, as GRIMM also holds, critically more than doubtful (comp. ROSENTHAL, Das 1 Macc.-Buch, eine historische und sprachlich-kritische Studie, Leip. 1867). Still the religious spirit, though it be peculiar, is present in that book. It is also clear that it is more than mere enthusiasm for the law and legal sentiment as to the mode of worship, etc. The faith is just as important to the author as is the faithfulness to law. In him, too, we find the designation of the people as the people of the faith (Macc. iii. 13; ii. 59, 61, etc.). In distinction from our author, however, he frequently reveals to us the fact that his heroes pray. His reference to God is at times so manifest that Luther did not hesitate to add the name of God, even where the author speaks very indefinitely of the law, or covenant, or of a will in heaven; and where it is unquestionable that God's law, covenant or will is meant (1 Macc. ii. 21; 54; iii. 60).

This spirit is further seen in the apocryphal book in question not only in such expressions as: ὁ θεός ἡμῶν καταλείπειν, etc. ("God forbid that we should forsake," chap. ii. 21), but also when the author says that they cried (to God) in prayer (chap. v. 33, etc.). This is especially true of the language and prayers of his heroes, who, though zealous for the law and the faith, are still prevented from calling God by name. Judas says: "Victory (strength) cometh from heaven" (chap. iii. 19). And still speaking of heaven he says: "Ho (αὐτός), (the Lord) Himself will overthrow them" (chap. iii. 22). Again: "Let us cry to heaven" (chap. iv. 10), "if peradventure He (the Lord) will have mercy upon us." Of their victories it is even said that, "they turned back and praised (the Lord) heaven that He (the Lord) had been good, and His mercy endureth for ever" (chap. iv. 24).

From this comparison of the books of Maccabees we arrive at the following explanation with reference to the matter in question: The naïve and direct piety of former times, being devoid of reflection, gradually give way to a different state during the exile. The Jews were in that age very sensitive not to manifest their innermost and holiest thoughts to the gaze of day, after the manner of their forefathers. It was a great satisfaction to the Jewish national feeling, groaning under oppression and opposed to heathenism, to know that the secrets of their faith and law were well known and understood by themselves without having to enter expressly upon a declaration of them; and also that these were unknown and unattainable by the heathen. The more general the fidelity to the law and the faith of the fathers became, at least externally, the more they took courage. The more apparent the contrast became between heathenism and Judaism,—which was however gradually lost by their political dependence, their political character, also being thus effaced,—the more the characteristics of their religion shone forth. Indeed, the Jews were henceforth persecuted only because of their laws and faith, in a word, their being different from their captors. Hence it was quite natural that the Jews, as such, should feel themselves to be the people of the true God, before all others. So it was also with the author, who represented them as being in this exalted relation, without even distinctly so expressing himself. To all this was added the progressive spiritualizing of God, which had previously reached a high stage in the prophetic times. This was now carried to a still higher pitch of development. Hence, those modes of anthropomorphism and anthropopathism, which before were a necessity of the more vital piety, were now avoided. Thus in bringing out the exalted character of God, as being above the creature, His transcendental character was brought into greater prominence, and His imminence was more and more kept out of sight. It is well known that the name Jehovah was entirely withdrawn from usage, as being too holy. We might very easily suppose that God Himself was held to be too holy and exalted to be much spoken of, even in divine worship. But once having entered upon this tendency of mind, a further step was not difficult of execution. Some, as our author, would not even mention in a general way the influence of a higher power, while others, as the author of 1 Maccabees, contented themselves with a little less reserve.

It is doubtless true that such a tendency had its great dangers. While the Old Testament theism, being faith in a living God, active in the development of the world and of mankind, held the proper middle ground between pantheism and deism, by believing in an ever-present real divine Spirit, it gradually and unmistakably leaned over to deism, in strong contrast with pantheistic heathendom. We thus have it exhibited to us in the Apocrypha. There, in place of the living immanent Spirit of God, we have the transcendental νοῦς or the abstract νοῦς. Hence a childlike trust in God and a true moral fear of God, had no more a proper place. Indeed it went still farther and degenerated into an abstract one-sidedness. Of this we have an example in later Judaism as opposed to Christianity. This also characterizes Mohamedanism. By cherishing such a worldly and materialistic spirit which ignores God, is very apt to grow more and more inveterate, as was especially manifest in Israel in later times.

Still, we must not suppose that this tendency had in the time of the present author proceeded to such a length; it was as yet but the normal development of the people of Israel. In its proper limits, and proceeding from a good foundation, it had a worthy aim. This was first of all to bring to general recognition the religious element as something self-evident and elevated above all exposition. Our author does not really intend to lose out of sight the mysteries of the faith and law. He rather presupposes them as self-evident. This is apparently from the circumstance that he not only represents the history of which he treats as being decidedly providential in its development, but also from the manner in which he gives the reason why Mordecai refused to bow the knee. So also in respect to the time in which the edict of Haman was published, and which should prove so destructive to the Jews (it was during the time of their Paschal festival), he is very indefinite, simply indicating it. Again we may note how he causes Mordecai to speak so indefinitely and yet in a manner so easily understood with reference to the help that would certainly come to the Jews. So also Esther is urged to take refuge in fasting which is almost inseparable from prayer, instead of praying at once as the nearest remedy at hand. The feeling arises in us on reading these passages, that he thought far more than he said, and that his silence has its ground in something quite different from infidelity.

Besides, the style of our book is most appropriate to its contents. Indeed we can readily recognize a divine providence in the fact, that just such a style and not a more religious one should have been employed. The deliverance of the Jewish people within the Persian dominions, which forms its subject was, of course, in itself a great and important event. But this was not brought about by a divinely-inspired hero, nor yet by the faithful valor of the people, but through the influence which a woman exerted over the king. In how different a manner will the soldiers (combatants) of the kingdom of God gain the victory in the future time of decision! Not through the charms of flesh, but by the Spirit and living energy of the Lord. Not by means of a forcible uniting and a bloody massacre, but by a willing submission. Instead of destroying others, they rather endure the utmost injury. It is in this succumbing that the highest power and glory is revealed; not in persecuting but in blessing! The plot is wrought out according to a human method. To have regarded the representative character of the persons and events described as being after the earthly type, and yet to have exalted them to a higher and holier tone, by which they would be brought into an immediate relation to God, would have created a discord. This would hardly have satisfied or edified the religious sentiment, but rather would have been a cause of irritation.

Certain it is, that although our book does not expressly take notice of and cultivate religion as such, still it forms a very essential part of the religious history of the kingdom of God. We were early reminded, in the introduction to the books of Ezra and Nehemiah, § 1, that the Diaspora remaining in heathen countries was by no means a rejected branch of the people of the covenant, but rather that it had a very important purpose to fulfil as regards the final accomplishment of the mission of Israel. This was clearly seen in the apostolic-Christian period. Hence the preservation of the despised Jews might very easily have become just as important as was the new founding of the people in Judæa and Jerusalem. Our book has to do with the preservation of this Diaspora, which, conditioned by peculiar circumstances, had taken on a low form, because living in a heathen world. But this in its deeper aspect still continued to be a part of the history of God's kingdom. It was an act of God by which He confessed Himself to this people as to His own peculiar people, and drew it up to Himself as its God. In addition to this the book is not only evidence that there is a just government of the world—that he who digs a pit for another will fall into it himself—that the enemies of the elect people are destroyed because of their enmity; but it also teaches, if we rightly understand it, the very simple and yet difficult duty of placing God's honor above that of man, and God's cause above the interest of man. At least it encourages us so to do. It represents to us the conflict into which the God-fearing man, as also the whole people (or church) may be plunged, in the execution of that duty. When the State is no more guided by divine principles, and as such is no more either theocratic or Christian, but purely human and heathen, this book points to the victory which the true people will in some way or other continue to obtain.

If we place this book, having such an important message, by the side of both the other post-exilic books as regards Judaism, namely Ezra and Nehemiah, it clearly testifies, as do also those, that the people of God, conceived as a religious society, can exist without having political independence, and fulfil their final destiny. But it shows also that they could maintain their integrity, even if separated and scattered. This is a truth which nowhere else finds such definite expression, but yet it forms the basis of existence for the most of the Israelites during all the following periods of time. Hence, also, the peculiar reverence paid to our book in preference to others by later Judaism. And this is not from any pathologically unsound cause. It rests not upon a passion aroused by the inimical and oppressive acts of other people, but it can be justified by a genuine religious reason. In so far as it celebrates the victory of the divine law over the world, and reveals its inviolableness in this new and distinct method, thus becoming an indispensable support of the Torah, it justifies the remarkable manner of its statement, as MAIMONIDES and later writers have fully shown. In so far as it teaches that the glory of God is pre-eminent over that of man, that those who refuse to honor man lest they deprive God of His due regard will not fail to receive their reward from God; in so far must Esther be to us indeed a star which leads us to battle on faithfully and courageously, should the State seek to put forth its power and endeavor to enter the religious domain in too absolute a manner.

If the canonical merit of the Old-Testament books consists to a great extent in the fact of their passing beyond the bounds of their own nation; if they have a more general relation, on account of which they are closely related to the cosmopolitan New Testament, still we must not forget that the national tendency of our author had not yet reached this point. He had not attained to that sense of superiority and contrast which ultimately made the Jews jealous of the communication that was given to them for transmission to other nations. He was at least indifferent to the weal or salvation of others, and even sought to obtain advantage over them, and to injure them. He does not reveal any timidity, such as we find in the book of Judith, where Nebuchadnezzar is degraded far below Ahasuerus. There, however, the Jews appear in a far more ideal light.

Thus in ch. viii. 17 he gives prominence to the fact that many of the people of the land—even though incited by fear—were converted over to Judaism; and he thereby indicates that, in addition to the negative effect, which for the purpose in hand he is necessitated to notice, this judgment of God over the world had also a decidedly positive result, namely, the reception among His people of heathen subject to His influence. The writer also recognizes in the great ruler noticed in this book a capacity to appreciate Judaism and its representatives to some extent at least. So also among the majority of the heathen populace he indicates a sense of justice and humanity which did not suffer them to rejoice at the promulgation of the first unrighteous decree for the extermination of the Jews, but on the contrary he shows that they were exceedingly glad because of the second favorable edict. He seems to be impressed with the fact that they have both the inclination and the capacity at some time to arrive at a knowledge of the true God, and for his part he would gladly leave the door open for them.

[Excursus on the Liturgical Use of the Book of Esther.]

[BY THE AMERICAN REVIEWER.]

[It is well known that this book is a favorite with the Jews, by whom it is often entitled המגילה, the Roll, by way of distinction from all others; and it is more frequently used in a separate form than any other of the sacred books. The extravagant estimate of the Rabbins is well represented by the saying of MAIMONIDES, above alluded to, that in the days of the Messiah all the books of the Old Testament will pass away, except the Pentateuch and Esther. This fondness for the book in question has doubtless arisen from the fact that it so highly gratifies the Jewish national pride.

The Feast of Purim (פּוּרִים, lots, so called from the fact stated in chap. ix. 26-32) is a standing memorial of the historical character of this book. As we have seen, it has been commemorated even since the days of the writer of the second book of Maccabees (xv. 36—the "Mordecai's day"—ἡ Μορδαχαϊκὴ ἡμέρα). The festival was so popular in the time of JOSEPHUS that he tells us: "Even now all the Jews that are in the habitable earth keep these days festivals, and send portions to one another" (Antiq. XI. 6, 13). That popularity has not diminished since. It has even been maintained by many (PETAIVUS, OLSHAUSEN, STIER, WIESELER, WINER, ANGER, ALFORD, ELLICOTT, etc., after a suggestion by KEPLER) that our Lord observed this festival (ἐορτὴ τῶν Ἰουδαίων, John v. 1); but the absence of the Greek article there is not at all decisive (as WINER himself admits, Gramm. of N. T. Idioms, MAYER'S Ed., p. 125), and there are very great objections to the identification of the "feast" in question with that of Purim, especially the fact that the parallel gospels show that the one which our Lord at that time attended was during the harvest-season (Matt. xii. 1; Mark ii. 22; Luke vi. 1).

Among the modern Jews the festival of Purim is regularly held on two days, the 14th and 15th of Adar, the last month of the year, corresponding to our March in general. In intercalary years it is repeated in full on the same days of the 13th month, Ve-adar. A preliminary fast, called "the fast of Esther," is appointed to be observed on the 13th day, in accordance with the command of Esther (iv. 5, 6); and sundry prayers of repentance, humiliation, etc. (סליחות) are introduced into the regular ritual for that day. As on all the fast days, the lesson from the Law consists of Exod. xxxii. 11-14; xxxiv. 1-11; and that from the Prophets of Isa. lv. 6—lvi. 9. If the 13th of Adar falls on a Sabbath, the fast takes place on the Thursday preceding, as no fasting is allowed on that sacred day, and it could not be held on Friday, because those engaged in preparing food for the Sabbath would necessarily have to taste the dishes to try them, or at least would be occupied in the labor connected with that preparatory day. If the 14th happened to fall on a Sabbath, or on Monday, or Wednesday, the commencement of the festival is deferred for similar reasons of convenience till the next day. On the evening closing the 13th and beginning the 14th, as soon as the stars appear, candles are lighted in token of rejoicing, and the people assemble in the synagogues. After the usual evening service, consisting of prayer and thanksgiving, the entire book of Esther is read through by the prælector from a roll written separately in Hebrew characters on good parchment with ink (Mishna, Megillah, II. 2). Any one is qualified to read it, except deaf people, fools and minors (ibid. II. 4), and it is lawful to read it in a foreign language to those who can only so understand it (ibid. II. 1). The prælector reads it in a histrionic manner, suiting his tones and gestures to the changes in the subject matter. Whenever he comes to the name of Haman, the congregation stamp on the floor and cry out: "Let his name be blotted out! The name of the wicked shall rot!" At the same time, in some places, the boys who are present make a great noise with their hands, with mallets, with rattles, and with pieces of wood and stone, on which they had written the name of Haman, and which they rubbed together so as to obliterate the writing. The passage in which the names of Haman's ten sons occur (ix. 7-9) is read very rapidly, and, if possible, in one breath, to signify that they were all hung at the same time. For this reason that passage is written in larger letters, and the names are arranged under one another. The tradition is that the names are written in three perpendicular columns to represent the hanging of Haman and his sons upon three parallel cords, three upon each cord, one above another (STAEHELIN, Rabbini. Literat., II. 349). The Targum on Esth. in WALTON'S Polyglott (ad loc.), however, states that they all hung on the gallows in one line, Haman at the top, and his ten sons at intervals of half a cubit under him. It is added that Zeresh and Haman's seventy surviving sons fled, and begged their bread from door to door (in evident allusion to Psalms cix. 9, 10). After the roll is finished, the reader dismisses the congregation with a short benediction. All go home and partake of a repast said to consist of milk and eggs.

On the morning of the 14th, the proper feast-day, the Jews again attend the synagogue, where several appointed prayers are added to the usual daily ritual, and instead of the regular lesson, the passage is read from the law (Exod. xvii. 8-16) which relates the destruction of the Amalekites, the people of Agag (1 Sam. xv. 8), the supposed ancestors of Haman (Esth. iii. 1). This is read by three persons—a priest, a Levite, and an Israelite. After this the roll of Esther is read through again in the same manner, and with the same responses as on the preceding evening. All who possibly can are bound to hear it read—men, women, children, cripples, invalids, and even idiots—though they may, if they please, listen to it outside the synagogue (Mishna, Rosh ha-Shanah, III. 7). When the service in the synagogue is over, all give themselves up to merry-making. Games of all sorts, with dancing and music, begin. The rest of the day is spent in feasting and rejoicing. Open house is kept; poor and rich, young and old, have free access to come and enjoy themselves. In the evening a quaint dramatic entertainment is often held, the subject of which is connected with the occasion. The men sometimes put on female apparel, declaring that the feast of Purim (Esth. ix. 22) suspends the rule in Deut. xxii. 5. A dainty meal then follows, sometimes with a free indulgence of wine, which the Rabbins allow on this occasion to the extent of absolute intoxication (Gemara on Megillah, VII. 2).

On the 15th day of Adar the rejoicing is continued, and gifts consisting chiefly of sweetmeats and other eatables are interchanged. Offerings for the poor are also made by all who can afford to do so (Esth. ix. 19, 22). See GINSBURG, in KITTO'S Cyclopædia, s. v. Purim; CLARK, in SMITH'S Dictionary of the Bible, s. v. Purim; SHICKART, in the Critici Sacri, III., 1184; MILLS, British Jews, p. 188; ESKUCHE, De festo Judæorum Purim, Marburg (1734, 4to.); AXENFELD, על פורים Betrachtung, etc. (Erlang., 1807).]

§ 4. COMPOSITION, TIME OF ORIGIN AND INTEGRITY.

The discussion respecting the author of this book had to be reserved until after the preceding questions had been determined, inasmuch as an answer to it would otherwise have been only of the most uncertain kind. Nor could we have hoped, by the solution of this point, to throw much light on the historical character of the book, or its canonical dignity. In chap. ix. 20 it is stated that: "Mordecai wrote these things, and sent letters unto all the Jews;" in verse 23, "The Jews undertook to do . . . as Mordecai had written to them;" and in verse 26, "Therefore for all the words of this letter." We are not, hence, to conclude that our book was written by Mordecai, nor that it is so claimed, but that the author had knowledge of such writings referable to Mordecai himself, with respect to Purim, and also that he made use of them. In the rest of the book we are at a loss for even a hint in regard to the person of our author. Even as relates to the locality where it was written we are in great uncertainty. Still the unusual familiarity which it evinces with Persian matters, which is in strong and remarkable contrast with the ignorance of later apocryphal books, and especially its total lack of allusion to Judæa or Jerusalem, makes it very probable that the author did not belong to the parent body in Palestine, but to the Diaspora in Asia. According to the Talmud (Baba Bathra, p. 15, c. 1), the book of Esther belonged to those (Ezekiel, the twelve lesser prophets, Daniel and Esther) which were written by the scribes of the Great Synagogue. But it is evident that this tradition has reference not so much to its composition as to its authoritativeness, a final editorial supervision. In the same sense the Talmud speaks of Hezekiah and his college, that they wrote Isaiah, Proverbs, Canticles, and Ecclesiastes.

As regards the time of the origin of our book, we are told by ZUNZ (Zeitschr. d. D. M. G., 1873, p. 687) that among other results obtained, he not only finds in it Persian and later Hebrew expressions, but also some terms derived from the Mishna. He assumes that the composition of Esther belongs to the post-Maccabæan period, in which the knowledge of the persecutions in Palestine had reached the Eastern countries. But he has cited only a very few expressions "which remind us of the linguistic usage of the Mishna," viz.: עָבַר with and without מַצִּית, in the sense of "transgressing" from (chap. iii. 8; ix. 27, 28), עָלָה יֵס טֹב (chap. ix. 19) and יָבֵה רָאִי (chap. ix. 26), expressions which equally belong to the ante-Maccabæan period, and to the later age. Certain it is that our book belongs to the last written (youngest) in the Canon. In its language it stands nearest to Ecclesiastes, after that to Ezra, Nehemiah, and the book of Daniel. It has three later words, in common with Ecclesiastes, (זמן, בִּקְשָׁה, בִּירוֹה) as well as with Ezra, Nehemiah, and 1 Chron., and שָׁלַט in common with Ecclesiastes and also with Nehemiah and the 119th Psalm. Five expressions are in common with Eccles. only (וּבְכֵן, וְעַתָּה, וְעַתָּה, וְעַתָּה, וְעַתָּה). The entire method or style, so far as it deviates from the mode of old and sacred historical composition, and approaches that of the 1

Book of Macc., and especially where the author endeavors to preserve an artistic and fascinating mode of development, would clearly show that he had already past one era of progress, such as had not yet shown itself in the time of Ezra or Nehemiah, or at least first began in the age of those writers to break a way for itself. This fact also appears from the manner in which the author treats or rather neglects to treat of the relation which Judaism bears to heathenism, namely, its religious element, and more particularly in his non-reference to God and the divine government. Perhaps, in the period in which he wrote, the Greek age was near at hand or had already come. This would agree with the reference of Ahasuerus to Xerxes, whose position in ancient history is well defined. Still we must not insist too much on this feature, lest we come into conflict with the authorship of the Greek manuscripts and the consequent age of the Greek translation of the book.

The subscription to these Greek copies, which may have been added later, and has the air of being based upon an invention or supposition, relates that a certain Dositheus had brought to Egypt, in the fourth year of the reign of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, a translation of this epistle of Purim (i. e., of our book of Esther, perhaps without the apocryphal additions), prepared by Lysimachus in Jerusalem. Among the four kings of the name of Ptolemy, who had queens named Cleopatra (B. C. 204–81), the one above-mentioned was probably Ptolemy Philometor, in whose reign, which was so friendly to the Jews (B. C. 181–145), the feast of Purim, and therefore also our book, might most readily find entrance into Egypt (comp. FRITZSCHE, Exeg. Handbuch zu den Apokr., I, p. 72sq.). It also says that there was a translation of Esther as early as the first half of the second century before Christ. Were we to conclude from 1 Macc. vii. 49, where the festival of Purim is not mentioned on the occasion of the celebration of the day of Nicanor the day previous, that the festival of Purim and the book of Purim had not found an earlier and more general recognition in Palestine than it did in Egypt so that at the time of the Maccabees it was not even known, still there would be nothing strange or contradictory in such an assumption. Nevertheless we could not reach any conclusion from this with respect to the time of the origin of our book. The Jews in Palestine were not threatened by the occurrences related in Esther, nor did the danger to the Jews there mentioned, or the defeat they brought upon their enemies, have much to do with their existence in that country. No inimical heathen people lived among the Palestinian Jews, to rise against them, or cause them to perish. Neighboring nations could only have shown their enmity by means of an invasion, which would not have differed greatly from an ordinary war (comp. HERZFELD, Gesch. Israels, II. 1, p. 8). Hence there was no immediate occasion for a festival of Purim for them. At all events such a conclusion as a mere argumentum e silentio would be very hazardous. It may not be improbable, indeed, that the day of the defeat of Nicanor, so far as we know concerning it (comp. § 2), might have been similar to our more modern days of battles and victories; and although at first there was a purpose of celebrating it annually, as a festival day, yet after several times, at last its memory became obliterated and it was forgotten by the majority. Hence the author of the 1st book of Maccabees had no real occasion to bring it into any relation to the day of Purim which came a day after.

Finally, we come to the question of the integrity of our book. If we hold fast to the Hebrew text, we will find that, as we have seen above (comp. chap. i. 9, 19; x.), it forms a beautifully arranged and greatly progressive whole, in which every individual part furnishes an integral and indispensable portion, and in which nothing essential is found wanting. But the case is very different in the second half of chapter ix. J. D. MICHAELIS asserts the beginning of this latter section to be the seventeenth verse, but BERTHEAU holds it to begin at vers. 20–32, in which reference is made to a letter by Mordecai to the Jews, and some of its contents are brought to light. Even the style of expression of this part is in unmistakable contrast with the rest of the book. מִשְׁפָּט, in the sense of “establishing ordinances” or “making them authoritative,” in verses 21, 27, 29, 31, and 32 (elsewhere only in Ruth iv. 7; Ezek. xiii. 6; Psa. cxix. 28, 106); the singular immediately preceding the plural of the subject, as in ver. 23 (וְהָיָה הַיּוֹם); the fem. substantive in a neuter sense, as in ver. 25 (וְהָיָה הַיּוֹם); further the mode of speech עַם-דַּפְּפָר (ver. 25), וַיְכַדְרָא (ver. 26), etc., all this does not again occur in the rest of the book. To this we are also to add matters of fact. The short report which is given in vers. 24-26 concerning the occasion and significance of the festival of Purim, sounds quite different from what we would be led to expect from the previously given history. It is especially remarkable that no mention is made of Esther's interference. But it rather seems according to ver. 25 ("and when it came before the king he commanded by letters") as if the king had before been ignorant of the intention of Haman, at least with its real import, and only needed to be more fully informed with regard to it; and that he then at once proceeded against Haman. One would think that the author would have apprehended the chief facts at issue quite differently, if he himself there gave their resumé. This resumé seems to be based upon a mode of statement by which many things that appear essential and important, are treated as of less significance, or are entirely omitted. Now we would not venture to assert, as does BERTHEAU, that the method of statement, lying at the basis, was in such flat contradiction to the substance of our book. We can easily conceive that the author may have differently presented the leading events in different parts of his work. Certainly the resumé of vers. 24-26 falls far short of proving the contrary. Again between verses 15-19 on the one hand, in which a part of the Jews celebrate the 15th of Adar on the 14th, even in the author's time; and vers. 20 sqq., on the other hand, where the celebration of both days is introduced through the writings of Mordecai, a contradiction is very unjustly urged by BERTHEAU (comp. chap. ix. 19).

We may presume from the peculiarities found in the section verses 20-32 there is contained in it an element more fundamental than elsewhere. Yet we have no right to argue from the absence of all real contradictions that the author had himself expunged them.—According to verse 20 there did exist a book of Purim referable to Mordecai. Perhaps the same one is meant in verse 32, by the writing in which the orders of Esther were recorded. It is quite possible that from it our author should have taken this section extending from vers. 20 to 32.

But next to the original text we must have regard to the older versions. In the Septuagint version there are several additions, which Luther threw out as being "apocryphal parts in Esther." But these are so interwoven into the text of the Greek Bible that they could easily be held to be integral parts of the book. Thus, to begin with, there is in chap. i. a dream of Mordecai, in which are indicated the most important phases of the subsequent history. In chap. iii. we find an edict by Ahasuerus ordering the extermination of the Jews. In chap. iv. there is a prayer by Mordecai, and also one by Esther, which they offered in their distress. Chap. v. has an explicit description of the appearance of Esther before Ahasuerus. Finally in chap. viii. 13 we find the new edict, issued by Mordecai, favoring the Jews, and as a conclusion of the whole an interpretation of the dream that had been indicated in chap. i.

Now the question is, What are we to think of these expansions? The assumption of BELLARMINE (De verbo Dei, chap. vii., § 10) and of DE ROSSI (Specimen variarum lectionum s. textus et Chaldaica Esteris additamenta, Romæ, 1782), to whom SCHOLZ may also be added (Introd., II., p. 538 sqq.), is that, originally, there were two books of Esther in existence; a larger one, from which these additions of the Greek version were taken, and a smaller, which was perhaps only an extract of the former. That the latter, however, should be regarded as our present Hebrew book, is not to-day held by any one. Equally untenable is the position taken by JOS. LANGEN, that the passages referred to were taken from Mordecai's "memoirs" (comp. ch. ix. 29 sqq.), or even from the annals of the king of Persia (comp. chap. ii. 23; vi. 1). See LANGEN, Die deutero-canonicalen Stücke des Buches Esther, Freiburg, 1862). The hypotheses in question were only originated to defend the canonicity of these additions decreed by the Council of Trent. A second, more enlarged book of Esther, whose expansion has been gratuitously assumed, but which was not regarded worthy of preservation, is nothing more than a wilful and highly improbable fiction, as indeed is virtually conceded by LANGEN. But as to these additions themselves, which according to LANGEN still have documentary value, we would call attention to the following considerations:

- (1) The dream of Mordecai stands in such a slight connection with the rest of the history that its very presence declares it a useless and unessential work. In order that it might not appear too isolated, its author has connected it with the discovery of the conspiracy of the two court officials, as if this were the first and the chief point of the general history, especially of the enmity of Haman against Mordecai. But thereby he becomes involved in contradictions with the original book, as is evident in departures from the latter traceable in the additions. For example, it is stated that Mordecai had his dream in the second year of the reign of Artaxerxes (Achashverosh). Consequently he must then also have discovered the conspiracy. But according to chap. ii. 21 sqq. these court officers entered into a conspiracy after the elevation of Esther. It must, therefore, have been in the seventh year of the reign of the king. Again Mordecai is represented as having already received some presents, by which the jealousy of Haman was intensified; whereas in chap. vi. 3 it is stated that he had not yet been rewarded. But what makes the whole account very suspicious is that the contents of our book would be materially altered and weakened by this incentive to the hostility of Haman towards Mordecai. The conflict between heathenism and Judaism, as such, would be transformed into an ordinary contest between two rival aspirants.

(2) These additions contrast so strongly in their spirit and tone with the genuine book of Esther, that we are obliged to look for their origin elsewhere. The religious element, which in the real book of Esther is so rarely manifested, is in them very decidedly, we might say extravagantly, expressed—so much so that we could properly accuse them of a species of hypocrisy.

(3) Even the diction makes it clearly probable that the passages referred to were originally written in Greek. Thus the circumstance speaks against them, that where the conference between Esther and the king is related, they have a strong Græcizing, and even an Alexandrine romantic character; which, according to EWALD, reminds us very forcibly of the 2d book of Maccabees. So also the notorious fact, that for a long time they were accepted by the Jews who spoke Greek, but not by the others, at least not by the authors of the Targums. In keeping with their Greek-Alexandrine origin, is the peculiarity that the author of these additions in several places designates Haman as being a Macedonian (Μακεδών) instead of an Agagite. This is done, doubtless, to make the epithet intelligible to his own vicinity and age, as that of an enemy of the Jewish people (in accordance with the text yet to be referred to, but which is rarely found at the end of the first addition; and also according to the edict interpolated at chap. viii. 13, as well as chap. ix. 24, where no tampering hand would be likely to be traced).

Doubtless we here have only embellishments, which some one has permitted himself to add, on the ground of tradition, or through his own poetic fancy. The comfort which the book gave was too desirable for it to wait long to become a favorite book with the people. They might indeed, perhaps, have felt the absence of the religious element. But, as has already been remarked, the Jewish community did not stand in such a receptive attitude towards those books written later, as towards the older sacred writings, which for some time previous had received a closed form. Yet they infallibly detected these suspicious passages by the interrupting of the general scope of the work by the conjectures thereby made by the mention of edicts that were decreed, as if those missing things should be added to complete the narrative. Indeed some one had evidently felt called upon, at these interesting points of detail, to expand the narrative occasionally. But how and when were enlarging or finishing touches given? That these additions had their origin in the reason just mentioned was held by Jerome, who in the preface to Esther remarks: "The Vulgate edition draws this book hither and thither by redundant coves (laciniosis sinibus) of words, adding whatever could on the occasion be said or heard; as is the custom in school exercises, after taking a theme to think out what words he can use who has sustained an injury, or he who has done an injury."

We may also observe the presumed progress of this tradition in the history of the book of Esther. In an earlier text of the Septuagint version (in Cod. 19, 93 and 1086 first published by JAMES USSHER in his Syntagma de Græca LXX. interpretum versione, Lond., 1655; next by FRITZSCHE in his 'ΕΞΗΡ, duplicem libri textum, ed. Turici, 1843), we find a special mode of treatment, which, of course, is but a remodelling of the original text. This text changed what was unintelligible and objectionable, and contracted what was too broadly asserted; thereby removing contradictions. But it also added other emendations (comp. FRITZSCHE, Exeg. Handbuch zu den Apokr., p. 70 sq.). JOSEPHUS, on his part, holds unreservedly to the Septuagint version, especially following the more ancient text. But he omits Mordecai's dream and its interpretation, and thus discloses a growing tradition by relating that a Jewish slave, Barnabazu, had revealed to Mordecai the conspiracy of the door-keepers spoken of in chap. ii. Even the old Latin translation, made prior to Jerome's time, used some free ornamentations (comp. FRITZSCHE, as above p. 74 sq.).

The Chaldee paraphrases or Targums are very important to the understanding of our book, chiefly because they have not adopted the Greek additions. If the latter had been at all genuine and authentic, they must have done very differently. A tradition would probably have arisen which, after the Talmudic period, would have asserted its authority. Still we must notice that some of them at least have embellishments. Among the earliest of the Chaldee versions we regard the Targum on Esther as now found in the Antwerp Polyglot Bible. This is nothing more than an exact translation of the Heb. book. But the so-called first Targum on Esther found in the London Polyglot (comp. Targum prius et posterius in Estheram nunc primum in ling. Lat. transl., stud. et op. FRANC. TALLERI, Lond., 1665, 4to.; see also another edition by WOLF, Bibl. Hebr., II., p. 1171 sq.). This follows very closely the Hebrew book verse for verse. Hence it has no place for the dream of Mordecai. But in order to give our book a higher and wider relation, it designates Ahasuerus in ch. i. 1 as the one in whose time the building of the temple was at a stand-still, and looks upon Haman as the one to blame for that delay. It understands that the two courtiers in chapter ii. 21 entered into a conspiracy against the king, because they saw Mordecai sitting in the Sanhedrim, which had been built in the king's gate by Esther's orders, and they deemed themselves thereby crowded out of favor.—בִּיכְיָא הָאֲנָן כְּרָדְכִי יְהִי בְּכַנְהֹדְרִין דְּתַקְנִית לֵה אֶסְתֵּר בְּתַרְעֵי מִכְּבָּד. It has also discovered that Haman, who is poetically represented in the beginning of ch. iii. as having been promoted for the exaltation of the divine glory, is angry at Mordecai above all others, inasmuch as he himself wishes to make his own daughter queen in the place of Esther. It ignores the prayers which the Greek Bible puts into the mouth of Mordecai and Esther. Still it points out in ch. iv. 16 that Esther requested not only that a fast should be observed on her behalf, but also that they should pray day and night. Besides it puts a prayer in an altogether arbitrary manner into the mouth of Esther herself in ch. v., in which she does not, as is stated in the Greek Bible, have regard to her people first and chiefly, but to herself purely: "Lord of the universe, do not give me over into the hands of this uncircumcised man, and fulfil not the desire of this wicked Haman on me!" etc. The so-called second Targum which, especially in ch. i. 1, has a style at once homiletical and extravagantly rhetorical, but which in general is more simple and brief than the former one, knows just as little of Mordecai's dream.* But, on the other hand, in ch. iii. 3, Mordecai is made to declare that God alone is to be worshipped, and to show the baseness of man and the exalted character of God. In ch. iii. 8 Haman in a very round-about way exposes the customs and ordinances of the Jews. An edict of Ahasuerus, having for its object the destruction of the Jews, is here inserted though it is first properly supplemented in ch. iv. 1. But this is just as peculiar as the prayer of Esther referred to in ch. v. 1.

The book ascribed to JOSIPON BEN GORION contains the dream and prayer of Mordecai and also that of Esther in its ch. ii. 1-3. It has also very faithfully copied from the Greek Bible the statement of the appearance of Esther before the king; and it has formed the medium by which such passages might be transmitted to the Jews speaking or writing in Hebrew, in the Midrashim, etc. We find the prayer and dream of Mordecai, as given in JOSIPON'S work carried over verbatim into the oldest Midrash on Esther (WOLF, Bibl. Hebr., ii., p. 1332; and ZUNZ, as above, p. 264).

The Chaldaic section also, beginning with the superscription: "A prayer of Mordecai; a prayer of Esther, and a dream of the former," and occurring in several not very ancient manuscripts of the Old Testament (comp. ZUNZ, p. 121), is really nothing more than an almost literal translation of JOSIPON ii. 1-2. DE ROSSI was certainly in error when he regarded this as a main proof for his theory, that originally there must have been a more copious book of Esther, out of which he took these Chaldaic passages to be the original documents preserved.

* It is an erroneous or indefinite mode of expression when ZUNZ, in his work (Die gottsdienstlichen Vorträge der Juden, p. 121), remarks: "The dream and prayers of Mordecai and Esther are found to vary very much from the Greek text, especially in the second book of the Targum of the Book of Esther," etc.

[The importance of these apocryphal additions to the book of Esther demands some further notice. We condense the following particulars from the article in MCCLINTOCK'S and STRONG'S Cyclopædia, s. v.:—

In the Septuagint and Old Latin versions these additions are dispersed through the canonical book, forming therewith a well-digested whole; and they therefore have in those versions no separate title. JEROME separated them in his edition, and removed (or rather added) them to the end of the book because they are not in the Hebrew, and they consequently appear in the Vulgate as the last seven chapters of the book. LUTHER entirely severed the apocryphal books from the canonical, placing the additions in question under a separate title; and the English Version has followed him in this, designating these pieces as "the rest of the chapters of the Book of Esther, which are found neither in the Hebrew nor in the Chaldee," and numbering them as "part of the tenth chapter after the Greek," and chaps. xi.—xvi.

The design of these additions evidently is to give a more decidedly religious tone to the record contained in the book of Esther, and to show more plainly how wonderfully the God of Israel interfered to save His people and confound their enemies. This the writer has effected by elaborating upon the events narrated in the canonical volume the following pieces:

1. Chap. i. 1 of the canonical book is preceded in the Septuagint by a piece which tells us that Mordecai, who was in the service of Artaxerxes, dreamed of the dangers that threatened his people and of their deliverance (vers. 1-12). He afterwards discovered a conspiracy against the king, which he disclosed to him, and was greatly rewarded for it (vers. 13-18). In the Vulg. and English this constitutes chap. xi. 2—xii. 6.

2. Between vers. 13 and 14 of chap. iii. of the canonical book the Septuagint gives a copy of the king's edict, addressed to all the satraps, to destroy without compassion that foreign and rebellious people, the Jews, for the good of the Persian nation, on the fourteenth day of the twelfth month of the coming year. In the Vulgate and English this is chap. xiii. 1-7.

3. At the end of chap. iv. 17 of the canonical book the Septuagint has two prayers of Mordecai and Esther, that God may avert the impending destruction of His people. In the Vulgate and English this is chap. xiii. 8—xiv.

4. In the midst of vers. 1 and 2 of chap. v. of the canonical book the Septuagint inserts a detailed account of Esther's visit to the king. This is chap. xv. of the Vulgate and English.

5. Between vers. 13 and 14 of chap. viii. of the canonical book the Septuagint gives a copy of the edict which the king sent to all his satraps, in accordance with the request of Mordecai and Esther, to abolish his former decree against the Jews. This is chapter xvi. of the Vulgate and English.

6. At the close of the canonical book, chap. x. 3, the Septuagint has a piece in which we are told that Mordecai had now recalled to his mind his extraordinary dream, and seen how literally it had been fulfilled in all its particulars (vers. 4-9). It also gives an account of the proclamation of the Purim festival in Egypt (vers. 10-13). This is given first in the apocrypha portion of the Vulgate, and English (as chap. x. 4-13).

7. The whole book in the Septuagint is closed with the following entry: "In the fourth year of the reign of Ptolemæus and Cleopatra, Dositheus, who said he was a priest and Levite, and Ptolemy his son, brought this epistle of Phurim, which they said was the same, and that Lysimachus, the son of Ptolemy, that was in Jerusalem, had interpreted it." In the Vulgate and English this forms chap. xi. 1.

The patriotic spirit with which the Jewish nation so fondly expatiated upon the remarkable events and characters of by-gone days, and which gave rise to those beautiful legends preserved in their copious literature, scarcely ever had a better opportunity afforded to it for employing its richly inventive powers to magnify the Great Jehovah, embalm the memory of the heroes, and brand the names of the enemies of Israel, than in the canonical book of Esther. Nothing could be more natural for a nation who "had a zeal of God" than to supply the name of God, and to point out more distinctly His interposition in their behalf in an inspired book, which, though recording their marvellous escape from destruction, had for some reasons omitted avowedly to acknowledge the Lord of Israel. The temptation was too great to be resisted, and, as in the case of all apocryphal writing, we are readily enabled by this meretricious embellishment to detect the false amid the genuine.

Besides the book implies and suggests far more than it records, and it cannot be doubted that there are many other things connected with the history it contains which were well known at the time, and were transmitted traditionally and otherwise to the nation. This is evident from the fact that JOSEPHUS (Antiq. XI. 6, 6 sq.) gives the edict for the destruction of the Jews in the Persian empire, the prayers of Mordecai and Esther, and the second edict authorizing the Jews to destroy their enemies, also mentioning the name of the eunuch's servant, a Jew, who betrayed the conspiracy to Mordecai, and citing other passages for the Persian chronicles, read to Ahasuerus, besides that relating to Mordecai, as well as amplifications of the king's speech to Haman, etc. The same appears in the fact that the second Targum, the Chaldee published by DE ROSSI, and JOSEPHUS BEN-GORION (ed. Breithaupt, p. 74 sq.) give the dream of Mordecai, as well as his prayer and that of Esther.

The first addition, in which Mordecai foresees in a dream both the dangers and the salvation of his people, is in accordance with the desire to give the whole a more religious tone. The latter part of this addition is intended to develop more distinctly the brief statement given in the canonical book of the loyal service of Mordecai, so as to explain so important an incident. In like manner the second addition originated from the fact that chap. iii. 13 of the canonical book speaks of the royal edict; hence this piece pretends to furnish said document in full. The same is the case with the third addition, which aims to supply the prayers said in chap. iv. 17 to have been offered by Mordecai and Esther. So also the fourth addition, giving a detailed account of Esther's interview with the king, originated in a desire to furnish more complete information upon a fact merely alluded to in the canonical passage. The fifth addition originated in the same manner as the second, namely, in an attempt to supply a copy of the royal edict; while the sixth addition ingeniously concludes with an interpretation of the dream in the first addition. The final entry was apparently intended to give authority to this Greek version of Esther by pretending that it was a certified translation from the Hebrew original. Ptolemy Philometor, who is here meant, began to reign B. C. 181. He is the same who is frequently mentioned in 1 Macc. (e. g., x. 57; xi. 12; comp. JOSEPHUS, Ant. XIII. 4, 1 and 5; CLINTON, Fasts Hellen., III. 393). Dositheus seems to be a Greek version of Mattithiah. Ptolemy was also a common name for Jews at that time. Thus every one of these additions is naturally accounted for as a fabrication having an adequate and natural motive in the connection.

From what has been remarked above, it will be at once apparent that these apocryphal additions were neither manufactured by the translator of the canonical Esther into Greek, nor are they the production of the Alexandrian, nor of any other school or individual, embracing some of the numerous national stories connected with this marvellous deliverance of God's ancient people, the authorship of which is lost in the nation. Many of them date as far back as the nucleus of the event itself, around which they cluster, and all of them grew up at first in the vernacular language of the people (i. e., the Hebrew or Aramaic), but afterwards assumed the complexion and language of the countries in which the Jews happened to settle down. Besides the above references which lead us to these conclusions, we refer also to the two Midrashim published by JELLINEK in his Betham-Midrash, I. (Lpz. 1853), 1 sq.

It is of this Septuagint version that ATHANASIUS (Test. Epist., p. 39, Oxford translation) spoke when he assigned the Book of Esther to the non-canonical books; and this also is, perhaps, the reason why, in some of the lists of the canonical books, Esther is not named, e. g., in those of Melito of Sardis, and Gregory Nazianzen (see WHITTAKER, Disput. on H. Script., Parker Society, pp. 57-58; COSIN on the Canon of Scripture, pp. 49, 50), unless in these it is included under some other book, as Ruth or Esdras (LEE, Dissert. on 2 Esdras, p. 25). The fathers, who generally regarded the Septuagint as containing the sacred Scriptures of the Old Testament, mostly believed in the canonicity of the additions likewise. Even ORIGEN, though admitting that they are not in the Hebrew, defended their canonicity (Ep. ad Abiram, ed. West, p. 225), and the Council of Trent pronounced the whole book of Esther, with all its parts, to be canonical. These additions, however, were never included in the Hebrew canon, and the fact that JOSEPHUS quotes them only shows that he believed them to be historically true, but not inspired. JEROME, who knew better than any other father what the ancient Jews included in their canon, most emphatically declares them to be spurious (Prof. in Esth.). SIXTUS SINENSIS, in spite of the Council of Trent, speaks of these additions in the same condemnatory manner.

§ 5. LITERATURE.

Jewish expositors, next to the Targums, Midrashim and Rabboth, of which ZUNZ speaks (Gottesdienstliche Vorträge d. Juden, espec. p. 35, 61 and 170 sq.), have published commentaries, some of which embrace the whole of the hagiographa (comp. the literature on Ezra and Nehemiah), while others are only on the five Megilloth (Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes and Esther).

To the latter belong ביאור על חמש מגילות (Elucidation) by ABDIAS SPHORI, an Italian physician, printed in Venice, 4to.; also פירוש or exposition of the five Megilloth by ELISA GALIKO, president of the Synagogue in Safed, publ. in Venice, in 1587, 4to.; also short explanations by JOSEPH TITZACK or TAITZACK, a Spaniard, who likewise commented on Daniel (Venice, 1608, 4to.). So also ISRAEL ARAMAH, a Spaniard, who commented on the Pentateuch and the Megilloth ([Constantinople, 1518, 4to.], Venice, 1573); MOSES ALMO-SHINUS (Venice, 1597, 4to.); R. ABRAHAM, of Heilbronn (under the title of אהבת ציון, Amor Sionis, Lublin, 1639), and others. As specially relating to Esther, we may mention the commentaries by R. ISAAK LEON, a Spaniard (Venice, 1565, 4to.; see BARTOLOCCI, in Bibl. magna Rabb.); by R. SALOMON BEN ZEMACH (תפארת ישראל); by R. ABRAHAM BEN ISAAK ZAHALON (Zabulon or Zebulon), which is a literal, allegorical and moral exposition (שע. מלכים, Venice, 1595, 4to.); by R. SAMUEL BEN JUDAH VALERIUS (יד הכלד, Venice, 1585, 4to.; by R. SALOMON LEVI ALCABAZ, R. LEO and others (in CARPZOV, Introd., I., p. 375).

Few Christian theologians have treated of the book of Esther. The Church-fathers have left us no exposition or treatment of it at all. Of Roman Catholic authors and their works we may mention: DIONYS. CARTHUSIANI, Enarrationes in libr. Hester, etc. (Colonis, 1534, fol.); a German exposition of Esther by JOHN FERNS (Mayence, 1567); FRANCO FEUARDENTHII Commentaria (Paris, 1585, Colon., 1595); SERARII Comm. in Tobiam, Judith, Esther et Maccabæos (Mayence, 1610); OLIVIERII BONARTII Comm. literalis et moralis (Colon., 1647); and DIDACI CELADÆIS Comm. cum duplici tractatu de convivio Ahasueri mystico, i. e., De Eucharistia et de Esther figurata i. e. beata Virgine (Lugduni, 1648, fol.). The commentary of FEUARDENTIUS, which is written in easy and almost too flowing Latin, far surpasses all those before mentioned. All the others savor of an intolerably insipid allegorical identification of Esther with the beata celestis Regina (the Virgin Mary); whereas this of Feuardentius is marked by sober, sound and very practical exegesis, and is based on much general reading. Although he now and then includes the Lutherans among the Hamanites to be exterminated, still Feuardentius has very perceptibly and early taken pattern after the evangelical exegesis, and copied some of the work of BRENZ almost literally.

On the part of the Evangelical Church BRENZ treats of the book of Esther in [Commentarii (Tübing., 1575); in Engl. by Stockwood, Lond., 1584, 4to.; also in] Operr. II.; also VICT. STRIGEL, Libri Esdræ, Nehemiæ, Esther et Ruth, ad Ebraicam veritatem recogniti et argumentis atque scholiis illustrati (Lips., 1571, 1572, 8vo.). There follow: COUR. PELLICAN, Comment. Bibl. (Figuri, 1583, fol.); LUD. LAVATER, Homilias (Figuri, 1586); RUD. WALTHER (Gualtherus) Homiliarum sylva (Figuri, 158, 8vo.); FRANZ BURMANN, a German Commentary published at Frankford, 1695; BALTH. KERNER, Ehren-Krone der demuthigen Esther (Ulm, 1666); GOTTFRIED MEISNER, Niedrigen aber nachmals erhohen Esther, mit biblisch-historischen Schmuck angethan (Hamburg, 1687); COM. ADAMUS, Observatt. theol. phil. (Gron., 1710, on chap. ii.).

Among those of more modern date may be mentioned a work which has not been referred to in the literature on Ezra and Nehemiah; CRUSIUS, De usu libri Estheræ ad praxin vitæ Christianæ (Ultraj., 1775).

The question: Who is to be understood by the Ahasuerus of our book? [which will be fully discussed in the Exegetical Notes on ch. i. 1] has been treated by FRANC. WOKENIUS in his Commentatio in l. Estheræ (1730), and by ASTER in his Diss. phil. de Estheræ cum Ahasuero conjugio (Wittenberg, 1730), both of whom held that Astyages is meant, although JOS. SCALIGER had given the correct interpretation, as also JOH. WAUCKEL, in his Dissert. de Assuero Estheræ marito, which he directed specially against JOS. SCALIGER.

As introductory works we may notice: SCHULZE, De fide historica l. Estheræ, in the Bibl. Hagana, V., VI.; KELLE, Vindiciæ Estheræ (Frib., 1820); MICH. BAUMGARTEN, De fide libri Estheræ Comm. hist. crit. (Hal., 1839); J. A. ### ORIGIN AND INCREASE OF DANGER TO THE JEWS.

CHAPS. I.—V.

INTRODUCTION :

The Occasion of the History. The Feast of Ahasuerus and Vashti's Rejection.

CHAP. I. 1-22.

I. Ahasuerus assembles the princes of his empire around him, and prepares a great feast, in which he endeavours to show his power and glory. Vers. 1-8.

1 Now [And] it came to pass [was] in the days of Ahasuerus [Achashverosh], (this is Ahasuerus which reigned [the one being king] from India [Hodu] even unto 2 [and till] Ethiopia [Cush], over a hundred and seven and twenty provinces,) That in those days when [as] the king Ahasuerus sat on the throne of his kingdom, which
3 was in Shushan the palace,<sup>1</sup> In the third year of his reign, he made a feast<sup>2</sup> unto all his princes and his servants; the power<sup>3</sup> of Persia [Paras] and Media [Madai], the 4 nobles<sup>4</sup> and [the] princes of the provinces, being before him. When he showed the riches of his glorious [the glory of his] kingdom, and the honour of his excellent
5 [the excellence of his] majesty, many days, even a hundred and fourscore days. And when these days were [had] expired, the king made a feast<sup>5</sup> unto all the people that were present [found] in Shushan the palace,<sup>1</sup> both unto great and [to great and
6 even to] small, seven days, in the court of the garden of the king's palace; Where were white [linen], green [cotton], and blue [violet] hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple to [on] silver rings and pillars of marble: the beds were of [there were beds of] gold and silver, upon a pavement of red [white] and blue
7 [marble], and white [pearl], and black marble [colored stone]. And they gave them [there was a giving of] drink in vessels of gold, (the vessels being [and the vessels were] diverse one from another,) and royal wine in abundance, according to 8 the state [hand] of the king. And the drinking was according to the law; none did compel: for so the king had appointed [ordained] to [upon] all the officers [every great one] of his house, that they should do [to do] according to every man's pleasure.

II. Queen Vashti refuses to appear before the king, and he is very much incensed thereat. Verses 9-12.

9 Also Vashti the queen made a feast<sup>9</sup> for [of] the women in the royal house which 10 belonged to king Ahasuerus. On the seventh day, when [as] the heart of the king was merry [good] with [the] wine, he commanded [said to] Mehuman, Biztha, Harbona, Bigtha, and Abagtha, Zethar, and Carcas, the seven chamberlains [eunuchs]

- 11 that served in the presence of Ahasuerus the king, To bring Vashti the queen before the king, with the crown royal [of royalty], to show the people [peoples] and 12 the princes her beauty: for she was fair to look on [good of appearance]. But [And] the queen Vashti refused to come at the king's commandment [word] [which was] by [the hand of] his [the] chamberlains [eunuchs]: therefore [and] was the king very wroth, and his anger burned [heat devoured] in him.

III. In accordance with the counsel of his wise men the queen is rejected by a public decree of the king.

Verses 18-22.

- 13 Then [And] the king said to the wise men, which knew [knowers of ] the times, (for so was the king's manner [word] toward [before] all that knew [knowers of ]
 14 law and judgment: And the next unto him was Carshena, Shethar, Admatha, Tarshish, Meres, Marsena, and Memucan, the seven princes of Persia [Paras] and Media [Madai], which saw [seers of] the king's face, and which sat [the sitters] the 15 first in the kingdom); What shall we do [is there to do] unto [in the ease of] the queen Vashti according to law, because [upon the fact that] she hath not performed [done] the commandment of the king Ahasuerus by [the hand of] the chamberlains [eunuchs]? And Memucan answered [said] before the king and the princes, Vashti the queen hath not done wrong to [upon] the king only, but [for] also to [upon] all the princes, and to [upon] all the people [peoples] that are in all the 17 provinces of the king Ahasuerus. For this deed [word] of the queen shall come abroad [go forth] unto [upon] all [the] women, so that they shall [to cause them to] despise their husbands in their eyes, when it shall be reported [in their saying], The king Ahasuerus commanded [said] Vashti the queen to be brought [to bring] in 18 before him, but [and] she came not. Likewise shall the ladies [princesses] of Persia [Paras] and Media [Madai] say this day unto all the king's princes, which [who] have heard<sup>1</sup> of the deed [word] of the queen. Thus [And] shall there arise
 19 too much [according to plenty] contempt and wrath. If it please [be good upon] the king, let there go [forth] a royal commandment [word] from [before] him, and let it be written among the laws of the Persians [Paras] and the Medes [Madai], that [and let] it be not altered [not pass], That Vashti come no more [not] before king Ahasuerus; and let the king give her royal estate [royalty] unto another [her 20 neighbor] that is better than she. And when the king's decree which he shall make shall be published [heard] throughout [in] all his empire [kingdom], (for it is great,) [and] all the wives [women] shall give to their husbands honour, both to 21 great and small. And the saying [word] pleased [was good in the eyes of] the 22 king and the princes; and the king did according to the word of Memucan: For [And] he sent letters into [unto] all the king's provinces, into [unto] every province according to the writing<sup>2</sup> thereof, and to [unto] every people after their language, that every man should bear rule [for every man to be prince] in his own house, and that it should be published [spoken] according to the language of every [his] people.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-8. The King's Banquet.—The point of departure in this history is formed by a feast at which Ahasuerus was unexpectedly humbled and provoked to wrath, while purposing to show his great majesty.

Ver. 1. Now it came to pass, etc. The sentence begun here, in its chief fact really follows

ver. 8. There it is stated that Ahasuerus made a feast in the third year of his reign. The  $\text{ו}$  at the beginning has not the conjunctive sense that it has in Ezra i. 1, but stands more indefinite. A Hebrew would understand this as a matter of which much had already been related, and of which the following is only a continuation. Thus he would proceed often with a  $\text{ו}$  without attaching any definite meaning to it.  $\text{וְהָיָה}$  has come to be a conventional formula for a beginning, comp. Jonah i. 4; Ex. i. 1; Isa. liii. 2, et al. Ahasuerus (Ahashverosh) written in cuneiform letters (comp. Lassen, Zeitschr. sur Kunde des M. L. VI., p. 128 sqq.; Benfey, Die pers. Keilschrift, p. 68 sqq.) Khasy-arsha, whence Cyaxares (comp. Dan. ix. 1), or Khasy-arsha, whence Xerxes (comp. Ezra iv. 6), early interpreted by Herodotus (vi. 98, etc.), as meaning ἀφῆος, according to Spiegel (Iranische Alterthumskunde, II. p. 377), a mighty man, here does not mean, as in Dan. ix. 1, Cyaxares I, the father of Astyages, as Ferrand holds (Réflexions sur la religion Chrétienne, I., p. 159), and Des Vignoles (Chronol. II., p. 274), and Nickes (De Esther libro, I., p. 48-59) would have it, since they especially insist that, according to chap. ii. 5 sq., Mordecai belonged to the first period of the exile, and that our book nowhere indicates that a new people had again arisen in Jerusalem. Nor is the monarch referred to the same as Astyages, as is asserted in the works referred to in § 5; and still less Artaxerxes, as Josephus assumes out of regard to the Septuagint version; but he is certainly Xerxes, as has been well proved by Scaliger (De emend. temp., ed. Geneva., p. 591 sqq.); also by Justi (in Eichhorn's Repert. XV., p. 388), and still more emphatically by Baumgarten (De fide l. Esth., pp. 122-151, and in his treatises respecting Cyrus the Great, in the Stud. u. Krit., 1853, p. 624 sqq.). On the different views in reference to Ahasuerus, see especially Feuardent on our book, and Pfeiffer, Dubia vez. p. 481 sqq. Against the identification with either Cyaxares or Astyages, are the following facts: (1) Shushan was already the capital of the empire, which it became through Cyrus (comp. Strabo, XV.); (2) the Persians are now the chief people (comp. the frequent collection of  $\text{יְהוּדִים וְכַנְעָנִים, a. g.}$ , in ch. i. 8); (3) the number seven indicates that of princes at the court of the king (comp. chap. i. 14); (4) many other specifically Persian peculiarities. Further, the empire at the time in question extended from India to Ethiopia, and stretched also to the coasts and isles of the Mediterranean sea (comp. chap. i. 1 and x. 1), as was the case since the time of Darius Hystaspis. The Jews, moreover, are here represented as scattered over all parts of the empire (comp. iii. 7, 8) and particularly numerous in the city of Shushan (comp. chap. ix. 12, etc.). On the contrary Artaxerxes is called in the Bible (in Ezra and Neh.) Artachsharshita or Artachshasta. For Xerxes, on the other hand, we may claim the identity of names (comp. Ezra ix. 6). In his favor is also the whimsical and tyrannical character manifested by the Ahasuerus of Esther (chap. i. and elsewhere). Besides, there is the remarkable circumstance that Vashti was rejected in the third year of Ahasuerus, although Esther was not made queen till the seventh year of his reign, which in the case of Xerxes may be explained on the basis that between his third and seventh year he made war on Greece.\* The clause beginning with  $\text{וְהָיָה}$  (comp. Gen. ii. 11) and referring us back—this is Ahasuerus which reigned from India even unto Ethiopia, etc.—is no doubt intended to designate Ahasuerus more distinctly,† but at the same time to make known his greatness of dominion and power. Thus the danger that threatened the Jews, as well as the elevation of Esther and Mordecai, and of the Jews through these, is more powerfully brought out.  $\text{יְהוּדִים}$  stands for the original  $\text{יִנְדֻּיִם}$ , as Hidku in the cuneiform inscriptions of the Persians stands for Hindhu (in Zend and Syrian Hendu), and is therefore India, in the Sanscrit Sindhu which is really the river Indus, then the inhabitants along the Indus, and at last the land of the Indus (comp. Lassen, Judische Alterthumskunde, I., p. 2); so also in the Vedas Sapta Sindhavas, or “the seven streams,” really stand for India (comp. Rödiger in Gesen. Thesaurus, Append. p. 83). The o sound in  $\text{יְהוּדִים}$ , and the tone falling on the first syllable are quite remarkable, but perhaps only a provincialism. Herodotus testifies to the great extension of the Persian empire under

* [We condense the following summary of the argument on the identity of the Ahasuerus of the book of Esther, from McClintock & Strong's Cyclop. s. v. Ahasuerus. “From the extent assigned to the Persian empire (Esth. I. 1), ‘from India even unto Ethiopia,’ it is proved that Darius Hystaspis is the earliest possible king to whom this history can apply, and it is hardly worth while to consider the claims of any after Artaxerxes Longimanus. But Ahasuerus cannot be identical with Darius, whose wives were the daughters of Cyrus and Otanes, and who in name and character equally differs from that foolish tyrant. Josephus (Ant. XI. 6, 1) makes him to be Artaxerxes Longimanus; but as his twelfth year (Esth. iii. 7) would fall in B. C. 454, or 144 years after the deportation by Nebuchadnezzar, in B. C. 598 (Jer. lii. 28), Mordecai, who was among those captives (Esth. ii. 6), could not possibly have survived to this time. Besides, in Ezra vii. 1-7, 11-26, Artaxerxes, in the seventh year of his reign, issues a decree very favorable to the Jews, and it is unlikely, therefore, that in the twelfth (Esth. iii. 7) Haman could speak to him of them as if he knew nothing about them, and persuade him to sentence them to an indiscriminate massacre. Nor is the disposition of Artaxerxes Longimanus, as given by Plutarch and Diodorus (XI. 71), at all like that of this weak Ahasuerus. It therefore seems necessary to identify him with Xerxes, whose regal state and affairs tally with all that is here said of Ahasuerus (the names being, as we have seen, identical); and this conclusion is fortified by the resemblance of character, and by certain chronological indications (see Rawlinson's Hist. Evidences, p. 150 sq.). As Xerxes scourged the sea, and put to death the engineers of his bridge because their work was injured by a storm, so Ahasuerus repudiated his queen, Vashti, because she would not violate the decorum of her sex, and ordered the massacre of the whole Jewish people to gratify the malice of Haman. In the third year of the reign of Xerxes was held an assembly to arrange the Grecian war (Herod. VII. 7 sq.); in the third year of Ahasuerus was held a great feast and assembly in Shushan the palace (Esth. I. 3). In the seventh year of his reign Xerxes returned defeated from Greece, and consoled himself by the pleasures of the harem (Herod. IX. 108); in the seventh year of his reign ‘fair young virgins were sought’ for Ahasuerus, and he replaced Vashti by marrying Esther. The tribute he ‘laid upon the land and upon the isles of the sea’ (Esth. x. 1) may well have been the result of the expenditure and ruin of the Grecian expedition.”—Ta.]

† (The principal purpose of this clause is to distinguish the Ahashverosh in question from all other Persian monarchs bearing that general or regal title, by adding the extent of his dominion. It thus becomes, as was evidently intended, an important chronological datum.—Ta.)

Xerxes, and in chap. xii. 9 he says that Mardoni-ans reported to Xerxes that the Saces and Assyrians, as well as the Indians and Ethiopians, had been conquered. See also vii. 97, 98, and viii. 65, 69, where the Ethiopians and Indians are enumerated as being under tribute. According to Arrian, Cyrus extended his conquests up to India, and the people of the Agvaka were by him made to pay tribute. Darius added still greater parts of northwestern India to the Persian empire (comp. Duncker, Gesch. d. Altherthums, 8d ed., II., page 468). The auxiliary sentence: A hundred and seven and twenty provinces, is merely to be regarded as an additional sentence in loose apposition, to indicate what provinces were included in the region just mentioned. If this sentence depended upon מְדִינֹתָיִם it should have לִפְנֵי [or בְּ] before it. According to Herod. III. 89 sqq., Darius Hyst. on account of the raising of taxes divided the empire into twenty ἀρχαί which were termed carpartia. A further division into lesser portions was not thereby excluded; with so many petty tribes and peoples this came as a matter of course. So there were contained in the fifth satrapy (comp. Herod. III. 91) a small Jewish people, a separate מְדִינָה, which really means a judicial or official circuit (comp. Ezra ii. 1). Our 127 provinces remind us of the 120 Satraps whom Darius the Mede placed over his empire (Dan. vi. 2).

Ver. 2. In those days, when the king Ahasuerus sat, etc.—Sitting is a posture common to judges and kings, but more particularly characteristic of the kings of Persia. The Persian kings are always painted as sitting on a throne under a lofty canopy. This is true of them even in the time of war, and in their journeys. Xerxes, indeed, was present in the battles sitting; thus it was at Thermopylæ according to Herodotus (VII. 102), and at Salamis according to Plutarch (Themistocl. 18). See also Baumgarten, l. c., p. 85 sqq. Which was in Shushan the palace.—He had a royal establishment in several cities; but at the time here referred to it was in Shushan, which was his favorite winter and spring residence (comp. Neh. i. 1). Æschylus calls it the palace ornate with gold of the Cissians, and Strabo asserts that every Persian king built his own palace there. מְלָכֵהָ was in use in later language, and מְלָכֵהָ in earlier times.

Ver. 3. In the third year of his reign he made a feast, etc.—All his princes and servants, for whom this feast was made, are specified as follows: The power of Persia and Media, the nobles and princes of the provinces (being) before him.—These words form an explanatory sentence, and assert distinctly that all the princes and servants were really gathered around Xerxes. We are to understand by the "power," the representatives of the same, who probably consisted of the body-guard of the king, which formed the flower of the entire army-power. According to Herod. VII. 40 sqq., this was in itself sufficiently large, and consisted of two thousand picked horsemen, two thousand lancers, and ten thousand common foot-soldiers. The פְּרָסִים, who are mentioned also in chap.

vi. 9, and Dan. i. 8, were the principes, chief men (in Sanscrit we find it parthama = "first;" in the Behistun Inscription fratama, in Pehlevi par-dom), i. e., the magnates. ["It is a superlative from a root fra, equivalent to the Greek πρῶ, "before." — Rawlinson]. The princes of the provinces are the Pashas or governors of those one hundred and twenty-seven provinces. That מְדִינֹתָיִם is more correct than מְדִינֹתָיִם has been mentioned in the note on Ezra i. 1.

Ver. 4. When he shewed the riches of his glorious kingdom, etc.—Keil connects these words with the inserted explanatory sentence, "the power — before him," and thus he gets the sense, not that the feast itself, at which Xerxes showed his riches, lasted one hundred and eighty days, but that he prepared a feast for the army lasting seven days, after they had viewed his riches for one hundred and eighty days (ver. 5). But the connection of our verse with the main assertion in ver. 3: "He made a feast" is much closer; as may be seen in the fact that nearly all exegetes have declared themselves for this rendering. Something again different seems to be meant in the seven days' feast of ver. 5, which Xerxes had caused to be made, not for the army, but for all the people in Shushan the palace. The feast during a hundred and eighty days may have been only for the purpose of consultation, and the real feast may have followed in the seven days succeeding. Keil's objection, that then the mention of the preceding feast of a hundred and eighty days was purposeless, does not hold, since the fact that Xerxes could entertain his princes and servants so long, is a proof also to the reader of his great riches. That such magnificent, long and great feasts were very popular at the Persian court, is elsewhere stated (comp. Duncker, as above, p. 209 sqq.). Herod. vii. 8 informs us that after the re-subjection of Egypt, Xerxes called the magnates of his empire to Shushan, in order to consult with them in reference to the campaign against Greece; and in vii. 2, he further states that the preparations for this undertaking lasted four years. Hence the assumption is not unfounded that in these long assemblies it was specially designed in the third year to counsel together regarding the war with Greece. This is the more evident since in the inserted clause of ver. 8 the power of the Medes and Persians is prominently stated. If Xerxes ascended the throne in the year B. C. 486 then there were still three or four years until this happened. There were three years until the battle of Salamis (480) beginning with his first year of empire. Clericus asserts that these princes of the provinces could not possibly have remained away so long a time as a hundred and eighty days from their provinces and governmental activity. Hence he would have them entertained one after the other; a view which is without foundation. They doubtless had subordinate officers, who ranked high enough to take their places for one half year.*

* ["We are not obliged to suppose that all or any of the governors were present during the whole period of festivity. Rather we may conclude that the time was extended in order to allow of the different persons

Ver. 5 And when these days were expired, the king made a feast to all the people.—This does not, as Keil would have it, take up the third verse again, but forms the transition from the counseling to the purely festive entertainment to which the king invited (in addition to those already assembled to the army and great rulers, comp. ver. 11) all the people at Shushan the palace. מְלֹאֲתַי is not an abstract form with an infinitive signification, which would properly have to be punctuated thus מְלֹאֲתַי, as are יְכֶנֶת (comp. Ewald, § 239 a), but the י stands in the wrong place in the originally defectively written מְלֹאֲתַי (comp. Lev. xii. 6), in order that it might be known as having been added later (comp. Joh. xx. 22).—To all these people who were invited, belonged also the lower classes of servants, and probably the common inhabitants likewise, as is evinced by the phrase both unto great and small—from the highest to the lowest. But these were only the male population, as is shown in ver. 9. In reference to מְלֹאֲתַי comp. the note on Ezra viii. 25. לְכֶנֶזֶל, with ל, as in 2 Chron. xv. 18; without it 1 Sam. xxx. 19.—In the court of the garden of the king's palace.—מְלֹאֲתַי for מְלֹאֲתַי occurs often in our book, but is found connected with מְלֹאֲתַי also in chap. vii. 7. The kingly palace or series of houses was situated, in Oriental manner, as is customary also to-day, in a large park (Xenoph. Cyrop. I. 8, 12, 14).

Ver. 6. The language describing the court of the garden where this entertainment took place, i. e., the tent-like, enclosed, and covered space of the park, specially prepared for this festive occasion, and likewise the entertainment itself in vers. 7, 8, must be understood as explained by the exclamations of wonder, white, green, and blue (hangings), etc., these latter being employed as coverings. מְלֹאֲתַי designates the white cloths as to color, not as to a certain quality of cloth; from מְלֹאֲתַי, to be white. מְלֹאֲתַי, occurring in the Sanscrit, Pers., Armen., and Arab., corresponds to the Greek κάπναος; designating cotton cloth; and, because of the two preceding and corresponding words, a splendid parti-colored fabric. מְלֹאֲתַי is the glistening blue-black hyacinth color, and here means any kind of cloth which had this particular hue. White and blue were, according to Curtius VI. 6, 4, the regal colors of Persia (comp. also Duncker, as above, pp. 891 and 961). These cloths were held fast (מְלֹאֲתַי) with cords to rings, and by these to the pillars.* The last words: The beds (divans) were of gold and silver (lying) upon a pavement of red and blue, and white and black marble, etc., describe the seats for the guests.

* [“Nothing could be more appropriate than this method at Susa and Persepolis, the spring residences of the Persian monarchs. . . . A massive roof, covering the whole expanse of columns, would be too cold and dismal; whereas curtains around the central group would serve to admit both light and warmth.” LORRUS.—Tr.]

Gold and silver here mean the cloths, which were woven with gold and silver threads. Hence they were brocades with which these divans were covered. But they lay upon רִצְפֹּת, Sept. ἐπὶ λιθοστρώματος, a tessellated (mosaic) flooring, which was formed of various kinds of stones. מְלֹאֲתַי, in Arab., a false stone, accords to the Sept., σμαραγδίνη, a stone of a green color, similar to the emerald (smaragd), is perhaps malachite or serpentine. מְלֹאֲתַי is white marble; מְלֹאֲתַי, in Arab. darun and darratun, pearl, is, according to the Sept., πινυνοῦ λίθος, a stone similar to pearl, perhaps mother of pearl. מְלֹאֲתַי (from שְׁחָר-כֹּחֶר, dark), is very likely black marble, with scutiform spots.*

Ver. 7. And they gave (them) drink in vessels of gold.—This actually occurred, or was seen transpiring. מְלֹאֲתַי, Infin. Hiph., is a substantive here. The vessels being diverse one from another, i. e., very different drinking-vessels were in service. According to Xenoph. Cyrop. VIII. 8, 18, these constituted an essential part of Persian luxury. And royal wine, i. e., such as was drunk from the royal vaults, as especially costly, perhaps coming from Chalybon, which it was usual for Persian kings to drink (comp. Ez. xxvii. 18). In abundance, according to the state of the king.—מְלֹאֲתַי, according to the hand = power of the king, means that the great quantity did honor to the power of the king, or that it corresponded to the ability and riches of the king (comp. chap. ii. 18; 1 Kings x. 18; also Neh. ii. 8).

Ver. 8. And the drinking was—i. e., went on—according to the law (custom); none did compel, etc. מְלֹאֲתַי hardly means a law enacted for this special occasion; for this purpose the expression would be too general;—but as custom, especially Persian royal etiquette required. This means, not moderately (as Clericus,—moralizing was not here intended), but on the contrary that the guests in a courageous and vigorous carousing should show their appreciation of the liberal hospitality of the king, and at the same time evince their ability to do something in their drinking worthy of the royal table. The Greeks knew how to do justice to hospitality (see Baumgarten, p. 12 sq.). While מְלֹאֲתַי was held to be a special law made for this occasion, it was thought that its substance was contained in מְלֹאֲתַי, מְלֹאֲתַי being taken in the sense of urging. The meaning is that the drinking was not to occur, as was usually the case, in compliance with the wishes or encouragements of the court officers. In contrast with the customary excessive drinking, because of too frequent urging, this should remain free to all to remain sober. While the Septuagint, in a free rendering, has joined מְלֹאֲתַי with מְלֹאֲתַי (οὐ κατὰ προκείμενον νόμον), the Vulgate has it thus: “Nec erat, qui nolentes cogere ad bibendum." But the true interpretation of the phrase evidently is as already indicated; every one having entire liberty to drink of the wine, without urging. The whole tone of the passage expresses abundance and luxuriance: yet we need not make "urging" out of וַיִּצְוּ, but rather "creating a real necessity, preparing difficulty, standing in the way in a preventive manner." In Dan. iv. 6, at least, it has this signification. It may possibly be an additional form for וַיִּצְוּ (Hitzig on Ex. xxiv. 17). At any rate it frequently stands in the Targums for the Heb. וַיִּצְוּ, וַיִּצְוּ, and וַיִּצְוּ. That no one should hinder another in drinking must have been self-evident and understood at a decently-conducted feast. But here it is stated: For so the king had appointed to all the officers of his house; here not our own, but Persian customs, give the key. Besides there is a negative hindrance in drinking, which obtains even among us, and which would seem to have been necessary in a company where high and low mingled together, namely that of not so frequently filling the cups. וַיִּצְוּ means, as it does in 1 Chron. ix. 22, arranging (ordering). With וַיִּצְוּ it is, first of all, giving orders in reference to or for some one. וַיִּצְוּ = the chief of the house, i. e., court-officer.

Vers. 9-12. The Queen's Banquet, and her Refusal to appear in the Royal Presence.—The festival of the king went hand in hand with that of the queen, which doubtless was intended to bring into view at the same time the royal majesty and magnificence. Usually the queen ate with her husband (see Herod. IX. 110), and even in greater feasts she was not under all circumstances excluded, as is proved by the reference to Lucian by Brissonius, De regio Pers. princ. I., c. 108. At this time she was compelled to remain away, since she also gave entertainment to the ladies. To permit the participation of women in all the feasts of the men would certainly not have been very desirable, since it was a mixed company.

Ver. 9. The name Vashti, וַשְׁתִּי, has probably a connection with the Old-Persian vahista ("the best"), or with the related behisht ("paradisiacus"); comp. Pott, Ueber alt-pers. Eigennamen, in the Zeitschrift. d. D. M. G., 1859, p. 888. In modern Persian Vashti signifies a beautiful woman. Vashti gave the feast to the ladies in the king's palace, i. e., either in her own apartments, which also were in the royal residence, or in some other dwellings there which were placed at her disposal for this festive occasion.*

Ver. 10. On the seventh day, as the last of the feast, in which perhaps there was the greatest joviality. When the heart of the king was merry with wine, i. e., well dis- posed, happy (וַיִּשְׂמַח, as in 2 Sam. xiii. 18; Judg. xvi. 25; וַיִּשְׂמַח is the infin. constr. Kal, with an intransitive signification), would grant a still greater favor to his guests, and one too which he would not have been willing to grant in a more sober mood. He turned to the seven eunuchs that served before him, וַיִּצְוּ, together with וַיִּצְוּ, as in 1 Sam. ii. 18. Their names signify nothing for the present purpose; and there are no certain data for their interpretation.* But our author names them because they were transmitted to him, and in order that the historical character of his narrative may be strengthened thereby. Certain it is, they were the medium between the king and the ladies. They were to transmit the commands of the former to the latter. Their number, seven, has close connection with that of the Amshaspands. This number was peculiarly sacred to the Persians, see ver. 14.

Ver. 11. They were to bring the queen in the regal crown, וַיִּצְוּ, kidaris or kirapic, i. e., in a high, pointed turban, and consequently bring her in her entire royal apparel, in order to show her beauty to the prince, as well as to the entire people, of whom at least there were representatives present. Xerxes was desirous of glory, not only because of his riches, but also because of his beautiful wife.†

Ver. 12. But the queen Vashti refused to come.—וַיִּסְרֹף here has reference to the word of the king, as in chap. iii. 15; viii. 14; 1 Ki. xiii. 1, 8. By (his) chamberlains, i. e., which was brought to her in a formal manner, and which therefore ought to have been obeyed all the more (comp. ver. 15). Persian etiquette gave to ladies, and especially to the queen, a certain reserve, and this under all circumstances. It was regarded as something unheard of if the queen appeared in public unveiled. But here, where there was no doubt of the fact that she should become the gasing-stock of a drunken company, that, so to speak, she should make a show of herself to the lascivious eyes of so many—according to the extremely literal view of the Targums, she was to appear naked—she had a right, indeed she was compelled to guard and keep in mind her dignity. There is no doubt that as the queen she was safe from such shameless proceedings as Herodotus (ver. 18) relates of Persian foreign ministers. But instead of being rejoiced at the modesty of his queen the king felt deeply humbled in the eyes of those to whom he would have shown himself in his highest glory. It is possible, and even probable, that a well-known self-assertion of Vashti had something to do in the matter. But this we need not necessarily assume in connection with his peculiar character in order to explain his wrath. Pride and self-exaltation perhaps so blinded him

* ["If the Ahasuerus of Esther is rightly identified with Xerxes, Vashti should be Amestris, whom the Greeks regard as the only legitimate wife of that monarch, and who was certainly married to him before he ascended the throne. In that case the name may be explained either by corruption of Amestris, or as a title; and it may be supposed that the disgrace recorded was only temporary; Amestris in the latter part of Xerxes' reign recovering her former dignity." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

* ["These names, being those of eunuchs, are not unlikely to be of foreign origin. They have generally but little resemblance to known Persian names." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

† ["It has been said that this is invariable, and indicates an ignorance of Persian customs on the part of the author. But even De Wette allows that such an act is not out of harmony with the character of Xerxes (Exaltation, § 193, a note 6); and it is evidently related as something strange and unusual. Otherwise the queen would not have refused to come." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

that he did not dream of such a rebuff. Perhaps, too, she might have found some way, had she been wise, in which without compromising herself she might have rendered obedience. But however bad the fact, the unfavorable light does not fall on her, but upon the king. He appears so thoughtless that one is quite prepared to expect still other rash and inconsiderate acts from him.

Vers. 13-15. The King's Inquiry.—When the king said to the wise men, which knew the times.—To know the times means to judge the times as did the astrologers and magicians, according to the heavenly phenomena, and to give counsel corresponding thereto, (comp. Dan. ii. 27; v. 15; Isa. xlv. 25; xlvii. 13; Jer. l. 85). But it also means in a general sense to be learned; for according to the expressions following, these wise men were likewise those skilled in the law. For so, adds the author, (was) the king's manner toward all that knew law and judgment.—וְכִן הָיָה does not here mean the word of the king, for then we might expect, instead of וְכִן, a preposition expressive of direction; but it is a matter of the king, i. e., all that relates to the king, or what he undertakes.

Ver. 14. And the next to him or standing nearest to him,—thus the explanation becomes clear, were Carshena, Shethar, etc.—There is no doubt that all seven should be named as standing before the king, and not the first only.* The sing. הָיָה has application to the second and third no less than to the first, and is, therefore, equal to a neuter plural. The sense, however, is clear. By these words, the wise were meant, the chief persons, who during and after consultation were to have a word before the king in this matter. The clause which saw the king's face, expresses their intimate relation to the king, and their great and high preference in an especially significant manner, since the approach to the king was very difficult. The seven princes that had conspired against the Pseudo-Smerdis had a perfect understanding that it should be permitted them to enter at any time into the presence of the king, who had been elected from their midst, and that, too, without previous announcement (see Herod. iii. 84). But that these princes themselves formed the court either before or after the event spoken of here, although mentioned "as the seven princes of the Medes and Persians," is not to be assumed. Those seven before mentioned did not, as did these, belong to the learned class, to the selected counsellors of the king, although they had intercourse with the king. These were the seven supreme counsellors (comp. Ezra vii. 14), who formed a complement to the seven Amshaspands.†

* ["These names have a general Persian cast, though they are difficult of identification. They have probably suffered to some extent for corruption (i. e., transcription into Hebrew); and perhaps they were not even at first very close to the Persian originals. In Marsena we may perhaps recognize the famous Mardonius, and in Admatha Xerxes' uncle, Artabanus." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["According to Herodotus (III. 84), there were seven families of the first rank in Persia, from which alone the king would take his wives. Their chiefs were entitled to have free access to the king's person. The Behistun Inscription, which gives Darius six coadjutors

The number seven, which is retained by the Persians in ver. 5, and again in chap. ii. 9, was originally instituted because of the seven planets, or the weekly cycle, or finally with regard to the seven Amshaspands. Perhaps its being composed of the numbers three and four gave it significance.

רִשְׁוֹנָה, first —presiding, is, first of all, to preside, constituting the highest authority. The feminine רִשְׁוֹנָה is a substitute for the adverb (comp. Gen. xxxiii. 2; Num. ii. 9).

Ver. 15. First, here, the discourse of the king follows. They are asked: What shall we do unto the queen Vashti according to law? כִּן is expressly prefixed here, and that without the article; hence, legally. Because she hath not performed the commandment of the king Ahasuerus.—Thus the king expresses himself, instead of simply saying: my word; since this was just the matter that came into consideration, that it was the king's word. For the rest comp. ver. 12 and notes.

Vers. 16-20. The Courtier's Reply.—Memucan, although last mentioned among the seven, is spokesman, doubtless after the wise men had had a consultation. For מוֹסִיךְ is here the same as מְמוֹכֵךְ in ver. 14, as is shown by the Keri. The assumption is natural that the Scriptio defectiva was really employed, and that the l was added later by the Masoretes. This is evident, further, in ver. 5, where the full form is distinguished as having been added by them at the wrong place. Feuardant thinks that, according to a more general custom, the last of the seven responded first "lest he might seem to say aught in view of the favor and protection of the chiefs and elders, but on the contrary out of mere liberty, and the full determination of his own will and judgment." But Memucan seems to have spoken first not only here, but also above; hence he seems to have been chairman (spokesman). He judges the offense of the queen very strictly in order to justify a severe verdict. But he also correctly premises that the offenses of persons high in office, on account of the influence which their examples will have, are punishable in a very high degree. Vashti the queen hath not done wrong to the king only, etc.—

Ver. 17. For (this) deed of the queen shall come abroad to all women.—כָּל with עָל, usually with אֶל. They shall despise, properly, make them to despise, their husbands in their eyes.—Those that despise are of course the wives, as is clear from the connection with מְמוֹכֵכֶם. The masc. form of the suffix is substituted for the fem. form.

Ver. 18. (Likewise) shall the ladies of Persia and Media say this day unto all the king's princes. הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה is used in its

in his conspiracy, confirms the Greek writer." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

* ["It is not surprising that the judgment delivered by Memucan was one of condemnation, for it was rarely indeed that any Persian subject ventured to offer opposition to the mildest caprice or to the most extravagant whim of the monarch. (See Herodotus III. 34, 35)." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

direct meaning. What the speaker means to say is, as regards the rest of the lower women, who were referred to in ver. 17. It may take a long time before the new law of the court shall have come to the knowledge of all, because some will hear of it later. But the princesses who live at the court and who have immediate news of Vashti's conduct, will relate what has been indicated in ver. 17. After וְאֵלֶּיךָ the same sentence is to be understood as follows: וְאֵלֶּיךָ in ver. 17; for the last words of the verse: Thus (shall there arise) too much contempt and wrath, cannot be construed into the definition of an object in view, as Bertheau would have it, as if the stood before וְאֵלֶּיךָ only as an attachment to the long phrase, but these form a separate sentence. The predicate: *thus there shall arise, must be supplied. וְאֵלֶּיךָ, really for a sufficiency, is by litotes, e. g., "more than enough."

Ver. 19. This contains the verdict. — If it please the king, let there go a royal commandment from him.—עַל occurs often in our book as also in Neh. ii. 5. דְּבַר מַלְכוּת, a word of the kingdom or a king's word (comp. ver. 8), hence first of all a royal order. And let it be written among the laws of the Persians and the Medes, that it be not altered, i. e., let it have express legal authority, so that it must remain unaltered (comp. Dan. vi. 9).* That Vashti come no more before king Ahasuerus; and let the king give her royal estate unto another that is better than she.—מַלְכוּתָהּ = מַלְכוּתָהּ (comp. ver. 2), royal state, royal government, here means royal highness, dignity, רֵעָתָהּ, her female companions. טוֹב, as to its connections, is especially referable to obedience. It may be that Vashti was hated as being a proud, assuming person. But the severity of the sentence against her is explainable also in this, that there remained no alternative to the judges either to declare her innocent, which, as respects Ahasuerus, they could not do, or to make her for ever harmless. Even if she had again obtained an influence with the king, they would have had to expect her wrath.

Ver. 20. We here notice the consequence of the decree of the king.—And when the king's decree, which he shall make, shall be published—all the wives shall give to their husbands honour, etc. The predicate נִשְׁכַּע is chosen, since it makes a presupposition for the יִתְּנָה which is expressed. It is first of all neuter: when it shall be published (heard). נִתְּנָה, as in Ezra iv. 17. אֲשֶׁר יִצְוֶה may mean: which he shall execute, inasmuch as this decree would be sanctioned by the example of the king himself; otherwise: which he shall decree. Memucan reminds him of the greatness of the empire, since the success of the punishment and its importance is connected with it. לְכָתוּב, as in ver. 5.

Vers. 21, 22. The Decree Issued. The king accepts the proffered counsel and rejects Vashti; indeed he does even more. In order that her punishment may become as well-known as her offense, he sends letters into all the provinces;* and in order that these may be intelligible, he writes according to the language of every province, and to every people in their own language.† That every man should bear rule in his own house, and that it should be published according to the language of every people.—לְהִיחַל does not really indicate the substance of what was written—this consists of the rejection of Vashti and the reasons therefor—but only its aim. Yet this object, strange as it may have sounded, has nevertheless received sufficient prominence. Feuardent thinks that the edict may be explained on the ground that there was too much petticoat government in Persia. But there exists no proof of such an assertion. It is true, in chap. v. 10, that Haman drew his wife into the council of consultation, but his friends first. It may be asked, what is the sense and connection of the phrase, and (it) should be published according to the language of every people. Older commentators and also Keil find therein only a command, that a man in his own house should speak his own native language. Hence if he was possessed of one or more foreign wives, who spoke a different language, they should be compelled to learn his language and speak only in it. Thereby the man was to show his authority as master of his own house.‡ But if we apprehend this decree in such a general manner, it would not only have been a very peculiar, but also a separate edict, and it would apply in fact to the rejection of queen Vashti, neither in its object, nor yet in its communication. It might much better have read thus, "that the wives speak the language of their husbands' people." Hence Bertheau, according to Hitzig's advice, changed כָּל־שִׂמְיָהּ עָלָיו to כָּל־שִׂמְיָהּ עָלָיו (and every one) shall speak what to him is appropriate; but

† [The practice of the Persians, to address proclamations to the subject-nations in their own speech, and not merely in the language of the conqueror, is illustrated by the bilingual and trilingual inscriptions of the Achaemenian monarchs, from Cyrus to Artaxerxes Ochus, each inscription being of the nature of a proclamation." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

‡ ["This decree has been called 'absurd' and 'quite unnecessary in Persia' (Davidson). If the criticism were allowed, it would be sufficient to observe that many absurd things were done by Xerxes (see Herod. VII. 35; IX. 108-111). But it may be questioned whether the decree was unnecessary. The undue influence of women in domestic, and even in public affairs, is a feature of the ancient Persian monarchy. Herodotus tells us that Alesia 'completely ruled' Darius (VII. 3). Xerxes himself was, in his later years, shamefully subject to Amestris (ib. IX., 111). The example of the court would naturally infect the people. The decree, therefore, would seem to have been not so much an idle and superfluous act as an ineffectual protest against a real and growing evil." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

* ["The theoretical inviolability of the laws of the Persians is often touched on by the Greek writers. Practically the monarch, if he chose, could always dispense with the law. It was therefore quite within his power to restore Vashti to her queenly dignity, notwithstanding the present decree, if he so pleased." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

this would introduce a thought foreign to the subject, and besides וַיִּשְׁמַע according to chap. iii. 8, should have וַיִּשְׁמַע before it. Perhaps the meaning is this: that he speak, etc., in short, that he have the right to use his people's language in his own house, even though he have a foreign wife; moreover that it is obligatory upon his wife to so far learn the language of her husband that she may understand the orders he may give in it. This phrase receives further light from the consequence which would follow upon the usurpation of the wife, since she would then compel her husband to learn her own language.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

On vers. 1-12. 1. Ever and anon the question arises, whether there is not upon earth somewhere, a condition of true satisfaction and unclouded happiness. One very much desires such a state of things, and one is tempted to believe it, especially when regard is had to the most beautiful dreams of the past, which had the appearance of bright promises. But this is not all. In spite of all assurances and experiences to the contrary, one is ever inclined to think that the world, and especially its lords, could give an affirmative answer to our question.

At the very beginning of our book there is unfolded to our eyes a picture full of riches and affluence, full of splendor and glory. Whatever is beautiful to look upon, whatever is enjoyable to the taste, whatever could rejoice the heart and elevate the soul, is here combined. A ruler, whose height of power leaves hardly anything to be desired, who has united under his sceptre the most powerful, the richest, and most celebrated nations, from India to Æthiopia, has called together the chief men of the various countries, and they are gathered around him in the beautifully situated and magnificently built city of the lilies, the most beautiful of all Persian residences (comp. Neh. i. 1), there to revel in luxury and enjoyment. He, it seems, is happy to be their ruler, and they are happy as his subjects. At the same time the women are also called to this festive enjoyment. The higher in station mingle on equal terms with those lower, and all celebrate and enjoy the occasion together. It seems as if every one must feel happy in his place. Yet the old adage asserts itself that the world, the rich, the high, the proud world possesses least of that which we here seek. It may be said, indeed, of this world alone, that it passes away with all its pleasures, and that its apparent wealth at last becomes sheer poverty. Ahasuerus, who is admired because of his greatness and lauded as happy by so many, is deeply humiliated; a woman dares to defy his command, and his joy is changed to anger and chagrin. Again, all the efforts that he makes to remove the object of his disappointment serve but to complete his misfortune. However widely and effectually his power may be felt, he is still only a man, and as such he has human needs. The empire cannot displace his house. All the wealth of earth cannot give him the joy that one person does, who submits herself entirely to him. Her he cannot gain by his measures, but rather she becomes for ever lost to him by those very measures. Vashti, however, this second person at the highest point of worldly glory, now sees the crown of her exalted station and her happiness torn to pieces. For her the day of highest joy becomes the day of her misfortune. The subjects, who had to bear the cost of these feastings, must have groaned and sighed the most in advance, instead of rejoicing. Feardent: "David once called water blood, because it had been drawn at the manifest risk of life on the part of his chieftains, and he therefore held it wrong to drink of it. But . . . from another's hide, as the proverb goes, since shoe-strings are cut by chiefs."

1. There is but One, who—Himself ever blessed—can make all kings and nations truly happy with the great wealth of His treasury. He also will bring to pass that if those whose beauty ought to be His honor and joy—mankind, whose love would have given Him more pleasure than a man would find in the love of his wife—if these will not come to Him, will not honor nor rejoice Him, indeed if all but one family desire each to go their own way; yet has this its ground in His highest, in His most liberal greatness, by which He has found means from the very beginning to unfold more and more the wealth of His glorious kingdom, in contrast with such stubbornness, and especially to reveal to us the riches of His grace.

2. Ahasuerus, or Xerxes, who had received this great and powerful kingdom from Darius his father, and who now governed it in its fullest extent, possessed the greatest glory among the people of his own time and those succeeding, as being the greatest and most powerful king. And in the feast, which in our chapter he instituted, he made it his special business to maintain this distinction to its fullest extent. But it is this very feast that while it reveals his greatness, also reminds us of his weakness. Perhaps even then many of his friends felt that he did not quite deserve all the distinction that he claimed for himself. By reason of his thoughtlessness and folly—and this may not have been the first time when these were manifested, though he now revealed them in a more public manner before the eyes of his princes—he demanded of the queen what was against all custom and good breeding. This lapse in moral strength of which he was guilty—in that he lived more for sensual gratification than for the duties of his government—especially reveals the fact that, though never so mighty a king and ruler, yet in fact in himself he was nothing more than a poor slave.

3. While Ahasuerus was intent to show how far the limits of his empire extended, by calling to his court the governors of the most distant provinces, he found in close proximity, yea, in his very house, insubordination to his will. Though he knew how to punish it, yet he could not conquer it, nor turn it into obedience to his wishes.

There is, therefore, a power higher than that of man, were he even the mightiest ruler of earth. Though the latter may prescribe laws and issue commands, the former has long ago set in order His ordinances, indeed stamped them on the very face of nature so deeply, so ineffaceably and unchangeably, that in contrast with human commands, they appear holy and irrefragable, and in case of a conflict bear away the palm of victory. To obey human laws may be a sacred duty; but to follow dutifully the eternally divine ordinances, is a holy and most glorious privilege, which no one must permit to be abrogated. To disobey human commands may be dangerous, may bring temporal disadvantage, but to despise God's laws is degrading, and will bring eternal ruin. If an earthly ruler with his laws come into conflict with divine ordinances, he will begin a war in which he will finally be destroyed. Feuardent: "Not even the heathens were unaware, under the instruction of Plutarch, that a man ought to govern his wife as the soul does the body, not as a master does a beast."

STARKE: "Great pleasure is often followed by equally great displeasure. Occasions of joyous feasting commonly end in sorrow (1 Macc. ix. 41). Wine disperses sorrow and rejoices the heart of man (Sir. xxxi. 32 sq.). In a drinking-company all kinds of useless counsels are generally brought forth (Wis. ii. 10). Men with men, women with women, thus it was among the heathen, and so should it also be among us Christians. How much that is unchaste would thereby be avoided, which is usually found in such gatherings (Sir. xix. 2). Although beauty is a gift of God, still one should not make a boast of it nor yet be proud (Prov. xxxi. 30). Pride occasions much sorrow, and often plunges others into destruction (Sir. iii. 80; Prov. xxix. 23; 1 Pet. v. 5)."

On vers. 13-22. 1. The wise men, on whom Ahasuerus depends to give a decision as to how Vashti should be treated, are both judges and masters of ceremonies. They are to execute law and justice, but they are also to see to it that court-etiquette be maintained. Instead of at once following out the suggestions of his wrath, and doing what he thinks best to be done, Ahasuerus subjects himself to an objective will-power, namely that of law and custom. This in itself is great and beautiful. This is the victory of culture over crudeness and passion. But in the manner in which this is done here, it amounts to nothing after all. We seem to feel in advance that nothing good will come of it. It sounds to us as if the advice of Memucan came from a court of judgment: where what was held to be light is changed into darkness, and what was deemed to be sweet is changed into bitterness. The queen's act, which was at the most but a trivial mistake, is now stamped as a dark crime, and this sentence is supported by them with learned reasons and wise references. There is guardianship of justice and of morals which is nothing more than hypocrisy, by means of which injustice and violence are made a cloak for the performance of abominable deeds. Hence we must seek to know, not what pleases man, but what pleases God. What is good and beautiful in itself is to be sought after. Feuardent: "All might have been explained in a milder sense, and a reasonable excuse might have been offered. She was forbidden to enter that promiscuous assembly by the very modesty which is a woman's chief ornament."

2. However wisely the counsellors of Ahasuerus counsel together, yet all their wisdom in truth is nothing but folly; to such a degree as to cause us to smile, but yet pity. They would forestall the assumptions of the women, and would protect the respect due to men. They suppose that they firmly ground the honor of man, if they suppress the rights of woman. They do not perceive that if they compel woman to be subject to them, even to the sacrifice of her modesty, they will divest her of all humanity, and thereby make her truly and offensively bold and arrogant. Ahasuerus appears equally foolish. By not rendering a decision himself, but deferring to his court for judgment, he would protect himself from the reproach of cruelty and blind passion. But the real responsibility nevertheless falls upon him. Nor does he by any means guard himself against the great loss of a wife, of whom he has been so proud, and whose merits he will so soon be compelled to recognise. Now the question remains, Were other heathen princes or judges really any wiser? We know that it has ever pleased God to bring to shame the wisdom of the world; and we would not hazard much, were we to say that the folly of Ahasuerus and his counsellors would be found repeated more or less in all human measures and arrangements which have not proceeded from a fear of God, but have reference solely to human desire, inclination, and advantage. The divine law only is truly wise, and those who are led thereby are surely protected from loss. Though that law pronounces sentence of banishment against those who are rebellious, still it is just; and even those so banished, if they but come to themselves and look within, must recognise its justice. It only rejects these, to make room for all those who do turn within and strive to give place to grace.

STARKE: "Vers. 18-15. 'For the wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God' (Jas. i. 20). Vers. 16-18. Thus it is ever in the world: as long as one is able to stand, others run to aid, knowing that their help is not needed. When, however, signs of falling are seen, all help to push him down. Ver. 19. True counsellors must set aside all respect for private interests, they must keep their eyes fixed upon public dangers. They must exert themselves to avert general misfortune, though thereby they even endanger their own welfare. Oh that all great lords would have respect to the laws of the great God, as they desire to have their laws respected! God's law is truly of such a nature and obligatory character upon us that it neither can nor should be changed. Vers. 20, 21. This is the manner of all great lords; when their honor is insulted, they are very severe, and promptly bring their laws into execution. But when God's honor is insulted, then they are easily quieted, and can readily and quickly change their purposes."

A.—ESTHER IS RAISED TO THE PLACE OF VASHTI, AND MORDECAI MAKES HIMSELF DESERVING OF THE FAVOR OF AHASUERUS.

CHAP. II. 1-23.

I. Esther's Elevation. Vers. 1-18.

- 1 AFTER these things [words], when [as] the wrath of king Ahasuerus was appeased [subsided], he remembered Vashti, and what she had done, and what was 2 decreed against her. Then [And] said the king's servants [young men] that ministered unto him [his waiters], Let there be fair [good of appearance] young
 3 virgins sought [let them seek] for the king: And let the king appoint officers in all the provinces of his kingdom, that they may [and let them] gather together all the fair young virgins [every young virgin good of appearance] unto Shushan the palace, to the house of the women, unto the custody [hand] of Hegai the king's chamberlain [eunuch], keeper of the women; and let their things for purification
 4 be given them [let there be a giving their furbishments]: And let the maiden [young woman] which pleaseth [that seems good to] the king be queen instead of Vashti. And the thing pleased [seemed good to] the king, and he did so.
- 5 Now in Shushan the palace there was a certain [man] Jew, whose [and his] name was Mordecai, the son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite, 6 Who had been carried away [made captive] from Jerusalem with the captivity which had been carried away [made captive] with Jechoniah king of Judah, whom 7 Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away [made captive]. And he brought up [was supporting] Hadassah (that is Esther) his uncle's daughter; for she had neither father nor mother, and the maid [young woman] was fair [beautiful of figure] and beautiful [good of appearance];<sup>1</sup> whom [and her] Mordecai, when her father and mother were dead, took for his own [to him for a] daughter.
- 8 So [And] it came to pass [was], when the king's commandment [word] and his decree was heard, and when many maidens [young women] were gathered together unto Shushan the palace, to the custody [hand] of Hegai, that [and, i. e. then] Esther was brought [taken] also unto the king's house, to the custody [hand] of 9 Hegai, keeper of the women. And the maiden [young woman] pleased him [seemed good in his eyes], and she obtained kindness of [received favor before] him; and he speedily gave [hastened to give] her her things for purification [furbishments], with [and] such things as belonged to her [her portions], and seven maidens [young women], which were meet [seen, i. e. chosen] to be given [give] her, out of the king's house: and he preferred [changed] her and her maids [young 10 women] unto the best [good] place of the house of the women. Esther had not showed [told] her people nor [and] her kindred [lineage]: for Mordecai had 11 charged [enjoined upon] her that she should not show [tell] it. And Mordecai walked [was walking to and fro] every day [continually]<sup>2</sup> before the court of the women's house, to know how Esther did [the peace, i. e. welfare of Esther], and what should become of [be done with] her.
- 12 Now [And], when every [each] maid's turn was come [approached] to go in to [the] king Ahasuerus, after that she had been [at the end of her being] twelve months, according to the manner [law] of the women, (for so were the days of their purifications [furbishments] accomplished, to wit, six months with oil of myrrh,

- and six months with sweet odors [spices], and with other things for the purifying [furbishments] of the women.) Then [And] thus [in this time] came every maiden unto the king; whatsoever she desired [might say] was [would be] given her, to go with her out of the house of the women unto the king's house. In the evening she went, and on the morrow [in the morning] she returned into the second house of the women, to the custody [hand] of Shaashgaz the king's chamberlain [eunuch], which kept [keeping] the concubines: she came [would come] in unto the king no more, except the king delighted in her, and that she were called by name.
- 15 Now [And] when the turn of Esther, the daughter of Abihail the uncle of Mordecai, who had taken her for his [to him for a] daughter, was come [approached] to go in unto the king, she required [sought] nothing but what Hegai the king's chamberlain [eunuch], the keeper of [keeping] the women, appointed [might say]: and Esther obtained [was receiving] favor in the sight [eyes] of all them that looked upon [seeing] her. So [And] Esther was taken unto [the] king Ahasuerus into his house royal in the tenth month, which is the month Tebeth, in the seventh year of his reign. And the king loved Esther above all the women, and she obtained [received] grace [favor] and favor [mercy] in his sight [before him] more than all the virgins; so that [and] he set the royal crown upon her head, and made her queen instead of Vashti. Then [And] the king made a great feast [banquet] unto all his princes and his servants, even Esther's feast [banquet]; and he made a release [rest] to the provinces, and gave gifts [a contribution] according to the state [hand] of the king.

II. Mordecai makes himself deserving of the favor of Ahasuerus. Vers. 18-20.

- 19 And when the virgins were gathered together the second time, then Mordecai sat [was sitting] in the king's gate. Esther had not yet showed [was not telling] her kindred [lineage] nor [and] her people, as Mordecai had charged [enjoined upon] her: for Esther did the commandment [saying] of Mordecai, like as [what she was] when she was brought up [in her being supported] with him. In those days, while [and, i. e. when] Mordecai sat [was sitting] in the king's gate, two of the king's chamberlains, Bigthan and Teresh, of those which kept [keeping] the door [threshold] were wroth [was enraged], and sought to lay hand on the king Ahasuerus. And the thing [word] was known to Mordecai, who [and he] told it unto Esther the queen, and Esther certified [said to] the king thereof in Mordecai's name. And when inquisition was made of [they sought] the matter [word], [and] it was found out; therefore [and] they were both hanged on a tree: and it was written in the book of the Chronicles [words (i. e. deeds) of the days] before the king.

Vers. 1-4. Plan for procuring a new Queen.—The history which informs us how Ahasuerus caused virgins to be brought together from all the parts of his kingdom; how in consequence he loved Esther in the place of Vashti, begins properly here, at the point when the anger of the king against Vashti had allayed, and when he thought of what she had done, and what was determined respecting her. In view of ver. 16 we would be led to assume, since Esther was brought to the king's palace in the seventh year, and the tenth month of the year, that now we stand in the fifth or even the sixth year of the reign of Ahasuerus. Hence there would be between ch. i. (comp. ver. 8) and chap. ii. a period of nearly three years. We may assume that it did not take longer than a half year to execute the order here given; and the preparation of the virgins described in ver. 12 did not continue more than a year. Meanwhile Ahasuerus was employed in Greece during the sixth year of his reign, but he returned in the seventh. In all probability we are still in the time of the Grecian war. We may also very naturally conclude that under the circumstances many years were not suffered to pass before it was thought to find a substitute for Vashti. This resolution was formed soon after the rejection of Vashti, but its execution may have been delayed because of the newly undertaken Grecian war. The literal meaning of ver. 1 seems to be that Ahasuerus rued in his sober moments what had passed, that hence the fear might have arisen lest he would now direct his anger from Vashti and let it fall upon his counsellors.

שָׁכַב, to let down, to lie down, is here and in chap. vii. 10, spoken of the swellings of anger, in Gen. viii. 1, of movements of water, and is related to שָׁחַב, to be low or become low. גָּזַר is to decide, to conclude firmly, irrevocably, comp. גִּזְרָה, Dan. iv. 14.

Ver. 2. The youths* that served before the king sought to avert the danger that threatened. Those here mentioned are his attendants (comp. Neh. iv. 10), who were employed about his person (comp. chap. vi. 3, 5). They advised that maidens, virgins, be brought to the king, and that these should be beautiful to look upon. בְּקָשָׁה, the 8d pers. plur., represents, as is usual in the Aram., the impersonal "one," as a passive expression. עֲרֹלוֹת, marriageable persons, is in itself too indefinite to be other than an appendage to בְּתוּלוֹת.†

Ver. 3. They also gave the plan of execution of this project: The king, through his appointed officers, or through specially authorized men, was to cause to be brought together from all the provinces of his kingdom the most beautiful virgins, and placed under the hand of Hege in the house of the women. This Hege was the chief eunuch of the king, the keeper of the women, under whose care and direction every young maiden taken into the harem was placed, and by him prepared for one whole year to go into the presence of the king (comp. ver. 12). הֵגֶה in vers. 8 and 15 called הִגָּה, was, as above stated, the chief overseer of the king's harem.‡ And let their things for purification be given (them).—נָתַן, the infin. absol., gives prominence to the act purely as such, since it presupposes the subject as being self-evident: "Let them be given" [rather, "Let there be a giving"]. תְּמַרְקָה (comp. vers. 9 and 12), from מָרַק, to rub, to cleanse, to make clean, is an abstract image, purification in the sense of cleansing; while מְוִקִּים in ver. 12 means rather [passively] become cleansed, or pure. Evidently such a purification meant a cleansing and anointing with precious oils, ver. 4. Their purpose was that the one who should please the king might become queen in the room of Vashti. מֶלֶךְ here speaks of the queen, as it elsewhere does of the king. Ahasuerus approved of this proposition also (comp. chap. i. 21).

Vers. 5-7. Now our author can and must make a reference to Mordecai and Esther as the chief persons on the one side in the conflict that is to follow. Ver. 5. A certain Jew—remained about there—in Shushan the palace—whose name (was) Mordecai.—It is a characteristic of our author in his vivid mode of statement that, instead of continuing the connection, he makes use of וַיֵּלֶךְ, so taking a fresh start (comp. chap. i. 9, 10). Thus a new element, which comes into play in this history, receives greater prominence.

The name Mordecai, which in the later recensions is not written מֶרְדֵּכִי, but מֶרְדֵּכִי, has perhaps connection with the Persian mordkai, "little man" (mannikin). Its derivation from the name of the Chaldee God, Merodach, is, however, extremely improbable. Its import is equally as uncertain with that of most of the names mentioned in chap. i.* The son of Jair, the son of Shimei, the son of Kish, a Benjamite.—According to most commentators, also Clericus and Rambach, Jair, Shimei and Kish were the nearest antecedents of Mordecai.† Still it is much more natural to hold with Josephus, who traces the genealogy of Esther to a royal house, that King Saul is meant (Arch. XI. 6); while both Targums hold both Shimei and Kish as being much earlier in the line, namely, identical with the men mentioned in the Books of Samuel, Shimei, the son of Gera, who cursed David (2 Sam. xvi. 5 sqq.; 1 Ki. ii. 8, 36 sqq.), and Kish, the father of Saul (1 Sam. ix. 1; 1 Chron. viii. 83). This agrees with the statement that the former Shimei, the same as the one here mentioned, should have been a son of Kish. In 1 Sam. xvi. 5 he is designated as being of the lineage of Saul. Further we discover that Mordecai, by this derivation, was a Benjamite, and that already by this genealogical descent he is placed in opposition to Haman as his enemy. This is most clearly shown by our author in designating

* ["Mordecai has been probably identified with a certain Matucas, who, according to Ctesias, was the most powerful of the eunuchs during the latter part of the reign of Xerxes. . . . That Mordecai was a eunuch is implied by his adoption of a young female cousin, and also by the ready access which he had to the harem of Ahasuerus." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

† [So also Rawlinson: "If the writer had intended to derive Mordecai from a royal stock, he would scarcely have omitted the name of Saul himself. Nor would he have designated Kish as a mere 'Benjamite.' The same writer adds that on the supposition 'that the list is simply the true line of Mordecai's descent from a certain Kish otherwise unknown, who was his grandfather,' and had been carried away by Nebuchadnezzar; then 'the four generations, Kish, Shimei, Jair, Mordecai, exactly fill up the space of 130 years from Jeconiah's captivity to the latter half of Xerxes' reign. . . . The age of Mordecai at the accession of Xerxes may have been about 30 or 40; that of Esther, his first cousin, about 20." Still these coincidences seem to be outweighed by the considerations advanced by our author.—Ta.]

* [עַרְ], however, like waîs in Greek, and boy in English, often denotes merely a male domestic, with little regard to age.—Ta.]

† [Id here, however, denotes something additional to the charms of the candidates for the queenly state. All young females are not virgins, nor are all virgins young. These were to be both, and more besides, to be fair.—Ta.]

the latter as an Agagite (comp. ob. iii. 1). It is also well known that it was a custom of Biblical historians not to give the genealogy complete, but rather to form a connection more or less close with celebrated names of the older times (comp. e. g. Maseiah in Neh. xi. 5, the son of Shiloni; or Pethahiah, Neh. xi. 24, the son of Judah; or Shallum, 1 Chron. ix. 19, the son of Korah). The relative sentence in ver. 6: Who had been carried away from Jerusalem with the captivity, which had been carried away with Jeconiah king of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar the king of Babylon had carried away cannot by any means be referred to the last named Kish, as is thought by older commentators, and also by Clericus and Baumgarten (I. c. p. 127), but only to Mordecai, to whom special reference is made as being a Benjamite. Not only the analogy of similar personal designations found in the Scriptures demands this, but especially the circumstance that this reference to Kish as a Benjamite would be purely arbitrary. Thus it gives the appearance as if Mordecai had himself belonged to the first period of the exile, and not his great grand-father, and as if the history of our book, instead of belonging to the period of Xerxes, really belonged to the period of a pre-existing king of Media (perhaps to that of Cyaxares, comp. chap. i. 1). For the assumption that Mordecai had lived from the beginning of the exile up to the time of Xerxes, and then, being perhaps 120–130 years old, had become prime minister, is quite improbable. So is also the statement that he was identical with the Mordecai mentioned in Ezra ii. 2; Neh. vii. 7, an exile returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel and Joshua, but afterwards coming back again to Chaldæa, or rather to Shushan (Rambach). The contrast with the youth of Esther renders it in that case well nigh impossible then that she should come into notice here. Still this natural consideration may be deceptive. Since all the other incidents point to the later time of Xerxes, we are justified, indeed compelled, to bear in mind that mode of speech which was then employed. This treats of things done by predecessors as having been witnessed by their progeny, who had a certain part in them; such an analogy is found in Gen. xlv. 8 sqq. Perhaps also the expression here indicates in advance that Mordecai had been carried away not only along with Jeconiah, but also together with the captives led away at the time of Jeconiah.* One thing, however, is clear: that though a Benjamite, he belonged to the "captivity" of Judah, and not to that of Israel, to which Joachim Lange would assign him. But in this place reference is made to him, as is indicated in ver. 7, because of his relationship to Esther. And he brought up Hadassah [that is, Esther] his uncle's daughter.—יָחִידָא, a participle connected with an accus., means a guardian (2 Ki. xi. 5; Num. xi. 12), but it may also mean one who cares for, or who is a foster-parent (Isa. xlix. 23). מִרְיָה, myrtle, usually masc. מִרְיָה, plur. מִרְיָהִים, may be compared with the Greek names for maidens, Mupria, Muppiya. The phrase, "that is, Esther," has joined with it also the other name by which she has become known. Without doubt she received this at the Persian court. אֶסְתֵּר is old Persian stara with * prosth.; see the term for star, modern Persian stareh, Greek astrop. As the daughter of his uncle, his father's brother, hence also his cousin, it was very likely that she was somewhat younger than her foster-father, but not one hundred or more years younger, as would be the case if he had lived at the beginning of the exile. Her father's name, according to ver. 15, was Abihail.

In vers. 8–11 it follows how Esther, and through her Mordecai, were involved in the history of Ahasuerus. Ver. 8. So it came to pass (literally "when was heard," comp. chap. i. 20 and Neh. vi. 1), when the king's commandment and his decree was heard—i. e., the decree of the king as expressed in the publicly proclaimed law, so that all were obliged to give it obedience; among other maidens Esther was brought also into the king's house.—Perhaps quite a time was allowed to elapse before executing the decree, on account of the war with Greece, which had broken out meanwhile. It is quite certain, according to what follows, that Esther was not brought into the palace of the king Ahasuerus before the sixth year of his reign.

Ver. 9. Now since Esther appeared very beautiful in the eyes of Hegai, and found favor in his sight מִצָּחַק וְיָחִידָא (vers. 15, 17; chap. v. 2) occurs only in our book, commonly יָחִידָא, to obtain or bear away grace or favor—he speedily gave her her things for purification with such things as belonged to her (comp. ver. 8). מְנוּחָה are portions, not so much of oils for anointing as rather good food (comp. chap. ix. 19, 22). Perhaps those maidens that were selected by the king received during their time of purification an especially good diet (comp. Dan. i. 5). But they were prepared one after the other. Hegai expedited matters that Esther should be counted among the virgins of the harem as soon as possible. The accus.: the things for her purification and such things as belonged to her, does not depend upon יָחִידָא, but upon לָחֵץ לָחֵץ; the object is placed before the infin. according to Aramaean usage. But the infin. is here added after the following object; and "the seven maidens selected" is repeated, lest the previous objective statement might seem too long. The seven maidens selected, i. e. from the king's service, were by law given to her as servants and to keep her company. רְאִיתָא means primarily selected for a definite purpose (comp. מִרְיָה, Dan. iii. 19); in the Talmud and Rabbins רְאִיתָא takes the meaning of dignus, decens, conveniens.*—And he preferred

* ["The relative clause, 'Who had been carried away' need not be so strictly understood as to assert that Mordecai himself was carried away; but the object being to give merely his origin and lineage, and not his history, it involves only the notion that he belonged to those Jews who were carried to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar with Jeconiah, so that he, though born in captivity, was carried to Babylon in the persons of his forefathers." KEIL.—Tr.]

her and her maids unto the best (place) of the house of the women, i. e. an especially good and beautiful part of it, the state-rooms of the women's house. Thus she might in every respect live as belonged to the distinction awaiting her.

Ver. 10. Esther owed this fortune next to her fairness to the shrewdness of Mordecai. Because of his advice Esther had not showed her people nor her kindred, as being one of the captive and despised Jews, else she would soon have been set back. Mordecai showed his love and shrewdness also in this, that even now he kept up his relationship to her. And Mordecai walked every day before the court of the women's house, to know how Esther did, and what should become of her.—This was to find out whether she was really in preparation for the king. It appears that he could still approach her without hindrance, whereas in chap. iv. it is stated, that when he put on clothes of mourning, he was no more permitted either to stand in the gate of the king, or to pass up and down before the house of the women. Perhaps the laws of the harem were in those days not so strict that, though he could not speak to Esther directly, still he could find out about her by her associate maidens. We have neither a right nor claim on the explanation of Jewish commentators that he was a Persian official high in rank, and therefore he had admittance to her (comp. ver. 19).*

Vers. 12-18. Esther was preferred before all the other virgins. But in order to give prominence to the modesty and simplicity of Esther, our author tells us beforehand, in vers. 12-14, what would have been granted her in this decisive hour had she requested it. Now when every maid's turn was come to go in to king Ahasuerus, etc.—תור, really order, according to Ewald, § 146 d, probably connected with תורת (comp. 1 Chron. xvii. 17), here in our verse corresponds to "turn," "row" (ver. 15); comp. תור, rows, chains, Cantio. i. 11. So instead of saying: "When the turn of each maid came," we would say: "When it was the turn of each maid." After that she had been twelve months, according to the manner of the women.—One would be led to expect: "At the end of twelve months, after that," etc. But the author desires to give expression to the thought: "At the end of the purifications and necessary preparations." The "manner of the women" does not mean the custom of the women (Gen. xviii. 11; xxxi. 85, (Mericus), for it would not then be necessary to add "twelve months;" but it is the law prescribing those preparations which are more fully set forth in what follows. The term "women" instead of "maidens" must not seem strange to us at this place any more than תַּמְרִינִי at the end of the verse. Six months with the oil of myrrh, etc., is more fully supplemented by: "They were purified" or prepared. The purifications of the women last mentioned are still other means which were employed by the women for this purpose. The clause following in ver. 13 should perhaps read: "At the coming of every maiden to the king all these things were given her," etc. For this is really the declaration upon which a fact is based, namely, that when Esther came, she required nothing more of Hegai than what he appointed, as is stated in ver. 15. The expression: "At her coming" is made with a previous clause of condition, and is attached by the conjunction "and" to the sentence gone before; and it is also connected in its participial form with the principal sentence, so that it is best introduced by the terms "and when" or "now when" (comp. Job i. 13, 16, 17 seq., and Ewald, § 341 d). Such participial sentences of condition as are found in ver. 14 correspond to the nominative absolute, somewhat like the genitive absolute of the Greeks. Then thus came (every) maiden unto the king; whatsoever she desired was given her to go with her.—

וְכָל may be understood to mean from that time, as does also the Sept., i. e., illo, sc. tempore; but it may also have reference to the condition, hoc modo, sc. ornata (comp. וְכָל, chap. iv. 16). The subject, "whatever" (all that), precedes for emphasis, and does not mean a companion (Rambach)—opposed to this is ver. 15—but all kinds of articles of decoration and of precious value with which she would decorate herself to appear before the king. The lot that befel most virgins in spite of all preparation and decoration is also on this account made note of by the author in ver. 14, in order to give due prominence to the good fortune that came to Esther in her simplicity and attractive demeanor by placing it in such contrast. In the evening she went, and on the morrow she returned into the second house of the women, to the custody of Shaashgaz, etc.—וְשָׁשְׂגַז is for שָׁשְׂגַז, as in Neh. iii. 80; another part of the harem which was occupied by the concubines. Shaashgaz, who had the special oversight over the concubines, may have been a subordinate officer. She came in unto the king no more, except the king, etc.—We find that וְכָל is in other good MSS. also written with the usual punctuation וְכָל.

Following ver. 15 we have Esther's conduct and success. Now when the turn of Esther, the daughter of Abihail, the uncle of Mordecai, who had taken her for his daughter, was come, etc. Thus fully is this account given, since now the decisive moment had come, in which she should come into such an important relation to her people. She required nothing but what Hegai the king's chamberlain, the keeper of the women, appointed.—Not, perhaps, because of shrewdness, as if she depended on the fact that Hegai understood best the taste of the king; she did not design to please the king by means of ornamentation, and only put on what was deemed indispensable by Hegai.* And Esther obtained favor in the sight of all them that looked upon her.—She was attractive, sc. in this momentous hour. וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ, like וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ, in ver. 9.—[Ver. 16. The month Tebeth.—“This word, which does not occur elsewhere in Scripture, is singularly like that of the corresponding Egyptian month, Tobi or Tubai. A name but slightly different is found in the Palmyrian inscriptions (Gesenius, Thesaur., p. 543). Tebeth corresponded nearly to our January.”—RAWLINSON.]

Ver. 17. And the king loved Esther, and made her queen instead of Vashti: no doubt at the time of the first interview.

Ver. 18. In addition he also made a joyous marriage-feast, viz.: a great feast unto all his princes and his servants (even) Esther's feast.—Perhaps such a feast, named in honor of the queen, was a custom on these occasions, and its import is this: Esther's marriage with the king was thereby celebrated in due form. To this it may be added that Ahasuerus gave to the provinces a release, and gave gifts, according to the state of the king.—The verbal form of the Hiphil of וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ in Chaldee may mean a release from taxes: the Sept. has it more indefinitely as ἀπερως. But the Vulg. has it reguias, as if it meant only a day of rest, for which וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ may be more appropriate. וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ, according to Amos v. 11; Jer. xl. 5, is a gift of corn or articles of food. וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ, as in chap. i. 7.

Vers. 19–23. The author connects with the elevation of Esther a meritorious act of Mordecai, namely, the discovery of a conspiracy against the life of Ahasuerus. This fact, though not at once apparent as to its present bearing, became of very great importance in the history yet to be developed. And it could even now serve to confirm the hope, by means of Esther's elevation, that henceforth an especially good time was coming for Judaism in Persia. Mordecai, who had previously shown himself a very shrewd man, now also reveals himself as a righteous subject. It seems that he, even more than Esther, was to be celebrated. The introductory sentences in vers. 19 and 20 are very obscure. And when the virgins were gathered together the second time, then Mordecai sat in the king's gate.—It may be asked what is meant by this second gathering of virgins. Clericus thinks “they seem on the first occasion to have been collected into the various provinces, and afterwards at Susa, before they were introduced into the royal gynæceum. The writer returns to what had happened before the marriage of Esther.” So likewise Grotius: “It is an ἐπαυδοῦς or retrogression; for reference is made to the incidents in chap. ii. 2.”

* [“No doubt the virgins generally took the opportunity—one that would occur but once in their lives—to load themselves with precious ornaments of various kinds, necklaces, bracelets, ear-rings, anklets and the like. Esther allowed Hegai to dress her as he would.”—RAWLINSON. Thus, as ever, it proved that true piety is the highest ornament, even in a heathen's sight; and modesty is the brightest jewel of female beauty (1 Pet. iii. 3, 4).]—T.L.]

But the word וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ does not well correspond to this, nor the circumstance that, now, according to ver. 20 sqq., Esther is already queen: so that Mordecai now no more takes his post at the inclosure of the house of the women, but in the gate of the king, and thus through him she is enabled to give information to Ahasuerus. Drusus and Bertheau assume that the writer speaks here of the gathering or transfer of those maids who had been with the king into the other part of the house of the women which was under the care of Shaashgaz. Thus we may explain the fact that Mordecai no longer walked up and down before the house of the women, but stopped in the gate of the king, and was at his post when the virgins were conducted from the house of the king back to the house of the women, where he might expect that Esther would pass, since as the beloved queen she frequently came to the king. But then we would not read of a gathering, especially one of virgins, וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ. Besides וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ does not well have a place in this explanation, and the idea that in the gate of the king one would be nearer to the women when returning from the king's palace is incorrect. The choice of the same expression וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ, which was employed in verses 3 and 8 with reference to the first collection of women, as well as then וְהָיָה כִּי יִשָּׁאָהּ, leads to the sense, as is recognised by Corn. & Lapide, as also by more modern expositors, Keil included, that after the elevation of Esther a still further collection of virgins was made, perhaps of such as came from distant provinces, and who arrived later. We must keep in mind that the selection of Esther did not prohibit Ahasuerus from loving other virgins also and crowning them queens, even though she had the preference before all the others. Solomon had seven hundred queens and three hundred concubines. The latter were only secundariæ uxores (concubines). Then it may further be asked, What purpose was served by the mention of the second gathering in this connection? Keil's assumption that thereby the period of the history following is designated, is insufficient, especially since it does not well serve as a designation of a period of time. The words immediately following make it probable that it was intended thereby to express how Mordecai could before this remain the more readily and oftener at his post in the gate of the king without attracting attention, or even without regard being paid to him. It may be assumed that at that time people did often come to the gate of the king except when the virgins had arrived, and in order to see them, while at other times they remained away. Usually, however, it was the seat for the officials, whether high or low in position (comp. chap. iii. 2, 3, and Dan. ii. 49; also Xenophon's Cyrop. VIII., 1, 6; Herodot. II., 120). We find nothing leading us to suppose that Mordecai was already an officer of the court, and as such had a place in the gate. If such had been the case it would have been mentioned, since, as an explanation to sitting in the king's gate, it was essential to the matter in hand. But, in chap. iii. 2, we again find him sitting in the king's gate, and that too, day after day. This may be accounted for. We may assume that, in consequence of the event stated of him in this place, he had in a certain sense obtained the right to stand among the servants of the king who had their position there. A confirmation of this view may be found in ver. 20, the object of which, without this connection, will remain obscure. Esther had not (yet) shewed her kindred nor her people, etc. If we look at what follows, where the door-keepers did not pay much regard to him, the sense seems to be: Mordecai did not remain there as the foster-father of Esther, for as such he would have been a distinguished personage, and one to be feared, but simply as an unimportant stranger. The reference is clearly to ver. 10. The author, in the repetition of this remark, and as is also clearly shown by the use of the participle, desires to indicate that Esther, as from the first so now also, maintained a strict secrecy, even after having become queen. Besides, the position of the word מְלִכָּה is notable. כֹּלֶלֶת, in distinction from עַץ, signifies the family connection or relationship, kindred. This is here placed first, because the relation of Esther to Mordecai is under consideration. The strong emphasis laid on the fact that Mordecai had so instructed her, that she only carried out his wishes, as when she was under his care, seems to oppose the opinion that she did it from other reasons, as that she was ashamed of her descent, and hence kept silence. מְלִכָּה here means "like as when;" comp. Job

x. 19, where it signifies "as if." אֲמֵנָה, education, care, has the raphe over the ה, so that the ending may not be taken for a suffix.

Vers. 21-23. In these days when Mordecai sat in the gate of the king, Bigthan and Teresh,* two of the king's chamberlains, of those which kept the door (Sept. ἀρχισυναγώγαι), or watchmen of the palace (comp. 2 Kings xii, 10), were wroth, became angry (רָצַח), and sought to lay hand on the king.† Contrary to ver. 20 the Sept. adds: Because Mordecai had become distinguished. But the matter became known to Mordecai in some way, according to Josephus through the Jewish slave of one of the conspirators; in truth, perhaps, because the lower officers, who had become party to the conspiracy, did not exercise sufficient discretion. Mordecai, through Esther, gave the king notice thereof.

Ver. 23. The matter was investigated, and it was so found, i. e., established, and they were both hanged on a tree, i. e., they were hung on a stake, or impaled; a customary mode of crucifixion (comp. chaps. v. 14; vi. 4; vii. 9, 10; Ezra vi. 11; and Herodot. III., 125).‡ These events were recorded in the book of the history of the reign, i. e., in the chronicles of the empire (comp. chaps. vi. 1; x. 2; Ezra iv. 15), and that before the king, which may mean, either in his presence, so that he might be assured of their correct insertion, or that the chronicles of the empire were deposited before him, in his palace (comp. chap. vi. 1). It was a Persian custom to insert the names of those into the chronicles of the empire, who had deserved well of the king, as is confirmed by Herodot. VIII., 85. He also relates that Xerxes, on his campaign against Greece, had historians in his train, who were required to record the deeds of the Persians in a book.*

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

It is of the every-day life of a purely worldly, of a heathen court, that the author of our chapter treats. This moves in the high places of this world, and yet it is a very low life. Ahasuerus begins to feel the loss which he has brought on himself by the rejection of his wife, and his courtiers advise him to procure for his lust another, most liberal indulgence. He lends an ear to their suggestion, and orders what might be expected to follow as a matter of course. Nothing seems more improbable in these events than a divine control and government; and we would hardly be led to expect the thoughts and guidance of God under such circumstances. Yet we are soon made aware that we are standing right in the midst of divine providence. Independent as the world may appear in its outward life, still the Lord knows how to make even the lowest impulses and movements—indeed even the sin present in them—serviceable to His purposes. While on the one side Ahasuerus desires nothing but to find the most beautiful of virgins, God on the other side places Esther in the right position, and through her brings help and protection to His people in the face of the dangers that threaten them on the part of the world. He permits His people to become involved in the low life of the world, nay, He has humbled them to such an extent that even their virgins must be brought to Shushan at the king's command. But in thus revealing the full depth of their degradation He also begins again to elevate them. Besides, it is remarkable, how the life of human love, even in its sunken state, can illustrate the work of divine Love. For just as Ahasuerus caused virgins to be brought together from all peoples and tribes, in order to select the most beautiful for himself, so God has in a certain sense tested all the peoples of mankind to see if He could find one that would be peculiarly His own. And then, in preference to all others, however many there might be, and however many excellencies they might have in certain directions, He would select the one least noticed as His bride and spouse.

On vers. 1-7. The author permits us here to take a hasty but deep insight into the domestic life of a powerful and wealthy heathen ruler, who lives in the world merely to live, and on the other hand he gives us a view into the every-day life of a seemingly poor Jew, who is also despised in the common lot of his people, but who nevertheless incontestably stands under the blessing of his fathers. Ahasuerus, amid all his wealth and splendor, feels an oppressive want. He remembers his wife whom he has rejected, and especially regrets the wrong which he has done her. Without doubt the feeling gains a place in him that the loss of a personal being whom he could call peculiarly his own, was a loss which could not be made good by any other possession, however precious. And the wrong which he thinks he had experienced from her, is, like all the wrongs of men of the world of which they accuse each other, rather of a doubtful kind. It may be a question whether it could not have been excused, or even taken in a good sense. In truth it was only because of his despotic and mistaken view of common rights, which even the wife has, that caused him to reject her. He had trampled under foot her feminine feelings. Nevertheless she was now for ever lost to him. He was not prudent, not cautious enough. He must even confess to himself that though he had consulted his counsellors, he still had acted in a passionate manner, and given too free a rein to his wrath. Though surrounded by affluence, he is yet discontented, more especially with himself; he is filled with vexation and conflict, though no one has dared to oppose him. Of course there are not wanting those who recommend to him means and ways for shaking off this oppressive feeling. One thing, however, is evident: he cannot attain to a true satisfaction in the manner which they recommend to him as regards the points in question. This can only be brought about by true love. But love, as is beautifully shown and carried out in Canticles, cannot be commanded nor yet purchased; it can only be won, and can only be brought into life and sustained by true love's labor. The view into the domestic life of Ahasuerus is, therefore, a view of the brilliant, but hopeless misery of heathendom, which only deceives the sensual fool with reference to its true nature, but which convinces those more circumspect of the poverty of those living without God in the world.

* ("Bigthan (the Bigtha of ch. i. 10) is probably the Old-Persian Bagadana, i. e., God-given. Teresh is by some derived from tars, 'to fear'; but it is more like a foreign than a Persian name." RAWLINSON.—Tr.)

How different a picture is presented to us in the domestic life of Mordecai! Mordecai is a lowly descendant of a formerly distinguished, indeed royal family. He belongs to the scattered foreigners fallen under contempt, who were carried away captives from Jerusalem. He is in a strange land. He has, it appears, neither father nor mother, neither wife nor child. Even his relatives, his uncle and his aunt, are dead. But the latter left an orphan; he is to her a father, she to him a daughter, indeed a precious treasure. Doubtless he is aware how great a trust was left to him in her and with her, how God is justly called the Father of orphans, and that He especially blesses those who pity and minister to them. He knows his duty toward her, and its fulfilment brings to him satisfaction, makes him happy. God has blessed her with beauty, but what is more, He has bestowed on her an obedient, humble, and unassuming spirit, as is afterward fully shown by her conduct in the royal house of the women, and as had doubtless been often manifested before. She loves her people, and surely also its customs, laws, and religion. Thus she is to him indeed a Hadassah, a myrtle in the true sense of the word, an unpromising and yet promising bud. Indeed to him she has developed into a lovely flower of hope; and though it happen that she is taken into the royal house of the women, she will still be to him a lovely flower, whose presence he seeks, whose prosperity lies at his heart day by day, whose development will cause him to rejoice. Again she will more and more become to him a brilliant star, an Esther (aster), in whose light he views his own and his people's future. In this manner his life is not poor, though he appear insignificant and obscure, though it be filled with painful reminiscences and great perplexities which he must combat daily in his heathen surroundings. On the contrary he is rich in light and hope; and even if he had realized the latter in a less degree than he eventually did, still his existence would not have been in vain.

On vers. 8-11. That which gave Esther distinction above all the other virgins, who were at the same time selected with her, and whereby she obtained first the favor of the keeper of the harem, and then the love of Ahasuerus, was certainly not merely greater personal beauty. This would hardly have made such a favorable impression upon the eunuch. But it was rather a certain graciousness of being and carriage, which could only be present where the spiritual element does not occupy a lower plane than the physical, as was the fact with most Persian poorly-trained maidens, but rather where the spiritual element elevates and transfigures the mere bodily element. This grace had its ground partly in her fortune, but also for a great part in the spiritual nature of Judaism through the blessing of an adoration of the true, exalted, and spiritual God. It was therefore not without reason that the then existing Jews thought themselves recognised and honored in the preference of Esther, which, no doubt, they did to its full extent. They all more or less participated in her spiritual advantages, or at least all could or should have participated in them. This, however, affords little ground for beholding in the victory she won an indication of the triumph which Judaism, then so oppressed and despised, should obtain over proud heathendom at large. Nevertheless in the before insignificant but lovely Hadassah, who is now the powerful Esther, we see a symbol of the weaker but better element in Israel perfecting itself as the powerful community of the Spirit in the Christian church, which will yet conquer the world.

LUTHER: "Whatever heart is thus minded, will bear ornamentation without danger to itself; for it bears and yet does not bear, dances and yet dances not, lives well and yet not well. These are the heavenly souls, the sacred brides of Christ; but they are scarce. For it is difficult not to have a lust for great ornamentation and display." STOLBERG: "Undazzled by splendor and royalty, the tender virgin rejected all these things. With noble simplicity she took the ornaments, neither selecting nor demanding anything, which the chief chamberlain brought to her. Even after she became queen above all the wives of the king, her heart still clung not only with gratitude, but with childlike obedience, to her pious uncle and foster-father, as in the time when he trained her as a little girl."

On vers. 12-18. In the small compass of what has here been said respecting heathen virgins on the one hand and Esther on the other, we find a beautiful picture of the world and of the kingdom of God—the opposite tendencies as also destinies, by which these conceptions are designated. Doubtless the heathen maids decorated themselves with all possible precious things, for the evening for which they had so long prepared themselves by their purifications and anointings, in order to make the best possible impression upon Ahasuerus, upon whose favor or disfavor their whole future happiness of life depended. But by all this tinsel they gained nothing more than to look beautiful in their own eyes, and that for a moment which flew away so soon, and in which they were allowed to harbor hope. The majority were only permitted to see the king, and thereafter for ever to bury their hopes. For them there remained the sad lot of the concubines; they must bid farewell to the joys which they might have had in another sphere of life, without obtaining any compensation for that loss in their strict seclusion. The elevated feeling that they had fulfilled their life-work must for ever be denied them. They had missed their life-purpose; life became to them more and more a uniform dark monotony. In like manner the children of this world act and deceive themselves. Although they are firmly intent on enjoying the pleasures of life, although they direct all their endeavors to this one object, and prepare and decorate themselves in their way at their very best, still they enjoy it but for a single fleeting moment. Esther, on the other hand, was distinguished by her lack of desire or claim to shine in external decoration. She only put on, what so to speak, was forced upon her. But she was thereafter beautiful not only in her own eyes, but in the eyes of all that beheld her.

Thus also her fortune was not a speedy disappointment; she really obtained, not what she had desired, but what she had never hoped nor expected. She really obtained a favorable intercourse with the king; she became his choice, his wife, she became queen. All these things plainly indicate that she possessed in an unusual degree God's favor and friendship, which still accompanied her. The children of God enjoy a still higher happiness. They who reckon it to be a great favor to serve God in all simplicity, yea to be even door-keepers in His sanctuary, are made His chosen and loved ones, if in other respects they have properly decorated themselves for Him. He adopts them as His children, and cares for them according to what is needful for them, even with temporal blessings; for the meek shall inherit the earth. He also elevates them to kings and priests, and adorns them with the crown of life, for He brings them to the inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for them (comp. 1 Pet. iii. 8; i. 7).

On vers. 17, 18. It is quite possible that Ahasuerus did not clearly know why Esther was preferred before her heathen virgin competitors, and what he was pleased with in her, why he crowned her as his queen. Still we can readily discover in his demeanor an indication that heathenism is always desirous, even when it has tasted to the full all that it can procure for its own enjoyment, to obtain something different and higher. Certain it is that these higher needs, which could be satisfied with nothing low, and which exhibited a higher receptivity, should arrive at this point. It was meet also that the heathen should see the fact fulfilled, that they themselves, their heathen kings and princes must pay homage to the people of the Lord, as to a queen who above all is worthy to be placed upon the throne, and to impart to the world her laws and ordinances (comp. Isa. xlix. 23; lxii. 4 sqq.). When this shall be entirely fulfilled, then the marriage-feast which Ahasuerus made in honor of queen Esther, with the edict proclaiming a temporary freedom from taxation of the people, and the relief from their oppressive yoke granted at the same time, shall correspond to the entire life of mankind.

On vers. 19-23. 1. Esther was silent in regard to her Jewish descent and religion, and this was permissible so long as she was not asked to reveal it, so long also as the weal of her people did not require a different course. This she could the more readily do, inasmuch as the Old Testament religion, by reason of its limitation, did not impose the duty of a missionary confession. Even the Christian can keep his faith out of sight so long as its confession will not benefit, but would rather do injury, and so long as the duty of veracity is not violated. At all events the martyr's crown, if it is not hastily seized, but rather borne with dignity, is far more glorious than a royal crown. Yet true faith will manifest its world-conquering power, and be encouraging to its devotees only when it is openly confessed, though its confessors stand at the martyr's stake, or die by the claws of wild beasts.

2. Nothing justifies us in assuming that Mordcai reported those conspirators because of selfish reasons, or in order to gain distinction and merit, or because Ahasuerus as the husband of Esther was nearly related to himself. Besides being an indication, it may be an expression of shrewdness, of his sense of duty. Although the Jew as such did not have a very warm feeling of attachment to the Persian king, still, in so far as he lived according to the divine Word, he sought to perform his obligations also toward the heathen governmental authority (comp. Jer. xxix. 7). Thereby he also becomes a practical illustration of the fact that the piety which is nurtured by God's Word is also of benefit to the heathen state and to heathen rulers. The governments of modern times, which treat religion not only with toleration but also with indifference, should remember that godly fear, as it is useful for all things, is also the most substantial bulwark for the continuance of the state.

BREX: "We have here a daughter bereft of the protection of man by the death of her parents, but God elevated her to great distinction, so that all men gave her honor. Why was she carried into exile, but that she should reign? why bereft of parents, unless that she might become the favorite of God and man?"

FEUARDENT: On vers. 8, 9. "From this it may be concluded, as later is actually affirmed by Paul, that God hath chosen the foolish things of the world to confound the wise; and the weak things of the world to confound the things which are mighty; and the base things of the world, and things which are despised, and things which are not, to bring to naught things that are: that no flesh should glory in His presence. For what is weaker than a little girl, or what more lowly and contemptible than an exiled orphan, born among a people of all other nations the most ignored and hated? What, on the other hand, in the estimation of the flesh and this world, is more wise and prudent, more glorious and powerful than Ahasuerus, Vashti, Haman and the other Persian and Median satraps? Yet by the means of a single person, Esther, they are confounded, superseded, ejected. By her office, I said, but by the help of God, although by the authority and arrangement of judges, of whom Esther was only the organ; lest the flesh should have aught whereof to glory, but that all the praise of the church preserved in the Persian realms should be referred to God. He was able, as in former days, so to have rallied under a brave Samson or Gideon His entire people scattered hither and thither, and to have fortified them with arms and strength, as to destroy by mutual slaughter all His foes when the great battle was joined; but in that case men would have arrogated something to themselves, and perhaps have said: Our own right hand, and not God, has done all this."—On ver. 15: "Let then both men and women learn by this case so to direct all their aims and desires as to please God alone by the ornament of a good conscience and by the forms of minds well adjusted; but to despise the adventitious bodily ornaments of this world as vain in His sight, and by this piety gain the surer rewards of heaven. For this alone is the true beauty, which is precious in God's view, and which causes us to be approved by the King of kings, and joined to Him in spiritual matrimony. . . . Surprising that even the heathen saw and taught this. For Crates says: 'That is ornament which adorns. But that adorns which makes a woman more adjusted and more modest. For this end neither gold nor gems nor purple avails, but whatever has the import of gravity, modesty, and chastity.'"

STARKE: On ver. 1. "Whatever has been undertaken in anger against God's command can well be changed (1 Sam. xxv. 34, 35)."—On ver. 2. "To heap sin on sin is the master work of art of all ungodly persons (2 Sam. xv. 1; xvi. 22; Isa. xxx. 1; Jer. ix. 8)."—On vers. 3, 4. "The advice of courtiers is most generally directed towards the object to which they think their lords are chiefly inclined, and they speak to their wishes (2 Sam. xv. 4; xvi. 21). 'Carnal ears love to hear nothing better than what will please their lustful hearts' (2 Sam. xvi. 22)."—On vers. 5-7. "When orphans fear God, He will also care for them (Ps. xxvii. 10). In a pious and virtuous maiden beauty of person is a great gift of God (Prov. xi. 2). We should not neglect the orphans of blood relatives. God is the Father of orphans (Ps. lxxviii. 6), and He knows how to open the hearts of pious people who will faithfully care for them (Ps. x. 14)."—On vers. 8, 9. "What care and cost is required for the decoration of the soul, when it would prepare as an acceptable bride for Jesus (Ps. xiv. 14)."—On vers. 16, 17. "God will raise the miserable one from the dust, so that He may seat him next to princes (Ps. cxlii. 7, 8)."

B.—HAMAN ATTAINS TO POWER AND DISTINCTION. HE DETERMINES UPON THE DESTRUCTION OF THE JEWS.

CHAP. III. 1-15.

1. Haman's elevation. His resolve with reference to the Jews. Vers. 1-7.

- 1 AFTER these things [words] did [the] king Ahasuerus promote [elevated] Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, and advanced [make great] him, and set
- 2 [put] his seat above all the princes that were with him. And all the king's servants, that were in the king's gate, bowed [were bending] and revered [bowing themselves to] Haman: for the king had so commanded concerning [enjoined for] him: but [and] Mordecai bowed not [would not bend] nor did him reverence [and]
- 3 would not bow himself<sup>1</sup>. Then [And] the king's servants, which were in the king's gate, said unto Mordecai, Why transgressest THOU<sup>2</sup> the king's commandment?
- 4 Now [And] it came to pass [was], when they spake daily unto him, and he hearkened not unto them, that [and] they told [it to] Haman, to see whether Mordecai's
- 5 matters [words] would stand: for he had told them that he was a Jew. And when Haman saw that Mordecai bowed not, nor did him reverence, then [and] was Haman full of wrath.<sup>3</sup> And he thought scorn [despised in his eyes] to lay hands [hand] on Mordecai alone; for they had showed [told] him the people of Mordecai; wherefore [and] Haman sought to destroy all the Jews that were throughout [in]

7 the whole kingdom of Ahasuerus, even the people of Mordecai. In the first month, (that is the month Nisan,) in the twelfth year of king Ahasuerus, they cast<sup>4</sup> Pur, that is, the lot, before Haman, from day to day, and from month to month, to the twelfth month, that is the month Adar.

2. With the permission of Ahasuerus Haman issues the decrees to exterminate the Jews. Vers. 8-15.

8 And Haman said unto king Ahasuerus, There is<sup>1</sup> a certain [one] people scattered abroad and dispersed among the people [peoples] in all the provinces of thy kingdom; and their laws are diverse from all [every] people, neither keep they<sup>2</sup> the king's laws, therefore [and] it is not for the king's profit [fit for the king] to suffer
 9 them [let them rest]. If it please the king, let it be written that they may be destroyed [to cause them to perish]; and I will pay ten thousand talents of silver to the hands of those that have the charge [the doers] of the business [work], to bring 10 it into the king's treasuries. And the king took his ring [signet] from [off] his hand, and gave it unto Haman the son of Hammedatha [the Medatha] the Agagite, the Jews' enemy. And the king said unto Haman, The silver is given to thee, the people also [and the people], to do with them [it] as it seemeth good to thee [in thy eyes]. Then [And] were the king's scribes called on the thirteenth day of the first month [in the first month in the thirteenth day in it], and there was written according to all that Haman had commanded, unto the king's lieutenants [satraps], and to the governors [pashas] that were over every [each] province, and to the rulers [princes] of every [each] people of every [each] province,<sup>3</sup> according to the writing thereof, and to every [each] people after their [its] language; in the name of [the] king Ahasuerus was it written, and sealed with the king's ring [signet].
 13 And the letters [books] were sent by posts [the hand of the runners] into all the king's provinces, to destroy, to kill [smite], and to cause to perish all Jews, both young and old [from lad even to old man], little children<sup>4</sup> and women, in one day, even upon the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which is the month Adar, and to 14 take the spoil of them for a prey. The copy of the writing, for a commandment [law] to be given in every province,<sup>5</sup> was published unto all people [the peoples], that they should be [to be] ready against [for] that day. The posts [runners] went out, being hastened by the king's commandment [word]; and the decree [law] was given in Shushan the palace [citadel]. And the king and Haman sat down to drink; but the city Shushan was perplexed.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-7. The author in very brief terms places the elevation of Haman, the Agagite, by the side of the exaltation of Esther, as shown in the previous chapter. Hence it is the more surprising that he adds what we would least expect upon the elevation of Esther, namely, that Haman, provoked by the apparent irreverence shown to him by Mordecai, resolves to destroy the Jews.

Ver. 1. After these things did king Ahasuerus—in ver. 7 we are in the twelfth year of the reign of Ahasuerus, five years after chap. ii. 10, but here somewhat sooner—promote Haman the son of Hammedatha.—וְיָרָא, usually used in bringing up children, here means to make him a great man—and set his seat above all the princes that (were) with him, i. e. above all those princes who were in his immediate presence, above his chief officers. He made him, so to speak, his Grand

Vizior. Haman from humajun = magnus, augustus, or according to Sanscrit somán, meaning a worshipper of Somar, was a son of Hammedatha, whose name is formed from haomo, soma, and signifies one given by the moon (Benfey, Monatsnamen, p. 199). Nowhere else do we find it Hammedatha, but rather Madathas (in Xenophon) or Madathes (in Curt. v. 3, 6). This form according to Pott (Zeitschr. der D. M. G., 1859, p. 424) has the same signification; and probably the מ is placed at the beginning on the ground that it may readily have fallen away, and thus is regarded as the article and so pointed. It is quite possible that the author knew the meaning of these names, and found them significant in what follows. Haman would accordingly be noted as a representative of heathendom.* The epithet מְאָרָא leads us to this conclusion. One thing is certain, that this designation with Jewish interpreters, as Josephus and the Targums, had in it a reminder of the Amalekitish king Agag in Saul's time (1 Sam. xv. 8, 38). But we have evidence more nearly at hand, since Esther and Mordecai in chap. ii. are traced back to a family that had to do with the Agag just mentioned. Haman may not have been an actual descendant of the Amalekitish king, nor yet have been known as such. But possibly our author desired to designate him as a spiritual offshoot of that race.† Agag was a king, and hence also a representative of that people which had kept aloof from Israel from motives of bitterest enmity, and at decisive times had placed itself in the way in a very hateful manner (comp. Ex. xvii. 8 sqq. and my Comment. on Deut. xxv. 17), and against whom the Lord also declared an eternal war (Ex. xviii. 15; Num. xxiv. 20). As an Amalekite, he formed, as is fully shown in the Targums, a link for Haman with the equally rejected and hateful rival people, the Edomites. Again, the author would seem to indicate that the flame of conflict, which soon broke out between Haman and Mordecai, inasmuch as it was originally war between heathendom and Judaism, had burned from ancient ages; and when Mordecai so vigorously withstood his opponent, causing his fall and destruction, he thereby only paid off a debt which had remained due from the time of Saul upon the family of Kish, since Saul had neglected to manifest the proper zeal by destroying the banished king (Agag). In the second Targum (on chap. iv. 13) Mordecai gives expression of this view to Esther, namely, that if Saul had obeyed and destroyed Agag, Haman would not have arisen and opposed the Jews. The author doubtless placed Haman in relation to Agag in particular, and not to the Amalekites in general, since he was a leader and prince, and not a common man of the people. The Arabs and even later Jews applied such genealogical distinctions to Greeks and Romans (comp. e. g. Abulfeda, Historia Anteislamica). In the Old Testament the word מֶלֶךְ in Ps. vii. 1 offers only a doubtful analogy; but on the other hand in Judg. xviii. 30 the change of Mosheh into Menashsheh is a parallel case wherein the faithless Levite Jonathan comes into a spiritual connection with the godless king Manasseh.

Ver. 2. All the servants of the king, who had their posts in the gate of the king, i. e., all royal court-officers, were obliged to bow the knee before Haman and to prostrate themselves; for the king had so commanded concerning him (לְפָנָיו, as with מֶלֶךְ and similar verbs, comp. e. g. Gen. xx. 13). It was a custom among the Persians to bow before the king, full prostrate, and kiss the ground (Herodot. iii. 86; vii. 136; viii. 118; Xenophon, Cyrop. v. 8, 18; viii. 8, 14), so also before the high officials and other distinguished men (Herodot. iii. 134). Mordecai, however, refused to do reverence to Haman. He did this not from stubbornness or personal enmity. It is clear from ver. 4 that it was because of his character as a Jew alone; otherwise that fact would not have been mentioned in this connection. Again the Jews could not have thought such ceremony under all circumstances unfitting or non-permissible, as did the Athenians, perhaps, who regarded its observance (before Darius) by Timagoras, as a crime worthy of death; or as did the Spartans (Herod. viii. 126), and later still the Macedonians, who would not fall down before Alexander the Great according to Persian custom. This mode of obeisance was established and sanctified for the Jews by the manifold examples of the fathers (comp. e. g. Gen. xxiii. 12; xlii. 6; xlviii. 12; 2 Sam. xiv. 4; xviii. 28; 1 Kings i. 16). Even the Alexandrine translators and the authors of the Targums, as also the majority of modern interpreters, agree that bowing the knee and prostration upon the face has here a religious significance. Persians regarded their king as a Divinity, and paid him divine honors, as is abundantly attested by classical authors. In Æschylus, Pers., 644 sqq., it is said: "Darius was called their Divine Counsellor, he was full of divine wisdom, so well did he, Persia's Shushan-born god, lead the army." Curtius says (viii. 5, 11): "The Persians not only out of devotion, but also from motives of policy, revered their kings as gods, for majesty is the safeguard of the empire." Comp. also Plutarch Themist. 27. In Haman as the chief officer it was doubtless intended to manifest a reflection of the divine dignity of the king, which should have reverence paid to it. Mordecai, it is held, thought that bowing the knee before Haman would be idolatry, and contrary to the commandment: "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image or any likeness." But this law in itself would hardly have restrained him

† ["It is certainly difficult to assign any other meaning to the word; but on the other hand it seems unlikely that Agag's children, if he had any, would have been spared at the time of the great destruction of Amalek, without some distinct notice being taken of it. Haman, moreover, by his own name, and the names of his sons (ch. ix. 7-9), and of his father, would seem to have been a genuine Persian." Rawlinson.—We may therefore conclude that the epithet "Agagite" is here used symbolically of a heathen enemy of the Jews.—Ta.]

therefrom. Against this speaks, not only ver. 4. which does not make a reference to the word of his God, nor yet to his monotheism, but only to his general character as a Jew; this, however, might be explained from the very slight indication in the style of our author. But the greatest difficulty in the way of this view is the circumstance that from such a conviction in regard to the act of bowing the knee, he must also refuse its performance even before Ahasuerus. In that case a later more intimate relation could not have subsisted between them. Moreover the facts seem against this view, since such Jews as Ezra, and especially Nehemiah, pious and loyal to the Law, found no difficulty at all observing the usual customs in their relations with the Persian kings of their time. It must certainly have been in his mind that to him Haman was an Agagite and Amalekite, i. e. a man placed under the curse and bann of God. He regarded bowing the knee before him as idolatry, if at all such, for the reason that a distinction only belonging to the representative of God would here be shown to one cast out and banished by God. Brenz says correctly: "The apocryphal statement (in the Sept. version) that Mordecai is said to affirm, that he would adore none but God, although a pious remark, is nevertheless not appropriate to this place. . . . Mordecai had in view certain passages (Exod. xvii. 15 and 1 Sam. xv.), from which he understood that the whole race of Amalek and all the posterity of Agag the king of the Amalekites, to which Haman belonged, were accursed and condemned by God. Therefore Mordecai, stirred by the Holy Spirit, confesses with magnanimous candor that he is a Jew, and is unwilling to bless by his veneration one whom God had cursed." In this view of the case Feuardent and Rambach substantially concur. If, on the contrary, we hold that Haman was not really an Agagite, and that the Jews regarded him as such only because of his disposition, then, of course, we must suppose that it was Mordecai's arbitrary will which regarded Haman as one rejected by God. Haman's inimical disposition against the Jews would not in itself have given a valid ground to the enmity of Mordecai. On the contrary it would still have been his duty to honor him because of his office. But this objection rests upon a stand-point such as we cannot assign either to Mordecai nor yet to the author of our book. It would have been different had it only had reference to a common personal enmity of Haman against Mordecai. But as the enemy of the Jews, who hates and persecutes them in toto because of their laws and religion, every one thought it proper to count him among those transgressors for whose extermination nearly all the Psalmists had prayed, over whom they had already seen the curse of God suspended, before whom one was not to manifest reverence, but rather abhorrence. It is well to bear in mind that Haman is not an enemy of the Jews, such as were so many heathen kings and rulers before him, but that in him the hate specially against the Jewish law was perfected, whereas other heathen magnates had usually manifested great indifference towards it. Mordecai had certainly abundant opportunity to become informed as to the kind of enmity thus exhibited. The author has not given this point great prominence because in his usual manner he thought he had done enough if he designated him as the Agagite. If this assumption be correct, then the import of our book is somewhat more general than is usually held; it does not in that case signify that the people of God can as such refuse to pay homage to men in certain definite ways and modes, but rather that to certain persons, as those who are rejected of God, all honorable distinctions may be denied. But it at all events amounts to this, that God's people may not lessen the reverence due to Him by doing reverence to others; for homage shown to those rejected of God would be against the honor of God, would be idolatry. In so far as Haman is an enemy of the Jews, who will not allow the observance of their law and religion, the final question would after all be whether the people of God, together with its law and religion, can be suppressed by heathendom, or whether it will have the victory. Comp. also Seiler on this chapter.

Vers. 3 and 4. The other officers daily questioned Mordecai because of his refusal, and finally reported him to Haman to see whether Mordecai's matters would stand (would withstand, succeed): for he had told them that he was a Jew.—By "his words," we can only understand an assertion that, as a Jew, he was prevented from participating in the ceremony of doing homage to Haman.

Vers. 5 and 6. Haman, when he had convinced himself of the conduct of Mordecai, regarded it lightly, and did not deem it sufficient to punish him alone; for the people to whom Mordecai belonged, had been told him, hence Haman knew that he belonged to the despised people of the Jews. But he rather strove to destroy all the Jews in the whole realm of Ahasuerus as being of the same mind with Mordecai.*

Ver. 7. Haman reasoned that for such a difficult and great undertaking he must select an especially appropriate day, and for this purpose he caused lots to be cast day after day throughout the whole year, and stopped at every day to see whether it was the one most proper for the undertaking. It was in the first month, that is, the month Nisan, in the twelfth year of king Ahasuerus, when this was done. Since he found a suitable day only in the twelfth month, namely, the thirteenth day of the month, according to ver. 13, it is clear that he manifested much persistency and endurance. Possibly, what in itself is not of great moment, namely, the time in which he examined every single day, is here given, in order to give due prominence to the greatness of his zeal. Possibly another reason may have obtained in this designation of time.

* ["In the West such an idea as this would never have occurred to a revengeful man; but in the East it is different. The massacres of a people, a race, a class, have at all times been among the incidents of history, and would naturally present themselves to the mind of a statesman. The Magophonia, or a great massacre of the Magi at the accession of Darius Hytaspis, was an event not fifty years old in the twelfth year of Xerxes, and was commemorated annually. A massacre of the Scythians had occurred about a century previously." Rawlinson.—Tr.]

If the day of extermination was determined on already in the month of Nisan, and proclaimed on the thirteenth of that month (comp. ver. 12) then it is clear that the Jews were for a whole year harassed in their mind regarding their fate in view of the edict which was now no longer a secret to them. Especially, if those living in and around Shushan had already heard on the 14th or 15th Nisan what was determined relative to them, then the most sacred joy which came to them in the Paschal festival was turned into utter sorrow. That it was the Paschal month in which their destruction was determined on, is by our author not so clearly expressed, since he seems to omit what might be understood as self-evident, but deserves consideration here. It seemed as if the old Paschal celebration, which indicated the ancient redemption out of the slavery from the world, was now to be abolished; as if Israel was now again to be handed over into the despotism and cruelty of foreign rulers. Instead of partaking of a feast it was enjoined on Mordecai, Esther and her friends to fast, as is shown in the old Targums (comp. chap. iv. 1, 16). But the more the ancient deliverance from Egypt seemed to be divested of its import, the more the new deliverance from Persia must have risen in significance; the more doubtful the joy of the Paschal-feast became, the more was the rejoicing of the feast of Purim enhanced. The feast of Purim as the second celebration of deliverance was hence co-ordinate with the Paschal festival as being the first deliverance, but in such a manner that the former became a vital support to the latter.

We do not regard Haman as the subject (Bertheau) to be supplied with הַפִּיל פִּיר, as is generally assumed according to ver. 6, but an indefinite "he," some one, i. e., "they." The author seems to presume that casting of lots in such cases as the one in hand was not infrequent, and that some one had the office of casting the lots, so that the subject of הַפִּיל may be implied as impersonal. If Haman himself had been the subject, then the words לִפְנֵי הֶכֶן following הָאָם would be remarkable, instead of which one would expect to find it לִפְנֵי. Bertheau connects this sentence with the explanatory phrase הָאָם הָגִדְרָל, as if the use of the foreign word פִּיר by the Jews did not mean every lot, but only that cast before Haman. But then the author would have expressed it more easily and shorter: This is the lot of Haman and not the lot before Haman. That פִּיר in the Old-Persian signified lot may not be doubted. Even in Modern-Persian it is behr and behre, "appointment," fate, portio, pars; so that a ground meaning, such as "lot," is not improbable (comp. Zenker, Türkisch-arab.-pers. Handwörterbuch, p. 229). It lies still more natural to compare it with, para or pars = "piece," morceau, pîce, originally perhaps also portio (ib. p. 162).*

* ["Par is supposed to be an Old-Persian word etymologically connected with the Latin pars, and signifying "part" or "lot." In modern Persian par has that meaning. The recovered fragments of the old language cient times was very common (comp. Van Dale, Orac. ethn. c. 14; Potter's Archæol. I. 780) and is especially mentioned of the Persians (comp. Herod. III. 128). The opinion, so closely connected with Astrology, that one day was favorable and another unfavorable for a certain undertaking, is met with also among other ancient peoples, and very extensively among the Persians. Indeed it obtains in those regions even to-day (comp. Rosenmüller, Morgenland, III., p. 302).*

The words: from day to day, and from month to month, are not to be understood as if the casting of lots had been continued from one day to another, etc., and thus repeated over and over, but, as is clear from ver. 18, the meaning is that, in the first month every day of the year one after the other was brought into question.† It is noticeable that, in addition to the words: "from month to month," the number of the chosen month is added, the twelfth. One would expect such a sentence as this to follow: "And the month was chosen, and then the number." At least after the phrase, "from month to month," it would have been added "up to the twelfth month." Hence Bertheau concludes that the Sept. has given the words here: "And the lot fell upon the fourteenth day of the month, which is Adar," because they found them in the text, and that the eye of the copyist slipped all between the first לְחֹדֶשׁ to the second, after which latter follow the designation of the day and its number. But since the Sept. also adds: "In order to destroy the people of Mordecai in one day," it is plain that it supplemented our verse with the thirteenth verse; and since it was not the fourteenth day, but the thirteenth (according to ver. 18; chap. ix. 18, 19) that was designated, it is clear that the Sept. assumed to make changes arbitrarily. Probably the author in his customary short style spoke just as we read it. The use of the cardinal number instead of the ordinal made such a contraction possible; and the statement as to which day had been decided by the lot, might readily be wanting here.

Vers. 8-11. In order to gain the king also over to his own murderous plan, and to obtain of him a legal edict, Haman said to the king: There is a certain people scattered abroad and dispersed among the people in all the provinces of thy kingdom.‡—שָׁנָן has the Nus inserted before the suffix as in I Sam. xiv. 39; xlii. 28; Deut. xxix. 14 (Ewald's Lehrb., p. 262 c). אֶחָד is a numeral. He means: "Only one of the many peoples has dared to disobey the have not, however, yielded any similar root." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

* ["The practice of casting lots to obtain a lucky day continues still in the East, and is probably extremely ancient. Assyrian calendars note lucky and unlucky days as early as the eighth century B. C. Lots were in use both among the Oriental and the classical nations from a remote antiquity." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

† ["A lot seems to have been cast, or a throw of some kind made, for each day of the month and each month of the year. The day and month which obtained the best throws were then selected." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

‡ ["Although a part of the Jewish nation had returned to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel, the greater portion was still despised among the provinces, in Babylonia, Mesopotamia, and elsewhere (see Ezra vii. 6; viii. 17; Neh. i. 1, 2, etc.)." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

laws of the king." This one, however, is so generally scattered and dispersed among the others that the evil example is of no small moment. It seems as if Haman here gave expression to a presentiment, whose fulfilment is declared by Seneca when he (De superst. 8, p. 427) says: "Such power have the customs of this detestable people already gained that they are introduced into all lands; they the conquered have given laws to their conquerors." Their laws (are) diverse from all (other) people, especially from the laws of this realm (comp. in ver. 1, "above all the princes").* Therefore it (is) not for the king's profit to suffer them.—לֹא־לְמַעַן, as in ch. iii. 8; v. 13, while in chap. vii. 4 it has a somewhat different sense. לֹא־לְמַעַן, to leave them in peace.

Ver. 9. If it please the king let it be written = let it be commanded by a public announcement, which is as irrevocable as a formal edict of the empire (comp. chap. i. 19), that they may be destroyed. And I will pay ten thousand talents of silver to the hands of those that have the charge of the business.—Such a great sum (according to the Mo-saic Shekel twenty-five million, and according to the common shekel, twelve and a half million taliers; vide Zöckler on 1 Chron. xxii. 14) does he hope to bring in by the confiscation of the property of the Jews.† "Those that have charge of the business," in 2 Kings xii. 11, designated builders (masons, etc.); but here and in chap. ix. 8 are meant the officers of the treasury ["the collectors of the revenue." Rawlinson].

Ver. 10. The proposal of Haman seems to have pleased the king so much that he gave him his seal ring, and thus empowered him not only to cause the before-mentioned public proclamation to be made, but also to issue other suitable decrees, and by imprinting the royal signet to give them the authority of irrevocable commands (comp. chap. viii. 8, 9). In private relations the present of a ring was the token of the most intimate friendship. Princes, however, thereby designated the one who held it as their empowered representative, (comp. chap. viii. 2; Gen. xli. 42; 1 Mac. vi. 15; Curt., X. 5, 4; Aristoph., Eq. 947; Schulz, Leitungen, etc., iv. 218 sq.; Tournefort, R., II. 383).‡ Sometimes successors to the crown were also thus appointed (comp. Josephus, Ant. XX. 2, 3). The significant designation of Haman as "the son of Hammedatha the Agagite, the Jews' enemy," points out how eventful this bestowal of authority upon Haman became to the Jews.

Ver. 11. The prospect of the great treasure thus to be acquired must have had considerable weight with Ahasuerus, who needed much money. Still it must not assume the appearance as if covetousness had anything to do with it. Hence he left the money to be gained to Haman, for thus he would also be the more sure of him in possible and coming events. The silver (is) (let it be) given to thee, the people also, to do with them as it seemeth good to thee.

—The participle נָתַן is a short mode of expression appropriate to the king. The sense is: "It is," or: "Let it be given." So also לֵיכֻלֵּהוּ, "let it be," or: "It must be done."*

Vers. 12-15. Haman at once caused the necessary proclamations to be prepared, and had them sent into all the provinces of the kingdom. Ver. 12. [Then were the king's scribes called. —The 'scribes' of Xerxes are mentioned more than once by Herodotus (vii. 103; viii. 90). They appear to have been in constant attendance on the monarch, ready to indite his edicts, or to note down any occurrences which he desired to have recorded."—Rawlinson]. In the very same month in which he had the lot cast, and on the thirteenth day of the same (י"ג, in י"ד, the said month). Perhaps it appeared that the thirteenth day of the first month was favorably indicated together with the thirteenth of the twelfth month.† And there was written according to all that Haman had commanded unto the king's lieutenants, and to the governors that (were) over every province, and to the rulers of every people of every province.—אֶחָדָם וְאֶחָדָם and כָּהֵן are here, as in Ezra viii. 86, placed together, the satraps of the larger provinces and the rulers among the separate peoples of the provinces. The שָׂרִים are the native so-called born princes of the different peoples. Before the following כְּרִינָה, and likewise before עַד further on, it should really be repeated: to the satraps, etc. The sense is: "For the governors of each province according to their mode of writing (style), and to those of every people according to its language." In the addition: "In the name of king Ahasuerus was it written, and sealed with the king's ring," the perfect tense only is fitting, and not the participle. And though נָתַן may have a Kamets, to give it greater distinctiveness, still this is not true of נָתַן, though so given in several editions.

† ["According to Herodotus (III. 95), the regular revenue of the Persian king consisted of 14,560 silver talents, so that if the same talent is intended, Haman's offer would have exceeded two-thirds of a year's revenue (or two and a half millions sterling). With respect to the ability of Persian subjects to make presents to this amount, it is enough to quote the offer of Pythius (Herod. vii. 28) to present this same monarch with four millions of gold darics, or about four and a half millions of our money, and the further statement of the same writer (Herod. i. 192), that a certain satrap of Babylon had a revenue of nearly two bushels of silver daily." In the East confiscation follows necessarily upon public execution, the goods of criminals ecclethating to the crown, which does with them as it chooses (comp. ver. 13 ad fin., and chap. viii. 1, and 11 ad fin.). RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["Haman had apparently (comp. ver. 7 with ver. 13) obtained by his use of the lot the 13th day of Adar as the lucky day for destroying the Jews. This may have caused him to fix on the 13th of another month for the commencement of his enterprise." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

Ver. 13. And the letters were sent by posts, etc.—שְׁלָחוֹת, infin. abs. Niph., instead of the finite verb in vivid description (comp. chap. vi. 9; ix. 6, 12). Letters, without the article, for the thought is: "Letters whose contents are that . . . should be destroyed." By the runners, by whom they were sent, are meant the posts, the angari or pressmen, who were posted on the main roads of the empire at definite distances from each other, from four to seven parangs, and who rapidly expedited the royal (mail) letters or commands (comp. Herodot. V. 14; VIII. 98; Brisson, De reg. Pers. princ. I. c. 238 sq.). To destroy, to kill, and to cause to perish, all Jews, etc.—The crowding of verbs impresses the murderous import. And to take the spoil of them—i. e., to thus obtain their property as spoils. Haman, of course, did not desire to come short in that which fell to him; but by giving the people the privilege of plundering, he desired to awaken their zeal the more. Thus they would either give him a share of the spoils, or else he hoped to obtain the sum before mentioned by the help of his servants or his coadjutors.*

Ver. 14. The copy (contents) of the writing, etc.—The statements respecting the contents in ver. 13 are too indefinite. It was not yet ordered that the officers only should fall upon the Jews, but that the people themselves should do this. This is expressly made to appear here. With reference to פְּתָשָׁן, see Ezra iv. 11. The substance does not there follow verbatim, but is indicated by the infinitive. For a commandment to be given in every province.—But the decree itself reads: Let it be published unto all people that they should be ready against that day.—What was to be published is also indicated, but briefly. Thus in the style of expression the details are noted as is common in edicts, with abbreviation of points referred to. Since הִיא is feminine, as is seen, for example, in vers. 8, 15, we cannot render: "That they should publicly proclaim the edict—make it manifest to all." Still less are we to understand it, as does Keil: "A copy of the writing of the substance that a law be given, and be declared to all peoples." Instead of נָלַךְ this verb would then have to be in the perfect tense, and נָלַךְ does not mean, as Keil interprets, open or unsealed in its transmission; neither does it mean opened, revealed, made known. נָלַךְ is rather in the optative, the same as is נָלַךְ in ver. 11 (so also Bertheau).

* ["By the issue of the decree at this time ('the first month') the Jews throughout the empire had from nine to eleven months' warning of the peril which threatened them. So long a notice is thought to be 'incredible' (Davidson), and the question is asked, 'Why did they not then quit the kingdom?' In reply we may say—(1) that many of them may have quitted the kingdom; and (2) that those who remained may have believed, with Mordecai (chap. iv. 14), that enlargement and deliverance would arise from some quarter or other. As to its being improbable that Haman should give such long notice, we may remark that Haman only wished to be quit of Mordecai, and that the flight of the Jews would have served his purpose quite as well as their massacre." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

Ver. 15. The posts went out, being hastened, etc.—הָרַחֵץ, went speedily, in haste; in 2 Chron. xxvi. 20 is the Niph. הָרַחֵץ. The additional clause: and the decree was given in Shushan the palace means to assert from whence they went out. But the remark: And the king and Haman sat down to drink; but the city of Shushan was perplexed reveals the terrible contrast between the gluttony of these men and the distress into which they plunged the land. It also indicates by what means Haman sought to draw the king away from the business of government. נִבְלָה primarily does not mean that it was distressed by terror or sorrow, but that it was perplexed, did not know what to think of such a terrible command (comp. Joel i. 18); in an external sense נִבְלָה means to have erred (Ex. xiv. 3).*

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

On vers. 1-7. 1. Mordecai's meritorious act, though recorded, had not yet been rewarded. One would naturally think that at this period he would obtain the deserved honor. But instead it is expected of him on his part to do honor to a man such as Haman, who was the sworn enemy of his people and a bitter opponent of the Jewish law; who finally, as an Agagite, was under the curse of God. Esther, who no doubt was true to Judaism, although she had not yet openly professed it, was seated on the throne as the chosen queen. And now one would be led to expect—certainly the Jews hoped—that she would bring the people relief from oppression, and restore for them liberty which would secure them from injuries such as they had hitherto experienced, or at least had been threatened with. Instead of this, Haman, empowered with full authority, resolves to wholly exterminate the people; indeed he is in haste, although this exterminating process was to begin only after eleven months, to make the people acquainted with their fate long before the event comes to pass. Now it happens that Haman thereby utterly ruins their holiest joy, and the season of Paschal rejoicing is converted into a time of distress and grief. It seems by such notice as if the people could no more place any reliance in their God as their Saviour; as if their Lord, who had at one time chosen them as His peculiar people, and who, if He would, could even now deliver them from the distress of exile, was no more to be the source of their joy. But, however unexpectedly these turns in their affairs may seem to some, and however the question might be raised, which is so often mooted, why it must thus transpire, seemingly against all hope; still that which came to pass was not so very surprising, but quite natural. One would very naturally expect of a prince

* ["The remark that 'Shushan was perplexed' has been attributed to 'Jewish conceit,' but without reason. Susa was now the capital of Persia, and the main residence of the Persians of high rank. These, being attached to the religion of Zoroaster, would naturally sympathise with the Jews, and be disturbed at their threatened destruction. Nay, even apart from this bond of union, the decree was sufficiently strange and ominous to 'perplex' thoughtful citizens." RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

who, like Ahasuerus, did not live to perform his duties, but to indulge in sensual gratification,—who sought, not the welfare of his subjects, but their wealth, would leave the power and government in the hands of men who knew how to flatter his weaknesses and to gratify his desires.

But above all, we cannot but notice the sharp contrast between the heathen state, as such, and the people of God. It looks very much like a merely casual human command, when Ahasuerus decreed that every one should bow the knee to such a man as Haman, and as if this single instance called forth a conflict. But in reality there is expressed the unconditional subordination which the state, especially the heathen one, must insist upon in reference to its laws and regulations. So long as the latter have proceeded not from the Spirit of God, but from the unregenerate heathen heart, so long will they contain demands to which the people of God cannot subject themselves. So long as the State is not entirely irreligious, it will be even inclined to operate within the religious domain, and thus the conflict takes its rise immediately between it and the people of God. We may also expect that the state will avail itself of such instruments to carry out its orders as of themselves are little disposed to be friendly to God's people; instruments who, because of that people's peculiarities, look upon them as a disturbing element, and are little disposed to exercise forbearance and toleration towards them. The people of God, on the other hand, have their obligation to obey all authorities under whose dominion they may be placed, even to the extent that they must endure condemnation to death, and suffer execution (Rom. xiii. 1 sqq.). But they are equally obligated to give honor to God and not to man. They can only give honor to man in so far as God has so ordered it. They must refuse honor to those who are opposed to God, at the risk of provoking the most powerful and dangerous men of authority in the government. There is in short a great contrast between those who know nothing higher than the law of the state and state religion and those who look above and beyond these to the true and living God, and who supremely reverence His law. This contrast in later times gave rise to the wars of the Maccabees, and still later, though differently in form, to the war against the Romans; and it was this, too, which more especially brought on the persecutions of the Christians. In short, it is the contrast which in the history of mankind has asserted its power even at the cost of conflict for life or death. It is so irreconcilable and so powerful that it could not and can not be removed by any compromise whatever, but only unconditional subjection on the one part—namely, of the kingdom of the world—and by victory on the other—namely, of the kingdom of God. This contrast has always revived anew where the powers of the world have thrown off from themselves the bands of the Lord and His anointed.

BERLENBURG BIBLE: "That believers obey not the laws of the king has always been the chief complaint among the anti-Christian rabble, of which Haman furnishes a copy. The children of God, in their eyes, must ever be insurrectionists, disturbers of the peace, persons subject to no law or order, and by whom the public weal is endangered." Thus we have expressed the view in which Christ and His apostles were regarded (Luke xxiii. 2, 5). But this is the greatest of all falsehoods."

2. It is not only offended ambition that incites Haman against Mordecai; it is also hate against Judaism. It offends him that it has privileges and laws so different from those of the other peoples in the empire (comp. ver. 8). Hence he is not content to lay hands on Mordecai alone, but he resolves also to exterminate all Jews. As his offended ambition strengthens his hate against Judaism, his hate receives fresh occasion from the offence to his ambitious designs on the part of Mordecai. The contrast between him and Mordecai has therefore a more general and deeper reason. Even Mordecai's religion is endangered thereby. Haman demands the bowing of the knee, because according to the Persian notion, Deity is thereby honored in him. This is to him a religious rite. This is especially clear from the fact that he does not himself arbitrarily determine the day in which he will carry out his designs respecting the Jews, but he is rather dependent on the voice of Deity, as it is revealed to him by means of the casting of the lot. Nevertheless he gives religion a subordinate position in his thoughts, tendencies, desires and purposes,—so that the former really becomes merely a means to the latter. It is just the opposite with Mordecai. Had it lain in his power to determine, he would doubtless cheerfully have obeyed the king's order to bow the knee before Haman. He no doubt comprehended the greatness of the danger that threatened him in case of refusal. He would perhaps the more easily have given in, since no doubt a voice often whispered in his ear that it might be very questionable whether or not he should view Haman as an Agagite, as one rejected of God. But the facts were too plain, and God's Word required Mordecai to abominate instead of honoring Haman. This he must perform not only when it was most agreeable to his disposition, but also in the most opposite case. Viewed in this light Haman and Mordecai clearly indicate to us that the emphatic difference between heathen and Jew is true piety. The former serves when the worship of deity is only worship of self; in the lower plane it is only worship of nature and of the flesh; in the higher grades it has its basis in worship of human ideals. True piety, however, is a surrender to another will, to the will of the Holy God. Hence the former perfectly corresponds to the selfish manner of men, as they live at present, because of sin; the other opposes this in sharp contrast. But while the first is a flatterer, who, if any man will give heed, will deceive, the latter is a trusty friend who will lead upon a right way and toward salvation.

BREX: "Satan, as Christ says, is a liar and a murderer. Hence he is ever busy in persecuting the church with his lying and murderous designs. You have heard before his lie: 'The people are using new laws and ceremonies, and they despise the edicts of the king.' Now hear his murderous words: 'If it pleases thee, decree that this people be destroyed.'" FEUJARD: "The sorrowful condition of the Jews becomes very apparent and plain as here revealed; likewise the just judgment of God is here fulfilled. He says: 'They would not obey God in their own land, where they enjoyed such great freedom, but now they groan under the severe service that presses upon them, and they are brought into the risk of life itself. They refused to assemble in the sanctuaries of Jerusalem under their own kings, they ran after the golden calves, the sacred groves, and idols and superstitions of the heathen. Now they are placed and scattered under the most tyrannical form of government. They neither can nor dare congregate to offer a service of praise to God.' STARKER: "A man resigned to the will of God will disregard the laws of men, whenever these stand opposed to the will and laws of God, however much he may suffer thereby (Acts v. 19; Dan. vi. 10 sq.). Although we should hold in honor those whom the higher authorities command to be honored, still such homage must not conflict with that due to God. When men disobey the laws of man and violate them, it is very soon taken notice of (Dan. vi. 11-13); but if they violate the law of God, then no one seems to observe the fact. We should not make man our idol, nor make flesh our arm (Jer. xvii. 5). Immoderate ambition generally breaks out into cruelty. The anger of great men is fierce (Prov. xvi. 14); hence one should have a care not to arouse the same against one's self."

On ver. 24. The people of God, in the conflict with their enemies, may rely on the protection of God, if they are morally in the right. Thus also the enemies of such people will be their own destroyers by virtue of their machinations. Such is the tenor of this whole book. But a more difficult question arises here, whether Mordecai, in refusing to bow the knee to Haman, and thereby bringing on the conflict, was really in the right. This question is the more grave, inasmuch as Haman could not properly be termed either an Agagite or an Amalekite; and all turned upon a form of homage proper and permissible in itself. The question would be more simple if Haman, as opposed to Mordecai, had been only a private individual. That in that case the latter's conduct would have been right and proper, cannot be doubted. As the Lord sanctioned enmity against all that are like-minded to Amalek in the command: "Remember what Amalek did unto thee" (Deut. xxv. 17), David justifies himself before God in hating those that hate God, and is grieved at those who raise themselves against Him; indeed he hates them with perfect hatred (Ps. cxxxix. 21, 22). When he would recount the chief characteristics of a truly pious person in the church, he makes this trait prominent (Ps. xv. 4). This, according to Luther, means that the just man is no respecter of persons; nor does he care how holy, learned, or powerful one be. If virtue be reflected from any one, the just man will honor him, though he were even a beggar. But if virtue be not found in him, then he will be esteemed as bad, and as nothing; the righteous man will tell him of it, and censure him. He will tell him, "Thou dost despise the Word of God, thou dost slander thy neighbor; therefore I desire no connection with thee." The Christian must in like manner perform this duty. He must do it for the sake of mercy, if no other means will avail; or for the sake of truth, which pronounces evil to be evil, and censures it. He must hold up to reproof him who by a persistent immoral life brings disgrace upon the name of Jesus Christ, or even by his conduct manifests enmity against the same. This the Christian should do often, not only as respects the particular person, but also as respects his acts or disposition. In regard to this, Harless says very justly: "It were a gross error to think that the Christian should content himself with reproving simply the offence and its tendency, but that thereafter he could nevertheless maintain personal and external relations with such a person. On the contrary, the blessings of the Spirit of Christ given to His church, will materially depend upon the principle that in the selection of personal companionship the consciousness and true unity which should unite the church must be maintained by external separation. The Christian, in so far as it depends on his own selection and is consistent with his calling, should avoid the society of those whose disposition he has found to be reprobate. We cannot term it other than a lack of Christian consistency when such Christians call it Christian love to seek out society from all the world in an indiscriminate manner, and cultivate it, and that according to one's own choice (comp. 1 Cor. xv. 33, etc.)." (Christliche Ethik, § 47, p. 456, 7th ed.). But all this has reference primarily only to the relation of the common intercourse of neighbors. Haman was to Mordecai an official magisterial person. Besides, it was expressly commanded by the king that he should be thus honored by bowing the knee before him. Hence the command: "Honor thy father and mother," and also the other that, "one should not revile the gods, nor curse the ruler of thy people" (Ex. xxii. 27), demanded respect. Neither was the precept to be forgotten: "My son, fear thou the Lord and the king" (Prov. xxiv. 21). In the New Testament the two chief apostles exhort us to submission under authority: Paul in Rom. xiii. 1 sqq.; Peter in 1 Pet. ii. 13 sqq. Peter closes the paragraph cited with the words: "Fear God. Honor the king." If by the word honor we are to understand merely the rendering of obedience, as seems to be implied in verse 13, then it would not be doubtful as to its proper limits. The word of the apostle: "We ought to obey God rather than man" (Acts v. 29) is very conclusive and direct, and needs no further confirmation. The church-fathers of the first centuries, in treating of this point, strongly assert that we should honor the authorities in, and not as opposed to God. Comp. J. Gerhard, in De magistratu politico, § 474. Then when the stability of order within an organized community is attacked and overthrown in defiance of right,—and such was the situation in Persia when Haman in an inimical manner attacked the Jews, who up to this time had had the undisputed right to live according to their law and faith; when he became to them an Agagite and an Amalekite,—then resistance, and individual participation therein, is justified and commanded. This, of course, holds within the limits of the existing order of a people and of the individual calling. Stahl (Die Partheien in Staat u. Kirche, p. 288), as also Harless (Christl. Ethik, § 54), is very clear on this point that, "the doctrine of the blamableness of any active resistance, and the unconditioned obligation of passive obedience is opposed to the Christian's sacred maintenance of right. So also is the assumption false that obedience must be rendered to authority because it is authority, even though it deny and disregard all right and law in the enforcement of its own claims to authority—an authority which it has not received for its own sake, but because of the right whose guardian and executor it is its calling to be" (Harless, as above, p. 541). Hoffmann (Schriftbeweise, II., 2, p. 409) speaks from the same conviction: "It is certainly not morally permissible that one people rise against the righteous order in the existing government of another people, or of a foreign ruler. But it is a moral duty that it should not submit to be despoiled by a foreign power of that element, which, in God's order, is essential to its existence and to its substantial peculiarity." Experience has ever proved that resistance grounded upon a good conscience, and supported by so high and noble an enthusiasm, is indeed countenanced by God in so decided a manner, that no force, however great, can accomplish anything against it. It is worthy of notice that the command to honor the king and secular authority demands more than obedience, it embraces also regard and homage. Hence arises the question, whether or not we ought to meet certain persons with esteem and homage, to whom we must refuse obedience, indeed against whom—in contrast with Mordecai—we are compelled to offer resistance. There are doubtless many cases where these conditions obtain. Such a case would especially occur where the authorities think that right is on their side. When they proceed from a different view or conviction with reference to the case, they are by no means to be disregarded. The admonition in 1 Peter ii. 18 is in place here: "Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward." Now if the authorities, as says Harless, really assume to disregard and deny right and law, in its claim of jurisdiction, which it can only have as the guardian and executor of justice, then practically it ceases to be authority. If it sanction oppression and pillage; if it touch the existing right, religion, and conscience, then it becomes a chief enemy of those who will not submit to the spoiling of these possessions—for so did Haman, nor otherwise could he justly be called an Agagite.

Hence homage can only be denied to the magisterial office where the bearer of the name is regarded as unworthy of the position he occupies. An external homage, in connection with which one must manifest hostility, would then become hypocrisy, and the more so since instead of giving the honor due from a sincere heart, we can only despise and execrate. To refuse it is only to act honestly, though it often requires courage. This is the more necessary since the opposition is grounded upon and confined to what is permitted according to right and calling. As was the case with Mordecai, we should take an early opportunity to manifest our determination to refuse homage to authority, since its false ways cannot be too severely condemned.

On vers. 8-15. 1. So long as Israel possessed a political independence the chief support of its religion had been the State. The State had jurisdiction over its own laws and those of religion. Now, however, the State takes an opposite stand to its religion. The complaint of Haman was, that this people had different laws from those of the other peoples of the kingdom, and hence did not obey those of the king (which was correct as regarded the laws that were opposed to its own). For this reason also, Ahasuerus permitted the decree for the extermination of Israel. The State, even at this period, could not avoid demanding decided submission; and where it encountered insuperable obstinacy it adopted extreme measures, even banishment and extermination. But it would have been better had it been tolerant to the last degree. All the means of might were at its command, by which to carry out its will. All the offices and organizations which the State had established for the weal of its subjects, as is indicated in vers. 12 and 15, could have been employed in their subjection. One might feel inclined to ask whether, in view of all these things, there remained any hope for Mordecai; whether his opposition did not, at the very beginning, promise to be futile. Doubtless his hope was in Him for whose honor he was jealous; namely, in the living God. That Being now desires to make manifest for all ages by a striking example, that He can sustain His people, not only without the aid of any civil power, but also in opposition to a foreign State. Indeed He can preserve it even amid the heathen, in spite of all distracting elements. Hence the church need not fear, be the relation of the State what it may. The Lord knows how to make even the most unfavorable circumstances serviceable and useful to the church.

2. If now we inquire upon what natural basis Mordecai could establish his hope, then we observe that truth was on his side. That which is rejected of God, instead of being honored, is to be abhorred. Hence for him who believed in the true God, no doubt existed but that this truth would eventually obtain a more general recognition. But in order to this, a still longer development was needed. Heathendom must first become conscious of itself, i. e., of its own weakness and impotence, which were a part of its existence in spite of all external power; then only can it learn to know the true God. For the present, it was the weakness and failing, which attached to the leaders of heathenism, that offered resting-places for the helping hand of God. Whether these were already well known to Mordecai is doubtful; but to our eyes they are already manifest in this chapter. Haman would not venture to come before Ahasuerus and exhibit his wounded vanity and spirit of revenge; and Ahasuerus does not desire to reveal the fact that he is anxious to possess the money of the Jews. However, with the former vanity, and with the latter an inordinate desire for money, plays the chief part. They would have it appear as if their acts were done under the impulse of right and duty. They would kill off the people of God with proper decency. They dissemble; but they thereby gain only a self-condemnation of their own evil motives. An official who is guilty of dissembling, is in danger of being unmasked; and a prince who is so weak as to be led by a motive of which he must needs be ashamed, especially in such a grave and extraordinary occurrence, easily exposes also other weaknesses. Hence it would not be difficult for others likewise to gain the ascendancy over him, who could easily dissuade him from a purpose, even after the same had become an irrevocable edict. The remark at the close of the chapter is also very significant and characteristic. A prince and an officer who at the time when the inhabitants of their chief city are in the greatest consternation, when above all an entire people is thrown into mortal fear of their life, can sit down to eat and drink, manifest either an inhumanity, which would easily arouse a general revolt, or an evil conscience which already foretells the failure of their plans. If we ask respecting the natural foundations upon which the expectation of an eventual victory of Christianity is based, in the face of all the assaults and dangers to which it is exposed, then the power of truth, as it breaks its way and compels universal recognition, would emphatically answer the question, and be the main point of reliance. The experience of centuries teaches one fact definitely and variously, that there is salvation in no other, and that no other name is given to men whereby they may be saved, than the name of Jesus Christ. But the weaknesses of those who deem themselves strong will ever be a matter of observation. Christians should be better informed than they often are, of the impotency and nothingness of those in opposition to them. They have a clear right to the question: What can men do to us? Even their opponents must acknowledge, if they are not too much blinded, that in those nations among which the pure faith reigns supreme, there is a different type of fidelity, conscientiousness, devotion, and readiness to make sacrifices than among those who have been dried up by the sun of false enlightenment. The course of events will soon compel them to see their mistake.

BARNES: "This is plainly what Christ afterwards said to His little church; that is, His disciples: 'Verily, verily I say unto you, ye shall weep and lament, but the world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful, but your sorrow shall be turned into joy.' For as in the passion of Christ the chief priests triumphed, and the soldiers mocked, but Christ hung on the cross and was afflicted with exceeding misery, so the joy of the wicked will be at its highest over the sorrow of the godly. . . . But that is most true which we read: 'The triumphing of the wicked (is) short, and the joy of the hypocrite (but) for a moment. Though his excellency mount up to the heavens and his head reach unto the clouds; (yet) he shall perish for ever like his own dung: they which have seen him shall say, Where (is) he?'" FREDERANT: "Observe now how active everything is in this matter, and how all conspires for the extermination of the people of God. The terrible sentence is defined and described in as many languages and modes as there are peoples in the empire. . . . But while the godly are in great distress, as they anticipate the fatal day of the cruel execution, the king and Haman indulge in drunkenness and lust and joy. So perisheth the righteous, and no man layeth it to heart (Isa. lvii. 1). So the servants of God are oppressed by the agents of the Devil. So cruelty triumphs. . . . But it is well. There is a God in the heavens." STARKER: "When wicked men cannot otherwise persecute the pious, then his religion and laws must furnish them with a cause and a covering for their evil intentions (Acts xvi. 21, 22). In important matters it is not good to render a hasty judgment, it is better to reflect (Isa. xxviii. 7). God permits the wicked to have success beyond their own expectation at times, but afterward destruction will come all the more unexpectedly. (Ps. xxxvii. 35, 36; Job x. 45.')

CHAPTER IV. 1-17.

1. Communication between Mordecai and Esther. Vers. 1-5.

- 1 WHEN [And] Mordecai perceived [knew] all that was done, [and, i. e. then] Mordecai rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth with [and] ashes, and went out into
- 2 the midst of the city, and cried with a loud [great] and a bitter cry; And came even before the king's gate: for none might [there was none to] enter [go] into the

And in every province,<sup>1</sup> whithersoever [the place that] the king's commandment [word] and his decree [law] came [was approaching], there was great mourning among [for] the Jews, and fasting, and weeping, and wailing [smiting the breast]: and many lay in sack-cloth

5 take away his sackcloth from [upon] him: but [and] he received it not. Then [And] called Esther for [to] Hatach, one of the king's chamberlains [eunuchs], whom he had appointed to attend upon [stationed before] her, and gave him a commandment [enjoined him] to [upon, i. e. concerning] Mordecai, to know what it was, and why it was.

7 before the king's gate: and Mordecai told him of all that had happened unto him, and of the sum [designation] of the money [silver] that Haman had promised [said] to pay to [upon] the king's treasures for [in consideration of] the Jews, to 8 destroy [cause them to perish]: Also [And] he gave him the copy of the writing of the decree [law] that was given at Shushan to destroy them, to show it unto Esther, and to declare [tell] it unto her, and to charge [enjoin upon] her that she should go [to go] in unto the king, to make supplication unto him, and to make 9 request before him for [upon] her people. And Hatach came and told Esther the 10 words of Mordecai; Again [And] Esther spake [said] unto Hatach, and gave him
11 commandment [enjoined him] unto Mordecai; All the king's servants, and the people of the king's provinces, do know [are knowing], that whosoever, whether man [every man] or [and] woman, shall [who shall] come unto the king into the inner court, who is not [shall not be] called, there is one law of his to put him to death, except such to whom the king shall hold out the golden sceptre, that [and] he may live; but I<sup>2</sup> have not been called to come in unto the king these [this] thirty days.

III. Mordecai presents his request still more urgently, and Esther promises to execute it. Vers. 12-17.

12, 13 And they told to Mordecai Esther's words. Then [And] Mordecai commanded [said] to answer Esther, Think not with thyself [in thy spirit] that thou shalt 14 escape in [to deliver] the king's house more than all the Jews. For [But] if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but [and] thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed [utterly perish]; and who knoweth whether thou art come [hast 15 approached] to the kingdom for such a time as this? Then [And] Esther bade them
16 [said to] return Mordecai this answer; Go, gather together all the Jews that are present [found] in Shusan, and fast ye for [upon] me, and neither eat [eat not] nor drink [and drink not] three days, night or [and] day: I also and my maidens will fast likewise; and so will I go in unto the king, which is not according to the law;
17 and if [whereas] I perish [have perished], I perish [have perished]. So [And] Mordecai went his way [passed] and did according to all that Esther had commanded [enjoined upon] him.

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>1</sup> [Ver. 1. pyt, a later or Aramaean form for pyc, seems to be intensive of קרא, including the simple call for help, שׁוּע, and the shriek from pain or danger, קִינָה. and denotes an earnest and vociferous demonstration.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The author manifestly desires to show in this chapter how very difficult it was for Mordecai to make even the one effort to save his people from destruction. But he was faithful and persistent; taking step after step until the object was attained. He here entered a conflict which was forced upon him, and which he was unable to avert. But thereby he ran the greatest danger both for himself and for Esther, whom he required to assist him. Three separate endeavors are recorded by our author as made on the part of Mordecai in order to involve Esther in this conflict. The first was preparatory, being designed simply to establish a connection with her; of the second the only result was the objections raised by Esther; and in the third she expressed her willingness and her resignation to a possible fate.

Vers. 1-5. Here is described the first step. The first thing Mordecai did was to take a leading part in the general sorrow of the Jews. Thereby he attracted the attention of Esther, and induced her not only to send him other garments than those of mourning, but also to send a confidential messenger through whom he could communicate with her. Ver. 1. When Mordecai perceived all that was done.—As is told us in ver. 7. Mordecai was even informed as to the sum of money which Haman expected to obtain by destroying the Jews. Possibly some of Haman's intimate friends heard of it and spoke of it in the king's gate where Mordecai could hear it. Mordecai rent his clothes, and put on sackcloth with ashes, i. e., a garment of hair cloth, and with the same also put on ashes, by strewing ashes over his person and clothing (comp. Dan. ix. 3; Job ii. 12).* And went out into the midst of the city.—He did not conceal the fact that he was in deep distress, and cried with a loud and bitter cry; literally, occurs in Gen. xxvii. 34 with reference to Esau.

Ver. 2. And came even before the king's gate, i. e., up to the free place that was before the entrance to the royal palace (comp. ver. 6),—further he could not come, no more could he come into the gate of the palace as before—for none (might) enter into the king's gate clothed with sackcloth.—סוּא לְבָשׁוֹת, comp. Ewald, § 321 c.

Ver. 3. Many other Jews also mourned. The sorrow was general. Despite the elevation of Esther her people now had everywhere only distress and grief, instead of honor and joy. It seems as if the author would here describe how the Jews were treated contrary to what one would naturally expect after the elevation of Esther. He would here, doubtless, also give prominence to the remarkable mode which Mordecai adopted to secure the attention of Esther. Further in ver. 8 he would show us how pressing was the need of every possible endeavor for their preservation. And in every province, whithersoever the king's commandment and his decree came, etc.—מְקוֹמָם is the Accusative of place found in stat. constr. before אָשַׁר, as in ch. viii. 17; Eccl. xi. 3; comp. Lev. iv. 24 בְּמָקוֹם אָשַׁר. And many lay in sackcloth and ashes.—While all gave vent to their distress and tears, many manifested their sorrow by putting on sackcloth and sitting in ashes (comp. Isa. lviii. 5).

Ver. 4. The first object that Mordecai gained by his public grief was that he drew the attention of Esther's women-servants and eunuchs, i. e., such as were assigned her for her exclusive service (comp. chap. ii. 9), and they gave notice to the queen. Though they had not as yet discovered the nationality of Esther, still they became aware of Esther's relation to Mordecai, who on his part was very diligent in his inquiries concerning her. Hence they delayed not to inform the queen of all that they know of him. Following the Kethib we should read מְבִיאוֹתָהּ. As this prolonged form of the word does not usually occur after a Vav. cons., the Keri has the form מְבִיאוֹתָהּ. The object of מְבִיאוֹתָהּ is found in what follows: the present appearance of Mordecai in mourning garments was not the cause (comp. ver. 5); but this was enough to give her considerable anxiety.

וְהָיָה לָהּ, a passive intensive from חָל, they were seized as with pains of delivery. She sent clothes to her guardian, that he might put them on, doubtless, that thereby he might again stand in the gate of the king, and so relate to her the cause of his grief. But he refused them, not only because he would wear no other than garments of mourning, but because he desired a private opportunity to communicate with her.

Ver. 5. Mordecai accomplished his object, and Hatach the eunuch was sent to him to obtain particulars. הָיָה לָהּ לְפָנֶיהָ, the king had appointed Hatach to serve Esther; hence he belonged to her eunuchs (ver. 4). מְבִיאוֹתָהּ עָלָיו, she commissioned him with respect to or עָלָיו, substantially similar to מָלָה, "she sent him to," (comp. ver. 10).

Vers. 6-11. Here we have the second step. In the face of the greatness of the danger that threatened the Jews it was hardly to be expected but that Mordecai should make a request of Esther whose fulfilment would be very serious in its consequences.—Vers. 6 and 7. When Hatach had proceeded to the open place before the palace, he found Mordecai, who in the hope that Esther would do something more, had remained there longer or more frequently resorted thither. Then Mordecai informed him of all that had occurred and that now threatened the Jews, and mentioned also the sum of money that Haman promised to place in the king's treasury, in return for the extermination of the Jews. This he did, no doubt, to show what low and despicable motives were at play in the matter; and thus he very naturally hoped to excite the greater indignation and wrath in Esther. She must not be left to think that Haman had found the Jews guilty of real transgressions when he obtained the consent of the king. That the king had remitted the money to Haman, is not referred to here because not pertinent. פָּרַשָׁה derived from פָּרַשׁ to cut off, separate, then to define correctly (comp. Lev. xxiv. 12), the exact statement of a thing, i. e., here, of the amount, sum of money to be given. For the Jews, to destroy them, means when the Jews would be surrendered to him with permission to destroy them. The Kethib form of הָיָה לָהּ is less frequently used for דָּוָהָם, which is found in chap. viii. 1, 7, 13; ix. 15, 18.

Ver. 8. Also he gave him the copy of the writing of the decree that was given at Shushan (comp. chap. iii. 15), to destroy them, i. e., which ordered them to be destroyed. כְּפִלְתָּ could here have the meaning of "copy;" but the rendering "contents" of the writing of the decree is preferable, (comp. Ezra iv. 11). Possibly Mordecai had briefly noted down the substance of the decree. To show (it) unto Esther, and to declare (it) unto her, and to charge her that she should go in unto the king to make supplication unto him.—וְלִהְיוֹת, contrary to the accents, is by Bertheau and Keil connected with what follows, as if it were the same in sense with לְהוֹת עליה. But it rather belongs to what precedes according to its import. Hatach was to show the writing to Esther and give her the substance of the information it conveyed. It is quite possible that Esther could read it herself; Mordecai sent the copy for the purpose of enabling Hatach to give the proper meaning of its contents. The infinitives with ל are here best translated by "in order that." To declare (explain) it unto her, and to charge her to go in unto the king, to make supplication unto him

... for her people.—כְּפִלְתָּ with עַל here, as in chap. vii. 7, means: to treat, supplicate for something diligently (comp. Ezra viii. 28). She should petition relief for her people.

Vers. 9-11. Mordecai elicited only the answer: All the king's servants, and the people of the king's provinces, do know, that whosoever, whether man or woman shall come unto the king, etc.—כִּי אִם אֶשֶׁר is prefixed as a Nom. absol. The predicate with אִם follows as an anacoluthon: "one is his law," i. e., one law extends to all. אִם is the law having reference in his case. Its substance reads briefly:

הַמֵּת, to kill, i. e., him. One was not even allowed to enter the inner court-yard, much less the king's palace. That the king resided in the inner court before the royal house (Bertheau and Keil), would not follow from chap. v. 1. Every one was to be killed, except him toward whom the king extended the golden sceptre. לְבָרָךְ, except, as for example, Ex. xii. 23; Josh. xvii. 5. הַשֵּׁט, from שָׁט, found only in this book (in chap. v. 2 and viii. 4), in the Aramaic tongue signifies "to reach out towards, to extend," and is connected with שָׁט, שָׁט. In the time of Deioces the Mede, approach to the king was already very difficult (Herod. I. 9); and among the Persians, with very few exceptions (Herod. III. 118), no one was permitted to approach the king without a notice (comp. chap. i. 14; and Herod. III. 140; also C. Nep. Conon, c. 8). According to our verse the sense of the law is not that no one should approach unannounced, but that no one should approach unless called. But the sense of both is the same. If one must give due notice of approach, one must first be also accepted; but to be accepted is to be called. As regards that law any one was free to give notice of his approach (comp. Herodot. III. 140), and hence arises the question, why Esther kept this privilege out of sight. Josephus says (Antiq. XI. 6, 8) that the husband of Esther (according to him Artaxerxes) forbade his people, by a special law, to approach him while he sat upon the throne. But he would manifestly give greater weight to our explanation. If we desire to find the correct answer we must not overlook the remark of Esther, that she had not been called to the king for now thirty days.* Possibly she apprehended that the king had become somewhat indifferent to her, and that, if she were to announce herself without being called by him, she would be refused admittance to his presence. This would have made the venture still more dangerous. According to chap. iii. 7, nearly five years had passed since their marriage. Hence she had possibly been somewhat forgotten. It could hardly appear otherwise in her eyes than that it was best to approach the king unannounced and place reliance on the fact that her appearance should kindle his love anew.†

Vers. 12-17. The third step. In order to move Esther to a compliance with his request, despite her hesitation, Mordecai had it reported to her (ver. 13): Think not with thyself that thou shalt escape in the king's house, more than all the Jews.—To be saved does not here mean, if I only am saved, the others do not concern me, as if Mordecai would warn her of a selfish and indifferent feeling toward her people. But the sense is: "Do not think that thou shalt escape, or that thou art better off." This is clear from ver. 14: For if thou altogether holdest thy peace, not making intercession with the king, at this time, (then) shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place; but thou and thy father's house shall be destroyed, i. e., be not better off, but worse. That the entire Jewish people cannot be thus destroyed is a matter self-evident to Mordecai. This is an incontestable truth, under all circumstances, which in his mind is made sure by the divine promises. And although neither God nor God's assurances are here mentioned, still, as is justly remarked by Brenz: "We have this noble and clearly heroic faith of Mordecai, which sees the future deliverance, even amidst the most immediate and imminent danger." Those Jews only can and must be destroyed, in his opinion, who, when it concerns the preservation of the people, do not perform their duty. It is very improbable that he should think that Haman has not power sufficient to cause the destruction of the Jewish nation as a whole, but merely of that detested Mordecai and his family, hence also Esther, must die (Bertheau,—otherwise he would not have said: "thou and thy father's house," but "thy father's house and thou, ye shall perish." He here makes reference rather to a divine punishment that shall come upon Esther first, but on her account also upon her father's house.  $\text{וְיָמֻתוּ} = \text{וְיָמֻתָּהּ}$  (Ex. viii. 11) means relief from pressure because of want of air.  $\text{עָכָר}$  in later language may have been given the meaning of  $\text{דִּקָּה}$ , so that it should mean to arise, to go forth, to be (1 Chron. xx. 4). But it may also signify: deliverance will be established (Bertheau), or stand ready. The "other place" is not God as immediate for help, but another agent of God, in contrast with Esther. Mordecai means: God will find other instruments whom He will employ, if thou wilt not serve Him. The last sentence of ver. 14 is, by most interpreters, declared to mean: "And who knows but that thou hast been elevated to be queen for just such an emergency as this, where there is danger, which thou shouldst assist in averting, so that thou canst easily help. But if thou wilt not help, thou wilt not escape an especially severe sentence." But to take  $\text{דָּא}$  in the sense of  $\text{מִלְּהָא}$ , is to say the least, venturesome, and cannot be justified by the fact that  $\text{כִּי יֵדָע}$  is sometimes, (but without  $\text{דָּא}$ ) used in the sense of perhaps (2 Sam. xii. 22; Joel ii. 14; Jonah iii. 9). Again it does not correspond to the sense of "if," "whether;" and we may say with Bertheau: "Who knows, when thou hast approached the royal throne (beseechingly), what then shall happen, whether the king will not receive you graciously;" or again, as Keil says: "Who knows but that thou hast attained to royalty for just such a time as this (as was no doubt true), what shall then be done by thee?" Mordecai would perhaps say, by way of adding to the before-expressed threat, "Thou shalt be destroyed, if thou art silent; and who knows whether thou shalt really be courageous enough to speak for us, and thereby manifest to us that, for just such a time as this thou wast elevated to royal dignity?" A doubt such as this would evidently be the most powerful incentive to her to do what was requested of her.

* ["According to Herodotus (III. 60), the wives of a Persian king, whether primary or secondary, shared his bed in rotation. As their number sometimes exceeded three hundred, the turn of a particular wife might not come for nearly a year."] RAWLINSON.—[Fr.]

Ver. 15. In fact this resolve was reached by her. She made request that Mordecai, together with the Jews in Shushan, should fast three days and nights in her behalf. Doubtless she thus expected to secure the help and protection of God for that eventful hour and step, and therefore she declared, with great resignation, that she would venture to fulfil their request. This fast could only mean that great misery impended over their heads, that with a contrite spirit God's hand was seen in this event, and that prayer was made to God for help (comp. 1 Kings xxi. 27-29; Joel i. 14; Jonah iii. 5). That Esther still does not make mention of God, no more than did Mordecai before this, when he asserted his faith in the indestructibility of the Jewish nation, may easily be explained, as has been observed in the Introduction, § 8, by remarking that it pertains to the style of the author. To the expression: fast ye for me, Esther adds: and neither eat nor drink three days, night nor day, in order to mark the severity of the fast. A strict fast of three days would indeed have been a severe task, and Esther would thereby have done injury to her appearance (J. D. Michaelis). But these three days seem, as in Jonah ii. 1, not to be clearly understood; hence the sense would be, from this day until the third day. For the fast must have begun on the same day that Esther's answer came to Mordecai. The "third day" mentioned in chap. v. 1 must mean the third day from that in which the decision of Esther was made. This decision was the main fact from which time was reckoned. Of course we cannot expect that Mordecai should that very day have induced all the Jews in Shushan to fast. Still it matters not so much that not all, if only many, fasted.—And so will I go in unto the king, which is not, etc.— $\text{בְּכֵן}$ , i. e. under such circumstances, or under such conditions.  $\text{אֲשֶׁר לֹא בָרָת}$  may simply mean: "which is not legally allowed," although not, etc.  $\text{אֲשֶׁר}$  may be taken in a neuter sense, although  $\text{אֲשֶׁר לֹא}$  reminds us of the Aramaic  $\text{לֹא מִלְּהָא}$ , and hence it can easily be taken in the sense of "without" (comp. Ewald, § 322 c). The last words: And if I perish, I perish, are an expression of willing submission to the fate that may threaten her in the performance of her duty (comp. Gen. xliii. 14). Esther had great cause to prepare for her own destruction. She not only proposed to go to the king without being called, but also to request something of him, which, according to Persian custom, it was impossible to grant. She would by her petition recall the edict and thereby seem to disregard the royal majesty. She would and indeed must reveal herself as a daughter of this detested Jewish people thus given over to destruction. Last of all, she must thereby place herself in open opposition to that all-powerful favorite, Haman.

Ver. 17. Mordecai went forth to fulfil the wish of Esther. The verb  $\text{עָכָר}$  has induced the Targums and older interpreters, as J. D. Michaelis, to advance the opinion that he had violated, "passed over," namely, the law, which ordered the Paschal feast to be celebrated in a joyous manner (from chap. iii. 12 it might follow that we are still in the time of the Passover); but the word has the meaning of: going away, going further. It has its explanation as contrasting with what Mordecai had done before, since, so long as Esther's answer was not satisfactory, he remained standing there.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Ver. 1 sqq. 1. Mordecai rends his clothing, and puts on sack-cloth and ashes. He enters the city thus, and raises a great and bitter lamentation. So also the Church of God, in its development as regards the history of humanity, should again and ever anew put on the habiliments of mourning. "The world shall rejoice: and ye shall be sorrowful." The then existing nation of Jews could not manifest its loyalty to the law without coming into conflict with heathendom. Nor can the Church bring to development its inherent spiritual powers without challenging all the Hamans and their opposition in the world. Even this present period is an instance in proof. Following upon the great progress of the things of the kingdom of God since the time of wars for freedom, we must naturally expect reactions, such as have been manifest in the sphere of science and other relations. Indeed, we must constantly look for increasing opposition on the part of the world. But when the Church shall have most fully developed the gifts of grace granted to it, then conflict and sorrow will have reached its highest point at the end of days. The real cause of sorrow on the part of the true members of God's Church will not be, as was the case with Mordecai, their own distress, but that of the world. It will consist in the fact that the world is still devoid of the blessed society of the true God; that the kingdom of God is still rejected and even persecuted. What joy it would give, if, instead of enmity, recognition and submission, and, instead of disdain, a participation in the gifts and grace of our Lord were to become the universal experience!

2. The more difficult the position of the Church as in contrast with the world, the more favorable is her position for bringing to view her glory. Her glory is that of her Head. If even in the Old Testament times, and in the "dispersion" itself, there existed a Mordecai, who for love of the people manifested his firmness and strength in the hour of tribulation; and if there was found an Esther, who, when called upon, willingly came forward to bring about the salvation of her countrymen; how much more in New Testament times and in the modern Church will there arise individuals, who, in following the Lord, especially in evil days, will manifest a watch-care for others and a self-sacrificing spirit for them; who will show forth patience and meekness, as well as energy, fidelity and tenacity, a spirit of giving and an ability to make sacrifices; and withal will carry in their hearts joy and peace as the seal of their kinship with God. All these graces may be so many illuminating rays of the glorious life of their Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, who more and more attains in them a full stature. May all seize the special opportunity, recognize the particular duty, and know when to perform it, which the times of distress of the Church place in their hand, of showing forth the power that dwells in them by their life and work!

8. Mordecai took an especially great part in the universal grief that overcame the Jews when the edict of their annihilation was issued and promulgated. It was not his personal danger that alarmed him, but, as may be expected of such a faithful follower of Judaism, it was the calamity threatening the whole Jewish people. While, however, thought and feeling were centred upon the event, he was free from despair. With him it was a settled conviction that the people of God, as a whole, could not be destroyed, and that deliverance must come from some source. Instead of giving way to despondency, he turned his distress into a power that urged him to still greater endeavors. There was no more a fear of appearing as a Jew, nor did he hesitate because his loud lamentation would attract general attention, and thereby expose him to the derision and disdain of many. However reluctant he might have been to expose his beloved Esther, whose welfare had ever been a matter of great concern to him, to extreme danger, still he persisted with the greatest determination that she should run the whole risk, and only rested when she gave her assent. It is barely possible that he attributed some blame to himself because of his firmness against Haman, or thought that on that account he more than any other was under obligation to remove the threatened danger. The sole moving impulse was doubtless his love for his people. But this should not be less in any true member of the Church. It should rather, in proportion as there are more members in the body of Christ, be the stronger than it was in him. Would that no one among us were behind him as regards energy, self-denial and a willingness to make sacrifices! There are doubtless many who are able to endure all this in their own person. But—if no lighter consideration—the thought that their relatives, yea, even wife and children, may suffer on account of their confession, hews them down. Would, if necessary, that we too may stand equal to Mordecai in willingness to surrender our dearest kin!

Ver. 6 sqq. Mordecai manifests a remarkable tenacity as opposed to Esther. He keeps his position at the gate of the king until she sends him not only her maids with garments, but also Hatach to transmit his message. He departs not thence until she has resolved to stand before Ahasuerus as a Jew pleading for the Jews. Under other circumstances he might have been thought to be tiresome by his persistency and demands; but his relation to her now justified it. When he had been accustomed to inquire concerning her health and well-being, to give her counsel, to care for her, he had shown no less persistency; and his demand that now she should reveal her Jewish descent, and as such should venture all, was equally in keeping with his character. So long as no danger threatened he counseled her to keep silence respecting her Jewish parentage; but now he had himself taken the lead in an open confession of the fact. Although it had before been difficult for him to approach Esther as the queen, or request any favor at her hand, now he hesitated no longer to implore her help, not so much for himself, as for the whole people. There was no motive for him to be selfish, or to conduct himself in a heartless or severe manner towards her. Hence there was no question but that his undertaking would succeed, that Esther would be willing to comply with his request. It is eminently desirable that those who, like him, must move and induce others to make sacrifices of self and possessions in the service of the kingdom of God, should stand on a level with him in this respect.

BREXZ: "At first the lazy (i. e. Jews) do not snore. For the Holy Spirit exhorts us in all adversities to confide in the Lord; He does not exhort us to be indolent, indifferent and sleepy.

For our confidence in the Lord is a powerful and efficacious means of stimulating in His service all strength and limbs. . . . Further, the Jews, though in the greatest peril, do not utter virulent words against the king, nor do they fly to arms. . . . Mordecai and the other Jews rend their garments, put on sack-cloth, strew ashes upon their heads, wail, weep and fast. These manifestations signify not that the Jews in Persia were turbulent, but that they take refuge in God; since help could not be discovered upon earth, they seek it from heaven. . . . 'The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit; a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.' . . . By this example we too are taught that when afflictions are sent upon us, we should reflect that God then sets before us the fat oxen and calves which we may offer to Him. In this way we offer to God in our prayers the afflictions which we sustain, and call upon the name of the Lord that He may help us. . . . Behold, however, the reverse of this order of things. The palaces of princes are divinely instituted to be the places of refuge for the miserable. On the contrary in the palaces of Persia nothing is regarded as more odious and abominable than men with the signs of affliction. . . . Heaven is ever open to the cries of mourners, and God is never unapproachable to those calling on His name by faith."

STARKE: "Temporal fortunes and successes are never so great as not to be subject to sorrow, terror and fear (Sir. xl. 8). God permits His Church to be plunged into sorrow at times; He leads her even into hell; but He also takes her out again (1 Sam. ii. 16). Though the Lord elevate us to high honors, we should never be ashamed of our poor relatives (Gen. xlvii. 2), but rather relieve their needs (1 Sam. xxii. 8). We should never reject proper and suitable means to escape a danger, but promptly use them (2 Cor. xi. 32, 33)."

Ver. 13 eqq. Mordecai manifests a precious sense of trust, saying: "For if thou altogether holdest thy peace at this time, then shall there enlargement and deliverance arise to the Jews from another place." But he who would save his soul will lose it. The risk which Mordecai called upon Esther to assume, that she should come to the king uninvited, and manifest herself as a daughter of the people thus devoted to destruction, was indeed great and important. Moreover, the hope that Xerxes would recall his edict, thus, according to Persian ideas, endangering the respect due his royal majesty, and likewise abandoning his favorite minister, was very uncertain of fulfilment. But Esther had been elevated to a high position. Mordecai, who in a doubting manner sends her word: "Who knoweth whether thou art come to the kingdom for such a time as this?" doubtless did it from a conviction that she must now prove herself worthy of such distinction, if she would retain it. He also conveys the idea that the higher her position the greater her responsibility, and consequently, in case of failure because of carelessness or fearfulness, the more intense her guilt. In these convictions of Mordecai are contained the most earnest exhortations even for us. This is especially true since we are all called to be joint heirs of Jesus Christ to the throne of the heavenly kingdom. In the deportment of Esther a no less reminder to duty is contained. It appears quite natural that Esther should order a fast not only to be observed by Mordecai and the rest of the Jews, but she also imposed on herself this fast of three days' duration. Had she had a little more of the common discretion of her sex, she would have feared the effects of the fast upon her appearance. Hence she would have adopted quite a different plan or preparation previous to her entrance into the king's presence. Here also she reveals the same attractive feature of mind and manner as when she was first presented to the king. Instead of placing reliance upon what she should externally put on or adorn herself with, we find her trust placed upon something higher. She well knows that she will only succeed if the great and exalted Lord be for her, who, notwithstanding His glorious majesty, yet dwells among the most lowly of men. It is in just such times as these, when we are raised to the greatest endeavors and self-sacrifices, that we must not expect to accomplish these things by our own power, but only through Him who in our weakness is our strength. Otherwise, despite our best intentions and most successful beginnings, we shall soon grow discouraged and fail. Our own weakness is but too often made manifest to our eyes. It is only when we consider and remember that the hand of the Lord is in it all that we will be saved from a lack of courage.

BREX: "As it is the most pleasing worship to God to support the Church with all our strength, so He execrates no one more than him who withholds from the Church when in danger that help which he is able to render. . . . If the cry of a single poor man is so availing that although unheard by man, it finds an avenging ear in God, what must be the influence of the cry of the whole Church in her affliction imploring assistance from Him who it hopes is able to help? . . . This teaches us that God confers power upon princes, riches upon the rich, wisdom upon the wise, and other gifts upon others, not that they may abuse them for their own pleasure, but that they may assist the Church of God, and protect it in whatever way they can. For the Church on earth is so great in the eyes of God, that He requires of all men whatever may serve her. 'The people,' He says, 'and the king that will not serve thee shall perish, and the nations shall dwell in a solitary place.'"

STARKE: "Our flesh is always timid when it has to encounter a hazard (Exod. iv. 13). My Christ in His divine majesty stands at the entrance into the faith, and sounds the free invitation to each and all, 'ever frequent, ever dear, ever happy' (Sirach xxv. 20, 21). One should succor his neighbor in peril and need (Prov. xxiv. 11; Ps. lxxxii. 8), and especially the brethren in the faith (Gal. vi. 10), even at the peril of one's own life (1 John iii. 16). We are born for good not to ourselves, but to others; and thus God oftentimes shows us that through us He aids our own, our country and the community (Gen. xlv. 5). Faith is the victory that overcomes the world (1 John v. 8). We may use ordinary prayer for important blessings (James v. 14; Gen. xxiv. 7; xliii. 14). Life can never be spent better than when it is the aim to lose it (Matt. xvi. 25; Acts xx. 24; xxi. 18)."

B.—ESTHER IS GRACIOUSLY RECEIVED BY THE KING; BUT HAMAN, HIGHLY DISTINGUISHED BY THE QUEEN, RESOLVES, BECAUSE OF THE REFUSAL OF MORDECAI TO BOW THE KNEE BEFORE HIM, TO HAVE HIM HUNG.

CHAPTER V. 1-14.

I. Esther finds favor with the King, and invites both him and Haman two separate times to a banquet prepared by herself. Vers. 1-8.

1 Now [And] it came to pass [was] on the third day that [and] Esther put on her royal apparel, and stood in the inner court of the king's house, over against the king's house: and the king sat [was sitting] upon his royal throne in the royal house, over against the gate [opening] of the house. And it was so, when [as] the king saw Esther the queen standing in the court, that she obtained [received] favor in his sight [eyes]: and the king held out to Esther the golden sceptre that was in his hand. So [And] Esther drew near, and touched the top of the sceptre. Then [And] said the king unto her, What wilt thou [is to thee], queen Esther? and what is thy request? [ask, and] it shall be even given thee to the half of the kingdom. And Esther answered [said], If it seem good unto [upon] the king, let the king and Haman come this [to-] day unto the banquet that I have prepared [made] for him. Then [And] the king said, Cause Haman to make haste, that he may do [to do] as Esther hath said [the word of Esther]. So [And] the king and Haman came to the banquet that Esther had prepared [made]. And the king said unto Esther at the banquet of wine, What is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee: and what is thy request? even [ask, and] to the half of the kingdom it shall be performed [done]. Then [And] answered Esther, and said, My petition and my request is; If I have found favor in the sight [eyes] of the king, and if it please [seem good upon] the king to grant [give] my petition, and to perform [do] my request, let the king and Haman come to the banquet that I shall prepare [will make] for them, and I will do to-morrow as the king hath said [according to the mind of the king].

II. Haman, encouraged by the remarkable distinction extended to him, at once resolves upon the immediate destruction of Mordecai. Vers. 9-14.

9 Then [And] went Haman forth [on] that day joyful and with a glad [good] heart: but [and] when [as] Haman saw Mordecai in the king's gate that [and] he stood [rose] not up, nor moved [or trembled] for [on account of] him, [and, i. e. then] he [Haman] was full of indignation against Mordecai. Nevertheless [And], Haman refrained [restrained] himself: and when he came home [to his house], [and] he sent and called for [brought] his friends [lovers], and Zeresh his wife. 11 And Haman told [recounted to] them of the glory of his riches, and the multitude of his children, and all the things wherein the king had promoted him [made him great], and how [that] he had advanced [raised] him above the princes and [the] servants of the king. [And] Haman said moreover, Yea, Esther the queen did let no man come in with the king unto the banquet that she had prepared [made] but myself; and to-morrow am I invited [called] unto her also with the king. Yet all this availeth me nothing, so long as [in all the time that] I see [am seeing] Mordecai the Jew sitting at [in] the king's gate. Then [And] said Zeresh his wife and all his friends [lovers] unto him, Let a gallows be made [Let them make a tree] of fifty cubits high [in height], and to-morrow [in the morning] speak [say] thou unto the king that [and] Mordecai may be hanged [they will hang Mordecai] thereon: then [and] go thou in merrily [joyful] with the king unto the banquet. And the thing [word] pleased [was good before] Haman; and he caused the gal-lows to be made [made the tree].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

<sup>2</sup> [Ver. 12. The position of וְהָיָה before לְמָחָר gives the latter emphasis; this was a fresh token of favor.—Tr.]

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-8. Mordecai's opposition against Haman receives fresh support by the movements of Esther. But they have as a first result that Haman on his part also determines the utmost extreme against Mordecai. Hence the conflict against Mordecai is here also the chief feature, as was that of Mordecai against Haman in the previous chapter. Esther risks an unannounced entrance to the king—so it seems—only that she might together with him invite Haman to the banquet in order to distinguish the latter before all other officers. Thereby the arrogance of Haman is extraordinarily strengthened.

Ver. 1. On the third day, viz., after her interview with Mordecai (comp. chap. iv. 14 sqq.), Esther put on (her) royal (apparel).—If we will not with Bertheau on chap. vi. 8 and viii. 15 sanction the rejection of לְבוּשׁ before בְּלִבְשָׁתָּהּ, then we must accept the fact that בְּלִבְשָׁתָּהּ in itself signifies royal dignity (comp. chap. i. 19), but also means royal apparel; or that it was usual in poetic language to say לְבוּשׁ חֹדֶר וְחֹדֶר (comp. civ. 1; Job xl. 10), as also לְבוּשׁ בְּלִבְשָׁתָּהּ. An accusative of limitation, "according to the king's manner," is highly improbable here. Esther posted herself—so here בְּעֵקֶד, according to 1 Kings xx. 38; 1 Sam. xvii. 51; not: stood, remained standing,—in the inner court in such a position that the king, who sat upon his throne in the king's house, could see her. He sat בְּתוֹךְ הַבַּיִת הַפְּנִימִי, not: before, but opposite, over against the door of the house. Since בְּתוֹךְ may easily be rendered "before" in the sense of "opposite," it is well so to translate it. Perhaps the king had selected this position in order the more easily to see what transpired in the court of the house. Perhaps also the throne was situated not far from the farthest wall, and nearer to the door.*

Ver. 2. As his eyes fell on Esther she found grace in his sight, see chap. ii. 9. As he extended the golden sceptre to her she touched its point, possibly, as is indicated by the Vulg., kissing it.

Ver. 3. [What wilt thou? "Rather, 'What ails thee?'"—Rawlinson.] He promised her:

* ["This is the usual situation of the throne in the 'throne-room' of an Oriental palace. The monarch, from his raised position, can see into the court through the doorway opposite him, which is kept open."—Rawlinson.—Tr.]

it shall be given thee to the half of the kingdom, viz., she might make bold request, and it should be granted her what she desired; similarly as in the case of Herod in Mark vi. 28.* Feuardent: "Observe, I pray you, the promise, so thoughtless, rash, and imprudent (a common fault among kings), which, without consideration, is here repeated for the third time (comp. chap. vi. and vii. 2). So excessive and prodigal are princes as regards women, good-for-nothing, gluttons, sycophants, traitors, and such like." But here it is in point to notice the greatness of that object which is capable of calling forth true love, and for it nothing is too great.

Ver. 4. The first and simplest thing that Esther dared to request was to invite Haman and the king to dine with her. אִם שִׁבְעָל, as in chap. i. 19. She would doubtless first convince herself whether the impression which she made on the king was deep enough to encourage her to express such a great request as she intended to present.† She desired Haman to be present, in order, as Calov remarks, that "she might charge him by name in the presence of the king with the decree surreptitiously obtained against her people, and to his very face cut off every possibility of cavil;" perhaps also in order to make his confusion the more complete.

Ver. 5. The king ordered Haman to be quickly called, and with him accepted the invitation of Esther. בְּהֵרֵץ, hastened, i. e., to cause to make haste, comp. 1 Kings xxii. 9; 2 Chron. xviii. 8. לְעֵשׂוֹת, as an infin., may have Haman as its subject: "that he may do as Esther hath said." This also would explain the phrase, in order that one do, i. e., the words of Esther.

Ver. 6. At the banquet of wine (comp. chap. vii. 2),—thus is indicated the more advanced stage of the banquet, where drinking was the chief thing, and where, in consequence, the most cheerful feeling prevailed (Bertheau), the king repeated his question and reasserted his promise.‡ וַתֵּשֶׁב (chap. vii. 2; ix. 12), "and it

* ["According to Herodotus (IX. 109), Xerxes, on another occasion, when pleased with one of his wives, offered to grant her any request whatever, without limitation."—Rawlinson.—Tr.]

† ["Esther seems to have been afraid to make her real request of Xerxes too abruptly, and to have wished to impress him favorably before doing so. She concluded that the king would understand that she had a real petition in the background, and would recur to it, as in fact he did (ver. 6, and chap. vii. 2)."—Rawlinson.—Tr.]

‡ ["After the meats were removed, it was customary in Persia to continue the banquet for a considerable time with fruits and wine (Herod. I. 133). During this shall be granted thee," is the shortened form of the imperf., the so-called jussive future, instead of יִשְׁמַע.

Vers. 7, 8. Still Esther hesitates with her principal request. It is true she begins: My petition and my request (is); as if she would now express herself, but she breaks off as if courage failed her, or as if she reflected upon it; and she leaves it there, simply again inviting the king and Haman to another banquet, at which she obligates herself to make her petition known. She doubtless was not yet sure of the success of her undertaking.*

Vers. 9-14. Haman, completely puffed up because of the distinction shown him on the part of the queen, felt all the more bitterly the apparent stubbornness of Mordecai, which still continued, and resolved, aided by the counsel of his friends and wife, on the following day to request his execution from the king.

Ver. 9. On the same day he again met Mordecai in the gate of the king. It must needs be that on this very day Mordecai must provoke his anger to the highest degree, and thereby unconsciously assist in precipitating the inimical orders of Haman. The whole plan of the book is thus brought out in its correspondence to the conception and development of the present treatment. Mordecai could now again stand in the gate of the king. The garments of mourning which had prevented him from this, were doubtless laid aside when he assuredly knew that Esther would take the step promised to him, i. e., go to the king. Fasting no doubt also ceased at the same time. In consequence he was doubtless more than ever drawn to that position where he might first hope to hear of the success of Esther. To the expression: But when Haman saw Mordecai in the king's gate, there is added the statement, that he stood not up, nor moved for him.—Such sentences of condition may be inserted without a copula (comp. Ewald, § 346). The וְ before מִן־הַמֶּלֶךְ, therefore, instead of being a copula, is a correlative to the following וְ before יָצָא; so that we have an ap-position, "neither"—"nor." Still it is more common and natural to accept a connection by means of וְ, "and" (comp. Gen. xviii. 11; xiv. 21; Joshua vi. 1). וְ and יָצָא are not participles—for then their subject would be made prominent—but they are third pers. præf. But יָצָא with וְ does not mean: neither did he even move from before him (Vulg. and most interpreters), but according to Dan. v. 19; vi. 27: he trembled not, was not terrified before him, as he should have done had he violated the law of the king (chap. iii. 2).

Ver. 10. Haman controlled himself, but only to consult soon after with his friends and wife, i. e., those who he knew would sympathize with him, part of the feast the king renewed his offer."—RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

* ["Esther still cannot bring herself to make the request on which so much depends, and craves another day's respite. She will soften the king's heart by a second banquet, and then she will submit her petition to him. There is something extremely natural in this hesitation."—RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

and who would restrain him from too great rashness in determining upon radical measures against Mordecai.*

Ver. 11. The author, with great art of statement, gives Haman an opportunity to recount all that would make him great and happy, but yet so as to make him admit that there is one thing missing for the completion of his happiness, and this is indispensable, namely, the destruction of Mordecai. The higher the fortune and honor in which he rejoiced, the greater would be the fall, so soon to be realized; and the more impressive must be his history upon those who read it. Next to the glories of his riches he makes mention of the multitude of his children (sons). According to chap. ix. 7-10 there were ten of them. Bertheau thinks these do not belong here, and he would change the reading. But Haman was obliged to mention them in honor of his wife. What indeed would his riches have been to him had he possessed it for himself only, or if he had not hoped to cause his sons to inherit after him, in whom, so to speak, he continued to live on? Not only among Persians, but also among Israelites, the happiness of parents depended largely upon the multitude of children; especially of sons. Likewise also the esteem in which they were held, particularly with the king, who sent presents annually to parents having the greatest number of children (comp. Herod. I. 186). Then also he recounted all wherein the king had promoted him, etc. אֲשֶׁר is here the second accus., depending on וְ, and one of definition or of instrument.

Ver. 12. As the highest point of his distinction, and the very latest, he mentions the circumstance that, above all others, he alone was invited to the banquet of the queen to be given the day following. This is the most direct proof that the author regarded these invitations as the very highest point of distinction. And he lays great stress thereon in order the more powerfully to show the overwhelming disaster that befel Haman, and also to prepare the reader for the climax of the story. אֲנִי, also, moreover, indicates in advance that what follows is a new ascending period. אֲנִי קָרָאָהּ means she has invited me (see Ewald, § 295 c).

Ver. 13. Yet all this—thus he himself must make prominent his folly and insatiableness, and at the same time pronounce his own sentence—avaleth me nothing, is not satisfactory to me, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the king's gate.—בְּכָל־עֵת אֲשֶׁר may mean: at all times, every time, when I; so that the sense is that the feeling of dissatisfaction comes to the surface each time. But it may also mean: during the whole time when I, i. e., so long as I (comp. Job xxvii. 8, according to Schlottmann and the older interpreters). The fact that such a Jew may defy him unpunished seems to be a counter-proof against his dignity and power.

Ver. 14. Then said Zeresh his wife and all his friends.—Zeresh being first, and also the singular form of the verb, indicates that she led the counsel. Even kings as well as their chief officers doubtless often allowed themselves to be directed by their wives. Let a gallows be made, i. e., erected, of fifty cubits high.—The third person plural here, as also in what follows, again points to an indefinite "one," "let one," "let them." The height of the gallows should intensify the disgrace of hanging, but should also serve to make manifest the dreadful punishment, and to terrify as many as possible from being discourteous to Haman. Feuardant well says: "But why make it so high (i. e. the tree, gallows)? In order that his disgrace might be plainly observable to the eyes of all, and the more striking. Wherefore should he be in such haste about it? Lest there should be danger in delay or procrastination. For what reason have it erected before his own house? So that he and all his family going in and out, seeing Mordecai hanging, might mock and feast their cruel eyes and minds with so miserable and foul a spectacle." Speak thou unto the king that Mordecai be hanged thereon, i. e., speak, that they hang. וְהָאֵלֶּה as in chap. ii. 23. These advisers take it for granted that the king will give his consent.* Hence the gallows should be already prepared in order that the execution may come off that very morning. Then, of course, his joy can be unclouded for his noon meal.†

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Vers. 1-8. 1. The destiny of God's people depended not only on the humors of this Persian king in general, but also upon the impression which a woman might make upon that monarch. This must appear as very peculiar and highly significant. Women have often exerted a decisive influence upon the destinies of nations. But here it seems as if this was not quite consonant with the dignity of the people of God, as they were still worthy of being called. It seems as if such a state of things could only be true of a degenerate cause. At present we have the view of Esther standing before the king, not as a wife before her husband, but as a petitioner before a sovereign, imploring protection, and anxiously waiting whether he would graciously reach out his sceptre to her. This truly represents the condition of dependence and lowliness of the Church of the Diaspora. In contrast with it Ahasuerus represents the dignity of the worldly power bearing rule over the people of God. For all this, however, every one feels that true dignity does not dwell with the former; he would else not have been taken captive by the charms of a woman, nor have made such unlimited promises, as he expressed. But true worth dwells with Esther, who, impelled by love for her people, risks even her life. Judgment concerning him would be vastly different if his liberality were to remind us that divine love above is prepared to give the better (godly) people all that is needed for its salvation and welfare. At any rate Esther here very well represents the better people. There are found in her beautiful countenance traces of the deep grief which fills her heart. She has become weakened by the fasting which she has imposed upon herself. She is pale in consequence of fear, which she cannot suppress. Hence her appearance is all the more noble and winsome to us. And if in Ahasuerus we regard the power which must be overcome, and in her the possibility of Israel's power, then it can no more be doubtful, how great will be the victory of Israel.

BREX: "This is truly heroic magnanimity, by which Esther declares as great a faith towards God, as love towards His church. Her trust in Him is such that she incurs the peril of her life in obedience to His call. For though all the circumstances of the case threaten her destruction, still she hangs by faith upon the divine promises. For whom God calls and leads into danger, to him He has also promised preservation and deliverance in those dangers. To Abraham He said: 'Get thee out of thy country and thy father's house.' This was a call to face danger. But He also added the promise: 'I will make of thee a great nation.' It is love alone that exposes itself in behalf of the church of God, and would rather risk its own life than leave the Church of God in danger. We may at the same time observe the modesty of Esther. Though elevated to regal majesty she does not disregard nor despise her relatives, even when most unfortunate and outcast; but condescends even to run the hazard of her life for them. How very far are some men, who have obtained a dignity beyond others, from exhibiting this modesty!"

2. We may recognize the picture of a soul praying to God in the image of Esther standing with humble and imploring attitude before Ahasuerus. Sacred poetry, especially, has made use of single features or expressions of this history in this regard. So Dressler in his beautiful hymn: "My Jesus to whom seraphim," etc., causes the pious supplicant to say: "Reach thy sceptre to my soul, which like an Esther bows to thee, and shows herself thy bride to thee. Speak: 'Yea, thou art she whom I have chosen.'" The representative signification of the persons in this history have, as it were, brought with them their own recognition. The Christian may certainly employ them in this sense. So STARKS when he says: "If a heathen king can willingly grant such grace, how much more willing is the most faithful Lord to receive all poor destitute sinners coming to Him in faith, and in the good time to come to place them upon His throne." Ahasuerus paid no regard to the fact that Esther had violated his commandment, but received her very graciously, although his irrevocable edict stood in the way of granting her petition. The father heart of God, although we violate all His laws,

* ["A gallows, in the ordinary sense, is scarcely intended, since hanging was not a Persian punishment. The intention, no doubt, was to crucify or impale Mordecai; and the pole or cross was to be seventy-five feet high, to make the punishment more conspicuous. On the use of impalement among the Persians, see the note on chap. ii. 23." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["As Ahasuerus had already consented to a general massacre of the Jews within a few months, it seemed probable that he would readily allow the immediate execution of one of them. Requests for leave to put persons to death were often made to Persian kings by their near relatives (Herod. IX. 110; Plutarch, Artax. 14, 15, 17, 23, etc.), but only rarely by others." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

and though His unchangeable holiness be against the sinner, still yearns toward us in its great love and grace. But just as Esther came boldly and yet modestly, so we also must combine with true humility a true and elevated courage, a disheartened repentance together with confiding faith.

BREX: "Consider a moment the happy issue that these events take, which are undertaken with faith and pious prayer. . . . How did Esther extort this from so great a king? Certainly not by outcries, nor by contempt, nor by disdain, nor by quarrels, nor by contention, nor by dishonest means; for by these practices women are wont to get blows and wounds rather than power and control; but by piety toward God, by reverence toward her husband, by modesty and all other reputable virtues. For so by serving and being obedient women rule, which is their only legitimate mode of governing."

STARKE: "The king's heart is in the hand of the Lord, as the rivers of water; He turneth it whithersoever He will (Prov. xxi. 1). My God reach Thy sceptre also to Thy bride now humbling herself before Thee.—To promise much is the universal custom of great men, but those keeping promises are few in number, (1 Mac. xi. 53). It is far easier to obtain favors by an humble and modest behaviour than by sullenness and a boasting manner (Gen. xxiii. 7 sq.)."

Vers. 9-14. 1. Our book is distinguished by showing us the greatest and most surprising changes of fortune of opposite character in a very small compass. Esther and Mordecai, after having the most pleasing prospects held out to them, are plunged in the greatest distress: indeed they are seized with the terrors of death, and fast in sackcloth and ashes. Then again they are lifted up to the highest pinnacle of human fortune. Haman, on the contrary, the most powerful favorite of Ahasuerus, can even think of exterminating a whole people in order to satisfy his desire for revenge. The king not only agrees to all that he undertakes, but the queen also distinguishes him before all other officers in the most flattering manner. This he himself regards as the very summit of his fortune and honor; and then his fall is so sudden and great, that he finds his end on the very accursed tree which but shortly before he caused to be erected for his mortal enemy. In this way our book strikingly illustrates the double truth, that, whomsoever the Lord would raise especially high, He often humbles very low; and, on the other hand, he whom He would suddenly overthrow, is often raised to great heights. In other words, it shows us in what wonderful ways the Lord leads His own children, as well as godless sinners. But it also gives a very definite reason why the one receives such exalted station and the other such great degradation. We must not therefore think of God in an anthropopathic, i. e., unholy manner, nor must we speak of "a freak of fortune." The process of humbling brings forth quite a different result in the pious person than does elevation in an ungodly one. The humiliation of Mordecai causes him to enter upon most severe and long-continued exertion, instead of remaining in a state of inactivity and reserve. He begins to exert himself in a most persistent manner to do all in his power for the deliverance of his people, without regard to his own personal cost or comfort. He even puts at stake the welfare of his beloved Esther, for the good of all the people. He prevails upon Esther, and she is willing to endeavor to save her people, even at the risk of her own life. By means of their humiliation they both were elevated to a grand height of purpose, which they had not before known. But the matter chiefly interesting is, that they submit to this humbling process. This is shown by their fast. They become conscious that in them are many things that provoke the displeasure of God, and thus they are purified by means of their sorrows. There was doubtless not wanting in them the proverbial Jewish stiff-neckedness; and this had first to be broken, before they became fitted for the good days coming, especially in manifesting humility, gratitude, and condescension towards others. Haman, on the contrary, as soon as he came from the banquet with Esther, gathers his friends and wife, boasting of his glorious riches, and the multitude of his sons, and his exalted dignity and honor, not in order to bring a thank-offering to his God, but only to impress upon them, to what recognition and distinctions of honor he can lay claim. The first and great mistake of the wicked is that all which they have accomplished and gained becomes a source of self-exaltation; the result is, that instead of finding their success more than great enough, they still find fault, indeed regard it as worthless, as nothing, so long as they have not yet attained the one thing, which now appears to them as chief. The effect is not that they reflect and become conscious of their internal want, but they accuse those circumstances that bring the want. Hence their third and most desperate mistake is, that they conceive the resolution, or are moved thereto by others, that, whatever be in their way, let it cost what it may, be it even an outrageous deed, they will remove it, so only they reach the longed-for object. If the antecedent humiliation is the proper beginning for the elevation of the pious, then the preceding elevation is already a beginning of divine judgment for the wicked. The words: "When thou dost humble me, thou dost make me great" (Ps. xviii. 36), which in the original reads: "Thy gentleness (condescension) hath made me great," has its truth well expressed in Luther's translation; and in so far he correctly interprets the text, since God condescends or humbles Himself only to those that are humbled. But the other: "Surely thou didst set them in slippery places" (namely the wicked), must mean that by simply permitting the success of their plans and their prosperity, the Lord places the feet of the wicked on ground which will turn to water under their feet (comp. Job xx. 16).

BREX: "Remark in Haman the stupendous and wonderful judgment of God. For the impious Haman is most exultant and fearless as regards the preservation and augmentation of his dignity and power; and he is most certain also of the destruction of Mordecai, whom he prosecutes with hatred. But behold now the end of the thing. The impious and secure Haman shall perish with sudden destruction; while the pious and afflicted Mordecai is unexpectedly raised to the highest dignity. . . . Let us therefore cast away all impious security, and fear God; so that, walking according to the calling of God, you may be preserved though the sky fall and the earth be moved."

ESUARDENT (from Rupert, De victoria verbi, VIII., 18): "'In order that he may give over a huge wild beast, as a fierce bear, to destruction, he first draws him to his food; so that he may no sooner hear the report, than feel the pang; no sooner see the pit, than fall into it. The cautious hunter well knows that it is more convenient to overpower the entrapped beast, than to overtake it by a doubtful chase with the dogs when frightened and running through the woods. These things are evidently to be regarded as not merely a part of the prudence of Esther, but much more of Divine Providence, which directed the prudence of the queen.—Surely Haman errs in that boasting, since he neither recognises God as the author and bestower of so many good things, nor gives Him thanks without contumely and the mark of a most ungrateful mind. . . . What could be more effeminate and miserable than such a spirit? Does he not seem like another Tantalus, catching at the streams that flee his lips? . . . So they who have not peace toward God and love toward their neighbor, cannot even have them toward themselves. 'Peace to those who are near and to those that are afar off,' says the Lord; 'but the wicked are like the troubled sea, that cannot rest, whose waves cast up mire and dirt' (Isa. lvii. 20). . . . Observe finally how false and vain is the confidence of impious and cruel men, who seek and hope to oppress and utterly destroy the servants of God. It is themselves that perish by the just judgment of God, and they are often caught by the very snares they lay for others; while God rescues His servants, and magnificently vindicates them. Goliath and Holofernes are slain with their own sword, and the saints triumph with their heads. The Babylonian satraps seemed to themselves secure, when the flames and the lions were about to devour Daniel and his companions; but the latter were gloriously preserved, and the former ignominiously perished by their own artifices and instruments. Pharaoh boasted, 'I will overtake (the Hebrews), I will divide the spoil' (Exod. xv. 9); but he immediately became food for the fisher, and a prey for the servants of the Lord. 'The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are foolishness.' 'He that sitteth in the heavens shall laugh at them.' These are the effects of that judgment of which the Holy Spirit speaks by the prophets: 'Evil-doers shall be cut off; but those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth' (Ps. xxxvii. 9). Let us therefore cast away impious security, contempt of God, and inhumanity towards others; but let us walk in the love and fear of the Lord, that at length we may come to His heavenly kingdom."

2. The previous chapter has shown of what exertions and self-denial Mordecai and Esther were capable in their conflict with Haman, since the salvation of their people was at stake; the present chapter shows us the extent of the evil mind of Haman, since he was only concerned for himself. It was not enough for him to have procured an edict commanding the universal destruction of the Jews. It seemed too long a time before this should be accomplished. Neither in his eyes should Mordecai perish in the manner of the rest of the Jews. He made it a point not only to destroy Mordecai, but to expose him to public shame. So instead of abiding by the lot, the voice of his divinity, which had imposed patience on him, he took counsel with his wife and friends. Thus he reached a point in his madness of impatience and insecurity which in itself is the best proof that such a one is not far from self-destruction.

STARKE: "An envious man cannot peacefully enjoy the benefits which God gives him. Go not after thine lusts, but refrain thyself from thine appetites (Sir. xviii. 30).—It is very grievous of wives to urge their husbands to do wickedly (1 Kings xxi. 7; Sir. xxviii. 15, 16).—He who digs a pit for others will fall in himself (Sir. xxv. 11, 20).—We must not of ourselves revenge ourselves on our enemy, but first bring him before the proper tribunal (Rom. xii. 19).—When the wicked are busy to remove from their path what will mar their earthly joy, then, on the other hand, the godly should be diligent to remove that which will embitter their spiritual and heavenly joy."

The Fall of Haman.

CHAPS. VI. VII.

A.—HAMAN, EXPECTING THE HIGHEST HONOR, IS BROUGHT LOW. HE MUST GIVE THE HIGHEST HONOR TO MORDECAI.

CHAPTER VI. 1-14.

I. Ahasuerus is reminded of Mordecai's former meritorious act and desires to know what reward has been given him. Vers. 1-5.

1 ON that night could not the king sleep [the sleep of the king fled]; and he commanded [said] to bring the book of records [memorials] of the Chronicles [words of
2 the days]: and they were read<sup>1</sup> before the king. And it was found written, that Mordecai had told of [upon] Bigthana and Teresh, two of the king's chamberlains [eunuchs], the keepers of the door [threshold], who sought to lay hand on the king
3 Ahasuerus. And the king said, What honour and dignity [greatness] hath been done to Mordecai for [upon] this? Then [And] said the king's servants [young men] that ministered unto him [his attendants], There is nothing [has not a word
4 been] done for [with] him. And the king said, Who is in the court? (Now [And] Haman was [had] come into the outward court of the king's house, to speak [say] unto the king to hang Mordecai on the gallows [tree] that he had prepared for him).
5 And the king's servants [young men] said unto him, Behold, Haman standeth [is standing] in the court. And the king said, Let him come in.

II. Haman describes the mode of honoring a deserving man, and Ahasuerus commands him to bestow such on Mordecai. Vers. 6-11.

6 So [And] Haman came in. And the king said unto him, What shall be done [is there to do] unto [in the case of] the man whom the king delighteth to honour [in whose honour the king delighteth]? (Now [And] Haman thought [said] in his 7 heart, to whom would the king delight to do honour more than to myself?). And Haman answered [said to] the king, For the man whom the king delighteth to honour [in whose honour the king delighteth], Let the royal apparel be brought [let them bring, etc.] which the king useth to wear [with which the king has clothed
8 himself], and the horse that the king rideth [has ridden] upon, and the crown-royal
9 which is set upon his head: And let this [the] apparel and [the] horse be delivered to [given upon] the hand of one [a man] of the king's most noble princes,<sup>2</sup> that they may array [and let them apparel] the man withal whom the king delighteth to honour [in whose honour the king delighteth], and bring him on horseback [cause him to ride on the horses] through [in] the street [wide place] of the city, and proclaim [let them call] before him, Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king
10 delighteth to honour [in whose honour the king delighteth]. Then [And] the king said to Haman, Make haste, and take the apparel and the horse, as thou hast said

- [spoken], and do even so to Mordecai the Jew that sitteth [the one sitting] at [in] the king's gate: let nothing fail [not a word fall] of all that thou hast spoken.
- 11 Then [And] took Haman the apparel, and the horse, and arrayed [apparelled] Mordecai, and brought him on horseback [caused him to ride] through [in] the street [wide place] of the city, and proclaimed [called] before him, Thus shall it be done unto the man whom the king delighteth to honour [in whose honour the king delighteth].

III. The vexation of Haman is only increased through the evil prophecy of his friends. Vers. 12-14.

- 12 And Mordecai came again [returned] to the king's gate: but [and] Haman hasted [urged himself] to his house mourning, and having his head covered [veiled as to the head]. And Haman told [recounted to] Zeresh his wife and all his friends [lovers] every thing that had befallen him. Then [And] said his wise men and Zeresh his wife unto him, If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, before whom thou hast begun to fall, thou shalt not prevail against [be able to] him, but [for thou]
- 14 shalt surely fall before him. And while they were yet talking with him [and, i. e., then] the king's chamberlains [eunuchs] came [approached], and hasted to bring Haman unto the banquet that Esther had prepared [made].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-5. As in the former chapter the danger for Mordecai rose to the highest point, and we may expect nothing more than that both opponents, if left to themselves, should destroy each other on the following morning, even before the careful Esther has as yet accomplished her mission, we now perceive how timely is the occurrence of an event in the intervening night, which not only prevents Esther's intercession for Mordecai from being too late, but also brings about the beginning of the downfall of Haman. The author ascribes this occurrence to the troubled sleep of Ahasuerus. Thus any who merely take a superficial view of things might ascribe it to chance. But to judge from what we have already seen, it is certainly not opposed to his view, that the second Targum in all things transpiring takes God into account, and represents things as if the angel of God's mercy were well informed of the lamentations of the daughters of Israel, and at God's command had disturbed the sleep of Ahasuerus.

Ver. 1. On that night could not the king sleep—but not because the issued edict against the Jews had caused him unrest. In consequence he commanded to bring the book of records of the Chronicles, in which, according to chap. ii. 28, Mordecai's deed was inscribed. He caused it to be read, not in order to find out whether the Jews had really deserved their extermination. This would have been worthy of a better king, but it is opposed by the facts in ver. 10 and chap. iii. 15, and also chap. vii. 5. His object was simply to entertain himself with the records of the past. Still it is remarkable that just that point, treating of Mordecai's act, should have been read. On any other than a providential view, one would be inclined to think that he had commanded first of all to read those passages referring to the Jews.* The use of the participle מְרַאֲיִי וְיִדְיִי signifies that the reading lasted for some time, perhaps extended through the night. Hence we may not be astonished that when the passage referred to came to be read, Haman already waited in the outer court.

Vers. 2, 3. The name Bighthana reads Bigthana in chap. ii. 21. The question of the king: what honour and dignity hath been done to Mordecai for this? means, What honor and reward has been assigned him? עָלָיו, because of this report. עָשָׂה with עָלָיו means: to apportion, to requite, (comp. 2 Sam. ii. 6; iii. 8 et al.).†

Ver. 4. The question: who is in the court? means, what officer is now present? The king desired to consult with him as to what distinction would be appropriate to Mordecai. It seems that those desiring to be admitted to the king's presence had to wait in the outer court. With reference to the king's intention to distinguish Mordecai, comp. Brisson De reg. Pres. princ. I., c. 185.

Ver. 5. Even though other officers were there already, still Haman stood first in choice.‡

* ["There is reason to think that the Persian kings were, in most cases, unable to read. (Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies, Vol. IV., p. 15). Hence documents, which they wanted to consult, were read to them."—RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

† ["It was a settled principle of the Persian government that 'Royal Benefactors' were to receive an adequate reward. The names of such persons were placed on a special roll (Herod. VIII. 5), and great care was taken that they should be properly recommended. (See Herod. III. 140; V. 11; VIII. 85; Thucyd. I. 138; Xenoph. Hæc. III. 1 and 6, etc.). It is a mistake, however, to suppose (Davidson) that they were always rewarded at once. Themistocles was inscribed on the list in B. C. 490, but did not obtain a reward till B. C. 465. Other 'benefactors' waited for months (Herod. V. 11), or perhaps years (ib. IX. 107) before they were recompensed. Sometimes a 'benefactor' seems to have received no reward at all (ib. III. 138)."—RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

‡ ["He was waiting in the outer court, till it should be

Doubtless he was the most acceptable to the king. כִּי is a short order: "Let him come in," namely into the house of the king.

Vers. 6-11. Convinced that he only could be the man whom the king delighted to honor, Haman at once designates the very highest honor, and is immediately commanded to award it to Mordecai. Our author very strikingly portrays how Haman, in the very moment in which he expected to receive the highest distinction for himself, was most effectually and painfully brought low; and that his opponent, whom he hoped to destroy, was elevated to the highest place of honor. Both of these things, too—and this adds an additional charm to the whole—were brought about by Haman himself, by his own expressed judgment, indeed by his own hand.

Ver. 6. When the king had asked the question, Haman thought within himself (בְּלִבּוֹ), to whom would the king delight to do honor more than to myself?—יִתֵּר כִּפְּנֵי—יִתֵּר, going beyond me, more than myself. יִתֵּר occurs in this form only in a later period (comp. Ecol. xii. 12, 9; also chap. ii. 15; vii. 11, 16).

Ver. 7. Haman was quickly prepared to give answer, and without any difficulty called up one distinction of honor after another. The sentence: For the man whom the king delighteth to honor, is placed in advance as being a theme brought up by the king and pleasant for his own ears to hear. We can replace it with the Nomin. Abs. in this way: As regards the man, etc. Thereafter he adds honor upon honor that should be bestowed on such a one, and seems hardly to know where to stop. But his aim is that the king should thereby designate this man to be thus honored as his second or other self, which in view of the divine dignity of the Persian kings, implied a great deal.

Ver. 8. Let the royal apparel be brought which the king useth to wear.—The constr.

of לְבָשׁ with וְ occurs only here and in the Arabic; in other places לְבָשׁ is followed by the accus., or by עַל with a distinct part of the body.

The garment is not to be one such as the king is accustomed to wear, but as the perfect tense fully shows, one which he has worn. Hence it is not to be a common apparel for a special occasion, or the so-called Median dress, which the king himself wore, as also those distinguished by him, especially his princes (comp. Herod. III. 84; VII. 116; Xenophon's Cyrop. VIII. 3, 1 as also Bähr's annotation on Herod. III. 84); but it was a costly garment, whose value was much enhanced by the fact that the king had worn it. It is not expressly related that, the king gave as a present his own garments as a mark of honor, at least not by the Grecian authors. Plutarch, however, relates (in his Artax. 24), that Tiribazus had asked of the king that he put off his royal apparel and present it to him (Tiribazus, and doubtless as a mark of honor): but that the king had presented him with it, yet forbade him to wear it.* It is therefore to be remarked that those things which were used by the king, and which he had directly touched, especially his garments, were through him sanctified. A courtier even called the table sacred, from which Darius Codomannus had eaten, and wept when he saw Alexander the Great place his feet upon it. The steed upon which the king had ridden wore a crown, and was thereby designated as royal and sacred. נִתֵּן can only be tertia præter. Niph., not prima Plur. Imperf. Kal, as in Judg. xvi. 5. אֲשֶׁר בְּרִאשׁוֹ does not have reference to the head of a man, as if one could with Le Clerc, Rambach and others translate: "that the royal crown was placed on his head" (to this is opposed the præter נִתֵּן), instead of which the Imperf. should have been chosen); but it rather means: upon the head of the horse. That the royal riding horse was thus crowned is also not expressly stated, still it is not improbable, since, according to Xenoph., Cyrop. I. 3, 8; viii. 3, 18, to him belonged a golden harness. Besides all this there is seen on Assyrian and Old Persian monuments, not so distinct on the latter, horses of the king, and perhaps also of princes, that wear an ornament on their heads terminating in three points, which can easily be taken for a crown.†

Ver. 9. And let this apparel and horse be delivered to the hand of one of the king's most noble princes, etc.—נִתֵּן, the infinitive, is the supplement of the optative יִבָּא (comp. chap. ii. 3). Delivered to the hand of, i. e., given over to, given up to. As regards רְחוֹב הַפְּרָתִים, comp. chap. i. 8. The place רְחוֹב הַפְּרָתִים, upon which the man to be honored should ride up and down, must, according to chap. iv. 6, have been before the king's gate and palace, and therefore a public thoroughfare. According to Gen. xli. 43, a similar honor was bestowed upon Joseph.

Vers. 10, 11. The king perfectly agreed to the proposition of Haman at once—and this must no doubt surprise the reader; he orders this designated honor to be shown to Mordecai. That Mordecai was a Jew and accustomed to sit in the king's gate could be well known to him from the records of the chronicle of the empire, or from the courtiers, who read the history to him, and who had doubtless also given him still

* ["The honors here proposed have been thought 'excessive,' and certainly they are such as Persian monarchs rarely allowed to subjects. Each act would have been a capital offence if done without permission. Still there is nothing contrary to Oriental notions in their being done under sufferance." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["The meaning of this clause is doubtful. Either it may be translated, 'and on whose head a royal crown is set,' the reference being to the horse, which conceivably might bear an ornament like a crown on its crest; or, 'and that a royal crown be set upon his head,' the reference being to the man, and the suggestion being not to deprive the king of his own diadem, but to place on the head of the person about to be honored a crown similar in general character to the royal one. (Compare chap. i. 11). The grammatical construction is in favor of the former rendering; but we have in evidence that Persian horses even wore crowns on their heads."—RAWLINSON. We may add that the latter idea is too fantastic for even Oriental taste.—Tr.]

other information respecting Mordecai.* It is very remarkable that the king did not here remember, or at least overlooked the fact that he had decreed the destruction of the Jews, and had even given them over to Haman; but this is not entirely inexplicable, as may be seen from his usual mode of doing things.—Let nothing fail of all that thou hast spoken, i. e., omit nothing of all these things (comp. Josh. xxi. 45; Judg. ii. 19).

Vers. 12-14. While Mordecai returns, loaded with honors, to his usual place of station, the gate of the king,† Haman, with covered head and sorrowful heart, hastens home to his friends and wife only to hear the discouraging prophecy that the unfortunate occurrence will be the beginning of his end. To cover the head was a sign of deep shame and distress (comp. 2 Sam. xv. 30; Jer. xiv. 4).‡ His friends are now called wise men, at least some of them, because they undertook to forecast his future. Perhaps there were among them some magicians, who, according to Cicero, Divin. l. 23, were a nation of wise and learned men. They very wisely concluded: If Mordecai be of the seed of the Jews, then לא תוכל לו, thou shalt not prevail against him; then shalt not thou be the conqueror, but he (comp. Gen. xxii. 26, נפול תפול), either thou wilt entirely, or at least surely fail. It may be asked, how did they arrive at such a conclusion? If they only attributed enmity on the part of Mordecai, then they needed only to recall the edict against the Jews and published by Haman. But they also attribute a superior power to him, because he is a Jew. Hence they must base themselves on something else. Most interpreters, among them also Bertheau and Keil, think that although these friends had before counselled Haman to have Mordecai, the unfortunate Jew, hung, yet now when he had become a highly honored person on the part of the king, and this too, as it were, through a miracle, the truth impresses itself upon them that the Jews must be under the especial divine protection. And indeed we find far more indicated here than a fear of the shrewdness and energy of the Jews. The fact that the Jews still existed in spite of all afflictions which they had endured must have impressed many with the conviction that there was a higher power assisting and caring for them. But these persons are more concerned now to appear very wise. Hence they act as if they had not known that Mordecai was a Jew, although Haman, in chap. v. 15, had expressly so stated.

* ["There is nothing strange in the king's knowing the nationality and position of Mordecai. His nationality would probably have been noted in the book of the chronicles; and, when told that nothing had been done for him (ver. 3), the king would naturally have asked his position." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["It is quite consonant with Oriental notions that Mordecai, after receiving the extraordinary honors assigned him, should return to the palace and resume his former humble employment. Ahasuerus regarding him as sufficiently rewarded, and not yet intending to do any thing more for him." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

‡ [It was also "through shame probably; not wishing any of his acquaintance to accost him." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

Ver. 14. In order that the narrative may make a very strong impression, there must now follow blow upon blow in quick succession. Hardly had the prophecy been uttered before its fulfillment begins. Accordingly the eunuchs of the king arrive, who press Haman to come to the banquet of the king.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Ver. 1 sq. 1. Mordecai, according to chap. iv. 14, was convinced that if Esther would not undertake the rescue of her people, there would be found other means and ways. He had placed his trust less in her than in the general providence which watched over him. Now it is seen that though Esther had become willing to intercede, he was correct in his position. Even before Esther had ventured to express her request for her people, Mordecai himself was threatened with destruction; and before he could do anything to avert, or was even acquainted with his danger, it was already removed. It seems to have been a very insignificant means of which Providence availed itself for his protection. But it was one which, because it clearly lay above human co-operation, very definitely revealed the higher activity in his behalf: it was the sleeplessness of Ahasuerus. When the Lord is desirous of protecting or saving His people, something must serve Him of which men least thought before. Nothing is either too great or too small for Him.

BREXZ: "This is as it is written in the Psalm: 'He suffered no man to do them wrong; nay, He rebuked even kings for their sake.' For the pious are so great a care to God, that in order to preserve them He does not even spare kings, but brings upon them various calamities."

FEUARDENT: "Let every one bear in mind day and night that pious proposition of Augustine concerning the solicitude of God for His saints (Conf. iii. 11): "So day and night dost Thou watch for my safe-guard as if, forgetful of Thy whole creation in heaven and earth, Thou consideredst me alone, and hadst no care for others.""

Berl. Bible: "O Lord, it is good to trust in Thee in the expectation of Thy help! Thou dost continually watch over the souls left in Thy care. And though Thou dost even wait until things have come to extremities, in order to cause the greater exercise of faith, so that none may despair of Thy assistance, still at the right time Thou art ever ready to help.—What indeed is more natural than that a king cannot sleep, and that he should wish something read to him? It is this altogether natural, yet wonderful leading, which causes the hearts of those who experience it to rejoice! To all other hearts this is dark. This wise, divine Providence is still unknown to those who only live in and for themselves."

2. It does not appear that Ahasuerus had a restless night because he had grievous thoughts regarding the edict of destruction against the entire Jewish people. We find that he is far too careless, much too indifferent and superficial, for such a state of mind (comp. chap. iii. 15; vii. 5). Still we would have naturally expected it, and it would have been well for him if it had been so. Had he been concerned about the great number of subjects that would thus be murdered, it would not have been necessary for him first to be reminded of the fact, through the reading of the history of his reign, that he had once been in danger of being murdered himself. He would have spontaneously remembered that only a Mordecai saved him from his fate of destruction. It would have been quite just that he, while robbing so many of their rest and sleep, whom he had destined to a doom of death, should be sleepless not one, but many nights. Would that every one whose eyes cannot find sleep at night might ask whether he had at any time or in any manner done wrong, which he should be in haste to set right; or whether he does not still owe thanks for some benefit received! Would that all those who must be awake at night were clearly conscious of the fact that there is Another who is also awake, and that He it is who imposes upon us this sleeplessness! Only when we look up to Him can we find true rest (comp. Ps. cxix. 55).

8. It was soon after the marriage of Ahasuerus with Esther that Mordecai discovered and reported the conspiracy. Hence it was now over five years that this meritorious deed had been recorded, but not yet rewarded. Instead of reward, he was threatened with destruction. Those who are diligent for the welfare of others must often give up the hope of receiving their well-merited reward, even at the present day. What is more sorrowful still is the fact that one is often inclined to impugn both their motives and their work, as if they had not designed it or exerted themselves to effect it. Mordecai's history may be very instructive and comforting to such. Ahasuerus too may here again as elsewhere remind us of a faithful watchman, who, however it may go with him, never sleeps nor slumbers. The works of the good are not only recorded on earth, where they are often and easily forgotten, but they are above all recorded in heaven. It is because God saves men by His grace that He will render unto all according to their work—to those not obedient to the truth, but obeying unrighteousness, displeasure and wrath; and to the others according to their patience in good works, glory and honor (Rom. ii. 7). The seed that they have scattered, if it was good, is indestructible, and cannot be lost; and when the time comes, God will bring it to maturity, so that it may bear abundant fruit either to the sowers or to others (comp. Gal. vi. 9).

BREX: "Although men are unmindful of benefits received, and, as Pindar says, old thanks sleep, still our Lord God is never forgetful." When God's time for reward has come, then even the zeal of enemies must assist Him, as we have seen in our history of Haman. However watchful and diligent our enemies may be in order to utterly destroy the pious, yet all their acts and labor form only the ground of the scene, which by the help of God is made to serve in perfecting the web of His leadings.—BREX: "This is the right hand of the Most High which brings it to pass that those good things occur to the pious which the wicked hope for; and to the ungodly there come those evils which they have prepared for the godly." For the wicked are only the bearers of that power which is ever desirous of evil, and yet ever produces good.

FEUARDENT: "In Haman thou perceivest how blind and erring is the temper of every ambitious man. He admires and regards only himself; he fancies himself worthy of all honor and reverence, and thinks that all things are due to him. He despises all others as obscure, abject and vile. It is well, however, that there is a God in heaven who laughs to scorn, contemns, judges and hurls down the proud from their seats, but glorifies the humble: so that all may learn to be wise concerning themselves, and to be content with moderate fortune. . . . Let all the pious therefore take courage, nor ever fail or despair of divine help on account of the rage and greatest power or violence of tyrants. For Christ still lives; He reigns, and will forever reign; and He puts all His enemies under His feet."

STARKE: "Princes should have diligent care that none who have deserved well of the State or of themselves are left to go unrewarded (Gen. xli. 42; Dan. ii. 48). God knows our acts of kindness; and though we may regard them as lost or ignored, yet He can bring them to the light at the proper time to receive even a greater reward than if they had been immediately rewarded (Gen. xli. 12 sq., 39 sqq.)."

Ver. 6 sq. FEUARDENT: "Diligently weigh the change of the right hand of the Most High. Haman had come into the court in order that by authority of the king he might destroy Mordecai by an ignominious death. Him, however, he is compelled to exhibit and proclaim to all in royal magnificence. He had come for the purpose of raising him aloft fastened upon a very high cross with the utmost shame. But on the contrary he is compelled to adorn this very man with regal splendors, to set him on the king's horse, and to herald him publicly as the monarch's most dear and honored friend. He had come with the design of bringing a capital charge against him; and he has the task of decorating his head with the royal diadem."

It seems to us to be like a divine irony in the destiny of Haman that he is himself compelled to assign the highest distinction to his mortal enemy, and that the king instructs him to impart this honor with his own hands, thus making his downfall the more striking and lamentable. But in fact this same truth is plainly shown daily over the entire ungodly world. The world must ever concede honor and glory to those who have deserved well respecting the welfare of mankind; but it is by no means its heroes and divinities who can claim this merit, though they have been regarded as the men of glory from antiquity (Gen. xi. 4).* What the latter have accomplished has been deception, wars and vain labors. It is those whom the world regards least of all fit for their work that have done most for it. And whose will be all that the world has brought forth and fostered, and which it regards as great and beautiful? When the judgments of God shall have been consummated upon the world, lambs will pasture upon it as if upon their own pasture, and the waste places of the fat ones shall strangers eat (Isa. v. 17).

Vers. 12-14. 1. When Haman had bestowed the highest dignity on Mordecai, he hastened home, sad and with covered countenance. It is a bad sign that he knew nothing better to do in such an hour. Those are upon difficult paths who feel themselves humbled when they have been obliged to show deserved honor to others. Even in the estimation of the world it would have been far better if he had endeavored to change his enemy into a friend. And had he but reflected and correctly apprehended his present position, he would have recognized the warning voice of God, which endeavored in a firm, but yet kind tone to lead him in the way of his salvation. The final judgments of God are ever preceded by other heralds. They are indeed the announcement of the beginning of the revelations of the wrath of God; but they are also proofs of the long-suffering and love of God, which would, even in the eleventh hour lead to salvation. But it is a remarkable fact that when the worldly need their wisdom most, especially they who have usually been regarded as wise, just then they are utterly bereft of counsel; and hence their proud and stubborn hearts all at once become faint.

FEUARDENT: "In prosperity he is highly insolent and cruel; but in adversity he is so broken and dejected that he knows not which way to turn." But his counsellors are no better off than himself. FEUARDENT: "His friends do not console him, nor show him any plan for escaping his danger, which nevertheless was then the most needful help for Haman; but they throw him, just hesitating between hope and fear, into despair. 'Thou wilt surely fall in his sight,' say they. Had they admonished him indeed of his many and heinous sins toward God and His servants, of his duty of recognizing the inevitable judgment of God, of repentance, of reconciliation; then perchance it may have turned out better with him."—When our author permits these advisers to give expression of the superiority of the people of God, their words are much more to the point and weighty, as FEUARDENT says: "The power and efficacy of truth is so great that even its enemies and all the ungodly bear testimony to it. So the magicians of Pharaoh are compelled to explain: 'This is the finger of God;' and the Egyptians cry: 'Let us flee before Israel, for the Lord fighteth for them' (Ex. viii. 19; xix. 25)."

2. What Haman fears, and what is hinted at by his advisers, is the great truth that the Lord had laid a stone in Zion, upon which those falling upon it shall be broken. But it is just those that have placed themselves upon this stone, who are secure against all assaults by the world. And what the world daily and clearly demonstrates is the fact that it is not enough to recognize or apprehend the truth; but it is necessary also to give the heart a proper position with respect to it. Happy are they who need not fear, but who can console their hearts when the Lord says: "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse them that curse thee;" "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm" (Ps. cv. 15); "He who toucheth you, toucheth the apple of his eye" (Zech. ii. 8).

STARKE: "Self-conceit, obstinacy and selfishness are three shameful and harmful evils that have plunged many into ruin (1 Tim. vi. 9). Wordly persons seek their highest good in external pomp and appearance (Ps. xlix. 12).—Self-love appropriates all things to itself, and conceals nothing to its neighbor.—Men seek perishable honor; would that they strove diligently after the imperishable honor and glory of heaven!—The manner of wicked advisers is, when the haughty fare too well, to goad them on to vindictiveness; but if something unforeseen checks them, they drive them to despair.—God is the same always; He can bring it about that neither earth nor hell can prevail against us.—The wicked are nearest destruction when they deem themselves farthest from it (Ps. lxxiii. 7, 18, 19)."

B.—ON THE VERY GALLOWS CAUSED TO BE ERECTED FOR MORDECAI, HAMAN, ACCUSED BY ESTHER, IS HIMSELF HUNG.

CHAPTER VII. 1-10.

I. Esther pleads for her People, and accuses Haman. Vers. 1-6.

- 1 So [And] the king and Haman came to banquet [drink] with Esther the queen.
- 2 And the king said again [also] unto Esther, on the second day, at the banquet [feast] of wine, What is thy petition, queen Esther? [ask,] and it shall be granted [given to] thee: and what is thy request? and it shall be performed, even to the
- 3 half of the kingdom [ask to the half of the kingdom, and it shall be done]. Then

[And] Esther the queen answered and said, If I have found favor in thy sight [eyes], O king, and if it please [be good upon] the king, let my life [soul] be given 4 me at my petition, and my people at my request: For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed [for one to destroy], to be slain [to smite], and to perish [cause to perish]: but if [and provided] we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue [hushed], although [for] the enemy [adversary] could not 5 countervail [is not equalling] the king's damage. Then [And] the king Ahasuerus answered [said],<sup>1</sup> and said unto Esther the queen, Who is he [is he this], and where is he [is this he],<sup>2</sup> that durst presume in his heart [whose heart has filled 6 him] to do so? And Esther said, The [a man]<sup>3</sup> adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman.<sup>4</sup> Then [And] Haman was afraid [terrified] before the king and the queen.

II. Ahasuerus, extremely enraged, causes the Death of Haman. Vers. 7-10.

7 And the king, arising [arose] from the banquet of wine in his wrath, went into the palace-garden: and Haman stood up to make request for his life [soul] to [from] Esther the queen; for he saw that there was evil determined [finished] 8 against him by [from with] the king. Then [And] the king returned out of the palace-garden into the place of the banquet [feast] of wine; and Haman was fallen [falling] upon the bed whereon Esther was. Then said the king, Will he [Is it to] force the queen also before [with] me in the house? As the word went out of the 9 king's mouth, [and] they covered Haman's face. And Harbonah, one of the chamberlains [eunuchs], said before the king, Behold also, the gallows [tree] fifty cubits high,<sup>5</sup> which Haman had made for Mordecai, who had spoken [spoke] good for [upon] the king standeth in the house of Haman. Then [And] the king 10 said, Hang him thereon. So [And] they hanged Haman on the gallows [tree] that he had prepared for Mordecai. Then [And] was the king's wrath pacified [subsided].

TEXTUAL AND GRAMMATICAL.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

Vers. 1-6. What here follows seems a thing to be expected as a matter of course, yet the manner of its occurrence, particularly the rapidity with which events succeed each other, as well as their magnitude and importance, imparts a certain charm to the narrative. Esther now steps unreservedly forward at the banquet that she has prepared and to which she has invited Haman (in chap. vi. 14), and boldly presents her accusation and request. The king is quite prepared to give a correct decision in the case.

Ver. 1. So the king and Haman came to banquet with Esther the queen.—לְשֹׂנוֹת stands for: in order to participate in the feast. The drinking after the feast, מִשְׁתֵּה הַיַּיִן (comp. chap. v. 6) was probably regarded as the chief matter at the time. But Esther petitioned (ver. 8): let my life be given at my petition, and my people at my request.—The 3 is the so-called 3 pretii, "about," "for." Her petition is seemingly the ransom which she profers: "my people" means in short: for the life of my people. She bases her petition in ver. 4 on the words: For we are sold, I and my people, to be destroyed, etc.—She has all the more occasion for the expression נִמְכְּרֵנוּ, since she and her people were left to the mercy of Haman for the sum of money he had promised the king if the Jews should be destroyed (chap.

iii. 9; iv. 7). לְהַשְׁמִיד and the following active infinitives are clearly substitutes for the passive form, precisely as in the royal order (chap. iii. 13).\* She also adds, however: But if we had been sold for bondmen and bondwomen, I had held my tongue, although the enemy could not countervail the king's damage, and she thereby indicates that it concerns not only her own, but also the king's interest. אֵלַי, contracted from אֵלַיָּךְ, as in Eccl. vi. 6, also common in the Aramaic language, introduces an event in a hypothetical manner as being more desirable, and is followed by the perfect, if instead another event than the one anticipated has occurred. In the next sentence usually the perfect follows with 1 consec. Here, however, the 1 is absent because Esther does not desire to say what she would do, but what she would have done: "I had held my tongue, although," etc. The sentence:  $\text{הָיָה לִי שֶׁחֹשֶׁן}$ , means according to R. Sal. ben-Melech and Rambach: The enemy can by no means equal, compensate or make good by his money the loss which the king suffers by our destruction. Similar also are the views of Clericus and others, who suggest an intermediate thought enlarging the meaning, such as: "But I dare not be silent." Though even such an addition were in itself not doubtful, still  $\text{הָיָה לִי}$  in the Kal, with 3, does not mean compensate (to compensate), but to be equal to, or to be worth as much as some other thing (comp. Prov. iii. 15; viii. 11). The assumption of Gesenius, that the expression: "The enemy is not equal to the damage to the king," is only another form of sentence for: "The enemy cannot make good the damage to the king," is very improbable. Hence Bertheau and Keil interpret it: "The enemy is not worthy of the king's damage," i. e. is not of sufficient account that I should grieve or distract the king. They insist that  $\text{הָיָה לִי}$  does not only mean pecuniary loss, as is commonly assumed from Ezra iv. 13, 22, but according to the Targums means also bodily harm (comp. Targ. Ps. xxi. 7; Gen. xxvi. 11; 1 Chron. xvi. 22). Still the thought thus gained is not quite satisfactory. It would have mattered little, not whether Haman, but whether the Jews were worthy of the king's displeasure. Certain it is that Esther expressed herself in very brief words, and such as implied more. Perhaps we may enlarge their sense thus: I would have held my tongue; for the punishment of the enemy is not worthy of, is less important than the averting of the damage which the king will suffer, now that the Jews are ordered to be destroyed; but this he would not have suffered if they had been sold as slaves, and hence had realized a large sum. In this way the chief thought is made to be the loss which the king would sustain if a whole people were destroyed; and Esther's keeping out of sight her special concern about the destruction of the Jews, which would have been very shrewd in her under any circumstances, becomes particularly so in the present instance and before Ahasuerus. The ancient translators, it seems, were at a loss here, and hence offer us but little help.

Ver. 5 with its twice-repeated  $\text{אָמַר}$ : Then the king Ahasuerus answered, and said unto Esther the queen, by its solemn title: "The king to the queen," indicates the great importance of these words and of the moment. The king of the great empire here addressed her, who was a daughter of her people, but also the queen in this great realm. At the same time the twice-repeated: "he said," reveals the agitation of the king, to which also corresponds the double question: Who and where is he?  $\text{לֹא אֶשֶׁר מְלָא}$ : that durst presume in his heart to do so.—We might expect it to read: "Who had filled his heart," viz. with the thought to do so. But it is the heart from which proceed the thoughts, and which determines the rest of the man to conclusive purposes (Isaiah xlv. 20; Eccl. viii. 11; Matt. xv. 19).\*

Ver. 6. Esther still hesitates to name Haman, but at last brings the predicate into prominence: The adversary and enemy is this wicked Haman.—She does not say: "The evil-disposed person," viz. of whom she is speaking, but without the article,  $\text{אֶת־הָאֹיֵב}$ , in order to make as strikingly prominent as possible the conception of the man so inimical. Haman trembled; for  $\text{נִבְּחַת}$  means more than that he was simply alarmed (comp. 1 Chron. xxi. 30; Dan. viii. 17, and  $\text{דָּבַחַת}$ , Ps. lxxviii. 17; Job vi. 4).

Vers. 7–10. Thereupon the king became at once terribly angry. Because of his agitation he went aside for a moment, but soon returned, and at once gave order for the execution of Haman. —Into the palace-garden (comp. chap. i. 5), which was the place to which he retired. This is strikingly expressed by  $\text{סָקַף}$ . He did this in order to recover from the first burst of anger, and to consider what was to be done with Haman. Haman remained standing to make request of his life to Esther. — $\text{עַל־נַפְשׁוֹ}$ , properly, "because of his life" ( $\text{נַפְשׁוֹ}$  with  $\text{עַל}$ , as in chap. iv. 8), since he saw that on the part of the king there was no more hope for him if Esther would not intercede for him; strictly: that evil was determined against him by the king, fully determined ( $\text{מִלְּפָנָיו}$  as in 1 Sam. xxv. 17; Ezra v. 13).

Ver. 8. Was fallen, i. e. had kneeled down ( $\text{סָפַף}$ ) as in Josh. vii. 10 and elsewhere) upon the bed whereon Esther was (sat), hence as a petitioner he fell at her feet.† The king, however, soon returned and said—since he could not control his anger, but now manifested it more terribly: Will he force the queen also before me in the house?—The infin.

$\text{לִכְבוֹשׁ}$  is here placed, as if he were understood as asking a question. But it may also be made stronger (comp. 1 Chron. xv. 2, etc.), viz. to trample under foot, to subjugate. If the question had only been whether the queen could be forced sexually, then Ahasuerus could not have asked such a question so lightly. It would only have been an expression of his highest displeasure and wrath. If Esther were honest and just, she must of necessity have exonerated Haman from such an evil design. The whole situation of things makes such a foul purpose highly improbable, indeed impossible. Or perhaps Ahasuerus was only asking whether, if one would attain anything from the queen, it was necessary to make request with such force.\* We can readily think that Esther sought to withdraw from Haman, but that he, as it were, forcibly detained her. The word of which it is now said: As the word went out of the king's mouth, they covered Haman's face, cannot mean the question that just preceded. Then it would be "this word;" but this is another word. We may consider that this word, possibly with a little addition, quite intelligible to the officers, was to them a command to take Haman out of his sight. The subject of יִדְּן is those whose duty it was to execute such commands, the servants of the king. The covering of the face was probably the beginning of the execution of the death-sentence (comp. Curtius vi. 8, 22: "They brought Phileas with covered head into the palace"). Even old interpreters, such as Brentius, Rinkel, Feuarent, remind us of the sentence in Cicero pro C. Rabirio IV. 13: "Lictor, bind his hands, veil his head, hang him on the hapless tree."†

* ["Ahasuerus could not really have doubted; but he affects to doubt, that he may express his anger at the act, apart from all personal considerations."] RAWLINSON.—[Tr.]

Ver. 9. In order that it might appear very strikingly what our history here would teach—that he who dug a pit for others, especially for pious Jews, shall fall into it himself; or yet more definitely that inimical heathendom shall perish by its own devices, it must be so ordered that one of the officers shall bring it about to have Haman hung upon the same gallows which he had caused to be erected for Mordecai. And in order to show how much hated this enemy of the Jews was, one of the king's officers must point out this very tree of death. This person was Harbonah, doubtless the one mentioned in chap. i. 10, one of the eunuchs of the king, i. e. of the higher officers who waited on the king. The word בֵּן with which he begins: Behold also, the gallows fifty cubits high, which Haman had made for Mordecai, etc., may not imply that the other servants or even Harbonah himself had already brought accusations against Haman, and in addition would also reproach him with the erection of this gallows (Berteau, Keil); but from Harbonah's view, it points out the most appropriate means at hand offered by the prepared gallows for the fate of Haman. This is more significant against Haman. In giving prominence to the fact that Mordecai was the one who spoke well of the king by revealing the plot against the king's life (comp. chap. ii. 22; vi. 2), he intimates that it was more fit for Haman to grace the gallows than the one for whom it was originally erected.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

Vers. 1-9. 1. How very carefully Esther brings her petition before the king, even though the king for the second time has accepted her invitation! She waits until the king himself inquires into it anew, and until he has even obligated himself to her to the half of his kingdom; she so frames her speech that her more personal interest, which in the present instance would have been of paramount importance in the eyes of the king, is presented equally with, indeed in advance of, all others. She avoids at once opposing herself against Haman; and finally she seeks to take the king on his weak side by giving prominence to the fact that in the destruction of the Jews the king would sustain a great loss. It was to her still a question whether Ahasuerus would permit her to interfere in the business of government—indeed whether he would grant her a hearing while opposed to so powerful a rival. But she acted at last with fear and trembling—although she was assured of the best ally as being with her—not only Ahasuerus, but also God's love. Her petition, moreover, had the very best effect. Thus the Lord, who leads the hearts of men and of kings like streams of water, has His help prepared for us, when we in our little faith stand trembling; and often where we hardly dared hope or advance, He gives us the greatest success. All depends upon this, that our hesitation be not of unbelief, but that we have fears only from our own power, capability, or worthiness; and that we seek not so much to promote our own cause as rather God's, and ours through Him.

STARKE: "Trembling soul, if this heathen king is so trustworthy in his promises, then your heavenly King is far more faithful. The former promises only to give the half of his kingdom—but He to give you the whole kingdom (Luke xii. 32; xxii. 29). Truth may be crushed to the earth, but it dies not; it can be avoided or offended, yet it will finally come to light and triumph."

2. Haman, from the very outset, had moved toward the fulfilment of his wishes with the greatest assurance. Even after being inquired of by the king as to what should be done to the man whom the king would especially honor, he had answered with the greatest confidence. Doubtless he thought that, because of the friendship, or because of the weakness of the king, all things were for him permissible, and he hoped every thing for himself. Yet if he had but reflected, he must have acknowledged that this foundation was unsafe, and that it was easy for another to gain the favor of the king against himself. But this is the common curse of human self-confidence that it places us in a state of insecurity. He who has succeeded in gaining the favor of the great is very liable to think that now he will also easily govern the servants of his Lord.

3. Truly it is a distressing condition in which Haman finds himself at the table of Esther. Outwardly he receives the highest distinction and is made happy, but inwardly there already comes a painful presentiment of his downfall. He is indeed already bound by the cord that shall plunge him into destruction.

FEUARENT: "But in all this the first notable thing is how far apart stand the judgments of the Almighty and those of this world, since those whom the world esteems most happy and fortunate are truly most unhappy and unfortunate before God. . . . Men, indeed, seeing only what appears, and judging according to the outward semblance, would have boldly pronounced no man more fortunate than Haman. But in fact and in God's view, who sees the heart, he was of all men the most miserable. For he was inflated with ambition, he was hot with envy, he was bursting with hate, and went to the banquet in the most disturbed state of mind. There rankled in the bottom of his heart the thought of that fresh honor which he had lately been forced to confer upon his enemy; and he was moreover goaded to desperation by what his friends had told him to his face—that he himself, having once begun to fall before the Jew, would forever be his inferior, and that Mordecai would increase in glory and honor.”

* "Of course the king did not believe his own words. But he meant to tax Haman with a further offence in not sufficiently respecting the person of the queen; and he thereby suggested to the attendants his instant execution." RAWLINSON.—Tr.

† ["The Macedonians and the Romans are known to have commonly muffled the heads of prisoners before executing them; but it is not mentioned elsewhere than here as a Persian custom." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

Haman, at the table of Esther, is but a picture of all wicked ones at the table of fortune. The change of circumstances now manifest, it is true, was unique, and seemed as if purposely selected for him.—FEUARDENT: “A little while ago all fell prostrate before Haman, but now he quails before a feeble woman. He who persecuted the Jews worse than a dog or a serpent, now becomes a suppliant to a Jewess. He who had procured a cruel slaughter for all the Hebrews is now anxious to save his own life. He who could not endure Mordecai now intercedes with his domestic.” The old reverse substantially recurs: “At the feast he who was unwilling to afford a crumb of bread to Lázarus, asked to be cooled by the finger of Lázarus dipped in water.” This change will be most striking when Christ shall lay all His enemies at His feet.

On ver. 8. 1. The only means left to Haman to be tried for his salvation evidently was that he should fall at the feet of Esther and implore her pardon. But it was just this which Ahasuerus, now returning from the garden, interpreted as a great crime, and so it filled the measure of his sin. When once the season of divine grace and forbearance allotted to sinners is closed, when punitive justice arises against them, then it seems as if they can undertake nothing but what will aggravate their case and hasten their own destruction. As Ahasuerus did in this case, so did all those who stood by the side of Haman and had given him their confidence. Now that he is so near his downfall, these are inclined to use every thing against the offender by which he might obtain deliverance. They know him too well to be ignorant of the tricks and deceptions of which he is capable. Petitions for pardon—and even repentance—is in such cases often thought to be only the repentance of Cain, affording no guarantee of genuine reform. Possibly these judges go too far in their sentence, but God's justice employs them as channels against the offenders.

FEUARDENT: “The king indeed is unjust in fixing this calumny upon Haman—but God is just who permits the righteous penalty to fall upon him for his lies and calumnies, inasmuch as he would have brought violence upon other virgins or matrons, and would have plunged the whole people of God into ruin. Accordingly it is written: “By what one sinneth, by that also shall he be punished;” and again: “With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured unto you again.”

2. The question raised by ancient interpreters whether it was not the duty of Esther to exonerate Haman from the accusation by the king, and to second his request for pardon, can only be satisfactorily answered by making the proper distinction between the views of such points in the Old and in the New Testaments. Upon New Testament grounds, the answer would undoubtedly be in the affirmative. It is no greater offence than one which the Christian, though he have suffered the most grievous insults and offensive acts, should be prepared to pardon, in a spirit free from hatred or revenge. Now whether the king, here acting in his judicial capacity, could entertain her request, would have been a different matter. Taking, however, the Old Testament view, the answer would most certainly be, No; and this the more, inasmuch as there was not yet a more satisfactory means of averting evil than the destructive judgments of God upon Haman, who, as an Agagite and an Amalekite, was regarded as representing the cause of evil in opposition to the cause of God and of His people (comp. Doct. hist. thoughts on Neh. iii. 36 sqq.). Further, in Esther's conduct is plainly shown the important fact that, when the season of grace is expired, Justice desires no interruption through petitions for mercy. This truth must be taken to heart, and we must not bewail its force. When Christians see the wicked perish, let them weep over their fate. But we must rejoice over the divine judgments upon iniquity. This serves to strengthen our faith in a holy, ever active God. Our own opposition to iniquity must be as unrelenting as was that of Esther against Haman.

STARKE: “It is barely credible that the king should have thought further upon this matter—have perceived the wonderful dealings of God. Neither can we believe that he was thereby led to know the true God. Esther, however, and Mordecai, together with many of the Jews, must have been gloriously strengthened in their faith. Jehovah's judgments are just (Rev. xix. 2). Let the Christian here notice the goodness and truthfulness of God (Rom. xi. 22), and let both be to him a warning voice!”

On vers. 9, 10. Bitter and sarcastic must it have struck upon the ears of Haman when Harbonah, one of the eunuchs, who up to this time had humbly shown him all desired honor, remarked, now that the doomed man was led away: “Behold also, the gallows fifty cubits high, which Haman had made for Mordecai, who had spoken good for the king, standeth in the house of Haman.” Must it then be that this despicable creature should raise his foot against the dead lion? See how in this moment he turns toward the newly rising sun with praises in his mouth! Must this miserable slave also add to the already great misfortune of Haman—that he should be hung on just this gallows which he had intended for the Jews! Poor Haman! Didst thou not know that in such ways as were thine thou hadst no really true friend? Didst thou not perceive that a selfish spirit and hypocrisy formed thy body guard? Not know that those who externally bowed the knee to thee, inwardly gnashed their teeth against thee? True friendship and fellowship can only exist between those who are together united to God. Even then we may of ten discover the overweening egotism which again loosens such bonds. Where this common bond is wanting, there separation must ensue; there, in fact, each goes his own way. If in such a case all the secret endeavors and aims could be exposed, we would discover a "war of all against all." It is frequently seen that apparent friends afterward become executioners, who, by their mockery, add to the misery of the culprit. In the future also it will be found that the enemies of the people of God will themselves destroy each other in order that judgment on them may be perfect. There is a universal just government of the world on the part of God. He who is capable of so shameful an act as not only to wish to destroy his enemy, but also to cover him with the greatest possible ignominy, must not be surprised if in his own well deserved misfortune great shame shall also accompany his own end. Whoever digs a pit for others, will himself fall into it. This proverb verifies itself in its fullest sense. It has the ring of Satanic mockery when Harbonah says: "And the gallows also stand ready, and that, too, before Haman's own house." There are many people who hesitate not to utter it mockingly, and how good were it for all those who are in danger of entering the way of destruction, should they hear it said loud enough for them to hear, and should they repeat it to themselves: "Also the gallows stand ready without."

STARKE: "It must also so happen in the just judgment of God that since the highest minister of State had caused the highest gallows to be erected in accordance with his greatness of feeling and State position and honors, before which all bowed in adoration to the earth, he should himself be elevated above all other people that were hung."

SECOND SECTION.

The Deliverance of the Jews.

CHAPTERS VIII. IX.

A.—ESTHER AND MORDECAI PROCURE PERMISSION FOR THEIR PEOPLE TO STAND ON THEIR OWN DEFENCE.

CHAP. VIII. 1-17.

I. Esther and Mordecai receive authority to order all things needful for the deliverance of the Jews.
Vers. 1-8.

- 1 On that day did the king Ahasuerus give the house of Haman, the Jews' enemy, unto Esther the queen: and Mordecai came before the king; for Esther had told
- 2 what he was unto her. And the king took [removed] off his ring [signet], which he had taken [caused to pass] from Haman, and gave it unto Mordecai. And Esther set Mordecai over the house of Haman. And Esther spake yet again [added and spoke] before the king, and fell down at [before] his feet, and besought him with tears [wept and supplicated to him] to put away [cause to pass] the mischief [evil] of Haman the Agagite, and his device that he had devised against the Jews.
- 4 Then [And] the king held out the golden sceptre toward [to] Esther. So [And]
- 5 Esther arose, and stood before the king, And said, If it please [be good upon] the king, and if I have found favor in his sight [before him], and the thing [word] seem right before the king, and I be pleasing [good] in his eyes, let it be written to reverse the letters [books] devised by [of the devising of] Haman the son of Hammedatha [the Medatha] the Agagite, which he wrote to destroy the Jews which
- 6 [who] are in all the king's provinces: For how can I endure to see [and (i. e., when) I see (i. e., look) on] the evil that shall come unto my people [my people shall find]? or [and] how can I endure to see [and (i. e., when) I see (i. e., look) on] the destruction of my kindred? Then [And] the king Ahasuerus said unto Esther the queen, and to Mordecai the Jew, Behold, I have given Esther the house of Haman, and him they have hanged upon the gallows [tree], because [upon that] he laid
- 8 [sent forth] his hand upon the Jews. Write ye also [And write YE] for [upon] the Jews, as it liketh you [is the good in your eyes], in the king's name, and seal it with the king's ring [signet]: for the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring [signet], may no man [there is no one to] reverse.

II. Mordecai authorizes the Jews to make preparations for a common defence. Vers. 9-14.

- 9 Then [And] were the king's scribes called at that time in the third month, that is, the month Sivan, on the three and twentieth [twenty] day thereof [in it]: and it was written, according to all that Mordecai commanded, unto the Jews, and to the lieutenants [satraps], and the deputies [pashas], and [the] rulers [princes] of the provinces which are from India [Hodu], [and] unto Ethiopia [Cush], a hundred [and] twenty and seven provinces, unto every province [province and (i. e., by) province], according to the writing thereof, and unto every people [people and (i. e., by) people] after [according to] their language [tongue], and to the Jews according to their writing, and according to their language [tongue]. And he wrote in the king Ahasuerus' name, and sealed it with the king's ring [signet]; and sent letters [books] by posts [the hand of the runners] on horseback [the horses], and riders on [of] mules [the steed], camels [the mules], and young dromedaries [sons of the mares]: Wherein [Which] the king granted [gave to] the Jews which [who] were in every city [and (i. e., by) city] to gather [congregate] themselves together, and to stand for [upon] their life [soul], to destroy, to slay [smite], and to cause to perish, all [every] the power of the people and province that would assault them, both little ones and women, and to take [he gave] the spoil of them for a prey. Upon one day, in all the provinces of king Ahasuerus, namely, upon the thirtieth [thirteen] day of [to] the twelfth [twelve] month, which [that] is the month Adar. The copy of the writing, for a commandment [law] to be given in every province [and (i. e., by) province] was published [revealed] unto all people [the peoples], and that the Jews should [for the Jews to] be ready against [to] that day to avenge themselves on [from] their enemies. So the posts [runners] that rode upon [riders of] mules and camels [the steed] went out, being hastened and pressed on by the king's commandment [word]. And the decree [law] was given at [in] Shushan the palace [citadel].

III. Mordecai's honor and the joy of the Jews. Vers. 15-17.

- 15 And Mordecai went out from the presence of [before] the king in royal apparel of blue [violet] and white [linen], and with a great crown of gold, and with a garment [robe] of fine linen [byssus] and purple: and the city of Shushan rejoiced [shouted] and was glad. The Jews had [To the Jews was] light, and gladness, and joy, and honour. And in every province and in every city [and (i. e., by) city], whithersoever [which] the king's commandment [word] and his decree [law] came [was approaching], the Jews had [was to the Jews] joy [gladness] and gladness [joy], a feast and a good day. And many of [from] the people [peoples] of the land became Jews [Judaized themselves]; for the fear of the Jews fell upon them.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

It seems almost self-evident after what occurred in chap. vii. that now, next to Esther, Mordecai should also come to great distinction. Whether, however, they would be able fully to reverse the fate that threatened the Jews, remained uncertain in view of the difficulty of the situation. Even after Mordecai had taken his own protective measures, up to the very hour when success was assured, uncertainty continued. In chap. viii. it is to be shown first what authority he received and what measures of policy he adopted.

Vers. 1-8. First, Mordecai's authority. On the very day in which Haman fell the king presented the queen with his house. Justly enough the Targums understand by the term "house," also the people in it, and the entire possessions belonging thereto. It was usual for Persian kings to possess themselves of the property of those who had been punished with death (Josephus, Antiq. XI. 1, 8; 4, 6). Mordecai came before the king, i. e. he was made one of the officers who saw the face of the king (comp. chap. i. 10, 4; vii. 9). He owed his position, not merely to his merit, as having himself been of service to the king, and now meriting the title benefactor of the king (Herod. VIII. 86), but because of his relation to Esther (chap. ii. 7). Indeed the king took off his ring (ver. 2. וְהָרַחֵק, as in chap. iii. 10), his seal-ring, which he had taken from Haman, and gave it unto Mordecai.—וְהָרַחֵק, as in Jon. iii. 6;

he made him prime minister (Gen. xli. 42; 1 Macc. vi. 15; comp. chap. iii. 10).* In addition Esther placed him over the house of Haman, i. e. left to him the honorable and lucrative management of the large estate thus reverting to her, in fact made him her governor of the house. Both henceforth enjoyed a brilliant position; but they were not misled thereby into evil. The remarks with reference to the present prosperity of Esther and Mordecai are evidently made with regard to what followed. They did not take their ease at the expense of the needed care over their people; these were not forgotten. On the contrary they believed it incumbent upon them to do all in their power to make their people happy and prosperous. The mourning of Esther was still great; it did not cease until full deliverance came to them.

Ver. 8. And Esther spake yet again before the king, and fell down at his feet, and besought him with tears.—She thus caused him to understand distinctly that she was by no means satisfied with what had been done. In so far as Esther had implored him in a general manner to cause to be put away, to neutralize, to annul (הִתְקַדֵּשׁ) the mischief of Haman (which he expected to inflict upon the Jews), and his device that he had devised against the Jews (comp. Jer. xviii. 11; Ezek. xxxviii. 10), the king showed his willingness to comply, and as in chap. iv. 11: v. 2, he again stretched forth the golden sceptre toward her, so that she could take courage to arise and stand before him. Still it was necessary to find out the ways and means how the thing should be begun.

Ver. 5. Esther suggested: If it please the king (comp. chap. i. 19; v. 4, 8; vii. 8); and further on feeling the doubtful character of her proposition, she added: and the thing seem right, advisable to him. כִּי־נִשְׁרָא = to succeed, to accomplish, and in this sense has reference to seed which has sprouted well (Eccl. xi. 6, in the Hiphil, Eccl. x. 10); it is a later word of which elsewhere we only find the noun בִּשְׂרִין (Eccl. ii. 21; iv. 4; v. 10). Let it be written, or commanded by an edict, as in chap. iii. 9, to reverse the letters (הִשְׁתַּחֲסִי, to cause to change from the state of being to non-existence) devised by Haman.—As is often the case, here the substance of a letter is indicated by an apposition, מִחֲשַׁבְתֵּי הָמָן (comp. chap. iii. 8 sq. and 12 sqq.). But in order the more certainly to carry through this doubtful proposal, she adds in ver. 6: For how can I endure to see evil that shall come unto my people? or how can I endure to see the destruction of my kindred?—With reference to the connection of וְיִשְׁתַּחֲסִי, we may indicate that one of the verbs, instead of being in the Infinitive

(with ל) is subordinate to the other as a finite verb (with ו), comp. Ewald, § 285 c. Still וְיִשְׁתַּחֲסִי itself means: "I cannot endure it," or "I will not be able to stand it" (comp. Isai. i. 13), and the term וְיִשְׁתַּחֲסִי is equal to "when I shall have seen." וְיִשְׁתַּחֲסִי with ו indicates to look upon some one with interest, be it that of pleasure, as is usual, or of pain or sorrow, as is the case here; comp. in this relation Gen. xii. 1.

Vers. 7, 8. In order to indicate in advance that his good will abounds towards Esther and Mordecai, and that he would grant them all that the law would sanction in favor of the Jews, the king here reminds them of what he had so far done for Esther and Mordecai. Since, however, he could not directly annul his first decrees, but could simply make them powerless in effect, he commands them not to send new orders to the governors—in this manner a suspension or recall of the first edict could not be accomplished—but to send an edict to the Jews themselves, commanding them to prepare for their defence. The sentence: For the writing which is written in the king's name, and sealed with the king's ring, may no man reverse, may have the sense, and so it is generally held, that the simple recall of the first edicts was not possible. וְיִשְׁתַּחֲסִי may indicate a reflection upon וְיִשְׁתַּחֲסִי in Esther's petition in ver. 5.*

But since these words so nearly correspond to what precedes: "Let it be written in the name of the king, and seal it with the king's ring," it is clearer and more natural to understand him to say: The new edict to the Jews will be just as authoritative and irreversible as was the former one to the governors. This must equally be obeyed with that. Of course the confirmation belongs still to the words of the king. The phraseology speaks only in an objective sense of the "king," because it refers to a general rule. The infin. absol. Niph. וְיִשְׁתַּחֲסִי is used instead of the perfect [by an ellipsis of the substantive verb].

Vers. 9-14. These contain the measures of Mordecai.† In the same manner as did Haman (chap. iii. 12-15) on the 18th of the first month, so Mordecai wrote to and "commanded the Jews and the rulers of the provinces," on the 23d of the third month, i. e. Sivan. This was fully two

* ["The answer of Ahasuerus is a refusal, but one softened as much as possible. He first dwells on the proofs which he had just given of his friendly feeling towards the Jews (ver. 7). He then suggests that something may be done to help them without revoking the decree (ver. 8). Finally, he excuses himself by appealing to the well-known immutability of Persian law." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["The suggestion of Ahasuerus quickened the inventive powers of Esther and Mordecai. The scribes were at once summoned, and a decree issued, not revoking the former one, but allowing the Jews to stand on their defence, and to kill all who attacked them. It has been pronounced incredible that any king would thus have sanctioned civil war in all the great cities of his empire; but some even of the more sceptical critics allow that Xerxes might not improbably have done so (De Wette, Einführung, p. 198 a)."] RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

* ["A pleasure-seeking Persian king, like Xerxes, was glad to be relieved of the toil of governing, and willingly committed to one favorite after another the task of issuing and signing with the royal signet the decrees by which the government was administered. That the official entrusted with these high powers might be a eunuch, appears from Diodorus (XVI. 50)."] RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† [From the statement of ver. 4 that the king again held out to her the golden sceptre, "we must understand that Esther had once more intruded on Ahasuerus unsummoned." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

months later, although Haman's fall must have occurred soon after the edict of extermination was published. No doubt Mordecai thought it expedient first to establish himself in his new position before taking such steps and proposing such measures. He wrote to the Jews, but so that the governors became acquainted with the nature of this order, and were obliged to forward it in their extensive provinces to every single Jewish community (comp. chap. i. 1).

The subject of יִתְבָּר in ver. 10 is the one transmitting or originating the writing, i. e. Mordecai. In order to speedily make known the edict so as to free the Jews from their anxiety, and avert the evil in time, he dispatched the messengers with the greatest speed. רָצִי, i. e. couriers, בְּסוּסִים, i. e. on horses, by posts on horseback, and riders on mules, and young dromedaries. — שָׂרָב, in distinction from סוּב, is the saddle-horse (dromedary), the race-horse (1 Kings v. 8), and is here used in a collective sense. אֲחֻשֶׁת־רָצִי (vers. 10–14) are not “asses,” according to the modern Persian estār, which in the Sanscrit = avatara, and hence may have been acpatara in old Persian; but they were princely, royal horses, hence belonging to the court, from kshatra, “royal,” king, according to Haug, in Ewald's Bibl. Jahrb. V., p. 154. רָצִי = the Syriac ramco, “herd,” particularly a herd of horses, with which we may also compare the word ramakat, “stud,” in the Arabic.

Ver. 11. Mordecai wrote that the king granted the Jews which were in every city to gather themselves together, and to stand for their life, i. e. to defend themselves (comp. Dan. xii. 1), to destroy, to slay, and to cause to perish all the power, which like an army would raise itself against them (חַיָּל), of the people and province that would assault them, both little ones and women, and to take the spoil of them for a prey.—This too was to take place on the day already designated in chap. iii. 18, viz. the thirteenth day of the twelfth month. The reduplication of the expression “to destroy,” etc., refers to chap. iii. 18. The same should be granted the Jews which, according to Haman's edict, was allowed the heathen. The Jews were permitted to apply the jus talionis. The case then stood that the governors and other authorities were by no means obligated to assist in the preparation for the destruction of the Jews, nor yet to obstruct or hinder the resistance which the Jews would offer to their assailants, as might seem to be implied in the first edict. For then the second edict, which was equally authoritative, would have been little respected; but they could leave the case to the people, whether they would attack the Jews and risk a conflict, and they need not afterward punish such Jews as had slain their enemies. But still more. It was permitted the Jews to assemble and prepare and arm for their common defence in advance, so that they might act as one man against all the assaults and reverses, which in case of their standing disunited would surely have befallen them. לְהִקְטֹל (to collect), placed in advance here, was especially important (comp. its prominence in chap. ix. 2, 15, 16, 18). Without this the Jews would not have possessed more than the simple right of self-defence, which, under any circumstances, they would have availed themselves of. Besides, even in the Persian empire the larger portion of the inhabitants seem to have possessed humanity enough to feel the disreputableness of an attack upon the Jews for the purpose of rapine, and they were little inclined to participate therein. On ver. 18 comp. chap. iii. 14 b, and on ver. 14, chap. iii. 15.

Vers. 15–17. The effect of this new measure was to produce great and general joy, and to bring great honor to Mordecai. He went forth from the presence of the king in royal apparel of blue and white (comp. chap. i. 6), and with a great crown of gold,* and with a garment of fine linen and purple† (תְּכָנִיף ap. leg., in Aramaic תְּכָנִיף). He was thus adorned doubtless to show what honor had been shown him by the king, but more particularly to make it manifest how he had succeeded in the matter of the Jews, and at the same time to publish his joyous feelings thereat. Importance attaches here not to the royal garment, which had already been given him in chap. vi. 8 sq., but to the State robes of the first minister at court, which, it appears, Mordecai had not put on at the time of his elevation (vers. 1–2), but which he put on after his care for his people was removed. Then the city of Shushan, i. e., its inhabitants one and all, and not the Jews alone, of whom there is separate mention made in ver. 16, rejoiced (צָהַל is not exactly to cry aloud, comp. Isa. xxiv. 14) and was glad.—Hence they had deprecated the massacre awaiting the Jews, and perhaps apprehended with fear the great disorders and dangers that would ensue. But the Jews, ver. 16—i. e., those living in Shushan—for the others are mentioned in ver. 17, had light and joy in contrast to the darkening of their future fate (אִוִּירָה, found in the fem. in Ps. xxxix. 12; in Isa. xxvi. 19, pl. אִוִּירָה), and gladness, and joy, and honor.

Ver. 17. So also the joy spread to those without, who were so exceedingly distressed through Haman's edict (chap. ix. 8). They indulged in feasts, and in a good, joyous day, i. e., a holiday (comp. chap. ix. 19, 22). But this was not all. Many of the people of the land became Jews (מִתְיַהֲדִים, derived from יָהִי, and found only here), because the fear of the Jews, and doubtless also of the mighty and powerful God of the Jews, ruling over their destiny, and not so much the fear of Mordecai and Esther, had fallen upon them (comp. Ex. xv. 16; Deut. xi. 25).‡

* [“Not a crown like the king's (כִּתְרָה), but a mere golden band or coronet (עֲטָרָה).” RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

† [“The tunic or minor robe of the king was of purple, striped with white (Xenoph. Cyrop. VIII. 3, § 13; Plutarch, Alex. § 51; Q. Curt. III. 5).” RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

‡ [“Mordecai's power might by itself have caused some fear, but the chief alarm felt probably was lest the Jews, when the day came for revenging themselves, should account the large class of indifferent persons among their enemies. Persons of this class avoided the danger by becoming Jews.” RAWLINSON.—Ta.]

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

On ver. 1 sqq. 1. If in the present case the danger that threatened the Jews had not been so imminent and the disposition of both Esther and Mordecai so patriotic, then they might possibly have become proud in view of the wealth and high life and station that they now enjoyed, or they might have grown indifferent or reserved with respect to the distress of their countrymen. It is too frequent an occurrence that upstarts fear to lose caste by paying regard to former relations. Hence they are quick to forget and neglect their previous friends. There is no question that the attainment of honor and wealth will bring a blessing only when these become an incentive to good works, especially in promoting God's kingdom. There is connected with their enjoyment sufficient discontent, envy and misery, and also enough trouble and curses. In general, Christians who have come to power are more timid in taking care of their friends than worldly people are. Hence the latter can more safely count on the applause of the great mass of men. But the world will not thank the former for their timidity, and God will hold them to account.

FEUARDENT: "We are taught by Mordecai's example that even pious men sometimes come to the head of affairs, and are safely entrusted with the reins of government; and that God adorns with this glory on earth those whom He will afterwards crown in heaven likewise. They are promoted, however, not so much for their own sake as that they may aid and promote the church and people of God, and may free and console those in affliction."

STARKE: "We should have sympathy for oppressed brethren in the faith (1 Pet. iii. 8; Col. iii. 12; Gal. vi. 10). The innocence of the guiltless should be protected (Sir. iv. 9; 1 Sam. xx. 32). He who has no pity for the pious and innocent when they are in danger is not worthy of the name of a man, much less that of a Christian; for we are members of one body (1 Cor. xii. 12)."

2. Although Haman had been removed and Mordecai raised to his present station, yet the people still stood in jeopardy of their lives. Since the edict issued against them was irrevocable, their case was still critical. There were not many perhaps who deemed it possible that any means could be found to avert the threatened calamity. Mordecai himself may have long been in doubt regarding the way to be pursued out of the difficulty. And even after it suggested itself to him, it may have seemed improbable that it should lead to success. All depended on the question whether the assailants would not be too numerous for the Jews to overpower. This could not be previously ascertained. It may afford us light to know that he waited two months after his elevation before he issued the new edict. The period until then was one of dark foreboding to the Jews. But the pious Jews doubtless knew how to comfort themselves. "God often delays help, not because He will render none, but in order to exercise our faith, and to stimulate us the more to call upon Him. Then also the help granted will make the deliverance more sweet, and transform a great distress into a great joy" (Beri. Bible).

Mordecai, for his part, doubtless held fast to the thought that one must not despair of the salvation of God's people, and that though the danger be ever so great, God is infinitely greater, and that it is man's duty to do all in his power for himself. With respect to Esther, it was something extraordinary that she, although by descent nothing but a poor Jewess, should propose to the great king of the Persians, the mighty and proud Ahasuerus, that he would revoke in one way or another an edict whose irrevocable character as a Persian dogma was fixed. Really this was a demand to divest himself of that higher divine glory (dófa) which the faith of the people had surrounded him with. It was to run the risk of unsettling the faith of the people in himself, and to expose himself to State disturbances. The difficulties surrounding him may even remind us of the problem that presented itself to Christ, when He, in the face of the sentence of condemnation upon the sinner on the part of justice, still made provision for grace. Esther might have feared that though her power over Ahasuerus had become great, still he might resent such boldness, and indignantly turn her away, refuse her request, and, if possible, become still more embittered against the Jews. Whatever considerations, however, may have arisen in her heart at the time, still she was doubtlessly incited by the predominant thought that the higher position one holds, the greater are the responsibilities connected therewith; that the more influence one wields, the greater must also be the courage to sustain it, so that one must not hesitate to strive after the highest aims and to tread the most difficult paths in the line of duty. But this correct view, this beautiful conviction, could not have been possible unless she had been first in possession of a pure love for her work. As is the case with men, so it was also with her, as a woman, that a true and correct conviction depended upon the state of her heart. If, in the following chapter, she manifests a sharp contrast with the heathen according to the Jewish Old Testament view, which threatened to cause her to err in the Christian view, and to bring vengeance and hate into play, yet, on the other hand, she reveals toward her people a love so strong, so self-sacrificing, and so bold, that it seems as if she had heard and apprehended the great question: "This I did for thee; what dost thou for me?" She here shows that mercy which is appropriate to him who recognizes how great the mercy was that met him.

3. It is a great and precious word which Esther utters in justification of her large and bold request: "How can I endure to see all the evil which will come upon my people, and how shall I bear to see the destruction of my friends?" She here openly expresses the fact that, though she is now greatly elevated, yet she is not able to sever the bond that unites her to her kindred. But, still more, she asserts that her life, though embellished with all the glory that Ahasuerus could bestow, has no value to her if she cannot also know that the lives of her kindred are safe from harm. All this was so well expressed by her that her word is very appropriate in pointing for our comfort to that Prince who in reality makes this sentiment His own—who, though in the form of God, thought it not robbery to be equal with God, but laid aside His glory, and became obedient to death, even the death of the cross. But it is also appropriate as an exhortation for us, which should impel us in our circumstances to more and more approach her in this duty. It would be little credit to us should we prefer only those who are alike spiritually-minded with ourselves, and should we neglect or ignore those who are related to us according to the body, and should we look upon the perdition of so many souls with indifference.

On vers. 7-14. The great excitement which now took place in Shushan, beginning among the scribes of the king and spreading through all the one hundred and twenty-seven provinces of the great Persian empire, from India to Ethiopia, by means of the couriers who rode the best and fleetest horses of the king's stud, and which seized all satraps and governors, but particularly all Jewish communities, may, as a first effect, have provoked much inquiry respecting the meaning of the message, and then great astonishment at it. It is, however, hardly possible that any one already comprehended the significance of the event. What was visible was seemingly only a shell in which lay secreted a seed capable of infinite developments, a new universal law, or rather a new and glorious gospel which should henceforth rule over the world's history and expand to ever increasing authority. The Jews were to have the right to arm themselves against the day of attack on the part of the heathen. This implied that though externally dependent, still among and in themselves they should have freedom and the right to observe their laws and religion. This again prophetically indicates that the kingdoms of the world, although outwardly powerful, should inwardly lay themselves more and more open to the power of the kingdom of God. The Jews should now be empowered to take their defence against their enemies into their own hands. Thus it was implied that, in spite of the restricted sphere to which they were assigned, they still had a right to self-exertion. This mode of action upon attack only left them in an externally insufficient position for successful defence. Yet even in this was contained the prophecy that the people of God are permitted, in an inward and higher sense, themselves to do the best for victory over their enemies, and this the more since the means of the world's empires are here insufficient. Both the right to exist and to be active in the new sphere which they should enter, though as yet existing in embryo, was never sanctioned here. And if Judaism even today expects to find in the book of Esther that which will afford it joy, then we must go still further and apprehend its deeper and more glorious import for Christianity and the Christian church.

On vers. 15-17. Mordecai, after having attained all his requests, went out from the king clothed in royal garments, adorned with a large golden crown upon his head. And in all the land and cities, wherever the new law was promulgated, joy and rejoicing arose among the Jews. A great festival day had come for them. We do not know in how far their joy was pure. If it only arose because they could now make the necessary preparations to defend themselves from the attacks of their assailants, then no one will begrudge them their joy. It was certainly a time of deliverance for them. It is just such times as these that have made great impressions not only upon the Jews, but likewise upon the heathen surrounding them. As in the case of the exodus of the Jews from Egypt (Ex. xii. 88; Num. x. 29), so also here many of the people of the land joined themselves to the Jews, indeed were converted to Judaism. Prophecies such as Isa. xiv. 1; xiv. 5 began to be in part realized. Periods of deliverance are chiefly periods of the extension of God's kingdom. Would that we might realize this in our times of trouble! Since the time of sorrow must of necessity have an end and make way for a time of deliverance, we may very properly rejoice in prospect of the future growth in the church, however threatening the outlook may be. It is on this account that our Lord exhorts us to raise the head when all these things are in process of fulfilment.

The points most important in our chapter are given in brief terms closely following each other. There is God's watchful and energetic care for His instruments for good. Esther and Mordecai are in advance established in their influential position, so that they may the more effectually execute His will. Then comes His care for His people, from whom He averts the threatening danger, and lastly the world is cared for.

BRENN: "What an example is here presented to us of the issue of the greatest dangers which may threaten God's people or church. But what is said of the safety of the universal church, the same holds true of every private individual who is a member of the church. 'I pray not for them alone,' says Christ, 'but for those who through their word shall believe in me.'"

STARKE: "It is a small thing for God to turn the seasons of sorrow of the pious into hours of joy (Ps. xxx. 12; John xvi. 20). God helps His people (Luke i. 52) and causes them to rejoice over their enemies (Ps. xcii. 12)."

B.—THE JEWS DESTROY THEIR ENEMIES, AND AT MORDECAI'S REQUEST ESTABLISH THE FESTIVAL OF PURIM.

CHAP. IX. 1–32.

I. The common defence of the Jews is very successful. Vers. 1–15.

1 Now [And] in the twelfth [twelve] month, that is the month Adar, on the thirteenth [thirteen] day of the same [in it], when [that] the king's commandment [word] and his decree [law] drew near to be put in the execution [done], in the day that the enemies of the Jews hoped to have power over [on] them, (though it [and] (i. e., then) that] it was turned to the contrary that the Jews [themselves] had rule
2 [should have power] over [on] them that hated them [their haters], the Jews gathered [congregated] themselves together in their cities, throughout [in] all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, to lay [send forth] hand on such as sought their hurt [on the seekers of their evil]; and no man could withstand [stood in the face
3 of] them; for the fear of them fell upon all people [the peoples]. And all the rulers [princes] of the provinces, and the lieutenants [satraps], and the deputies [pashas], and [the] officers of the king [doers of the work which was to the king],
4 helped [were lifting] the Jews; because the fear of Mordecai fell upon them. For Mordecai was great in the king's house, and his fame [hearing] went [was going] out throughout [in] all the provinces; for this [the] man Mordecai waxed greater
5 and greater [was going and great]. Thus [And] the Jews smote [on] all their enemies with the stroke [smiting] of the sword, and slaughter and destruction, and did what they would [according to their pleasure] unto those that hated them [on their 6 haters]. And in Shushan the palace [citadel] the Jews slew and destroyed five 7, 8 hundred men. And Parshandatha, and Dalphon, and Aspatha, and Poratha, 9 and Adalia, and Aridatha, and Parmashta, and Arisai, and Aridai, and Vajezatha, 10 the ten sons of Haman, the son of Hammedatha [the Medatha], the enemy of the 11 Jews, slew they; but [and] on the spoil laid [sent forth] they not their hand. On that day the number of those that were slain [the slain ones] in Shushan the palace 12 [citadel] was brought [came] before the king. And the king said unto Esther the queen, The Jews have slain and destroyed five hundred men in Shushan the palace [citadel], and the ten sons of Haman; what have they done in the rest of the king's provinces? Now [And] what is thy petition? and it shall be granted [given to]
13 thee; or [and] what is thy request further [again]? and it shall be done. Then [And] said Esther, If it please [be good upon] the king, let it be granted [given] to the Jews which [who] are in Shushan to do to-morrow also according unto this day's [to-day's] decree [law], and let Haman's ten sons be hanged [let them hang] 14 upon the gallows [tree]. And the king commanded [said] it so to be done; and 15 the decree [law] was given at Shushan; and they hanged Haman's ten sons. For [And] the Jews that were in Shushan gathered [congregated] themselves together on the fourteenth day also of the month Adar, and slew [smote] three hundred men [males] at Shushan; but [and] on the prey [booty] they laid not their hand.

II. At the desire of Mordecai the Jews resolve to celebrate the 14th and 15th of the month Adar as Purim. Vers. 16–28.

16 But [And] the other [remainder of the] Jews that were in the king's provinces gathered [congregated] themselves together, and stood [there was a standing] for [upon] their lives [soul], and had rest from their enemies, and slew [there was a smiting] of [in] their foes seventy and five thousand (but they laid not their hands 17 [hand] on the prey [booty]). On the thirteenth day of the month Adar: and on

- the fourteenth day of the same [in it] rested they [there was a resting], and made 18 [there was a making] it a day of feasting [banquet] and gladness. But [And] the Jews that were at Shushan assembled [congregated] together on the thirteenth day thereof [in it], and on the fourteenth thereof [in it]; and on the fifteenth day of the same [in it] they rested [there was a resting]. and made [a making] it a day of 19 feasting [banquet] and gladness. Therefore the Jews of the villages [country places], that dwelt in the unwall'd towns [cities of the country places], made [were making] the fourteenth day of the month Adar a day of gladness and feasting [banquet], and 20 a good day, and of sending portions one [a man] to another [his neighbor]. And Mordecai wrote these things [words], and sent letters [books] unto all the Jews that were in all the provinces of the king Ahasuerus, both [the] nigh and [the] far, 21 to stablish this among [upon] them, that they should keep [to be making] the fourteenth day of the month Adar, and the fifteenth day of the same [in it] yearly, [in 22 every year and (i. e., by) year], as the days wherein the Jews rested from their enemies, and the month which was turned unto them from sorrow to joy [gladness], and from mourning into a good day; that they should make [to make] them days of feasting [banquet] and joy [gladness], and of sending portions one [a man] to 23 another [his neighbor], and gifts to the poor. And the Jews undertook [each received] to do as they had begun [what they had begun to do], and as [what] Mordecai had written unto them; because Haman the son of Hammedatha [the Me- 24 datha] the Agagite, the enemy of all the Jews, had devised against the Jews to destroy them, and had cast Pur (that is, the lot) to consume [discomfit] them, and 25 to destroy them: but [and] when Esther [it] came before the king, he commanded [said] by [with the] letters [books], that his wicked [evil] device, which he devised against the Jews, should return upon his own head, and that he [him] 26 and his sons should be hanged [they should hang] on the gallows [tree]. Wherefore [Therefore] they called these days Purim, after [upon] the name of [upon] Pur: therefore for [upon] all the words of this letter, and of that which [and what] they had seen concerning this matter [upon thus], and which [what] had come 27 unto them. The Jews ordained [established], and took [each received] upon them, and upon their seed, and upon all such as joined [the ones joining] themselves unto [upon] them, so as [and] it should not fail [pass], that they would keep [to be making] these two days according to their writing, and according to their appointed 28 time, [in] every year [and (i. e., by) year]; and that these days should be [these days were] remembered and kept [made] throughout [in] every generation [and (i. e., by) generation], every family [family and (i. e., by) family], every province [province and (i. e., by) province], and every city [city and (i. e., by) city]; and that these days of Purim should not fail [pass] from among [the midst of] the Jews, nor the memorial [remembrance] of them perish [cease] from their seed.

III. At the request of Esther the Jews also resolve to commemorate the feast of Purim with fasting and mourning. Vers. 29-32.

- 29 Then [And] Esther the queen, the daughter of Abihail, and Mordecai the Jew, wrote with all authority, to confirm [establish] this second letter of [the] Purim. 30 And he sent the letters [books] unto all the Jews, to the hundred twenty and seven 31 provinces of the kingdom of Ahasuerus, with words of peace and truth, to confirm [establish] these days of [the] Purim in their times appointed, according as Mordecai the Jew and Esther the queen had enjoined [established upon] them, and as they had decreed [established] for [upon] themselves [their soul], and for [upon] 32 their seed, the matters [words] of the fastings and their cry. And the decree [saying] of Esther confirmed [established] these matters [words] of [the] Purim; and it was written in the book.

SUPPLEMENT.

DISTINCTION AND POWER OF MORDECAI IN THE MIGHTY PERSIAN EMPIRE.

CHAPTER X. 1-3.

- 1 AND the king Ahasuerus laid [put] a tribute upon the land, and upon the isles of
- 2 the sea. And all the acts [work] of his power [authority] and of his might, and the declaration [spreading] of the greatness of Mordecai, whereunto the king advanced him [whom the king made great], are they not written in [upon] the book of the Chronicles [words of the days] of the kings of Media [Madai] and Persia [Paras]? 3 For Mordecai the Jew was next [second] unto [the] king Ahasuerus, and great among [to] the Jews, and accepted of [to] the multitude of his brethren, seeking the wealth of [good to] his people, and speaking peace to all his seed.

EXEGETICAL AND CRITICAL.

The author here gives us the last and most important part of the solution, the success which followed the measures of Mordecai for the deliverance of the Jews. Thus his history takes such a turn that the great Persian heathen empire, which at first rejoiced with feasting and hilarity, now suffers a great defeat. Moreover this occurs by the very Jewish nation which Haman and similar enemies hoped to destroy. The time of joyous feasting now came to the Jews and to those who had joined them. Mordecai's measure for the removal of the danger was quite sufficient. This was true first (vers. 1-5) in the Persian empire in general.

Ver. 1. Now in the twelfth month, that is, the month Adar, on the thirteenth day of the same, when—אֲשֶׁר may here be taken as the accus. of time, in which, or where, the king's commandment and his decree drew near to be put into execution, i. e., in which the king's word and law should be carried out, in the day that the enemies of the Jews hoped to have power over them (though it was turned to the contrary so that the Jews had rule over them that hated them). The infin. absol. וַיִּהְיֶה הַיּוֹם may be made to depend, as a continuation of the preceding perfect upon אֲשֶׁר. Then הָיָה will stand as a neuter for the thing which their enemies hoped to accomplish on the thirteenth. וַיִּהְיֶה may also serve as a remark inserted as a casual intermediate expression, then הָיָה will probably refer back to הַיּוֹם, comp. ver. 22: "As the day was turned unto them (so) that," etc. As this remark does not anticipate, and in advance indicate the result afterward realized, but only speaks of change brought about by the issue of the second royal edict, שָׁלַט stands the second time for the "might" or "power" which now awaited the Jews ac-ording to right and law, but had not yet been realized. וַיִּהְיֶה added to the subject, serves to make a sharp contrast between the Jews and their enemies, so that it may be translated ipsi, (themselves) comp. Ewald, § 314 a. In ver. 2 follows the mention of a fixed time: The Jews gathered themselves together in their cities, i. e., those in which they were more numerous, but yet dwelt mixed up with the heathen inhabitants. They gathered themselves, to lay hand on such as sought their hurt, i. e., according to chap. viii. 11, such as attacked them to destroy them. And no man could withstand them,—so וְאִישׁ מֵאִישׁ (comp. Josh. x. 8; xxi. 42; xxiii. 9), because fear of them, or their fear had fallen upon all the people (comp. chap. viii. 17).*

Ver. 3. All the princes, the satraps, and governors, and also other persons of rank whom it is unnecessary here to name (comp. chap. iii. 9), assisted the Jews. כִּנְשָׁאִים, as in Ezek. i. 4.†

Ver. 4. These were especially influenced by the fear of Mordecai, who now became more and more powerful and authoritative, (comp. 1 Chron. xvii. 12, where we find instead of נָרַל the intrans. partic. נָרַל).

Ver. 5. Thus the Jews inflicted a great defeat

* ["The Jews apparently did not remain wholly on the defensive. Their enemies were no doubt well known to them, and were prepared for the struggle which it was seen must come. Sometimes the one side, sometimes the other, would commence the attack." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["This is very important. It has been stated that according to the narrative of Esther the Jews were allowed to kill '75,000 Persians;' and this (supposed) feature of the narrative has been pronounced 'incredible.' The present verse shows that the real Persians, who formed the standing army which kept the empire in subjection, and were at the disposal of the various governors of the province, took the Jews' side. Their enemies were almost entirely to be found among the idolatrous people of the subject nations, for whose lives neither the Persians generally, nor their monarchs, cared greatly." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

upon all their enemies with the sword, slaughter and destruction: they carried out the right of retaliation which had been accorded them in ch. viii. 11. הָרָבָה with 3 is to smite, to defeat some one (2 Sam. xxiii. 10; xiv. 17; Num. xxii. 6). מָכַת can only depend upon הָרָבָה; הָרָבָה and מָכַת both belong to מָכַת (comp. chap. ix. 5, where מָכַת הָרָבָה corresponds to הַשְׂמִיד).

Vers. 6-15. The defence of the Jews succeeded especially well in Shushan. Ver. 6. And in Shushan the palace the Jews slew and destroyed five hundred men.* The infin. אָבְדָה as a supplement to the foregoing perfect expresses: "they slew and destroyed."

Ver. 7. The insertion of the names of the ten sons of Haman who were also destroyed, corresponds to the author's method of exactness, and his disposition to mention names, as is seen in chap. i. 14. Jewish rabbis have found these names indicative of representative importance, and have taken the individual traits to mean something prophetic. This peculiar mode of writing, corresponding so well to the style of later mystical modes of interpretation of later Jewish theology, may have been inherent in its spirit, or it may have been because they find the "minuscule" letter נ in the first, ש in the seventh, and י in the tenth name, and also the "majuscule" letter י in the tenth name.† According to statements made by Buxtorf (Synag. Jud., p. 588) the mode of writing should be a sign that the ten sons were suspended in a perpendicular line, one over the other, or an omen that after their fall they should never more rise to glory. The Jews did not take the booty of their enemies as was permitted them to do in the edict of chap. viii. 11. This, however, was the order given to their enemies in the edict of Haman, chap. iii. 13, and the author here gives it prominent mention, in order to show that there was no intention on the part of the Jews, to gratify a low avaricious disposition, but only to defend themselves.

Vers. 11-15. After Ahasuerus had discovered the number of those who had perished in Shushan, he stated the same to Esther, adding:

* ["By 'Shushan the palace' or 'the fort,' we are probably to understand the whole of the upper town, which occupied an area of above a hundred acres, and contained, no doubt, many residences besides the actual palace. It is not likely that the Jews would have ventured to shed blood within the palace precincts." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["Excepting Adalia, all these names are readily traceable to Old Persian roots. Parshandatha is 'given to Persia,' or 'to the Persians'; Darphon, which in Persian must have been Darphon or Darpon, is probably the Persian representative of the Sansc. darpin, 'arrogant'; Aspatha is from aspa, 'horse,' and would probably mean 'horseman'; Poratha is apparently from paru, 'much, great,' and ratha, 'a chariot,' and would mean 'having many chariots'; Aridatha is from the roots ari 'very, and da, 'to give,' and would mean 'liberal' (comp. Phrdates). Parnashtha is a little doubtful, but may be from fra, an intensive particle, and mathista, 'greatest' (comp. Lat. præmagnus). Arisai has the intensive ari prefixed to a root sava, which is perhaps 'to conquer' or 'to go'; and Aridai has the same intensive prefixed to the root da, 'to give.' Finally, Vajezatha comprises two elements, vaya, 'the wind,' and zatha, (comp. Zend. zyat), 'powerful'; and would mean 'strong as the wind' (comp. Chitratachma, 'strong as the leopard'; Tritanachmes, 'strong as Tritan, i. e., Feridem')." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

What have they done in the rest of the king's provinces? i. e., how many must they not have destroyed there; this he said in order to prove to her that he had granted a great favor to the Jews, and hence that he was well-disposed toward them (comp. chap. viii. 7, 8). But to the same intent he also adds the promise following: Now what is thy petition? and it shall be granted thee.—Perhaps he recognized the fact that, if the Jews had to do with so many opponents, they could hardly have mastered them, and even now great danger threatened them on the part of those remaining, if they could not hunt down such in their hiding places (and there must have been many in so large a city) and destroy them utterly. מָוֶה, maso, or rather neuter, with reference to מָוֶה, while in chap. vii. 2 we find the fem. מָוֶה in relation to שָׂמֵלֶךְ. The necessity of extending the privilege granted the Jews to the following day, must be evident, since Esther (chap. viii. 11) on her part, without consulting Mordecai, still further requested it. And let Haman's ten sons be hanged upon the gallows, i. e., crucify the dead bodies in order to increase the disgrace of their execution, but more in order to augment the fear of the Jews. This was the Hebrew and Persian custom (see Ezra vi. 11 [comp. Plutarch, Artax. 17]).

Ver. 14. The king acceded to Esther's request, and so another edict was issued. This contained principally or exclusively a renewed permission for the Jews. This must be publicly proclaimed. With respect to the sons of Haman a simple command was sufficient. The words, and they hanged Haman's ten sons, by no means indicates the substance or consequence of the law; opposed to this are the accents and the perfect וְהָרָבָה. But since the publication of a law was the consequence of the king's acquiescence, so it was also with the hanging of Haman's sons.

Vers. 16-28. The establishment of Purim.—In vers. 16-19 we find the historical introduction to the new edict of Mordecai, in vers. 20-28 an index of contents, and in vers. 24-28, still further, a supplement, confirmatory of what preceded, and which seems to have been taken from some other writing.

The statement in ver. 16: But the other Jews—separate from those in Shushan, etc.—again connects with what preceded in vers. 1 and 2, in order first, to add the number of those whom they had slain, and next to give due mention to the day of their conflict as well as to the fact that the 14th was for them already a day of rest.* The author adds after the phrase and stood for their lives (comp. chap. viii. 11): and had rest from their enemies.—וְיָמָם is instead of the more usual מָוֶה, Infin. Absol. as in Num. xi. 25. And though he is interested to publish the result for which the Jews stood, namely, that they slew 75,000 of their enemies, yet he is more busied with the main thought that, these outside Jews, in distinction from those in Shushan, had peace soon after their first defence. The perfect in vers. 16, 17, as also in ver. 18, is continued by subordinated infinitives (comp. Ewald, § 351 c). The statement that the outside Jews had rest already on the 14th of Adar, is here the main point. The other, in ver. 18, that the Jews in Shushan first had peace and joy on the fifteenth, is subordinate. This relation is best expressed by the word "while," by which ver. 19, with its על־כֵּן, may be joined to vers. 16 and 17: Therefore the Jews of the villages, that dwelt in the unwall'd towns, made the fourteenth day of the month Adar a day of gladness and feasting, etc.—It does not matter much about the first season of joy, as stated in ver. 17, but it is important that this season had now become a custom of the people, and must have existed down to the time of our author. As evidence of this we have the partic. עֹשִׂים, and also the particles על־כֵּן, which latter is generally employed in an explanation as to how a custom originated. It seems, therefore, that for a long time there existed a difference of time as respects the day of the feast of Purim. It appears that the Jews in the smaller villages had one day, and those residing in the larger cities, i. e., also in Jerusalem (according to some MSS. of the Septuagint version αὐτοὶ κατοικοῦντες ἐν ταῖς μητροπόλεσιν) had another. The writing of Mordecai, mentioned in the following verses, which ordered a uniform celebration, viz., of two days (on the 14th and 15th of Adar) soon restored uniformity. But its acceptance had as a first consequence that, only those chief communities in the larger cities (vers. 23, 27), obeyed the order, but the smaller bodies still retained the 14th Adar as the chief day of the feast. To assume a contradiction between vers. 23 and 27 (as does Bertheau) would be unwarranted even if the section beginning with ver. 20 be not an addition by our author, but by some later person. At the time of Josephus it seems that the season of celebration was uniform (comp. Antiq. VI, 13). According to the Mishna (Megilla, 1) this difference only exists that the book of Esther should be read on the 14th in the smaller towns, but on the 15th in the ancient walled cities of Palestine הַפְּרוּשִׁים, with the Kethib, is the plural of פָּרוּשׁ, countryman. The Keri is the same as Deut. iii. 5, and 1 Sam. vi. 18. There could have been another form from פָּרוּשׁ such as פָּרוּשׁ, as in קָטוּן beside קָטוּן.

מִשְׁלַח is the accus., dependent on עֹשִׂים: And of sending portions one to another.—According to ver. 22 (comp. Neh. viii. 10) one made presents in these feasts, similar to the sacrificial feasts, to those less wealthy, but also to others to whom one desired to signify a joyous mind.

Vers. 20–23. The writing which Mordecai sent to all the Jews, doubtless contained the substance of our book of Esther, חֻקֵּי הָאֱלֹהִים; i. e., it recounted the danger which had threatened the Jews, and the way in which they were preserved from destruction; for this was needful to state here, in order to give cause and color to the feast ordered by Mordecai. But this did not, therefore, need to include the whole book of Esther.

Ver. 21. Mordecai's purpose was: To stablish this among them, that they should keep the, etc.—דִּקְּ besides this place (verses 20–32) occurs only in Ruth iv. 7; Ezra xiii. 6;

Ps. cxix. 28, 106; and used with עַל it signifies to establish something as binding upon some one, so that it shall become a duty obligatory on him. עָשָׂה with יום here seems to mean (comp. ver. 27), to celebrate a day. The phrase לְהַזִּיז עִשְׂתִּים, following upon the long intervening sentences of ver. 21, is again taken up in ver. 22 by לְעִשְׂתֵּי יוֹם אִתָּם and still more enlarged. The result was (ver. 23) that what the Jews had begun to do (ver. 22) and what Mordecai wrote to them to do was by them established as a valid and permanent custom. קָבַל, to "accept" (ch.

ix. 4), here means, according to later linguistic usage, to recognize something as a valid tradition or law. The sing. form is explained by the fact that the verb precedes its subject, according to Gesen. § 114. [Rather it denotes a distribution or individual sense.—Tr.]

Vers. 24–28. Now in order both to give the name of the feast just mentioned as well as its duration through two days, our author again briefly repeats the substance of the historical basis in vers. 24 and 25. He also makes brief mention of the facts decisive of the name, and then refers us in ver. 26 to Mordecai's letter and the experiences of the Jews as forming its basis. In ver. 24 we find Haman's intention to destroy the Jews (comp. chap. iii. 1, 6 sqq.), and he then points to the feast of Pur or casting of lots (chap. iii. 7). לְהָרֶם, "to destroy them," from an older word, הָרַם, which generally describes confusion and anguish such as comes from God (Ex. xiv. 24; Deut. ii. 15), but which here may have been selected as a play upon the name of Haman. As regards the edict so friendly to the Jews in ver. 25, comp. chap. viii. 8 sqq.—But when (it) came before the king, etc. The suffix of the word בָּנָאָה can have no reference to Esther; she is not mentioned in this connection (so opposed to the Targum, Syriac and most interpreters), but can only be taken as a neuter (as for example in Ezek. xxxiii. 33), (so Bertheau and Keil); and this the more in keeping with the intention of Haman, which is placed in its proper light.—He commanded by letters that, etc.—אָמַר עַם־הַכָּתוּב for: "to command by writing," occurs only in this place. It is also peculiar in this section that the command: that his wicked device, which he devised against the Jews, should return upon his own head, is given in direct speech, while usually in the rest of the book the infin. with לְ is employed. Finally the author also mentions the execution of Haman and his sons, on which see chap. vii. 10 and ix. 6 sqq. In ver. 26 follows the declaration of the name of the day of the celebration, to which the author here designed to give prominence; but this is followed by the statement, after על-כֵּן, that this should last two days. What is simply indicated by the particles על-כֵּן is further enlarged upon by על-כֵּן-בְּכָרִי. Therefore for all the words of this letter (of Mordecai in accordance with ver. 20), and (of all that) which they had seen concerning the matter על-כֵּן-כֵּה, concerning the so and thus), and which had come unto them; hence also because their own experience fully corroborated the substance of Mordecai's letter. In ver. 27 follows after על-כֵּן the concluding sentence: The Jews ordained, and took upon them, and upon their seed, and upon all such as joined themselves unto them (i. e. all proselytes), so as it should not fail (but be unalterably established, יָעֲבֹד, as in chap. i. 19), that they would keep these two days according to their writing, and according to their appointed time every year (year after year).—עָשָׂה following upon ver. 21 is easily comprehensible. Their writing and determination of time can only have come to them from Mordecai's. In ver. 28 there follows the further injunction: And that these days should be remembered and kept throughout every generation, etc. The partic. נִזְכָּרִים, etc., depend upon לְהַזְכִּיר in the preceding verse. סוּף כֵּן = "to have an end," to cease.

Vers. 29–32. In order more firmly to establish the new law, and the confirmation of a new custom, which thus far had only been observed by Mordecai and Esther, that is, to connect a day of fasting and mourning with the days of the feast of Purim, a second letter was published. This time it was Queen Esther who composed the letter, hence the femin. וַיִּכְתֹּב. Mordecai is also mentioned; but possibly he was only added to give the letter authority and legality, as being the highest functionary in the realm, and to add the writings mentioned in ver. 80. It was especially Esther's concern that the fasts and wailings which had their origin with herself at the time of the decisive step should serve as a reminder of the great distress so happily overcome. According to chap. ii. 15 she was the daughter of Abihail, and on account of the solemnity of the occasion she is expressly designated as such. אֶת-כָּל-חֲזָקָהּ, "with all strength" (power). חֲזָקָהּ occurs only here, in chap. x. 2 and Dan. xi. 17, and would signify the great emphasis that Esther laid on the season of fasting and mourning no less than on the celebration of the joyous feast. The object of לְכַמֵּן, "to make valid as a law," this second letter of Purim (the first was that of Mordecai in ver. 20), is also the object of the preceding וַיִּכְתֹּב. By the word "this" the author designates the second letter, since he has in mind not to give its substance, but simply to indicate its existence.

Ver. 80 explains somewhat why Mordecai is also mentioned in ver. 29 along with Esther:

And he sent the letters unto all the Jews. The subject can here only be Mordecai himself. The סְפָרִים, however, which he sent were not copies of Esther's letter (Keil), but writings accompanying it. These may have had the object of further confirming and explaining the facts on account of which fasts and seasons of mourning should be instituted, and of giving a historic sketch of the fast and mourning of the Jews living in Shushan. The words: And he sent the letters unto all the Jews to the hundred twenty and seven provinces, are in apposition to the kingdom of Ahasuerus.—The contents of the writing are briefly designated as words of peace, i. e. as words that meant well, which aimed at the welfare of Israel by thus recommending a good custom for general observance, and which were based on truth.

Ver. 81. The aim of both Esther and Mordecai's letters was: to confirm these days of Purim in their times appointed.—This does not mean that it had reference only to certain periods or divisions of the days of Purim in which fasts and mourning should take place, and for which arrangements should be made (Bertheau and also Keil); for that would have been expressed otherwise and more definitely; but it gives the proper validity to the selected days of the feast of Purim, the 14th and 15th Adar. The main thing, however, is contained in the following: According as Mordecai the Jew and Esther the queen had enjoined them, and as they had decreed for themselves and for their seed, the matters of the fastings and their cry.—Hence they would also establish the feast of Purim for themselves, so that they might join fasting and lamentation to the feast as Mordecai and Esther had previously done. The suffix עֲלֵיהֶם may also refer to the above-mentioned days of Purim (not as to their definite time, Bertheau and Keil; for this is only mentioned incidentally); but since עָל with קִים always means to make a thing obligatory, it is naturally referred to Esther and Mordecai. It is true there follows the phrase עַל-נַפְשָׁם; but we may understand this in the sense of עֲלֵיהֶם when preceding וַעֲלֵי-דָרְעָם. There cannot well be any other subject intended by קִים than (against Keil) the above-mentioned Mordecai and Esther. עַל-דָּרְעָם is a zeugmatic mode of expression. It has practical reference to Mordecai's posterity since Esther, as regards her descendants, could not well hope to see them perpetuate Jewish customs.

Ver. 82 strengthens the foregoing greatly.—And the decree of Esther confirmed these matters of Purim, those, namely, that had reference to the fasts and mourning.—And it was written in the book, of course not in Esther's letter, nor in Mordecai's writing accompanying the decree, which would be designated by the plural סְפָרִים; but it was written in the book indicated in ver. 20, in which Mordecai wrote concerning these events, and which is not identical with our Esther-book, but may have served as one of its sources.* The day of fasting and mourning is not definitely fixed nor stated here; but it was probably the 13th of Adar, which Haman had set apart for the destruction of the Jews, and which the Jews celebrate as צוֹמֵי אֶסְתֵּר, Esther's fast, although in the period of the Talmud there is mention made of a three days' fast, which was observed after that of Purim.

Chap. x. Our book aims not only to present the deliverance, but also the elevation of Judaism in the time and midst of the great and powerful heathenism of the period of Ahasuerus. It would represent the latter in the person of Haman, the enemy to Judaism, and the former in the person of Mordecai. Hence at its close it speaks once more of Mordecai's greatness and honor.—And the king Ahasuerus laid a tribute upon the land, and upon the isles of the sea.—The Kethib אֶחָשֶׁרֶשׁ is an orthographical mistake for אֶחָשֶׁרֶשׁ, "a levy," tribute (a tribute-service), here means a tax levied, and this for the reason that tribute-service belonged to products or moneys which were rendered to the king.† It may be asked why this remark occurs in our book, which, according to all that has gone before, does not belong to the history of Ahasuerus, but has to do with quite another matter. Keil thinks the author wished briefly to indicate at the close whence Ahasuerus derived the means to support such magnificent state as was described at the beginning of our book. But this inference would be superfluous, and would come somewhat late here. The only safe answer is given us by the manner in which the author, in ver. 2, connects the power of Ahasuerus with the greatness of Mordecai. The greater the power of Ahasuerus and his wealth, the more powerful the dignity of Ahasuerus. It is as if the author would tell us: Ahasuerus had power extending over the whole earth, and he caused its wealth to flow into his treasury, and hence made himself felt as the head and lord of the entire power of the earth. It is worth while in this connection to observe the comprehensive statement עַל-הָאָרֶץ וְאֵי דָרִים.

But this concentration of universal sway in himself did not avail for the suppression of an externally despicable Judaism; it rather served for the recognition and elevation of the latter, since, according to the Providence recognized in our book, Mordecai, the Jew, became the second ruler after Ahasuerus. Although it seemed as if the people of God had been stricken out of the list of people of the earth, still, in Mordecai, because of his relation to Ahasuerus, it became possessed of the wealth of the peoples of the earth.‡

always means a particular book—"the book of the chronicles of the kings of Media and Persia (ch. ii. 23; vi. 1; q. 2), it seems best to give it the same sense here." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["Some fresh arrangement of the tribute is likely to have followed on the return of Xerxes from Greece. His exchequer would be exhausted, and steps would have to be taken to replenish it. The expression in the original does not necessarily imply the first imposition of a tribute." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

‡ [Upon the expression isles of the sea, in this connection, Rawlinson remarks: "Cyprus, Aradus, the island

Ver. 2. The author does not designate either the wealth or the power of Ahasuerus or of Mordecai more minutely, but rather refers, for particulars on both to the archives of the empire of the Medes and Persians.* It is enough for him to be able to refer to these, and it is especially honorable for Mordecai's cause, that even the archives of heathen kings must remember him. For פְּרָשָׁה, "clear statement," summary, comp. chap. ix. 7.

Ver. 8. Here the author must once more give prominence to the fact that Mordecai, the Jew, who for him stands as the representative of Judaism, stood next to king Ahasuerus, since therefrom it follows that the greatness of the one was also that of the other.

שֵׁנִי, "the second," here means the first minister (comp. 2 Chron. xxviii. 7), and hence indicates that Mordecai was great among the Jews, and favored among the multitude of his brethren; i. e., that he really occupied a representative position among them.† On רָצָו comp. Deut. xxxiii. 24. The expression אֶחָדוֹ is not to be taken in a limited sense, as if he would say less than: "all his brethren;" but may be explained, as Bertheau justly remarks, from the poetic elevation to which his speech rises at its close. The additional sentence also: Seeking the wealth of his people, and speaking peace to all his seed, is quite in place here, in so far as it indicates that what came to Mordecai also redounded to the good of his entire people. וְרָצָו, in parallelism with עָלָם, is the family to which he belongs, as in 2 Kings xi. 1; Is. lxi. 9, and not his posterity.

DOCTRINAL AND ETHICAL.

On ver. 1. The day in which the enemies of the Jews expected to see the realization of their hopes, became instead for the Jews a day of victory, and for their enemies a day of reverse and defeat. This, under existing circumstances, seemed to be a change which could only be brought about, as it were, by a miracle. It was indeed one of those Providences by means of which it has pleased God to reveal Himself from time to time in an especially remarkable manner. At all events, the prophets had foretold such occurrences as a matter surely to be expected. When the captivity of Israel shall have of Tyre, Platea, etc., remained in the hands of the Persians after the victories of the Greeks, and may be the 'isles' here intended. Or Xerxes may have ignored the loss of the Ægean Islands, and have 'laid' his tribute upon them, though he might not be able to exact it."—Tr.]

* ["In the latter years of Xerxes his 'power and might' were chiefly shown in the erection of magnificent buildings, more especially at Persepolis. He abstained from military expeditions." "Media takes precedence of Persia (contrary to chap. i. 3, 14, 18, etc.) because the kingdom of Media had preceded that of Persia, and in the 'Book of the Chronicles' its history came first." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

† ["It has been objected that Artabanus, the captain of the guard, and not Mordecai, was Xerxes' chief favorite in his twelfth and thirteenth years. But this view rests upon the false chronology of Ctesias, who gives Xerxes 13 years only, instead of the 21 of Ptolemy, Mætho, and the generality of the Greek writers. Artabanus was favorite towards the close of Xerxes' reign, i. e., in his 20th and 21st years." RAWLINSON.—Tr.]

reached its culmination, when the people of God are on the point of expiring under the rod of their drivers, then, instead of really perishing, they should become captors for their captors and task-masters for their drivers (Is. xiv. 2). What is here shown in a small prelude, according to such prophecy, should attain a much larger circumference and a much greater glory. Our book itself, according to its deeper significance, points in a manner typical or prophetic to this great and glorious final history. As a matter of fact, this change of affairs was itself deeply grounded in the nature and circumstances of things. So certain as the God of Israel was the only true God, whose kingdom shall not be destroyed, but through all apparent reverses shall continually rise to new and greater victories, so likewise to His people—so long as it is the sole bearer of His sway, the grave, which threatens to swallow it up, shall ever be a place of revivification and resurrection. And to-day also His empire must continue; and that which thought to overcome its power must itself be overcome, and either be absorbed or consigned to destruction. All the days of persecution for God's kingdom are days indeed in which its enemies hope to overcome it, but it always turns out that such enemies are themselves conquered at last.

BREXES: "We have above such an example in Haman, who was himself hung on the crosses which he had prepared for Mordecai. So the Egyptians were themselves overwhelmed in the sea to which they had driven the Israelites in order to overwhelm them. So also Saul, who had driven David over to the Philistines, that they might destroy him, was himself destroyed by the Philistines."

On vers. 2-4. At the time of the deliverance from Egypt and the entrance into Canaan, the Lord showed abundantly that He was able to make His people a great nation despite the most powerful of their enemies. Now in its exile He again showed them that, as for Himself, He now no longer had need of them as a people, at least as a politically independent one. The great deeds that were then done were edifying and elevating in tendency; what He now did was momentous and instructive. It was plainly evident that He could accomplish His purpose aside from external means or political circumstances. It is still more manifest than it then was that it has pleased Him to be powerful in those who are weak, and great in those who have little influence. In those days he prepared as His instruments the chief persons and princes of His own people, who were in an especial manner filled with the Spirit. Now, however, he employs instead the satraps and governors of Persia, little as they were willing or fit for such work. Together with and among kings, such as Cyrus and Ahasuerus, they must also further God's purposes. There was a time when the Lord had caused fear and terror to fall upon the peoples before Israel, especially those who stood opposed in war, so that they fled from before them (comp. Deut. ii. 25). Now, however, the princes and governors, who had great fear, were obliged to protect the rights of the subjects of the king, and thus they protected Israel. This corresponded entirely to His greatness. Therein is shown His claim as the God of all men. This is itself further evinced by the fact that, if His people will only become more spiritual, as is His wish, and partake of His nature, He will by no means leave them fatherless. But the more spiritual His kingdom, i. e., His people, will become, the more will He assist them to arrive at truth, justice, and security through the world while in it.

On vers. 5-11. 1. We now know a different and better mode of conquering enemies than by the sword and through bloodshed. We know that love only will gain the victory over hate. The people of God is strongest where it is given over to sacrifice and suffering. But we know further that this spiritual mode of combat and victory has become possible only since the time when we received spiritual strength and weapons. In the Old Testament time one could only speak of an external victory over opponents, but not of an internal one. Hence we find it explicable why Israel was compelled to fight such sanguinary battles and merciless wars of destruction. What is most striking in our history is the fact that the Jews, although living in circumstances in which they did not need to wield the sword, nevertheless seized the sword. Though they were no more a people in a political sense, and hence could not procure help for themselves, still they acted as a separate political community. The cause that made them wield the sword of destruction with much the greater pleasure and satisfaction was the fact that Esther stood at their head, and instead of bespeaking a shortening of the work of blood, she promoted it. It is observable also that after the destruction of so many enemies, instead of expressing pain that it needed so severe a conflict, she manifested only joy over their success. But we may nevertheless ask whether condemnation of the then Jews, whom one judges so severely often, as well as criticism of the author, who must have thought and felt as they did, does not proceed from a too rigid doctrinal stand-point, which is inclined to measure every thing by an arbitrary standard, without sufficient regard for circumstances. We would doubtless excuse the then expressions of vindictiveness, were it not for the principle that seems to be involved. For in a real war, in which the patriotic feeling has supreme control, and the weakening of an enemy is a duty of self-preservation, we find such feelings as are exhibited in Judaism and Esther very natural, to say the least. We also perceive the same sentiments often displayed by Israel in its earlier conflicts, without taking so serious an account of them. But the main objection really fails. For the carnage was not of their free will, but a matter of stern necessity. It resulted from the peculiar situation of the case; in fact it was so ordered by the government that the Jews should seize the sword. They were not only entitled, but actually necessitated in this case to return to their political independence. Hence the older interpreters very properly lay great stress upon the fact that the Jews did not venture this of themselves, but at the instance of higher authority. STARKE also says: "It is one thing to take revenge of one's self, another to do so on the order of authority; not the latter, but the former, is forbidden. The simple command of a government will justify such an act only in so far as it is a guaranty against pure thirst for revenge. Every thing here depends upon the disposition of mind. But we would certainly misjudge the temper of the then Jews were we to assume that because the people were but a religious community, we are at liberty to apply a Christian standard to them. It would be unjust to deny them the privilege, which they as an independent people formerly enjoyed, of rejoicing in a victory over their enemies; and it would be little to the purpose, if instead of aiming at their conversion, we acquiesced in their destruction. Instead of justifying the complaint that, we do not pay sufficient regard to those Old Testament national conditions, we must also remember that Old Testament saints could not well avoid often taking a stand-point opposed to their enemies, just as we are still allowed to assume a position at variance with those in enmity against God. Besides, we are not to forget that, for those who will not join themselves to the kingdom or people of God, whatever its form or degree of development, this very hostility is a ground of condemnation. All things that cannot be employed for a good end will finally issue in destruction and extinction. This is still true, and will be true until the end of time. In the same manner even the angels in heaven could not have acted differently from Esther with regard to those enemies in the city of Shushan. We would be more just to Esther, to the Jews spoken of in our book, and to the book itself, if, in what was done in Shushan as well as in all Persia, we would see an anticipation of the judgments connected and parallel with the progress of the kingdom of God on earth, and especially of the final judgment. If the animus of the O. T. with respect to the destruction of enemies seems to us terribly vindictive, rather than mild, yet this may not only be excusable, but may even be a prophetic intimation. The fact, so prominently and emphatically expressed, in the present instance, that the Jews did not stretch out their hands after the goods (spoils) of their enemies, proves to us that they meant to conduct this contest as a measure of self-protection, or better as a holy war, the sole purpose of which was the removal of their enemies.

BREX: "This example, however, is set before us not that we should take it upon ourselves to avenge injuries, according to our own judgment, but that we may recognize the severity of the divine wrath against the impious persecutor of the people of God, and that in persecution we might most confidently expect deliverance through faith, and be obedient to the calls of God."

2. That the sons of Haman should also suffer was agreeable to Persian law, according to which, in many cases, the whole circle of relationship of a criminal must suffer death with him (comp. Amm. Marcell. xxiii. 6). Nor was this mode of proceeding contrary to the Mosaic code. The law that the children should not die for their fathers (more correctly: at the same time), Deut. xxiv. 16, was only applicable to those cases in which the children had no part in the crime of their parents (comp. 2 Kings xiv. 6; 2 Chron. xxv. 4). Doubtless the sons of Haman belonged to those who were inimical to the Jews and attacked them; indeed they may have been their bitterest enemies. It is fair to suppose them in the same state of mind with their father, so that Isa. xiv. 21 came true in their case. Esther requested that, after they were executed, they should also be hung. That the Jews really executed this climax of punishment, may indicate the especially severe judgment that will overtake those who are the principal agents of Antichrist on earth; and this illustrates the truth that opposition against whatever is antagonistic to goodness and piety, must rise till it reaches its overwhelming acme. This is a principle valid even for Christians, that they must be in a hostile attitude to evil to the last degree.

BREX: "This is written in admonition of parents, in order that they may be incited to cultivate piety, lest along with themselves they may also drag their children down into destruction. Such severity of God is stated in the Decalogue: 'Visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation of those that hate me' (comp. John. xviii. 17 sq.)."

On vers. 11-32. 1. In the first pages of our book Ahasuerus, together with the representatives of his empire, indeed heathendom itself, celebrated a great feast. Here, at the end, however, it is for the Jewish people to celebrate a feast. The way of the world begins with pleasure and mirth, but does not end so. The way of God's people leads through sorrow, but at its end is the great feast which is described by Zech. in chap. xiv., as a feast of tabernacles; since it will be celebrated in the tabernacles of undisturbed peace. This, according to Isa. xxv. 6 sqq., may also be the celebrating feast of salvation and consolation, in which God will wipe away all tears from all eyes. We here have to do with the celebration of a feast in time. This obviously differs greatly from the heathen festival. When in later centuries Purim was celebrated with heathenish abandon and luxury, when it seemed to the Jews that they regarded it as a duty to so intoxicate themselves so that they could not distinguish between the names of Mordecai and Haman, this became a striking proof to how low a level, even to heathenism, Judaism had sunk.

The festivals that the people of the Lord as such celebrate, have quite a different purpose from those of heathendom. Ahasuerus aimed to show the riches of his glorious kingdom. God's people desire first of all to praise God's grace. They would give thanks for the gifts bestowed upon them. They would secure and keep what they already have by rendering thanks and praise to God as its author. Theirs are feasts of gratitude. Hence these also have a different character from the others. The pious cannot manifest their spirit of gratitude to God for all His benefits without also proving this by benefaction to their brethren in the faith. The love of God has kindled love to their fellows in their hearts; this would prove itself in deeds of kindness and benevolence. They would confess their allegiance to God as to one mild and kindly; they would else deny Him were they not to give sway, on their part, to mildness and kindness. Their festivals, therefore, are seasons of refreshing, but especially so to the poorer brethren among them (comp. vers. 19, 22). At the same time there is joined to their spirit of rejoicing one of great seriousness. They cannot enjoy their deliverance without also looking back upon the sorrow that preceded it. They can only appreciate the former by taking a full view of the latter. They do not forget that though salvation is theirs, still there are even yet abundant causes for sorrow and grief. The chief cause of this is the remains of sin in them. As the Mazzoth (unleavened) days are followed by the serious Paschal sacrifice, and as the joy of the feast of tabernacles is preceded by the repentance of the fast of the day of atonement, so also here the joyous feast of Purim is connected with a preparation of fasting and mourning (comp. ver. 31). In eternity also will this transition hold true.

STARKE: "It is the privilege of God's children to rejoice in the Lord (Deut. xii. 15; Phil. iv. 4). When God presents us with days of joy and blessing, we should also remember the poor, (Sir. xiv. 4; Ps. xxii. 27 seq.)."

2. In Deut. xiii. 1, it is commanded neither to add to nor to take from the law. If then the Jewish people nevertheless added another feast to those already existing then, doubtless they took into account the principle that what one is encouraged to do in view of a certain law is not so much an addition as an outflow of the same. At any rate the Jewish church already began in this manner to assume a freer position with respect to the Law. And this, if the interior impulse be true, not so much to the letter as rather to the spirit, would be still loyal; nor could it very easily transform the "writing," spoken of in vers. 21, 27, into an objectionable system of statute law.

STARKE: "We can well receive or retain good church ceremonies, if only they are not opposed to the Word of God, in view of our Christian freedom. Even the holidays ordered by the authorities of one's country should be celebrated in a becoming manner (Zech. vii. 2-5)."

On chap. x. That next to the great power of Ahasuerus, having such extensive dominions, all subject to taxation, the greatness of the Jew Mordecai should have been handed down to the memory of all times in the books of record of remarkable events of the Medes and Persians, was a great honor to the Jews. To this day they rejoice over his elevation. But they may well look to it to see whether they may now claim him as their own. That which God especially honored and protected in Mordecai and the then Judaism, was their fidelity to Him and His law. And only where these are found will we find a church that may receive the book of Esther as a prophecy of its victory and continuance in spite of all oppressions on the part of the world.

BRENN: "The Jews, because they rejected Christ, the true seed of Abraham, are now no longer the people of God, no more His Church, but belong to Ishmael and Esau, who always have persecuted the true seed of Abraham. And since they persecute the true Israel, i. e., Christians with the same enmity with which Haman once persecuted them, it is clear that they are themselves the kindred and allies of Haman the Amalekite."

Only where we suffer like Mordecai may one take comfort, as is so convincingly expressed in our book in the thought that the crown is at the end of the cross.

FEUARDENT: "Mordecai, in order to vindicate the glory of God and his countrymen from the Hamanites, endured the hatred of many. He afflicted himself with fastings, prayers, sackcloth, cryings, and lamentations; he constantly spurned that impious man; and was at last adjudged to suffer on the ignominious cross. Now, however, by the singular favor of God he is crowned beyond all men (Ahasuerus alone excepted) with glory and honor even in this world."

THE END.

PREFACE BY THE GENERAL EDITOR.

---

THIS volume embraces three distinct parts, as follows:

1. A General Introduction to the Poetical Books of the Old Testament, by the American Editor. It corresponds to a similar Introduction to the Prophetical Books. In its preparation I have chiefly consulted Lowth, Herder, and Ewald. I might have considerably enlarged it by introducing more specimens, and discussing minutely the difficult questions of Hebrew metre, rhyme, and versification generally, but the great extent of this volume suggested brevity.

2. A new Version of the Book of Job, with brief philological annotations, a preliminary essay, and a series of dissertations on the more difficult passages of the Book, by Prof. TAYLER LEWIS, who has made Job for years the object of special study. He discusses with rare ability and vigor its grand all-pervading Theism, its leading idea and aim, and finds in the humble and unconditional submission to the Divine will the final answer to Satan's question in the Prologue: "Will a man serve God for naught?" The theistic relation of man, made in the image of God, so strongly expressed in Job and Genesis, contains "the power of an endless life" (Heb. vii. 16), though a future state is not dogmatically expressed. The veiled Shemitic idea has more moral power than the Greek or Vedaic conceptions of another life, though the latter seem so much more definite and mythologically clear. The Rhythmical Version aims at fidelity and conciseness, smoothness of measure, and harmony with the Hebrew accentuation and divisions. The Exegetical Notes pay special attention to the broken, ejaculatory or soliloquizing style of Job's speeches, as distinguished from the less impassioned addresses of others; also to the passages on the great works of nature, and those questions in the latter part of Job which—according to Humboldt's dictum—have not as yet been answered by science. (See especially notes on chs. xxviii., xxxvi. to xxxix.) Of the twelve Excursuses on important sections, those on the famous passage ch. xix. 25 (pp. 173 sqq.), on the peculiar character of Job's speeches (175), and on the Angel Intercessor (pp. 208 sqq.) deserve special attention.

3. The Commentary of Prof. ZOECKLER, prepared for the Lange Series (Leipzig, 1872, pp. 321), translated by Dr. L. J. EVANS, Professor of Hebrew and Old Testament Literature in Lane Theological Seminary, Cincinnati. Prof. Evans has given a faithful and idiomatic version of the German work, and has added valuable references, citations, and critical remarks, mostly in the exegetical part, where the general utility of the commentary seemed to require it. He has also, in the Introduction (pp. 252-262), ventured upon a new and ingenious suggestion in respect to the vexed question of the authorship, which deserves careful consideration. He ascribes it to king Hezekiah, and regards the beautiful ode after his recovery, which Isaiah has preserved (ch. xxxviii. 9-20), as the key-note rather than the echo of Job. To the same age, though not the same author, Ewald, Renan and Merx assign the composition. But the conjectures of a post-Mosaic and post-Solomonic authorship leave it an inexplicable mystery that a pious Israelite enjoying the blessings of the theocracy and the temple service, should, in such a long poem on the highest theme, have purposely ignored the sacred laws and institutions of his Church, and gone back to a simpler and more primitive religion. Ancient literature furnishes no example of such a complete reproduction of a bygone age. For, whoever was the author, he certainly represents a patriarchal state of society and a religion of the order of Melchizedek, the cotemporary of Abraham, the mysterious ιερεὺς τοῦ θεοῦ τοῦ ὑψίστου, βασιλεὺς δικαιοσύνης, ἀπάτωρ, ἀμήτωρ, ἀγενεαλόγητος.

But I cannot enter into details. The object of the Preface is simply to introduce the reader to the contents of this volume. The remaining parts of the Old Testament division of this Commentary are considerably advanced, even in anticipation of the German work, which has not yet reached Isaiah, the last historical Books, and the post-exilic Prophets.

§ 1. ORIGIN OF POETRY.

Poetry and music—the highest and most spiritual of the fine arts—are older than the human race; they hail from heaven and from a pre-historic age. The old legend traces the origin of music to the angels, and Raphael paints St. Cecilia, the patroness of church music, as faintly echoing the higher and sweeter chorus from the celestial world. The same applies to poetry, for music presupposes poetry and derives from it its inspiration. Christianity was sung into life by the anthem of the heavenly hosts, who existed before the hexaëmeron or certainly before man, and who are the agents of God in the realm of nature as well as in all great epochs of revelation. The same angels raised their anthems of glory and peace at the completion of the first creation by the hand of the Almighty. Then

And all the sons of God shouted for joy.”*

As poetry and music began in heaven, so they will end in heaven, and constitute a rich fountain of joy to angels and sanctified men.

§ 2. POETRY AND RELIGION.

Poetry and music came from the same God as religion itself, and are intended for the same holy end. They are the handmaids of religion, and the wings of devotion. Nothing can be more preposterous than to assume or establish an antagonism between them. The abuse can never set aside the right use. The best gifts of God are liable to the worst abuse. Some have the false notion that poetry is necessarily fictitious and antagonistic to truth. But poetry is the fittest expression of truth, its Sabbath dress, the silver picture of the golden apple, the ideal embodied in and shining through the real. “Let those,” says Lowth,† “who affect to despise the Muses, cease to attempt, for the vices of a few, who may abuse the best of things, to bring into disrepute a most laudable talent. Let them cease to speak of that art as light and trifling in itself, to accuse it as profane or impious; that art which has been conceded to man by the favor of his Creator, and for the most sacred purposes; that art, consecrated by the authority of God Himself, and by His example in His most august ministrations.” Dean Stanley says:‡ “There has always been in certain minds a repugnance to poetry, as inconsistent with the gravity of religious feeling. It has been sometimes thought that to speak of a book of the Bible as poetical, is a disparagement of it. It has been in many Churches thought that the more scholastic, dry, and prosaic the forms in which religious doctrine is thrown, the more faithfully is its substance represented. Of all human compositions, the most removed from poetry are the Decrees and Articles of Faith, in which the belief of Christendom has often been enshrined as in a sanctuary.§ To such sentiments the towering greatness of David, the acknowledged preëminence of the Psalter are constant rebukes. David, beyond king, soldier, or prophet, was the sweet singer of Israel. Had Raphael painted a picture of Hebrew as of European Poetry, David would have sate aloft at the summit of the Hebrew Parnassus, the Homer of Jewish song.”

§ 3. THE POETRY OF THE BIBLE.

More than one-third of the Old Testament is poetry.

This fact is concealed, and much of the beauty of the Bible lost to many readers by the uniform printing of poetry and prose in our popular Bibles. The current versicular division is purely mechanical, and does not at all correspond to the metrical structure or the laws of Hebrew versification.

The poetry of the Old Testament is contained in the Poetical Books, which in the Jewish canon are included among the Hagiographa or Holy Writings, namely, Job, the Psalms, the Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Solomon. Besides these the Lamentations of Jeremiah, and most of the Prophets are likewise poetic in sentiment and form; and a number of lyric songs, odes, and prophecies, are scattered through the historical books.

§ This disparaging remark about creeds is too sweeping and inapplicable to the oldest and best, the Apostles' and Nicene creeds, which sound like liturgical poems through all ages of Christendom, together with the Te Deum and Gloria in Excelsis of the same age.

The poetic sections of the New Testament are the Magnificat of the blessed Virgin, the Benedictus of Zachariah, the Gloria in Excelsis, the Nunc dimittis of Simeon, the Parables of our Lord, the Anthems of the Apocalypse, and several poetic quotations in the Epistles, e.g., 1 Tim. iii. 16.

Sometimes the prose of the Bible is equal to the best poetry, and blends truth and beauty in perfect harmony. It approaches also, in touching the highest themes, the rhythmical form of Hebrew poetry, and may be arranged according to the parallelism of members.* Moses was a poet as well as a historian, and every prophet or seer is a poet, though not every poet a prophet. The same is true of the prose of the New Testament. We need only refer to the Beatitudes and the whole Sermon on the Mount, the Parables of our Lord, the Prologue of St. John, the seraphic description of love by St. Paul in the thirteenth chapter of second Corinthians, and his triumphant paean at the close of the eighth chapter of Romans, which, in the opinion of Erasmus, surpasses the eloquence of Cicero.†

In this wider sense the Bible begins and ends with poetry. The retrospective vision of the first creation, and the prospective vision of the new heavens and the new earth are presented in language which rises to the summit of poetic beauty and power. There can be nothing more pregnant and sublime in thought, and at the same time more terse and classical in expression than the sentence of the Creator:

"Let there be light! And there was light."

Is there a loftier and more inspiring conception of man than that with which the Bible introduces him into the world, as the very image and likeness of the infinite God? And the idea of a paradise of innocence, love and peace at the threshold of history is poetry as well as reality, casting its sunshine over the gloom of the fall, and opening the prospect of a future paradise regained. Then, passing from the first chapters of Genesis to the last of the Apocalypse, how tender and affecting is St. John's description of the new Jerusalem—the inspiring theme of all the hymns of heavenly home-sickness from "Ad perennis vitæ fontem" to "Jerusalem the golden," which have cheered so many weary pilgrims on their journey through the desert of life.

Hebrew poetry has always been an essential part of Jewish and Christian worship. The Psalter was the first, and for many centuries the only hymn-book of the Church. It is the most fruitful source of Christian hymnody. Many of the finest English and German hymns are free reproductions of Hebrew psalms; the 23d Psalm alone has furnished the keynote to a large number of Christian hymns, and the 46th Psalm to Luther's master-piece: "Ein' feste Burg ist unser Gott."

As among other nations, so among the Jews, poetry was the oldest form of composition. It precedes prose, as youth precedes manhood, and as feeling and imagination are active before sober reflection and logical reasoning.

Poetry and music were closely connected, and accompanied domestic and social life in seasons of joy and sorrow. They cheered the wedding, the harvest, and other feasts (Jos. ix. 3; Jud. xxi. 19; Amos vi. 5; Ps. iv. 8). They celebrated victory after a battle, as the song of Moses, Ex. xv., and the song of Deborah, Judg. v.; they greeted the victor on his return, 1 Sam. xviii. 8. The shepherd sung while watching his flock, the hunter in the pursuit of his prey. Maidens deplored the death of Jephthah's daughter in songs (Judg. xi. 40), and David the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 18), and afterwards Abner (2 Sam. iii. 33). Love was the theme of a nobler inspiration than among the sensual Greeks, and the Song of Songs celebrates the Hebrew ideal of pure bridal love, as reflecting the love of Jehovah to His people, and prefiguring the union of Christ with His Church.

* Isaac Taylor says (l. c. p. 68): "Biblical utterances of the first truths in theology possess the grandeur of the loftiest poetry, as well as a rhythmical or artificial structure."

† "Quid unquam Cicero dixit grandiloquentius?" The heathen rhetorician, Longinus, placed Paul among the greatest orators.

§ 4. THE SPIRIT OF HEBREW POETRY.

In a wider sense all true poetry is inspired. The civilized nations of antiquity, particularly the Greeks, regarded it as a divine gift, and poets as prophets and intimate friends of the gods; and all the ceremonies, oracles and mysteries of their religion were clothed in poetic dress. There is, however, a two-fold inspiration, a Divine, and a Satanic; and the poetry which administers to pride and sensual passion, idolizes the creature, ridicules virtue, and makes vice attractive, is the product of the evil spirit.

The poetry of the Hebrews is in the highest and best sense the poetry of inspiration and revelation. It is inspired by the genius of the true religion, and hence rises far above the religious poetry of the Hindoos, Parsees and Greeks, as the religion of revelation is above the religion of nature, and the God of the Bible above the idols of the heathen. It is the poetry of truth and holiness. It never administers to trifling vanities and lower passions; it is the chaste and spotless priestess at the altar. It reveals the mysteries of the divine will to man, and offers up man's prayers and thanks to his Maker. It is consecrated to the glory of Jehovah and the moral perfection of man.

The most obvious feature of Bible poetry is its intense Theism. The question of the existence of God is never raised, and an atheist—if there be one—is simply set down as a fool (Ps. xiv.). The Hebrew poet lives and moves in the idea of a living God, as a self-revealing, personal, almighty, holy, omniscient, all-pervading and merciful Being, and overflows with his adoration and praise. He sees and hears God in the works of creation, and in the events of history. Jehovah is to him the Maker and Preserver of all things. He shines in the firmament, He rides on the thunder-storm, He clothes the lilies, He feeds the ravens and young lions, and the cattle on a thousand hills, He gives rain and fruitful seasons. He is the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, of Moses, David and the prophets, He dwells with Israel, He is their ever-present help and shield, their comfort and joy, He is just and holy in His judgments, good, merciful and true in all His dealings, He overrules even the wrath of man for His own glory and the good of His people.

To this all-prevailing Theism corresponds the anthropology. Man is always represented under his most important moral and religious relations, in the state of innocence, in the terrible slavery of sin, or in the process of redemption and restoration to more than his original glory and dominion over the creation. Hebrew poetry reflects in fresh and life-like colors the working of God's law and promise on the heart of the pious, and every state of his experience, the deep emotions of repentance and grief, faith and trust, gratitude and praise, hope and aspiration, love and peace.

Another characteristic of Bible poetry is the childlike simplicity and naturalness with which it sets forth and brings home to the heart the sublimest ideas to readers of every grade of culture, who have a lively organ for religious truth.* The scenery and style are thoroughly oriental and Hebrew, and yet they can be translated into every language without losing by the process—which cannot be said of any other poetry. Greek and Roman poetry have more art and variety, more elegance and finish, but no such popularity, catholicity and adaptability. The universal heart of humanity beats in the Hebrew poet. It is true, his experience falls far short of that of the Christian. Yet nearly every phase of Old Testament piety strikes a corresponding chord in the soul of the Christian; and such are the depths of the divine Spirit who guided the genius of the sacred singers that their words convey far more than they themselves were conscious of, and reach prophetically forward into the most distant future.†

* "Not less in relation to the most highly-cultured minds than to the most rude—not less to minds disciplined in abstract thought, than to such as are unused to generalization of any kind—the Hebrew Scriptures, in the metaphorical style, and their poetic diction, are the fittest medium for conveying, what is their purpose to convey, concerning the Divine Nature, and concerning the spiritual life, and concerning the correspondence of man—the finite, with God—the Infinite." This idea is well carried out in the work of Isaac Taylor, see p. 50.

† The higher order of secular poetry furnishes an analogy. Shakespeare was not aware of the deep and far-reaching

All this applies more particularly to the Psalter, the holy of holies in Hebrew poetry. David, "the singer of Israel," was placed by Providence in the different situations of shepherd, courtier, outlaw, warrior, conqueror, king, that he might the more vividly set forth Jehovah as the Good Shepherd, the ever-present Helper, the mighty Conqueror, the just and merciful Sovereign. He was open to all the emotions of friendship and love, generosity and mercy; he enjoyed the highest joys and honors; he suffered poverty, persecution and exile, the loss of the dearest friend, treason and rebellion from his own son. Even his changing moods and passions, his sins and crimes, which with their swift and fearful punishments form a domestic tragedy of rare terror and pathos, were overruled and turned into lessons of humility, comfort and gratitude. All this rich spiritual biography from his early youth to his old age, together with God's merciful dealings with him, are written in his hymns, though with reference to his inward states of mind rather than his outward condition, so that readers of very different situation or position in life might yet be able to sympathize with the feelings and emotions expressed. His hymns give us a deeper glance into his inmost heart and his secret communion with God than the narrative of his life in the historical books. They are remarkable for simplicity, freshness, vivacity, warmth, depth and vigor of feeling, childlike tenderness and heroic faith, and the all-pervading fear and love of God. "In all his works," says the author of Ecclesiasticus (xl. 8-12), he praised the Holy One most high with words of glory; with his whole heart he sang songs, and loved Him that made him. He set singers also before the altar, that by their voices they might make sweet melody and daily sing praises in their songs. He beautified their feasts and set in order the solemn times until the end, that they might praise His holy name, and that the temple might sound from morning. The Lord took away his sins and exalted his horn forever; He gave him a covenant of kings and the throne of glory in Israel.*

This inseparable union with religion, with truth and holiness, gives to Hebrew poetry such an enduring charm and undying power for good in all ages and countries.† It brings us into the immediate presence of the great Jehovah, it raises us above the miseries of earth, it dispels the clouds of darkness, it inspires, ennobles, purifies and imparts peace and joy, it gives us a foretaste of heaven itself.

In this respect the poetry of the Bible is as far above classic poetry as the Bible itself is above all other books. Homer and Virgil dwindle into utter insignificance as compared with David and Asaph, if we look to the moral effect upon the heart and the life of their readers. The classic poets reach only a small and cultured class; but the singers of the Bible come home to men of every grade of education, every race and color, every condition of life, and every creed and sect. The Psalter is, as Luther calls it, "a manual of all the saints," where meaning of his own productions. Goethe said that the deepest element in poetry is "the unconscious" (das Unbewusste), and that his master-piece, the tragedy of Faust, proceeded from the dark and hidden depths of his being.

* Comp. Ewald's admirable portrait of David as a poet, in the first volume of Die Dichter des A. B., p. 25. Prof. Perowne in his Commentary on the Psalms, vol. I., pp. 8, 9 third ed. (1873), gives this truthful description of him: "As David's life shines in his poetry, so also does his character. That character was no common one. It was strong with all the strength of man, tender with all the tenderness of woman. Naturally brave, his courage was heightened and confirmed by that faith in God which never, in the worst extremity, forsook him. Naturally warm-hearted, his affections struck their roots deep into the innermost centre of his being. In his love for his parents, for whom he provided in his own extreme peril—in his love for his wife Michal—for his friend Jonathan, whom he loved as his own soul—for his darling Absalom, whose death almost broke his heart—even for the infant whose loss he dreaded—we see the same man, the same depth and truth, the same tenderness of personal affection. On the other hand, when stung by a sense of wrong or injustice, his sense of which was peculiarly keen, he could flash out into strong words and strong deeds. He could hate with the same fervor that he loved. Evil men and evil things, all that was at war with goodness and with God—for these he found no abhorrence too deep, scarcely any imprecations too strong. Yet he was, withal, placable and ready to forgive. He could exercise a prudent self-control, if he was occasionally impetuous. His true courtesy, his chivalrous generosity to his foes, his rare delicacy, his rare self-denial, are all traits which present themselves most forcibly as we read his history. He is the truest of heroes in the genuine elevation of his character, no less than in the extraordinary incidents of his life. Such a man cannot wear a mask in his writings. Depth, tenderness, fervor, mark all his poems."

† Winer, too, derives from the religious character of Hebrew poetry its "sublime flight and never-dying beauty." Angus says: "The peculiar excellence of the Hebrew poetry is to be ascribed to the employment of it in the noblest service, that of religion. It presents the loftiest and most precious truths, expressed in the most appropriate language." Ewald remarks that "Hebrew poetry is the interpreter of the sublimest religious ideas for all times, and herein lies its most important and imperishable value."

each one finds the most truthful description of his own situation, especially in seasons of affliction. It has retained its hold upon the veneration and affections of pious Jews and Christians for these three thousand years, and is even now and will ever be more extensively used as a guide of private devotion and public worship than any other book. "When Christian Martyrs, and Scottish Covenanters in dens and caves of the earth, when French exiles and English fugitives in their hiding-places during the panic of revolution or of mutiny, received a special comfort from the Psalms, it was because they found themselves literally side by side with the author in the cavern of Adullam, or on the cliffs of Engedi, or beyond the Jordan, escaping from Saul or from Absalom, from the Philistines or from the Assyrians. When Burleigh or Locke seemed to find an echo in the Psalms to their own calm philosophy, it was because they were listening to the strains which had proceeded from the mouth or charmed the ear of the sagacious king or the thoughtful statesman of Judah. It has often been observed that the older we grow, the more interest the Psalms possess for us as individuals; and it may at most be said that by these multiplied associations, the older the human race grows, the more interest do they possess for mankind."*

§ 5. POETIC MERIT.

In its religious character, as just described, lies the crowning excellence of the poetry of the Bible. The spiritual ideas are the main thing, and they rise in richness, purity, sublimity and universal importance immeasurably beyond the literature of all other nations of antiquity.

But as to the artistic and æsthetic form, it is altogether subordinate to the contents, and held in subserviency to the lofty aim. Moses, Solomon, David, Isaiah, and the author of Job, possessed evidently the highest gifts of poetry, but they restrained them, lest human genius should outshine the Divine grace, or the silver pitcher be estimated above the golden apple. The poetry of the Bible, like the whole Bible, wears the garb of humility and condescends to men of low degree, in order to raise them up. It gives no encouragement to the idolatry of genius, and glorifies God alone. "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thy name give glory," (Ps cxv. 1.)

Hence an irreligious or immoral man is apt to be repelled by the Bible; he feels himself in an uncongenial atmosphere, and is made uneasy and uncomfortable by the rebukes of sin and the praise of a holy God. He will not have this book rule over him or disturb him in his worldly modes of thought and habits of life.

Others are unable to divest themselves of early prejudices for classical models; they esteem external polish more highly than ideas, and can enjoy no poetry which is not cast in the Greek mould, and moves on in the regular flow of uniform metre and stanza. And yet these are no more essential to true poetry than the music of rhyme, which was unknown to Homer, Pindar, Sophocles, Virgil and Horace, and was even despised by Milton as "the invention of a barbarous age to set off wretched matter and lame metre, as the jingling sound of like endings trivial to all judicious ears and of no true musical delight." This is indeed going to the opposite extreme; for although rhyme and even metre are by no means necessary, especially in the epos and drama, they yet belong to the perfection of some forms of lyric poetry, which is the twin sister of music.

If we study the Bible poetry on its own ground, and with unclouded eyes, we may find in it forms of beauty as high and enduring as in that of any nation ancient or modern. Even its artless simplicity and naturalness are sometimes the highest triumph of art. Simplicity always enters into good taste. Those poems and songs which are the outgushing of the heart, without any show of artificial labor, are the most popular, and never lose their hold on the heart. We feel that we could have made them ourselves, and yet only a high order of genius could produce them.

Where is there a nobler ode of liberty, of national deliverance and independence, than the Song of Moses on the overthrow of Pharaoh in the Red Sea (Ex. xv.)? Where a grander panorama of creation than in the one hundred and fourth Psalm? Where a more charming and lovely pastoral than the twenty-third Psalm? Where such a high view of the dignity and destiny of man as in the eighth Psalm? Where a profounder sense of sin and divine forgiveness than in the thirty-second and fifty-first Psalms? Where such a truthful and overpowering description of the vanity of human life and the never-changing character of the holy and just, yet merciful God, as in the ninetyeth Psalm, which has been styled "the most sublime of human compositions, the deepest in feeling, loftiest in theologic conception, the most magnificent in its imagery?" Where have the infinite greatness and goodness of God, His holiness, righteousness, long-suffering and mercy, the wonders of His government, and the feeling of dependence on Him, of joy and peace in Him, of gratitude for His blessings, of praise of His glory, found truer and fitter embodiment than in the Psalter and the Prophets? Where will you find such sweet, tender, delicate and exquisite expression of pure innocent love as in the Song of Songs, which sounds like the singing of birds in sunny May from the flowery fields and the tree of life in Paradise? Isaiah is one of the greatest of poets as well as of prophets, of an elevation, a richness, a compass, a power and comfort that are unequalled. No human genius ever soared so high as this evangelist of the old dispensation. Jeremiah, the prophet of sorrow and affliction, has furnished the richest supply of the language of holy grief in seasons of public calamity and distress from the destruction of Jerusalem down to the latest siege of Paris; and few works have done this work more effectively than his Lamentations. And what shall we say of the Book of Job, the Shakspeare in the Bible? Where are such bold and vivid descriptions of the wonders of nature, of the behemoth and leviathan, and of the war-horse "who paweth in the valley and rejoiceth in his strength, who swalloweth the ground with fierceness and rage, who saith among the trumpets Ha, ha! and smelleth the battle afar off, the thunder of the captains and the shout of war?" What can be finer than Job's picture of wisdom, whose price is far above rubies? And what a wealth of comfort is in that wonderful passage, which inspired the sublimest solo in the sublimest musical composition, those words graven in the rock forever, where this holy outsider, this patriarchal sage and saint of the order of Melchisedec, expresses his faith and hope that his Redeemer liveth and will stand the last on the grave, and that he shall see Him with his own eyes on the morning of resurrection.

The times for the depreciation of Bible poetry have passed. Many of the greatest scholars and poets, some of whom by no means in sympathy with its religious ideas, have done it full justice. I quote a few of them who represent different stand-points and nationalities.

Henry Stephens, the greatest philologist of the sixteenth century, thought that there was nothing more poetic (ποιητικώτερον), nothing more musical (μουσικώτερον), nothing more thrilling (γοργώτερον), nothing more full of lofty inspiration (διδραμβικώτερον) than the Psalms of David.

John Milton, notwithstanding his severe classic taste, judges: "There are no songs comparable to the songs of Zion, no orations equal to those of the Prophets, and no politics like those which the Scriptures teach." And as to the Psalms, he says: "Not in their divine arguments alone, but in the very critical art of composition, the Psalms may be easily made to appear over all the kinds of lyric poesy incomparable."

Sir William Jones: "I have regularly and attentively read the Holy Scriptures, and am of the opinion that this volume, independently of its divine origin, contains more true sublimity, more exquisite beauty, more important history and finer strains both of poetry and eloquence, than could be collected from all other books."

Sir D. K. Sandford: "In lyric flow and fire, in crushing force and majesty, the poetry of the ancient Scriptures is the most superb that ever burnt within the breast of man."

John von Müller, the German Tacitus: "There is nothing in Greece, nothing in Rome, nothing in all the West, like David, who selected the God of Israel to sing Him in higher strains than ever praised the gods of the Gentiles."

Herder, who was at home in the literature of all ages and countries, is full of enthusiastic admiration for the pure and sublime beauties of Hebrew poetry, as may be seen on almost every page of his celebrated work on the subject. He regards it as "the oldest, simplest, sublimest" of all poetry, and in the form of a dialogue between Alciphron and Eutyphron, after the Platonic fashion, he triumphantly vindicates its merits against all objections, and illustrates it with admirable translations of choice passages.

Goethe pronounced the book of Ruth "the loveliest thing in the shape of an epic or idyl which has come down to us."

Alexander von Humboldt, in his "Cosmos," (where the name of God scarcely occurs, except in an extract from the heathen Aristotle), praises the Hebrew description of nature as unrivalled, especially the 104th Psalm, as "presenting in itself a picture of the whole world." "Nature," he says, "is to the Hebrew poet not a self-dependent object, but a work of creation and order, the living expression of the omnipresence of the Divinity in the visible world."

Thomas Carlyle calls the book of Job, "apart from all theories about it, one of the grandest things ever written by man. A noble book! All men's book! Such living likenesses were never since drawn. Sublime sorrow, sublime reconciliation; oldest choral melody, as of the heart of manhood; so soft and great as the summer midnight; as the world with its seas and stars. There is nothing written, I think, of equal literary merit."

Isaac Taylor: "The Hebrew writers as poets were masters of all the means and the resources, the powers and the stores, of the loftiest poetry, but subservient to a far loftier purpose than that which ever animates human genius."

Henry Ewald calls the old Hebrew poetry "unique in its kind and in many respects unsurpassed, because as to its contents it is the interpreter of those sublime religious thoughts which lived in Israel, and are found nowhere else in antiquity in such purity, vigor and durability, and as to its form it has a wonderful simplicity and naivete flowing from that sublimity of thought."

Dean Stanley: "The Psalms are beyond question poetical from first to last, and he will be a bold man who shall say that a book is less inspired, or less true, or less orthodox, or less Divine, because it is like the Psalms. The Prophet, in order to take root in the common life of the people, must become a Psalmist."

J. J. Stewart Perowne: "The very excellence of the Psalms is their universality. They spring from the deep fountains of the human heart, and God, in His providence, and by His Spirit, has so ordered it, that they should be for His Church an everlasting heritage. Hence they express the sorrows, the joys, the aspirations, the struggles, the victories, not of one man, but of all. And if we ask, How comes this to pass? the answer is not far to seek. One object is ever before the eyes and the heart of the Psalmist. All enemies, all distresses, all persecutions, all sins, are seen in the light of God. It is to Him that the cry goes up; it is to Him that the heart is laid bare; it is to Him that the thanksgiving is uttered. This it is which makes them so true, so precious, so universal. No surer proof of their inspiration can be given than this, that they are 'not of an age but for all time,' that the ripest Christian can use them in the fulness of his Christian manhood, though the words are the words of one who lived centuries before the coming of Christ in the flesh."

§ 6. DIFFERENT KINDS OF HEBREW POETRY.

Hebrew poetry may be divided into lyric, didactic, prophetic, and dramatic. The first two are the prevailing forms. The third may be regarded as a branch of didactic poetry, or perhaps better, as a substitute for epic poetry. The fourth is not to be confounded with the Greek drama, and is in close connection either with the lyric or didactic. Hence many writers admit only these two.*

The absence of epic poetry in its proper sense is due to the fact that the revealed religion excludes mythology and hero-worship, which control this kind of poetry, and that it substitutes for them monotheism, which is inconsistent with any kind of falsehood and idolatry. The real hero, so to speak, of the history of revelation is Jehovah Himself, the only true and living God, to whom all glory is due. And so He appears in the prophetic writings. He is the one object of worship, praise and thanksgiving, but not the object of a narrative poem. He is the one sovereign actor, who in heaven originates and controls all events on earth, but not one among other actors, co-operating or conflicting with finite beings. Epic poetry reproduces historic facts at the expense of truth, and exalts its hero above merit. The Bible poetry never violates truth.

* So Perowne (The Book of Psalms, Vol. I., p. 1, third ed.): "The poetry of the Hebrews is mainly of two kinds, lyrical and didactic. They have no epic, and no drama. Dramatic elements are to be found in many of their odes, and the Book of Job and the Song of Songs have sometimes been called Divine dramas; but dramatic poetry, in the proper sense of that term, was altogether unknown to the Israelites."

There are, however, epic elements in several lyric poems which celebrate certain great events in Jewish history, as the Song of Moses, Exod. xv., and the Song of Deborah, Judg. v.; although even here the lyric element preponderates, and the subjectivity of the poet is not lost in the objective event as in the genuine epos. The Book of Ruth has been called an epic by Göthe. The Prologue and Epilogue of Job are epic, and have a truly narrative and objective character; but they are only the framework of the poem itself, which is essentially didactic in dramatic form. In the apocryphal books the epic element appears in the book of Tobith and the book of Judith, which stand between narrative and fiction, and correspond to what we call romance or novel.

§ 7. LYRIC POETRY.

Lyric poetry, or the poetry of feeling, is the oldest and predominant form of poetry among the Hebrew as all other Semitic nations. It is the easiest, the most natural, and the best adapted for devotion both private and public. It is closely connected with song, its twin sister. It wells up from the human heart, and gives utterance to its many strong and tender emotions of love and friendship, of joy and gladness, of grief and sorrow, of hope and desire, of gratitude and praise. Ewald happily describes it as "the daughter of the moment, of swift, rising, powerful feelings, of deep stirrings and fiery emotions of the soul."*

Among the Greeks the epos appears first; but the older lyric effusions may have been lost. Among the Hindoos they are preserved in the Vedas. Lyric poetry is found among all nations which have a poetic literature; but epic poetry, at least in its fuller development, is not so general, and hence cannot be the primitive form.

Lyric poetry contains the fruitful germ of all other kinds of poetry. When the poetic feeling is kindled by a great event in history, it expresses itself more or less epically, as in the battle and victory hymns of Moses and Deborah. When the poet desires to teach a great truth or practical lesson, he becomes didactic. When he exhibits his emotions in the form of action and real life, he approaches the drama. In like manner the lyric poetry may give rise to mixed forms which appear in the later stages of literature.†

The oldest specimen of lyric poetry is the song of Lamech to his two wives (Gen. iv. 23). It has already the measured arrangement, alliteration and musical correspondence of Hebrew parallelism. It is a proud, fierce, defiant "sword-song," commemorating in broken, fragmentary utterances the invention of weapons of brass and iron by his son Tubal Cain (i. e., lance-maker), and threatening vengeance:

Adah and Zillah! hear my voice,
Ye wives of Lamech, listen to my speech:

* Dichter des A. B. I., p. 17: "Die lyrische Dichtung oder das Lied ist überall die nächste Art von Dichtung, welche bei irgend einem Volke entsteht. Sie ist es ihrem Wesen nach: denn sie ist die Tochter des Augenblicks, schnell emporkommender gewaltiger Empfindungen, tiefer Rührungen und feuriger Bewegungen des Gemüthes, von welchen der Dichter so ganz hingerissen ist, dass er in sich wie verloren nichts als sie so gewaltig wie sie in ihm leben, aussprechen will. Sie ist es ebenso der Zeit nach: das kurze Lied ist der beständige, unverwüthliche Theil von Poesie, der erste und letzte Erguss dichterischer Stimmung, wie eine unsiegbare Quelle, welche zu jeder Zeit sich wieder frisch ergießen kann. Sie ist also auch bei allen Völkern nothwendig die älteste, die welche zuerst eine dichterische Gestaltung und Kunst gründet und allen übrigen Arten von Dichtung die Wege bahnt." On p. 91 Ewald says: "Und so bleibt das Lied in seinem ganzen reinen und vollen Wesen wie der Anfang so das Ende aller Dichtung."

† Ewald, l. c., p. 19: "Der besondere Zweck, welchen der Dichter verfolgen mag, kann im Allgemeinen nur ein dreifacher sein: er will entweder mit seinen geflügelten Worten wie mit einer Lehre andre treffen, oder er will erzählend beschreiben, oder endlich er will das volle Leben selbst ebenso lebendig wiedergehen: und so werden LEHRDICHUNG, SAGENDICHUNG (Epos) und LEBENS- DICHUNG (Drama) die drei Arten höherer Dichtung sein, welche sich überall wie von selbst ausbilden wollen. Erst wenn sie sich vollkommen aus gebildet haben, entstehen auch wohl neue ZWITTERARTEN, indem das Lied als die Urart aller Dichtung seine eigenthümliche Weise mit einer derselben neu verschmilzt und diese stets nächste und allgegenwärtigste Urdichtung sich so in neuer Schöpfung mannichfach verjüngt."

For I have slain* a man for wounding me,
 Even a young man for hurting me.
 Lo! Cain shall be avenged seven-fold,
 But Lamech seventy and seven-fold.†

Here we have the origin of secular poetry and music (for the other son of Lamech, Jubal, i. e., Harper, invented musical instruments), in connection with the progressive material civilization of the descendants of Cain.

The other poetic remains of the ante-Mosaic age are the Prediction of Noah concerning his three sons (Gen. ix. 25-27), and the death-chant of Jacob (Gen. xlix. 1-27); but these belong rather to prophetic poetry.

In the Mosaic age we meet first with the song of deliverance which Moses sang with the children of Israel unto the Lord after the overthrow of Pharaoh's hosts in the Red Sea (Ex. xv. 1-19). It is the oldest specimen of a patriotic ode (from οἰδεύω, to sing), and may be called the national anthem, or the Te Deum of the Hebrews. It sounds through all the thanksgiving hymns of Israel, and is associated by the Apocalyptic Seer with the final triumph of the Church, when the saints shall sing "the song of Moses, and the song of the Lamb" (Rev. xv. 3). Its style is archaic, simple and grand. It is arranged for antiphonal singing, chorus answering to chorus, and voice to voice; the maidens playing upon the timbrels. It is full of alliterations and rhymes which cannot be rendered, and hence it necessarily loses in any translation.‡

I will sing unto Jehovah,
 For He hath triumphed gloriously:
 The horse and his rider
 Hath He thrown into the sea.

Jehovah is my strength and song,
 And He is become my salvation.
 This is my God, and I will praise Him; §
 My father's God, and I will exalt Him.

Jehovah is a man of war;
 Jehovah is His name.
 Pharaoh's chariots and his hosts
 Hath He cast into the sea:

* The perfect, I have slain (יָרַח, Sept. ἀνέκρεiva, Vulg. occidi), is probably used in the spirit of arrogant boasting, to express the future with all the certainty of an accomplished fact. Chrysostom, Theodoret, Jerome, Jarchi and others set Lamech down as a murderer (of Cain), who here confesses his deed to ease his conscience; but Aben-Ezra, Calvin, Herder, Ewald, Delitzsch, take the verb as a threat: "I will slay any man who wounds me."

† The law of blood for blood is strongly expressed also in the tragic poetry of Greece, especially in the Eumenides of Æschylus, also the Chæphoræ, 398 (quoted by Prof. T. Lewis, Com. on Gen. in loc.):

"There is a law that blood once poured on earth
 By murderous hands demands that other blood
 Be shed in retribution. From the elain Erynny calls aloud for vengeance still,
 Till death in justice meet be paid for death."

‡ Herder says of this poem, of which he gives a free German translation: "Der Durchgang durchs Meer hat das älteste und klingendste Siegeslied hervorgebracht, das wir in dieser Sprache haben. Es ist Chorgesang: eine einzelne Stimme mälte vielleicht die Thaten selbst, die der Chor aufsing und gleichsam verhallte. Sein Bau ist einfach, voll Assonanzen und Reime, die ich in unserer Sprache ohne Wortzwang nicht zu geben wüßte; denn die ebräische Sprache ist wegen ihres einförmigen Baues solcher klingenden Assonanzen voll Leichte, lange, aber wenige Worte verschoben in der Luft, und meistens endigt ein dunkler, einsylliger Schall, der vielleicht den Bardit des Chors machte." Dr. Lange thus happily characterizes this ode (Comm. on Ex.): "Wie der Durchgang durch das Rother Meer als eine fundamentale Thatsache des typischen Reiches Gottes seine Beziehung durch die ganze Heilige Schrift ausbreitet, wie er sich rückwärts auf die Sündfluth bezieht, weiter vorwärts auf die chrisdliche Taufe, und schliesslich auf das Endgericht, so gehen auch die Reflexe von diesem Liede Moses durch die ganze Heilige Schrift. Rückwärts ist es vorbereitet durch die poetischen Laute der Genesis und durch den Segen Jakobs, vorwärts geht es durch kleine epische Laute über auf das Abschiedslied des Moses und seinen Segen 5 Mos. 32, 33. Zwei grossartige Seitenstücke, welche folgen, das Siegeslied der Debora und das Rettungsglied des David 2 Sam. 22 (Ps. 18), leiten dann die Psalmen-poësie ein, in welcher vielfach der Grundton unseres Liedes wieder mit anklingt, Ps. 71, 78, 105, 106, 114. Noch einmal ist am Schlusse des N. T. von dem Liede Moses die Rede; es tönt fort als das typische Triumphlied des Volkes Gottes bis in die andre Welt hinein, Offenb. 15, 3."

§ The E. V.: 'I will prepare Him an habitation' (sanctuary), would anticipate the building of the tabernacle, but is not justified by the Hebrew.

And his chosen captains
Are sunk in the Red Sea.
The depths cover them.
They went down to the bottom like a stone.

Thy right hand, O Jehovah, glorious in power,
Thy right hand, O Jehovah, dasheth in pieces the enemy.
And in the greatness of Thy majesty
Thou overturnest them that rise up against thee:
Thou sendest forth Thy wrath,
It con-nemeth them like stubble.
And with the blast of Thy nostrils the waters were piled up.
The floods stood upright as an heap.
The depths were congealed in the heart of the sea.

The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake,
I will divide the spoil,
My soul shall be satisfied upon them;
I will draw my sword,
My hand shall destroy them.

Thou didst blow with Thy wind,
The sea covered them:
They sank as lead in the mighty waters.

Who is like unto Thee, O Jehovah, among the gods?
Who is like Thee, glorious in holiness,
Fearful in praises, doing wonders?
Thou stretchedst out Thy right hand,
The earth swallowed them.

Thou in Thy mercy hast led the people
Which Thou hast redeemed.
Thou hast guided them in thy strength
To thy holy habitation.

The peoples have heard, they tremble :*
Pangs have taken hold on the inhabitants of Philistia.
Then were the chiefs of Edom dismayed.
The mighty men of Moab, trembling taketh hold upon them,
All the inhabitants of Canaan are melted away;
Terror and dread fall upon them.
By the greatness of Thine arm they are as still as a stone;
Till Thy people pass over, O Jehovah,
Till the people pass over,
Which Thou hast purchased.

Thou shalt bring them in,
And plant them in the mountain of Thine inheritance.
The place, O Jehovah, which Thou hast made for Thee to dwell in,
The sanctuary, O Jehovah, which Thou hast established.
Jehovah shall reign for ever and ever.

Here the song ends, and what follows (ver. 19) is probably a brief recapitulation to fix the event in the memory:

For the horses of Pharaoh went in with his chariots
And with his horsemen into the sea,
And Jehovah brought again the waters of the sea upon them;
But the children of Israel walked on dry land
In the midst of the sea.

Moses wrote also that sublime farewell-song which celebrates Jehovah's merciful dealings with Israel (Deut. xxxii.), the parting blessing of the twelve tribes (Deut. xxxiii.), and the ninetyeth Psalm, called "A Prayer of Moses, the man of God," which sums up the spiritual experience of his long pilgrimage in the wilderness, and which proves its undying force at every death-bed and funeral service.

* The poet now, after giving thanks for the past, looks to the future and describes the certain consequences of this mighty deliverance, which struck terror into the hearts of all enemies of Israel, and must end in the conquest of Canaan, as promised by God.

In the book of Joshua (x. 12, 13) there is a poetic quotation from "the Book of the Upright," which was probably a collection of patriotic songs :

"Sun, stand still upon Gibeon,
And thou, moon, upon the valley of Ajalon!"
And the sun stood still, and the moon stayed her course,
Until the nation were avenged of their enemies.

The song of Deborah (Judges v.), from the heroic period of the Judges, eight centuries before Pindar, is a stirring battle-song full of fire and dithyrambic swing, and breathing the spirit of an age of disorder and tumult, when might was right.*

Another but very different specimen of female poetry is Hannah's hymn of joy and gratitude when she dedicated her son Samuel, the last of the Judges, to the service of Jehovah (1 Sam. ii. 1-10). It furnished the key-note to the Magnificat of the Virgin Mary after the miraculous conception.

The reign of David was the golden age of lyric poetry. He was himself the prince of singers in Israel. His religious poetry is incorporated in the Psalter. Of his secular poetry the author of the Books of Samuel has preserved us two specimens, a brief stanza on the death of Abner, and his lament for the death of Saul and Jonathan (2 Sam. i. 19-27). The latter is a most pathetic and touching elegy full of the strength and tenderness of the love of friendship. His generosity in lamenting the death of his persecutor who stood in his way to the throne, enhances the beauty and effect of the elegy.

Thy Glory, O Israel,† is slain upon thy heights.
(CHORUS) How are the heroes fallen!

Tell it not in Gath,
Publish it not in the streets of Askelon;
Lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice,
Lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph.

Ye mountains of Gilboa, no dew nor rains
Come upon you, and ye fields of offerings,‡
For there the shield of the hero is polluted,§
The shield of Saul not anointed with oil.]

From the blood of the slain, from the fat of the heroes,
The bow of Jonathan turned not back,
And the sword of Saul
Returned not empty.

* An admirable German translation is given by Herder, and another by Prof. Cassel, in his Com. on Judges, translated by Prof. Steenstra.

† Or: "The Glory (the Beauty) of Israel." Ewald, Bunsen, Keil, take ישראל, as vocative, "O Israel;" the E. V. ("the beauty of Israel"), De Wette, Erdmann (Die Zierde Israels), and others, as genitive. צִכְרִי means splendor, glory (Isa. iv. 2; xlii. 19; xxiv. 16, and is often used of the land of Israel, and of Mount Zion, which is called "the mountain of holy beauty," חֹר צִכְרִי קֹדֶשׁ, Dan. xi. 45); also a gazelle, from the beauty of its form (1 Kings v. 3; Isa. xlii. 14). The gazelles were so much admired by the Hebrews and Arabs that they even swore by them (Cant. ii. 7; iii. 5). Herder (Israel's Reh), and Ewald (Der Steinbock, Israel—to avoid the feminine die Gazelle) take it in the latter sense, and refer it to Jonathan alone. Ewald conjectures that Jonathan was familiarly known among the soldiers of Israel as the Gazelle on account of his beauty and swiftness. Jonathan was, of course, much nearer to the heart of the poet, but in this national song David had to identify him with Saul, so that both are included in the Glory of Israel.

§ By blood and dust. A great indignity to a soldier. Homer says that the helmet of Patroclus was rolled under the horses' feet, and soiled with blood and dust (Il. xvi. 794). The E. V., following the Vulgate (abjectus), translates עָלַה עֵלֶי עָלַה cast away.

] But with blood. The E. V., following again the Vulgate (quasi non esset), supplies "as though he had not been anointed," i. e., as if he had not been a king (1 Sam. x. 1). So also Herder: "Königes Schild, als wär er nimmer mit Oel geheiligt." But the more natural interpretation is: "the shield of Saul was not anointed with oil," as was usual in preparation for battle, and after it had been polluted by blood or corrupted by rust (Isa. xxi. 5). The unanointed shield here is an emblem of utter defeat and helplessness.

Saul and Jonathan, lovely and pleasant in their lives,
And in their death they are not divided.
They were swifter than eagles,
They were stronger than lions.

Ye daughters of Israel, weep over Saul,
Who clothed you in purple with delight,
Who put ornaments of gold Upon your apparel.*

(CHORUS) *How are the heroes fallen in the midst of the battle!
O Jonathan, slain upon thy heights!*

I am distressed for thee, my brother Jonathan,
Very pleasant hast thou been unto me:
Thy love to me was wonderful,
Passing the love of women.†

(CHORUS) *How are the heroes fallen,‡
And the weapons of war § perished.*

Lyric poetry flourished during the reigns of David and Solomon, then declined with the decline of the nation, and revived for a short period with the restoration of the temple and the theocracy, when the harps were taken from the willows to accompany again the songs of Zion. It is altogether improbable that the Psalter contains hymns of the Maccabæan age, as Hitzig conjectures. The canon was closed long before (B. C. 450).||

The Magnificat of the Virgin Mary, the Benedictus of Zacharias, and the Nunc dimittis of Simeon are the golden sunset of Hebrew psalmody, and the dawn of Christian hymnody.

The various kinds of lyric poetry are designated by the following names, which occur in the titles of the Psalms:¶

Shîr (Sept. ψῆς), song for the voice alone.

Mizmôr (Sept. ψαλμός), psalm, song of praise, with instrumental accompaniment (μέλος).

Maschîl (συνέσεως, εἰς σύνεσιν), a skilfully constructed ode, a reflective, contemplative, didactic song.

Michtham (στηλογραφία, or εἰς στηλογραφίαν, lit., song of inscription), a golden poem, or a song of mysterious, deep import. (Delitzsch: catch-word poem).

Shiggaion, an excited, irregular, dithyrambic ode.

Thehillah, a hymn of praise. The plural thehillim is the Hebrew title of the Psalter.

Thephillah, a prayer in song. (Pss. xvii., lxxxvi., xc., cxlii., Hab. iii.).

Shîr jedidoth, song of loves, erotic poem (Ps. xlv.).

Shîr hamma'aloth (Sept. ψῆς τῶν ἀνάβαθμῶν, Vulg. canticum graduum, E. V. "song of degrees'), most probably a song of the goings up, i. e., pilgrim song for the journeys to the yearly festivals of Jerusalem.

* Lowth: "This passage is most exquisite composition. The women of Israel are most happily introduced, and the subject of the encomium is most admirably adapted to the female characters."

† The sweet, tender, devoted, enduring love with which women love. A picture of the ideal of friendship sanctified by the consecration of their hearts to Jehovah. The Vulgate inserts here the clause: Sicut mater unicum amat filium suum, ita ego te amabam, which has no foundation either in the Hebrew or the Septuagint.

‡ The repetition of this lament, probably by the chorus, is entirely in keeping with the nature of an elegy, which likes to dwell upon the grief, and finds relief by its repeated utterances.

§ כִּלְיֵי הַמִּלְחָמָה are the heroes themselves, as the living weapons of war. So Ewald and Erdmann (die Rüstzeuge des Streits). Comp. Isa. xlii. 5; Acts ix. 15, where St. Paul is called "a chosen vessel" (σκεῦος). It is less lively and poetic to understand it literally of the material of war, as the Vulgate does (arma bellica), and Herder who renders:

Ach, wie fielen die Helden und ihre Waffen des Krieges Liegen zerschlagen umher.

¶ Hengstenberg, Hävernick, Kell, among the orthodox divines, Gesenius, Ewald, Thenius, Dillmann, among the liberal critics, deny the possibility of Maccabæan Psalms. Ewald says (Preface to third ed. of his Com. on the Ps.) against Hitzig: "Nothing can be more false and perverse than to suppose that there can be Maccabæan poems in the Psalter." Delitzsch (Com. über den Psalter, new ed. 1867, p. 9) admits the possibility, but denies the existence of such late Psalms.

¶ For particulars on the names and musical titles in the inscriptions of the Psalms, some of which are very obscure and variously interpreted, we must refer to the commentaries of Ewald, Hitzig, Delitzsch, Moll (in Lange), and Perowne.

Kinah (ᾠδὴς), a lament, dirge, elegy.* Here belong the laments of David for Saul and Jonathan, 2 Sam. i. 19-27, for Abner (2 Sam. iii. 33, 34), and for Absalom (2 Sam. xviii. 33), the psalms of mourning over the disasters of Judah, Ps. xlix., lx., lxxiii., cxxxvii., and the Lamentations of Jeremiah.

The PSALTER is the great depository of the religious lyric poetry of the Jewish Church, and the inexhaustible fountain of devotion for all ages. The titles are not original, but contain the ancient Jewish traditions more or less valuable concerning the authorship, historical occasion, musical character, liturgical use of the Psalms. Seventy-three poems are ascribed to David (דָּוִד); † twelve to Asaph (אַסָּף), one of David's musicians (Ps. l., lxxiii.-lxxxiii.); eleven or twelve to the sons of Korah, a family of priests and singers of the age of David (Pss. xlii.-xlix., lxxxiv., lxxxv., lxxxvii., lxxxviii.); one to Heman the Ezrahite (lxxxviii.); ‡ one to Ethan the Ezrahite (lxxxix.); two to Solomon (lxxii., cxvii.); one to Moses (xc.); while fifty are anonymous and hence called Orphan Psalms in the Talmud. The Septuagint assigns some of them to Jeremiah (cxxxvii.), Haggai and Zechariah (cxlvi., cxlvii.).

The PSALTER is divided into five books, and the close of each is indicated by a doxology and a double Amen. In this division several considerations seem to have been combined—authorship and chronology, liturgical use, the distinction of the divine names (Elohistic and Jehovistic Psalms), perhaps also the five-fold division of the Torah (the Psalter being, as Delitzsch says, the subjective response or echo from the heart of Israel to the law of God). We have an analogy in Christian hymn- and tune-books, which combine the order of subjects and the order of the ecclesiastical year, modifying both by considerations of convenience, and often adding one or more appendixes. The five books represent the gradual growth of the collection till its completion after the exile, about the time of Ezra. The collection of first book, consisting chiefly of Psalms of David, may be traced to Solomon, who would naturally provide for the preservation of his father's poetry, or, at all events, to King Hezekiah, who "commanded the Levites to sing praise unto the Lord with the words of David and of Asaph, the Seer" (2 Chron. xxi. 30; Prov. xxxv. 1).

If we regard chiefly the contents, we may divide the Psalms into Psalms of praise and adoration, Psalms of thanksgiving, Psalms of faith and hope under affliction, § penitential Psalms, didactic Psalms, historic Psalms, Pilgrim Songs (cxi.-cxxxvi.), prophetic or Messianic Psalms. But we cannot enter here into details, and refer to the full and able Introduction of MOLL'S Commentary in this series.

Before we leave lyric poetry, we must say a few words on the LAMENTATIONS (קִינִיּוֹת, ᾠδῶν, elegiæ) of Jeremiah—the most extensive elegy in the Bible. They are a funeral dirge of the theocracy and the holy city after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar and the Chaldees, and give most pathetic utterance to the most intense grief. The first lines strike the key-note. Jerusalem is personified and bewailed as a solitary widow:

(ALEPH)

How sitteth solitary
The city once full of people!
She has become as a widow!
She that was great among the nations,
A princess over the provinces,
Has become subject to tribute.

* From ἐὲ λέγειν, to cry woe, woe! Comp. the German, Klaglied, Trauerlied, Todtenlied, Grablied.

† Thirty-seven in the first Book, Ps. iii.-xli., 18 in the second, 1 in the third, 2 in the fourth, 15 in the fifth Book. The Septuagint ascribes to David 85 Psalms (including xcix. and civ., which are probably his). The N. T. quotes as his also the anonymous Pss. ii. and xcv. (Acts iv. 25, 26; Hebr. iv. 7), and Ps. ii. certainly has the impress of his style and age (as Ewald admits). But some of the Psalms ascribed to him, either in the Hebrew or Greek Bible, betray by their Chaldaisms a later age. Hengstenberg and Alexander mostly follow the Jewish tradition; Delitzsch (Commentar über die Psalmen, p. 7) thinks that at least fifty may be defended as Davidic; while Hupfeld, Ewald, and especially Hitzig, considerably reduce the number. Ewald regards Ps. iii., iv., vii., viii., xi., xv., xviii., xix., xxiv., xxix., xxxii., cl., as undoubtedly Davidic; Ps. ii., xxiii., xxvii., lxii., lxiv., cx., cxxxviii., as coming very near to David.

‡ This Psalm is called shir mimor and maschil, and is ascribed both to the sons of Korah and to Heman the Ezrahite, of the age of Solomon (1 Kings v. 11). The older commentators generally regard the former as the singers of the shir, the latter as the author of the maschil. Hupfeld thinks that the title combines two conflicting traditions.

§ What the Germans would call Kreuz- und Trost-Psalmen.

(BETH)

She weepeth bitterly in the night,
And her tears are upon her cheeks:
She hath no comforter
From among all her lovers:
All her friends have turned traitors to her,
They have become her enemies.

* * * * *

(LAMED)

Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by?
Behold and see,
If there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow,
Which is inflicted on me,
Wherewith Jehovah hath afflicted me
In the day of His fierce anger.

The ruin and desolation, the carnage and famine, the pollution of the temple, the desecration of the Sabbath, the massacre of the priests, the dragging of the chiefs into exile, and all the horrors and miseries of a long siege, contrasted with the remembrance of former glories and glad festivities, and intensified by the awful sense of Divine wrath, are drawn with life-like colors and form a picture of overwhelming calamity and sadness. "Every letter is written with a tear, every word is the sob of a broken heart!" Yet Jeremiah does not forget that the covenant of Jehovah with His people still stands. In the stormy sunset of the theocracy he beheld the dawn of a brighter day, and a new covenant written, not on tables of stone, but on the heart. The utterance of his grief, like the shedding of tears, was also a relief, and left his mind in a calmer and serener frame. Beginning with wailing and weeping, he ends with a question of hope, and with the prayer:

Turn us, O Jehovah, and we shall turn;
Renew our days of old!

These Lamentations have done their work very effectually, and are doing it still. They have soothed the weary years of the Babylonian Exile, and after the return they have kept up the lively remembrance of the deepest humiliation and the judgments of a righteous God. On the ninth day of the month of Ab (July) they are read year after year with fasting and weeping by that remarkable people who are still wandering in exile over the face of the earth, finding a grave in many lands, a home in none. Among Christians the poem is best appreciated in times of private affliction and public calamity; a companion in mourning, it serves also as a book of comfort and consolation.

The poetic structure of the Lamentations is the most artificial in the Bible. The first four chapters are alphabetically arranged, like the 119th and six other Psalms, and Proverbs xxxi. 10-31. Every stanza begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in regular order; all the stanzas are nearly of the same length; each stanza has three nearly balanced clauses or members which together constitute one meaning; chaps. i., ii. and iv. contain twenty-two stanzas each, according to the number of Hebrew letters; the third chapter has three alphabetic series, making sixty-six stanzas in all. Dante chose the terza rima for his vision of hell, purgatory, and paradise; Petrarca the complicated sonnet for the tender and passionate language of love. The author of Lamentations may have chosen this structure as a discipline and check upon the intensity of his sorrow—perhaps also as a help to the memory. Poems of this kind, once learnt, are not easily forgotten.*

§ 8. DIDACTIC POETRY.

Didactic poetry is the combined product of imagination and reflection. It seeks to instruct as well as to please. It is not simply the outpouring of subjective feeling which carries in it its own end and reward, but aims at an object beyond itself. It is the connecting link between pure poetry and philosophy. It supplies among the Shemitic nations the place of ethics, with this difference, that it omits the reasoning and argumentative process, and gives only the results of observation and reflection in a pleasing, mostly proverbial, sententious style, which sticks to the memory. It is laid down in the Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. Many Psalms also are didactic (i., xix., xxxvii., cxix., etc.), and the Book of Job is a didactic drama (see below).

* "In the scatterings and wanderings of families," says Isaac Taylor (p. 375), "and in lonely journeyings, in deserts and cities, where no synagogue-service could be enjoyed, the metrical Scriptures—infixed as they were in the memory, by the very means of these artificial devices of versets and of alphabetic order, and of alliteration—became food to the soul. Thus was the religious constancy of the people and its brave endurance of injury and insult sustained and animated."

The palmy period of didactic or gnostic poetry is the peaceful and brilliant reign of Solomon, which lasted forty years (B. C. 1015-975). He was a favorite child of nature and grace. He occupies the same relation to the Proverbs as David to the Psalter, being the chief author and model for imitation. He was the philosopher, as David was the singer, of Israel. The fame of his wisdom was so great that no less than three thousand proverbs were ascribed to him. "God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand that is on the sea-shore. And Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the wisdom of Egypt. For he was wiser than all men; than Ethan the Ezrahite, and Heman, and Chalcol, and Darda, the sons of Mahol: and his fame was in all nations round about. And he spake three thousand proverbs: and his songs were a thousand and five. And he spake of trees, from the cedar tree that is in Lebanon even unto the hyssop that springeth out of the wall: he spake also of beasts, and of fowl, and of creeping things, and of fishes. And there came of all people to hear the wisdom of Solomon, from all kings of the earth, which had heard of his wisdom" (1 Kings iv. 29-34). According to a rabbinical tradition, Aristotle derived his philosophy from the Solomonian writings which Alexander the Great sent him from Jerusalem.*

The usual word for a didactic poem is māshāl (מָשָׁל, παροιμία, παραβολή), a likeness, similitude, comparison; then, in a wider sense, a short, sharp, pithy maxim, sententious saying, gnome, proverb couched in figurative, striking, pointed language. A proverb contains multum in parvo, and condenses the result of long observation and experience in a few words which strike the nail on the head and are easily remembered. It is the philosophy for the people, the wisdom of the street. The Orientals, especially the Arabs, are very fond of this kind of teaching. It suited their wants and limits of knowledge much better than an elaborate system of philosophy. And even now a witty or pithy proverb has more practical effect upon the common people than whole sermons and tracts.†

THE PROVERBS of the Bible are far superior to any collection of the kind, such as the sayings of the Seven Wise Men of Greece, the Aurea Carmina attributed to Pythagoras, the Remains of the Poetæ Gnomici, the collections of Arabic proverbs. They bear the stamp of divine inspiration. They abound in polished and sparkling gems. They contain the practical wisdom (chokma) of Israel, and have furnished the richest contributions to the dictionary of proverbs among Christian nations. They trace wisdom to its true source, the fear of Jehovah (chap. i. 7). Nothing can be finer than the description of Wisdom in the eighth chapter, where she is personified as the eternal companion and delight of God, and commended beyond all earthly treasures:

Wisdom is better than rubies,
And no precious things compare with her.

I, wisdom, dwell with prudence,
And find out knowledge of wise counsels.

The fear of Jehovah is to hate evil;
Pride, haughtiness, and an evil way,
And a perverse mouth, do I hate.

Counsel is mine, and reflection;
I am understanding; I have strength.

* Comp. on the wisdom of Solomon, Ewald's Geschichte des Volkes Israel, Vol. III. pp. 374 sqq.; and Stanley's Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, Vol. II. pp. 252 sqq. Ewald exclaims with reference to the visit of the Queen of Sheba (p. 379): "O glückliche Zeit wo mächtige Fürsten mitten in ihren von heiliger Gottesruhe unfriedigten Ländern so zu einander wallfahrten, so in Weisheit und was noch mehr ist, im regen Suchen derselben vortrefflichen können!"

† Cicero says: "Gravissime sunt ad beate vivendum breviter enunciata sententiae."

By me kings reign,
And princes decree justice.
By me princes rule,
And nobles, all the judges of the earth.

I love them that love me;
And they that seek me early shall find me.
Riches and honor are with me.
Yea, enduring riches and righteousness.
My fruit is better than gold, yea, than refined gold;
And my increase than choice silver.

I walk in the way of righteousness,
In the midst of the path of rectitude;
To make, ensure abundance to those that love me,
And to fill their storehouse.

* * * * *

Blessed is the man that heareth me,
Watching daily at my gates,
Waiting at the posts of my doors!
For whosoever findeth me findeth life;
And shall obtain favor from Jehovah.

The description of the model Hebrew woman in her domestic and social relations (chap. xxxi. 10-31, in the acrostic form) has no parallel for truthfulness and beauty in all ancient literature, and forms the appropriate close of this book of practical wisdom; for from the family of which woman is the presiding genius, springs private and public virtue and national prosperity.

"The Book of Proverbs," says a distinguished modern writer, "is not on a level with the Prophets or the Psalms. It approaches human things and things divine from quite another side. It has even something of a worldly, prudential look, unlike the rest of the Bible. But this is the very reason why its recognition as a Sacred Book is so useful. It is the philosophy of practical life. It is the sign to us that the Bible does not despise common sense and discretion. It impresses upon us, in the most forcible manner, the value of intelligence and prudence, and of a good education. The whole strength of the Hebrew language, and of the sacred authority of the book is thrown upon these homely truths. It deals, too, in that refined, discriminating, careful view of the finer shades of human character, so often overlooked by theologians, but so necessary to any true estimate of human life. 'The heart knoweth its own bitterness, and the stranger does not intermeddle with its joy.' How much is there, in that single sentence, of consolation, of love, of forethought! And, above all, it insists, over and over again, upon the doctrine that goodness is 'wisdom,' and that wickedness and vice are 'folly.' There may be many other views of virtue and vice, of holiness and sin, better and higher than this. But there will always be some in the world who will need to remember that a good man is not only religious and just, but wise; and that a bad man is not only wicked and sinful, but a miserable, contemptible fool!"*

The poetic structure of the Proverbs is that of Hebrew parallelism in its various forms. They consist of single, double, triple, or more couplets; the members corresponding to each other in sense and diction, either synonymously or antithetically. Delitzsch calls them two-liners, four-liners, six-liners, eight-liners.† The first section, x.-xxii. 16, contains exclusively two-liners. Besides these there are a few three-liners, five-liners and seven-liners, where the odd line is either a repetition or a reason for the idea expressed in the first lines. A few specimens will make this clear.

* Stanley, Vol. II., p. 269. A different view is presented and elaborately defended in the commentary of Rev. John Miller, of Princeton (New York, 1872), who maintains that the Proverbs, being an inspired book, can have no secular, but must have throughout a spiritual, meaning. He charges King James' version with making the book "hopelessly secular in many places" (p. 12).

† Zuckeaieler, Vierzeiler, Sechzeiler, Achzeiler. Commentary on Proverbs, Leipz., 1873, pp. 8 sqq.

1. Single synonymous couplets:

- CHAP. III. 1. My son, forget not my law;
And let thy heart keep my commandments.
12. Whom Jehovah loveth He correcteth:
Even as a father the son in whom he delighteth.
13. Blessed the man who finds wisdom:
And the man who obtains understanding.
- XI. 25. The liberal soul shall be made fat:
And he that watereth shall himself be watered.
- [XVI. 32. He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty:
And he that ruleth his own spirit than he who taketh a city.

2. Single antithetic couplets:

- CHAP. X. 1. A wise son maketh a glad father:
But a foolish son is the grief of his mother.
12. Hatred stirreth up strifes:
But love covereth all sins.
16. The wages of the righteous is life:
The gain of the wicked is sin.
- XIII. 9. The light of the righteous shall be joyous:
But the lamp of the wicked shall go out.
25. He that spareth his rod hates his son:
But he that loveth him giveth him timely chastisement.
- XVIII. 17. He that is first in his own cause seemeth right:
But his neighbor cometh and searcheth him.

3. Single couplets which merely express a comparison:

- CHAP. XXVII. 8. As a bird that wandereth from her nest,
So is a man that wandereth from his place.
15. A continual dropping in a very rainy day,
And a contentious woman are alike.
19. As in water face answereth to face,
So the heart of man to man.

4. Single couplets where the second member completes the idea of the first or assigns a reason or a qualification:

- CHAP. XVI. 24. Pleasant words are as a honey-comb,
Sweet to the soul and health to the bones.
31. The hoary head is a crown of glory,
If it be found in the way of righteousness.

5. Three-liners:

- CHAP. III. 3. Let not mercy and truth forsake thee:
Bind them about thy neck;
(Synonymous) Write them upon the table of thine heart.
- XXVIII. 10. Whoso causeth the righteous to go astray in an evil way:
He shall fall himself into his own pit, (Antithetic) But the upright shall inherit good things.
- XXVII. 10. Thine own friend, and thy father's friend forsake not:
Neither go into thy brother's in the day of thy calamity;
(Reason) For better is a neighbor near than a brother afar off.

6. Double couplets or four-liners: xxiii. 15 sq.; xxiv. 3 sq., 28 sq.; xxx. 5 sq., 17 sq.; xxii. 22 sq., 24 sq.; xxv. 4 sq. These are all synonymous, or synthetic, or corroboratory, but there seems to be no example of an antithetic four-liner.

7. Five-liners; the last three usually explaining and confirming the idea of the first two lines: xxiii. 4 sq.; xxv. 6 sq.; xxx. 32 sq.

8. Triple couplets or six-liners, which spin out an idea with more or less repetition or confirmations and illustrations: xxiii. 1-3, 12-14, 19-21; xxiv. 11 sq.; xxx. 29-31.

9. Seven-liners: xxiii. 6-8. The only specimen in the Proverbs.

10. Quadruple couplets or eight-liners: xxiii. 22-25.

But these four, six, and eight-liners, so-called, may be easily resolved into two, three, or four single couplets. Take, e. g., chap. xxiii. 12-14, which Delitzsch quotes as a six-liner, and we have there simply three couplets which carry out and unfold one idea, or expand the masnal sentence into a masnal poem:

Apply thy heart to instruction:
And thine ears to the words of knowledge.
Withhold not correction from the child:
For if thou beatest him with a rod, he shall not die.
Thou shalt beat him with the rod,
And shalt deliver his soul from hell.

ECCLESIASTES or KOHELETH is a philosophic poem, not in broken, disconnected maxims of wisdom, like the Proverbs, but in a series of soliloquies of a soul perplexed and bewildered by doubt, yet holding fast to fundamental truth, and looking from the vanities beneath the sun to the eternal realities above the sun. It is a most remarkable specimen of Hebrew scepticism subdued and moderated by Hebrew faith in God and His holy commandments, in the immortality of the soul, the judgment to come, the paramount value of true piety. It corresponds to the old age of Solomon, as the Song of Songs reflects the flowery spring of his youth, and the Proverbs the ripe wisdom of his manhood.* Whether written by the great monarch or not (which question is fully discussed on both sides in this Commentary), it personates him (i. 12) and gives the last sad results of his experience after a long life of unrivalled wisdom and unrivalled folly, namely, the overwhelming impression of the vanity of all things earthly, with the concluding lesson of the fear of God, which checks the tendency to despair, and is the star of hope in the darkness of midnight. The key-note is struck in the opening lines, repeated at the close (xii. 3):

O vanity of vanities! Koheleth saith;
O vanity of vanities! all—vanity!

This is the negative side. But the leading positive idea and aim is expressed in the concluding words:

Fear God and keep His commandments,
For this is all of man.

Some regard Koheleth as an ethical treatise in prose, with regular logical divisions. But it is full of poetic inspiration, and in part at least also poetic in form, with enough of rhythmical parallelism to awaken an emotional interest in these sad soliloquies and questionings of the poet. Prof. Tayler Lewis (in his additions to Zöckler's Commentary) has translated the poetic portions in Iambic measure, with occasional use of the Choriambus. We transcribe two specimens from chap. vii. and chap. xi.:

Better the honored name than precious oil;
Better the day of death than that of being born.

* This comparison was made by Rabbi Jonathan on the assumption of the Solomonic authorship of the three works.

Better to visit sorrow's house than seek the banquet hall;
 Since that (reveals) the end of every man,
 And he who lives should lay it well to heart.

Better is grief than mirth;

For in the sadness of the face the heart becometh fair.
 The wise man's heart is in the house of mourning.

The fool's heart in the house of mirth.

Better to heed the chiding of the wise

Than hear the song of fools.

For like the sound of thorns beneath the pot,

So is the railing laughter of the fool.

This, too, is vanity.

* * * * *

Rejoice, O youth, in childhood; let thy heart

Still cheer thee in the day when thou art strong.

Go on in every way thy will shall choose,

And after every form thine eyes behold;

But know that for all this thy God will thee to judgment bring.

O, then, turn sorrow from thy soul, keep evil from thy flesh;

For childhood and the morn of life, they, too, are vanity.

Remember thy Creator, then, in the days when thou art young;

Before the evil days are come, before the years draw nigh;

When thou shalt say—delight in them is gone.

To didactic poetry belong also the FABLE and the PARABLE. Both are allegories in the style of history; both are conscious fictions for the purpose of instruction, and differ from the MYTH, which is the unconscious product of the religious imagination. But the fable rests on admitted impossibilities and introduces irrational creatures to teach maxims of secular prudence and lower, selfish morality; while the parable takes its illustrations from real life, human or animal, with its natural characteristics, and has a much higher moral and religious aim. It is, therefore, far better adapted, as a medium of instruction, to the true religion. "The fable seizes on that which man has in common with the creatures below him; the parable rests on the truth that man is made in the image of God." The former is only fitted for the instruction of youth, which does not raise the question of veracity; the latter is suited to all ages.

There are no fables in the New Testament, and only two in the Old, viz., the fable of Jotham: the trees choosing their king, Judges ix. 8-15, and the fable of Jehoshaphat: the cedars of Lebanon and the thistle, 2 Kings xiv. 9, and 2 Chr. xxv. 18. The riddle (parable) of Ezekiel xvii. 1-10 introduces two eagles as representatives of human characters, but without ascribing to them human attributes.

The parable occurs 2 Sam. xii. 1 (the poor man's ewe lamb), Isa. v. 1 (the vineyard yielding wild grapes), also 1 Kings xx. 39; xxii. 19. It was cultivated by Hillel, Shammai and other Jewish rabbis, and appears frequently in the Gemara and Midrash. It is found in its perfection in the Gospels. The parables of our Lord illustrate the various aspects of the kingdom of heaven (as those in the Synoptical Gospels), or the personal relation of Christ to His disciples (as the parable of the good shepherd, and that of the vine and the branches, in the Gospel of John). They conceal and reveal the profoundest ideas in the simplest and most lucid language. They are at once pure truth and pure poetry. Every trait is intrinsically possible and borrowed from nature and human life, and yet the composition of the whole is the product of the imagination. The art of illustrative teaching in parables never rose so high before or since, nor can it ever rise higher.*

§9. PROPHETIC POETRY.

This is peculiar to the Bible and to the religion of revelation. Heathen nations had their divinations and oracles, but no divinely inspired prophecy. Man may have forebodings of the future, and may conjecture what may come to pass under certain conditions; but God only knows the future, and he to whom He chooses to reveal it.

Prophecy is closely allied to poetry. The prophet sees the future as a picture with the spiritual eye enlightened by the Divine mind, and describes it mostly in more or less poetic form. Prophetic poetry combines a didactic and an epic element.* It rouses the conscience, enforces the law of God, and holds up the history of the future, the approaching judgments and mercies of God for instruction, reproof, comfort and encouragement. Prophecy is too elevated to descend to ordinary prose, and yet too practical to bind itself to strict rules. Ezekiel and Daniel, like St. John in the Apocalypse, use prose, but a prose that has all the effect of poetry. The other prophets employ prose in the narrative and introductory sections, but a rhythmical flow of diction in the prophecies proper, with divisions of clauses and stanzas, and rise often to the highest majesty and power. The sublime prayer of Habakkuk (ch. iii.) is a lyric poem and might as well have a place in the Psalter.

The greatest poet among the prophets is Isaiah. He gathers up all the past prophecies to send them enriched into the future, and combines the deepest prophetic inspiration with the sublimest and sweetest poetry.†

The earliest specimens of prophetic poetry are the prediction of Noah, Gen. ix. 25-27, the blessing of Jacob, Gen. xlix., the prophecies of Balaam, Numb. xxiv., and the farewell blessing of the twelve tribes by Moses, Deut. xxxiii. The golden age of prophetic poetry began with the decline of lyric poetry, and continued till the extinction of prophecy, warning the people of the approaching judgments of Jehovah, and comforting them in the midst of their calamities with His promise of a brighter future when the Messiah shall come to redeem His people and to bless all the nations of the earth.

We select one of the oldest specimens, a part of the remarkable prophecy of Balaam concerning Israel, which has a melodious lyrical flow (Num. xxiv. 4-10, 17-19):

He saith who heareth the words of God,
Who seeth the vision of the A mighty,
Falling down, and having his eyes opened:

How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob,
Thy tabernacles, O Israel!
As the valleys are they spread forth,
As gardens by the river side,
As lign aloes which the Lord hath planted,
As cedar trees beside the waters.

He shall flow with water from his buckets,
And his seed shall be in many waters,
And his king shall be higher than Agag,
And his kingdom shall be exalted.
God bringeth him forth out of Egypt;
He hath as it were the strength of a buffalo:
He shall eat up the nations his enemies,
And shall break their bones in pieces,
And smite them through with his arrows.

He couched, he lay down as a lion,
And as a lioness; who shall stir him up?
Blessed is he that blesseth thee,
And cursed is he that curseth thee.

* * * * *

* Ewald treats prophecy as a part of didactic poetry. "Ein reiner Dichter," he says (p. 51), "im ursprünglichsten Sinne des Wortes ist der Prophet nicht: was er ausspricht, soll von vorne an bestimmend, vorschreibend, belehrend auf Andere wirken. Aber sein Wort will von der Begeisterung Flügeln getragen von oben herab treffen, und muss so von vorn an erhaben in gleicher Höhe sich bis zum Ende halten. . . . So drängt sich denn dem Propheten die längst gegebene Dichterweise unwillkürlich auf, ähnlich hebt und senkt sich bei ihm der Strom der Rede, nur der Gesang fällt vor der ungewöhnlichen Höhe und dem Ernste seiner Worte leicht von selbst weg."

† Comp. the eloquent description of Isaiah by Ewald in his Die Propheten des Alten Bundes, Stuttgart, 1840, vol. I., p. 166.

There shall come forth a Star out of Jacob,
 And a Sceptre shall rise out of Israel
 And shall smite through the corners of Moab,
 And break down all the sons of tumult.
 And Edom shall be a possession,
 And Seir shall be a possession, his enemies;
 While Israel doeth valiantly.
 And out of Jacob shall he have dominion,
 And shall destroy the remnant from the city.

The nearest approach which the prophecy of the Old Testament several hundred years before Christ made to the very heart of the gospel salvation, is in the fifty-third chapter of Isaiah :

Who hath believed our report?
 And to whom is the arm of the Lord revealed?
 For He shall grow up before Him as a tender plant,
 And as a root out of a dry ground:
 He hath no form nor comeliness; and when we shall see Him,
There is no beauty that we should desire Him.
 He is despised and rejected by men;
 A Man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief:
 And we hid as it were our faces from Him,
 He was despised and we esteemed Him not.

Surely He hath borne our griefs,
 And carried our sorrows:
 Yet we did esteem Him stricken,
 Smitten of God and afflicted.
 But He was wounded for our transgressions,
 He was bruised for our iniquities.
 The chastisement of our peace was upon Him;
 And with His stripes we are healed.
 All we like sheep have gone astray;
 We have turned every one to his own way;
 And the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all.

He was oppressed, and He was afflicted,
 Yet He opened not His mouth:
 He is brought as a Lamb to the slaughter,
 And as a sheep before her shearers is dumb,
 So He opened not His mouth.
 He was taken from prison and from judgment:
 And who shall declare His generation?
 For He was cut off out of the land of the living:
 For the transgression of my people was He stricken.
 And He made His grave with the wicked,
 And with the rich in His death;
 Because He had done no violence,
 Neither was any deceit in His mouth:
 Yet it pleased the Lord to bruise Him;
 He hath put Him to grief.

When Thou shalt make His soul an offering for sin,
 He shall see His seed, He shall prolong His days,
 And the pleasure of the Lord shall prosper in His hand.
 He shall see the travail of His soul, and be satisfied.
 By His knowledge shall my righteous servant justify many;
 For He shall bear their iniquities.
 Therefore will I divide Him, a portion with the great,
 And He shall divide the spoil with the strong;
 Because He hath poured out His soul unto death:
 And He was numbered with the transgressors;
 And He bore the sin of many,
 And made intercession for the transgressors.

§ 10. DRAMATIC POETRY.

If we start with the Greek conception of the drama, there is none in the Bible. But if we take the word in a wider sense, and apply it to lengthy poetic compositions, unfolding an action and introducing a number of speakers or actors, we have two dramas in the Old Testament. The Song of Solomon is a lyric drama or melo-drama; the Book of Job, a didactic drama.

The best judges of different ages and churches, as Gregory of Nazianzen, Bossuet, Lowth, Ewald, Renan, Stanley, recognize the dramatic element in these two poems, and some have even gone so far as to suppose that both, or at least the Canticles, were really intended for the stage.* But there is not the slightest trace of a theatre in the history of Israel before the age of Herod, who introduced foreign customs; as there is none at the present day in the Holy Land, and scarcely among the Mohammedan Arabs, unless we regard the single reciters of romances (always men or boys) with their changing voice and gestures as dramatic actors. The modern attempts to introduce theatres in Beirut and Algeria have signally failed.

1. The CANTICLES presents the Hebrew ideal of pure bridal and conjugal love in a series of monologues and dialogues by different persons: a lover, king Solomon (Shelomoh, the Peaceful), a maiden named Shulamith, and a chorus of virgins, daughters of Jerusalem. There are no breaks or titles to indicate the change of scene or speakers, and they can be recognized only from the sense and the change of gender and number in the personal pronoun. The English version is much obscured by a neglect of the distinction of feminine and masculine pronouns in the Hebrew.

The poem is full of the fragrance of spring, the beauty of flowers, and the loveliness of love. How sweet and charming is Solomon's description of spring, ch. ii. 10-14, which a German poet calls "a kiss of heaven to earth."

Rise up, my love, my fair one, and go forth !
For, lo, the winter is past,
The rain is over, is gone.
The flowers appear on the earth,
The time for the singing of birds is come,
And the voice of the turtle is heard in our land.
The fig-tree spices its green figs,
And the vines with tender blossoms give fragrance.
Arise, my love, my fair one, and go forth !
My dove, in the clefts of the rock,
In the recess of the cliffs,
Let me see thy countenance,
Let me hear thy voice;
For thy voice is sweet,
And thy countenance is comely.

The Song of Solomon canonizes the love of nature, and the love of sex, as the Book of Esther (where the name of God never occurs) canonizes patriotism or the love of country. It gives a place in the Book of God to the noblest and strongest passion which the Creator has planted in man, before the fall, and which reflects His own infinite love to His creatures, and the love of Christ to His Church. Procul abeste profani! The very depth of perversion to which the passion of love can be degraded, only reveals the height of its origin and destiny. Love in its primal purity is a "blaze" or "lightning flash from Jehovah" (Shalhebeth-Jah, ch. viii. 6), and stronger than death, and as it proceeds from God so it returns to Him; for "God is love; and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him" (1 John iv. 16).†

* Ewald (Die Dichter des A. B., I. 72 sqq.) asserts very positively, but without proof, that dramas were enacted on the great festivals, and at the courts of David and Solomon. He calls the Canticles "the purest model of a comedy (Lustspiel)"; Job, "a genuine tragedy (Trauerspiel)."† He admits, however, that in no case could God (who is one of the actors in Job) have been introduced on a Jewish stage, like the gods in the Greek dramas. Renan (Le Cantique des Cantiques) denies the existence of public theatres among the Hebrews, owing to the absence of a complicated mythology which stimulated the development of the drama among the Hindoos and Greeks, but maintains that the Song of Songs, being a dramatic poem, must have been represented in private families at marriage feasts.

† That most pure and godly German hymnist Tersteegen, in his sweet hymn: "Ich bete an die Macht der Liebe," traces all true love to Christ as the fountain-head, in these beautiful lines:

*Ehr' sei dem hohen Jesusnamen,
In dem der Liebe Quell entspringt,
Von dem hier alle Büchlein kumen,
Aus dem der Sel'gen Schaar dort trinkt.*

As to the artistic arrangement or the number of acts and cantos in each act of this melo-drama of Love there is considerable difference among commentators. Some divide it into five acts, according to the usual arrangement of dramas (Ewald, Böttcher, Zöckler, Moody Stuart, Davidson, Ginsburg), some into six (Delitzsch, Hahn), some into seven, corresponding to the seven days of the Jewish marriage festival for which the successive portions of the poem are supposed to have been intended to be sung (Bossuet, Percy, Williams). Ewald subdivides the five acts into thirteen, Renan into sixteen, others into more or less cantos. On the other hand Thrupp and Green give up the idea of a formal artistic construction, such as the Indo-European conception of a drama would require, and substitute for it a looser method of arrangement or aggregation with abrupt transitions and sudden changes of scene. All the parts are variations of the same theme, "the love of king Solomon and his bride, the image of a divine and spiritual love." Those who regard the poem as an idyl rather than a drama (Sir William Jones, Good, Fry, Noyes, Herbst, Heiligstedt) divide it into a series of songs, but likewise differ as to the number and the pauses.

This is not the place to enter into the wilderness of interpretations of this wonderful and much abused Song, which are fully discussed in this Commentary by Drs. Zöckler and Green. But I must protest against the profane, or exclusively erotic interpretation which in various contradictory shapes has of late become so fashionable among scholars, and which makes the position of this book in the canon an inexplicable enigma. I add the judicious remarks of Dr. Angus on the subject.* "Much of the language of this poem has been misunderstood by early expositors. Some have erred by adopting a fanciful method of explanation, and attempting to give a mystical meaning to every minute circumstance of the allegory. In all figurative representations there is always much that is mere costume. It is the general truth only that is to be examined and explained. Others, not understanding the spirit and luxuriance of eastern poetry, have considered particular passages as defective in delicacy, an impression which the English version has needlessly confirmed, and so have objected to the whole, though the objection does not apply with greater force to this book than to Hesiod and Homer, or even to some of the purest of our own authors. If it be remembered, that the figure employed in this allegory is one of the most frequent in Scripture, that in extant oriental poems it is constantly employed to express religious feeling, that many expressions which are applied in our translation to the person, belong properly to the dress, that every generation has its own notions of delicacy (the most delicate in this sense being by no means the most virtuous), that nothing is described but chaste affection, that Shulamith speaks and is spoken of collectively, and that it is the general truth only which is to be allegorized, the whole will appear to be no unfit representation of the union between Christ and true believers in every age. Properly understood, this portion of Scripture will minister to our holiness. It may be added, however, that it was the practice of the Jews to withhold the book from their children till their judgments were matured." The most recent commentator, too, justly remarks:† "Shall we then regard it as a mere fancy, which for so many ages past has been wont to find in the pictures and melodies of the Song of Songs types and echoes of the actings and emotions of the highest Love, of Love Divine, in its relations to Humanity; which, if dimly discerned through their aid by the Synagogue, have been amply revealed in the gospel to the Church? Shall we not still claim to trace in the noble and gentle history thus presented foreshadowings of the infinite condescensions of Incarnate Love?—that Love which, first stooping in human form to visit us in our low estate in order to seek out and win its object (Ps. cxxxvi. 23), and then raising along with itself a sanctified Humanity to the Heavenly Places (Eph. ii. 6), is finally awaiting there an invitation from the mystic Bride, to return to earth once more and seal the union for eternity (Rev. xxii. 17)?"

2. The Book of JOB is a didactic drama, with an epic introduction and close. The prologue (chs. i. and ii.) and the epilogue (ch. xlii. 7-17) are written in plain prose, the body of the poem in poetry. It has been called the Hebrew tragedy, but differing from other tragedies by its happy termination. We better call it a dramatic theodicy. It wrestles with the perplexing problem of ages, viz., the true meaning and object of evil and suffering in the world under the government of a holy, wise and merciful God. The dramatic form shows itself in the symmetrical arrangement, the introduction of several speakers, the action, or rather the suffering of the hero, the growing passion and conflict, the secret crime supposed to underlie his misfortune, and the awful mystery in the background. But there is little external action (δράμα) in it, and this is almost confined to the prologue and epilogue. Instead of it we have here an intellectual battle of the deepest moral import, mind grappling with mind on the most serious problems which can challenge our attention. The outward drapery only is dramatic, the soul and substance of the poem is didactic, with all the Hebrew ideas of Divine Providence, which differ from the Greek notion of blind Fate as the light of day differs from midnight. It is intended for the study, not for the stage.*

The book opens, like a Greek drama, with a prologue, which introduces the reader into the situation, and makes him acquainted with the character, the prosperous condition, the terrible misfortunes, and the exemplary patience of the hero. Even God, and His great antagonist, Satan, who appears, however, in heaven as a servant of God, are drawn into the scenery, and a previous arrangement in the Divine counsel precedes and determines the subsequent transaction. History on earth is thus viewed as an execution of the decrees of heaven, and as controlled throughout by supernatural forces. But we have here the unsearchable wisdom of the Almighty Maker and Ruler of men, not the dark impersonal Fate of the heathen tragedy. This grand feature of Job has been admirably imitated by Göthe in the prologue of his Faust.

The action itself commences after seven days and seven nights of most eloquent silence. The grief over the misfortunes which, like a succession of whirlwinds, had suddenly hurled the patriarchal prince from the summit of prosperity to the lowest depths of misery, culminating in the most loathsome disease, and intensified by the heartless sneers of his wife, at last bursts forth in a passionate monologue of Job, cursing the day of his birth. Then follows the metaphysical conflict with his friends, Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar, who now turn to enemies, and "miserable comforters," "forgers of lies, and botchers of vanities." The debate has three acts, with an increasing entanglement, and every act consists of three assaults of the false friends, and as many defences of Job (with the exception that in the third and last battle Zophar retires and Job alone speaks).† The poem reaches its height in the triumphant assertion of faith in his Redeemer (ch. xix. 25-27), by which "the patriarch of Uz rises to a level with the patriarch of Ur as a pattern of faith."‡ After a closing monologue of Job, expressing fully his feelings and thoughts in view of the past controversy, the youthful Elihu, who had silently listened, comes forward, and in three speeches administered deserved rebuke to both parties, with as little mercy for Job as for his friends, but with a better philosophy of suffering, whose object he represents to be correction and reformation, the reproof of arrogance and the exercise of humility and faith. He begins the disentanglement of the problem and makes the transition to the final decision. At last God Himself, to whom Job had appealed, appears as the Judge of the controversy, and Job humbly submits to His infinite power and wisdom, and penitently confesses his sin and folly. This is the internal solution of the mighty problem, if solution it can be called.

A brief epilogue relates the historical issue, the restoration and increased prosperity of Job after this severest trial of his faith, and patient submission to God.

To the external order corresponds the internal dialectic development in the warlike motion of conflicting sentiments and growing passions. The first act of the debate shows yet a

* W. A. Wright (in W. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, III. 2553) says of the Book of Job: "Inasmuch as it represents an action and a progress, it is a drama as truly and really as any poem can be which develops the working of passion and the alternations of faith, hope, distrust, triumphant confidence, and black despair, in the struggle which it depicts the human mind as engaged in, while attempting to solve one of the most intricate problems it can be called upon to regard. It is a drama as life is a drama, the most powerful of all tragedies; but that it is a dramatic poem intended to be represented upon the stage, or capable of being so represented, may be confidently denied."

‡ See a fine exposition of this passage in Dr. Green's Argument of the Book of Job Unfolded, New York, 1874, pp. 181 seqq.

tolerable amount of friendly feeling on both sides. In the second the passion is much increased, and the charges of the opponents against Job made severer. In the last debate Eliphaz, the leader of the rest, proceeds to the open accusation of heavy crimes against the sufferer with an admonition to repent and to convert himself to God. Job, after repeated declarations of his innocence and vain attempts at convincing his opponents, appeals at last to God as his Judge. God appears, convinces him, by several questions on the mysteries of nature, of his ignorance, and brings him to complete submission under the infinite power and wisdom of the Almighty, chap. xlii. 2-6.

I know that Thou canst do all things;
And no thought can be withheld from Thee.
Who is this that hideth counsel without knowledge?
I have then uttered what I understand not.
But hear me now, and let me speak;
Thee will I ask, and do Thou teach me.
I have heard of Thee by the hearing of the ear;
But now mine eyes behold Thee.
Therefore I abhor it (I recant),*
And repent in dust and ashes.

The Book of Job, considering its antiquity and artistic perfection, rises like a pyramid in the history of literature, without a predecessor and without a rival.

§ 11. POETIC DICTION.

The language of Hebrew as well as of all other poetry, is, in one respect, more free, in other respects more bound, than the language of prose. It is the language of imagination and feeling, as distinct from the language of sober reflection and judgment. It is controlled by the idea of beauty and harmony. It is the speech of the Sabbath-day. It soars above what is ordinary and common. It is vivid, copious, elevated, sonorous, striking, impressive. To this end the poet has more license than the prose-writer; while, on the other hand, it imposes on him certain restraints of versification to secure greater æsthetic effect. He is permitted to use words which are uncommon or obsolete, but which, for this very reason, strike the attention and excite the emotion. He may also use ordinary words in an extraordinary sense. The licenses of the Hebrew poets are found in the following particulars:

1. Archaic forms and peculiar words, some of Aramaic or even a prior Shemitic dialect: Eloah for Elohim (God), enosh for adam (man), orach for derech (path), havah for haiah (to be), millah for dabar (word), paal for asah (to do), katal for razah (to kill). Sometimes they are accumulated for poetic effect.†

2. Common words in an uncommon sense: Joseph for the nation of Israel; adjectives for substantive objects, as 'the hot' for the sun, 'the white' for the moon (Cant. vi. 10), 'the strong' for a bull (Ps. l. 13), 'the flowing' for streams (Isa. xlv. 3).

3. Peculiar grammatical forms, or additional syllables, which give the word more sound and harmony, or an air of antiquity; as the paragogic ah (ה) affixed to nouns in the absolute state, o (ו-) and i (י-) affixed to nouns in the construct state; the feminine termination ath (for the ordinary ah); the plural ending in and ai (for im); the verbal suffixes mo, amo, and emo; the pronominal suffixes to nouns and prepositions—amo (for am), and ehu (for an); also lengthened vowel forms of pronouns and prepositions—lamo (for lo or lahem), lemo (for ל), bemo (for ב), kemo (for כ), eleh (for אל), adai (for עד).

* אֲבִיָּאִים (from נֹאֵם to reject, to despise, to abhor), without the pronominal object, which is either the person of Job (Sept. ἐμάντῳ; Vulg. me; E. V., myself; Luther, mich), or his argument, his foolish wisdom (Aben Ezra: quicquid antea in te sum temere loquutus et imperite). Ewald translates indefinitely: Drum widerrufe ich und übe Reue; Similarly Zöckler: Darum widerrufe ich und thue Busse.

† So in the highly poetic Ps. viii. 8 we have sonch (sheep) for the prosaic צֶמֶח, alaphim (oxen) for בָּקָר, adai (field) for שָׂדֵה, and bahamoth sqdai (beasts of the field) instead of חַיֵּי הָאָרֶץ.

§ 12. VERSIFICATION. PARALLELISM OF MEMBERS.

Hebrew poetry has a certain rhythmical flow, a rise and fall (arsis and thesis), versicular and strophic divisions, also occasional alliterations and rhymes, and especially a correspondence of clauses called parallelism, but no regular system of versification, as we understand it. It is not fettered by mechanical and uniform laws, it does not rest on quantity or syllabic measure, there is no equal number of syllables in each line or verse, nor of lines in each stanza or strophe. It is a poetry of sense rather than sound, and the thought is lord over the outward form. It differs in this respect from classical, modern, and also from later Hebrew poetry.*

This freedom and elasticity of Hebrew poetry gives it, for purposes of translation, a great advantage above ancient and modern poetry, and subverts the universal mission of the Bible, as the book of faith and spiritual life for all nations and in all languages. A more artificial and symmetrical structure would make a translation a most difficult task, and either render it dull and prosy, by a faithful adherence to the sense, or too free and loose, by an imitation of the artistic form. Besides it would introduce confusion among the translations of different Christian nations. The Iliad of Homer, the Odes of Horace, Dante's Divina Comedia, Petrarca's Sonnets, Milton's Paradise Lost, Göthe's Faust, could not be translated in prose without losing their poetic charm, yea, their very soul. They must be freely reproduced in poetic form, and this can only be done by a poetic genius, and with more or less departure from the original. But the Psalms, the Book of Job, and Isaiah can be transferred by a good and devout scholar, in form as well as in substance, into any language, without sacrificing their beauty, sublimity, force, and rhythm. The Latin, English, and German Psalters are as poetic as the Hebrew, and yet agree with it and among themselves. It is impossible not to see here the hand of Providence, which made the word of truth accessible to all.

The few acrostic or alphabetical poems can hardly be called an exception, viz., Pss. xxv., xxxiv., xxxvii., cxi., cxii., cxix. and cxlv., the Lamentations, and the last chapter of Proverbs (xxxi. 10 sqq.). For the alphabetical order is purely external and mechanical, and at best only an aid to the memory. Pss. cxi. and cxii. are the simplest examples of this class; each contains twenty-two lines, according to the number of the Hebrew alphabet, and the successive lines begin with the letters in their regular order. Ps. cxix. consists of twenty-two strophes, corresponding to the number of Hebrew letters; each strophe begins with the letter of the alphabet, and has eight parallelisms of two lines each, and the first line of each parallelism begins with the initial letter of the strophe. The remaining four acrostic Psalms are not so perfect in arrangement.

Many attempts have been made by Jewish and Christian scholars to reduce the form of Hebrew poetry to a regular system, but they have failed. Josephus says that the Song of Moses at the Red Sea was composed in the hexameter measure, and the Psalms in trimeters, pentameters and other metres. But he and Philo were anxious to show that the poets of their nation anticipated the Greek poets even in the art of versification. Jerome, the most learned among the Fathers (appealing to Philo, Josephus, Origen, and Eusebius for proof), asserts that the Psalter, the Lamentations, Job and almost all the poems of the Bible are composed in hexameters and pentameters, with dactyls and spondees, or in other regular metres, like the classic poems, and points also to the alphabetical arrangement of Pss. cxi., cxii., cxix., cxlv., and the Lamentations. Among later scholars some deny all metrical laws in Hebrew poetry (Joseph Scaliger, Richard Simon); others maintain the rhythm without metre* (Gerhard Vossius); others both rhythm and metre (Gomarus, Buxtorf, Hottin-ger); others a full system of versification, though differing much in detail (Meibomius, Hare, Anton, Lautwein, Bellermann); while still others, believing in the existence of such a system, in whole or in part, think it impossible to recover it (Carpzov, Lowth, Jahn, to some extent also Herder and Wright). Ewald discusses at great length the Hebrew rhythm, verses and strophes, also Hebrew song and music, without making the matter very clear. Merx finds in the Book of Job a regular syllabic and strophic structure, eight syllables in each stich or line, and an equal number of stichs in each strophe, but he is obliged to resort to arbitrary conjectures of lacunæ or interpolations in the masoretic text.

* Delitzsch (Com. on the Psalms, Leipzig, 1867, p. 17) says: "Die althebräische Poesie hat weder Reim noch Metrum, welche beide erst im 7. Jahrh. n. Chr. von der jud. Poesie angeeignet wurden." But afterwards he qualifies this remark and admits that the beginnings of rhyme and metre are found in the poetry of the O. T., so that there is an element of truth in the assertion of Philo, Josephus, Eusebius and Jerome, who find there the Greek and Roman metres. Ewald (l. c., p. 104) denies the existence of rhyme in Hebrew poetry; yet the occasional rhymes and alliterations in the song of Lamech, the song of Moses, the song of Deborah, etc., can hardly be merely accidental.

The conceded and most marked feature of Bible poetry is the parallelism of members, so-called.† It consists in a certain rhythmical and musical correspondence of two or more sentences of similar or opposite meaning, and serves by a felicitous variation to give full expression and harmony to the thought. The parallel members complete or illustrate each other, and produce a music of vowels and consonants. Paralellism reflects the play of human feeling, and supplies the place of regular metre and rhyme in a way that is easily understood and remembered, and can be easily reproduced in every language. Ewald happily compares it to "the rapid stroke as of alternate wings," and "the heaving and sinking as of the troubled heart."

There are different forms of parallelism, according to the nature of the internal relation of the members. The correspondence may be either one of harmony, or one of contrast, or one of progressive thought, or one simply of comparison, or of symmetrical structure. Since Lowth, it has become customary to distinguish three classes of parallelisms: synonymous, antithetic, and synthetic or constructive. The majority belong to the third class, and even those which are usually counted as synonymous, show more or less progress of thought, and might as well be assigned to the third class. A large number of parallelisms cannot be brought under either class.

1. SYNONYMOUS parallelism expresses the same idea in different but equivalent words, as in the following examples:

Ps. viii. 4. What is man that Thou art mindful of him?
And the son of man that Thou visitest him?

Ps. xix. 1, 2. The heavens declare the glory of God:
And the firmament sheweth His handiwork.
Day unto day uttereth speech:
And night unto night proclaimeth knowledge.

Ps. ciii. 1. Bless the Lord, O my soul:
And all that is within me, bless His holy name.

These are parallel couplets; but there are also parallel triplets, as in Ps. i. 1:

Blessed is the man that walketh not in the counsel of the ungodly:
Nor standeth in the way of sinners,
Nor sitteth in the seat of the scornful.

Similar triplets occur in Job iii. 4, 6, 9; Isa. ix. 20.

Parallel quatrains are less frequent, as in Ps. ciii. 11, 12, where the first member corresponds to the third, and the second to the fourth:

* All metre is rhythm, but not all rhythm is metre, as Augustine says (De musica).

† Lowth is the author of a more fully developed system of parallelism and its various forms. But the thing itself was known before under different names. Aben Ezra calls it duplicatio (כפול), Kimchi: duplicatio sententiæ verbis variatis. See Delitzsch, l. c. p. 18. Rabbi Azariah, and especially Schöttgen (Horæ Hebraicæ, Vol. I. 1249-1263), as quoted by Prof. Wright (Smith's Dict. of the Bible, III. 2557), seem to have anticipated the main features of Lowth's system. Parallellism is also found among other Shemitic nations, in Old Egyptian poetry, and among the Chinese.

For as the heavens are high above the earth,
 So great is His mercy towards them that fear Him.
 So far as the East is from the West,
 So far has He removed our transgressions from Him.

When the two members are precisely the same in word and sense, they are called identical parallelism; but there are no cases of mere repetition, unless it be for the sake of emphasis, as in Isa. xv. 1; Ps. xciv. 1, 3.

2. ANTITHETIC parallelism expresses a contrast or antithesis in sentiment:

- Ps. I. 6. For the Lord knoweth the way of the righteous;
 But the way of the ungodly shall perish.
- Ps. xxxvii. 9. Evil-doers shall be cut off:
 But those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the earth.
- Prov. x. 7. The memory of the just is a blessing;
 But the name of the wicked shall rot.
- Prov. xii. 10. A righteous man regardeth the life of his beast,
 But the tender mercies of the wicked are cruel.
- Hos. xiv. 9. The ways of the Lord are right, and the just shall walk in them;
 But the transgressors shall fall therein.

3. SYNTHETIC or CONSTRUCTIVE parallelism. Here the construction is similar in form, without a precise correspondence in sentiment and word as equivalent or opposite, but with a gradation or progress of thought, as in Ps. xix. 7-11; cxlviii. 7-13; Isa. xiv. 4-9. We quote the first:

The law of Jehovah is perfect, converting the soul:
 The testimony of Jehovah is sure, making wise the simple.
 The statutes of Jehovah are right, rejoicing the heart:
 The commandment of Jehovah is pure, enlightening the eyes.
 The fear of Jehovah is clean, enduring forever:
 The judgments of Jehovah are truth, they are righteous altogether.
 More to be desired are they than gold, and much fine gold:
 And sweeter than honey, and the honey comb.
 Moreover, by them is thy servant warned:
 In keeping of them there is great reward.

To these three kinds of parallelism Jebb (Sacred Literature) adds a fourth, which he calls introverted parallelism, where the first line corresponds to the last (fourth), and the second to the penultimate (third), as in Prov. xxiii. 15, 16. De Wette distinguishes four, slightly differing from Lowth, Delitzsch six or eight forms of parallelism, as we have already seen in the remarks on the Proverbs.

The pause in the progress of thought determines the division of lines and verses. Hebrew poetry always adapts the poetic structure to the sense. Hence there is no monotony, but a beautiful variety and alternation of different forms. Sometimes the parallelism consists simply in the rhythmical correspondence of sentences or clauses, without repetition or contrast, or in carrying forward a line of thought in sentences of nearly equal length, as in Psalm cxv. 1-8.

Not unto us, Jehovah, not unto us,
 But unto Thy name give glory,
 For Thy mercy,
 For Thy truth's sake.
 Wherefore should the heathen say,
 "Where is now their God?"
 But our God is in the heavens;
 All that He pleased He has done.
 Their idols are silver and gold,
 The work of the hands of men.
 A mouth have they, but they speak not;
 Eyes have they, but they see not;

Ears have they, but they hear not;
 Noses have they, but they smell not;
 Hands have they, but they handle not;
 Feet have they, but they walk not;
 They make no sound in their throat.
 Like them are they that made them,
 All that trust in them.

This looser kind of parallelism or rhythmical correspondence and symmetrical construction of sentences, characterizes also much of the Hebrew prose, and is continued in the New Testament, e. g., in the Sermon on the Mount (especially the Beatitudes), in the Prologue of John, in Rom. v. 12 sqq.; viii. 23 sqq.; 2 Cor. xiii. 1 sqq.; 1 Tim. iii. 16; 2 Tim. ii. 11, and other passages which we are accustomed to read as prose, but which even in form are equal to the best poetry—gems in beautiful setting, apples of gold in pictures of silver.

THEISM

THE BOOK OF JOB.

ITS GRANDEUR AND PURITY.

Among all writings, inspired or uninspired, the Book of Job stands preëminent for its lofty representations of the pure moral personality, the holiness, the unchallengeable justice, the wisdom, the Omnipotence, the absolute Sovereignty of God. Whatever may be said of its obscurities and difficulties in other respects, in the splendor of its theism it is unsurpassed. Whether we take the earlier or the later date that has been assigned to it, the wonder is still the same. "Crude theistic conceptions" have been charged upon the whole Old Testament, surpassing, in some respects, those of surrounding nations, yet still characteristic of the infancy of the race and the infancy of science. The Book of Job refutes this. Our best modern theology, in its most approved and philosophical symbols, may be challenged to produce any thing surpassing the representations which this ancient writing gives us of God as "a Spirit, infinite, eternal and unchangeable in His being, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth." Nothing approaches its ideal of the ineffable purity of the divine character, before which the heavens veil their brightness, and the loftiest intelligences are represented as comparatively unholy and impure. God the Absolute, the Infinite, the Unconditioned, the Unknowable,—these are the terms by which our most pretentious philosophizing would characterize Deity as something altogether beyond the ordinary theological conception. But even here this old Book of Job surpasses them in setting forth the transcending glory, the ineffable height, the measureless profundity of the Eternal. How much stronger the intellectual and moral impression of this, as derived from the vivid metaphors of Zophar, than any thing that comes to us from the negatives of Sir William Hamilton, or from any such powerless abstractions as philosophy is compelled to employ: "Canst thou explore the deep things of God? Canst thou find out the Almighty in His perfection? Higher than Heaven, what canst thou do? Deeper than Hades, what canst thou know? Longer than the earth; broader than the sea;" excelling all height, going beneath all depth, extending beyond all space; infinite in its unsearchableness, yet never dissociated from the idea of a personal Divine presence more wondrous in its nearness than in any conception we can form of its immensity.

CONTRAST BETWEEN THIS EXALTED THEISM AND THE DIM ACCOMPANYING VIEW OF A FUTURE LIFE.

In connection with such a sublime theism, there is to be noted another fact, worthy of attention in itself, but more especially in its bearing on the first and greater aspect of the Book. This exalted idea of God is almost wholly separated from any dogmatic view of a future life for man, although it most distinctly recognizes what has ever been regarded as having a close connection with this latter doctrine, namely, a spiritual world inhabited by superhuman beings, good and bad, among whom a conspicuous place is held by those who are called בני אלהים, or "Sons of God." The idea of another side of human existence, of some state beyond, whether in Sheol, or after the dominion of Sheol, cannot, indeed, be said to be wholly wanting. It gleams upon us from certain passages, but as something repressed rather than as intended to be prominently revealed. It is kept back; a veil seems thrown over it; it is silenced, as it were, even in places where it would appear to be almost breaking through, and struggling to manifest itself in circumstances most adapted to call out its utterance. This is a remarkable feature of the Book, very suggestive in respect to its purpose,—its problem, as some would call it,—or, to speak more correctly, the lesson it truly teaches, whatever may be said as to its artistic design.

The Foundations of Religious Belief.

Two tenets are commonly regarded as fundamental in religion,—as indispensable, in fact, whatever else may be received or rejected. These are, 1st, the belief in a personal God having moral relations to a world of rational beings, a Ruler, Lawgiver and Judge, instead of a mere physical Creator; 2d, the belief in a future state for man, or of some higher life, however conceived, which shall give dignity to that relation, or make man a fit subject of a divine moral government appealing to the highest motives, and the most transcending reasons that can influence one appointed to such a destiny. They are the two necessary articles in every system of theology. Piety cannot exist without them. So it seems to us in the present age of the world. We find it difficult to think of religion as separate from some very clear and decided belief in another state of existence. And yet it has not always been so. Nothing is more certain than that, in the early days of the human world, this second article which, in certain kinds of modern religionism, seems to usurp the first place, to be the great dogma, in fact, giving its chief importance to the other, did certainly hold a very subordinate rank in the mind's conceptions. If it existed at all, its form was most shadowy and indefinite. It was a feeling rather than a dogma having any defining limits in respect to any conceived time, state, or locality. And yet there was a strong sense of a high moral relation between man and God,—a relation somehow eternal, though one of the parties was mainly thought of as finite, earthly, and mortal.

The Exalted Piety of the Patriarchal Life as compared with the Scantiness of its Creed.

Connected with this scanty creed, or rather with this wholly deficient creed, as we would deem it, there was an exalted piety, a rapt contemplation described as a "walking with God," an adoring view of the divine holiness, an ecstatic longing for the blessedness of the divine communion. Strange as this may seem, it cannot be denied whilst we have before us the history of those early patriarchs who appeared ever to live as in the presence of God, and to whose earthly existence this feeling gave such an unearthly aspect, though knowing nothing, seemingly, of any state beyond.

Difference between it and Modern Religionism.

It is difficult for us to conceive how it could have been so. Nothing of the kind is seen or known in our modern world. The creed of the materialist, or of the mortal Deist, as he is called, would seem outwardly to present but little difference from that of the patriarch in regard to this item of a future life, but how utterly does it repel every idea of such an exalted piety, such an adoring theism, as characterized these men who called their earthly stage a pilgrimage, but who knew not whither it tended, or what was its meaning, except that it was assigned to them by God. We never find such a belief now, or rather such an absence of belief, separated from some form of sheer worldliness, sensuality, animalism, ambition, utter selfishness in some aspect, vulgar or refined,—ever characterized by indifference to all religious thought, and wholly wanting in adoration or reverence for God, though theoretically believed.

Earliest Ideas of Death and of Continued Being.

It is not easy for us now to enter into the mind of the early men, and to understand precisely what view they took of the strange phenomenon of death, or what conception they formed of any possible after being. It was a cessation of visible activity, but we are not warranted in supposing that they regarded it as extinction, on the one hand, or that they formed any idea of something separating, going off, and continuing as a distinct immaterial existence, on the other. It was a great mystery in respect to which nothing had been told them, except that it was a condition into which men entered on account of sin. It was the beginning of something, so far as the mere act of dying or the cessation of activity was concerned, but they had nothing to warrant them in regarding it as an end of being. It was not annihilation. They had no such word or figure—no such conception to be expressed by it. It was a state, a state of being, instead of a ceasing to be. It was a penal state, and the first dawning of a better hope and of a more distinct idea must have arisen from the strong desire of deliverance from it as from a darkness and a prison, which, although they may have interrupted their conscious active powers, did not destroy their personal identity. It was a state strange and indescribable—inconceivable, we may also say—yet held, nevertheless, as a fact of which they could give no account. The body lies motionless before them. They see it beginning to undergo a fearful change. As far as sense is concerned, every thing seems at an end; and yet they continue to speak of the dead man as one who somehow yet is. He has yet relations to God and to the living. He is not all gone. His “blood cries from the ground.” God has yet a care for him, and makes inquisition for him, as a yet remaining entity having rights and wrongs. Such language may have become mere empty figures as used now; but it could not well have become so in the early day; it meant something. They are gone from the congregation of the active living, but they are gathered into another—into a community of beings in a similar strange condition. Especially is this thought and said of the pious: “They are gathered to the fathers,” “gathered to their people.” The earthly living go to them; they come not back to us (Gen. xxxvii. 36). This is before any pictures of locality have been formed. Even those exceedingly dim conceptions first embodied in such words as Sheol and Hades had not yet assumed a rudimentary distinctness. The subterranean imagery had not yet grown out of the forms of burial. Still, even before all this, there was the feeling, the sentiment, of something in man, or belonging to man, that did not perish; and that, because of his vital moral relation to the ever Living God. “Because He lived,” therefore, in some way they knew not how, and on some ground they did not understand, “they should live also.” Hence that early Hebrew oath, which afterwards became so frequent, חַי יְהוָה וְחַי נַפְשׁוֹ, “as the Lord liveth and as thy soul liveth.” Surely there was meaning in all this; it was not mere verbiage. From this arose that kind of language which, as we learn from 2 Sam. xxv. 29, afterward pervaded the common Jewish speech. Thus Abigail uses it to David as a sort of habitual or proverbial utterance of the formal religionism: “The soul of my lord bound up in the bundle of life, צִירוֹ הַחַיִּים, with the Lord thy God.” Compare also Ps. xxxvi. 10: “For with thee is the fountain of life, מְקוֹר הַחַיִּים, in thy light do we see light.” There is here “the power of an endless life,” even though time conception and local scenery be wholly absent. It is astonishing that some of our most learned and most acute commentators see so little in such remarkable language, whilst so keen to find meaning in the common-place ethics, or mystical rhapsodies of Zoroastrian, Brahminic, or Confucian writings.

Pilgrims and Sojourners. The Covenant Idea.

This absence of local conception, and of forms of expression for it, should not lead us to imagine a complete destitution of the idea, or of the feeling, as we may rather call it. They were “strangers and pilgrims upon earth” (ξένοι, παρεπίδημοι, גֵּרִים), way-farers; “and they that say such things make it clear (ἐμφανίζουσιν) that they seek a country.” At the command of God, it is said, they went out from their native land, “not knowing whither they went;” and the same may be said of their apparent departure from the earthly state of being: They went down to Sheol, not knowing whither they went, yet firmly trusting God, who had made a "covenant with them well ordered in all things and sure." Hence the great significance of this covenant idea which forms so peculiar a feature of the Old Testament, and especially of the patriarchal, economy. God does not deal with them as He does with nature. He raises them above the plane of an arbitrarily imposed and an involuntarily accepted law. He stipulates with man, he proposes terms to him, as one rational mind to another. But such a transaction implies a greater being in the party thus treated than the transient earthly life. God deals not thus with creatures of a day. "He is not the God of the dead, but of the living." It is our Saviour's argument with the Sadducees, most rational, most Scriptural, and most conclusive, though some of the Rationalists have not hesitated to characterize it as a force upon the text quoted, and an evasion of the difficulty presented.

"THE POWER OF AN ENDLESS LIFE."

It cannot be denied that there may be a feeling, a sentiment, an influence, call it what we will, that may have an immense power over the soul, giving it a most peculiar character, and yet wholly undefined in the forms either of thought or of language. It may be the consciousness of some greater being, strongly felt, yet without any conceived accompaniments of time, state, and locality. It is that mysterious idea which characterized the priesthood of Melchizedek, and which the Apostle calls "the power of an endless life," δύναμιν ζωῆς ἀκαταλείτου (Heb. vii. 16),—of an indissoluble, unbroken being. It is a power truly instead of a bare dogmatic idea, and yet indissolubly connected with that other and higher idea of the eternal God, with its awful moral relations to the human soul.

It demands a Pure Theism first as the Ground of all other Religious Ideas.

Thus it is that these two great articles of religion, though inseparably connected in their essence, stand to each other in a causal relation of birth and development. The second, so far as respects its definiteness of conception, was to grow out of the first, and find in it its security against all perversion. To this end the first was to be clearly established, and to have the dominion of the soul, before the second assumed such form as might make it, in any degree, really or seemingly, independent of it. The clear acknowledgment of God as a moral Governor, whatever might become of man, or whatever might be thought of the duration or the importance of his being,—this was to be first, not only for its own sake as intrinsically greater than any other idea, but also on account of the second itself, as being a dogma, which, without such clear recognition of the greater dogma, might become vain, imaginative, grotesque, bringing in all kinds of monstrous chimeras on the one hand, or of pretty sentimentalities on the other, and, in either way, wholly losing all moral power.

Doctrine of a Future Life developed from it.

From the doctrine of the being, personality, moral government, and moral sovereignty of God, were to grow out all other religious ideas. Under the divine direction of human history, and especially of the people who were chosen to be keepers of truth for the world, their development in the soul was to be their revelation. The Scriptures are the record of this revelation, made by divinely chosen and divinely guided instruments; or rather it is the record of the circumstances and events, natural or supernatural, common or extraordinary, in which, under the divine control, these developments had their origin and growth. Thus the idea of retribution was born in the sharp human conviction of something due to great crime—awakening also the thought that there might be a heinousness in such crimes, and even in what were regarded as common sins, far beyond that ordinary estimate which might itself have fallen with fallen beings. In the murderer's conscience was born essentially the idea of Hell before any Hadean penalty was conceived of, either as to mode or locality. So the acknowledged relation of God as Moral Governor, as Redeeming Angel, as Covenant Friend, must have produced in the souls of the pious a feeling that becomes the preparation on which the idea of a blessed future being was, in time, firmly and definitely to rest. In such an acknowledged relationship there was this "power of an endless life," of infinite being, as the germ of every idea that might afterwards be held in respect to the human destiny or the human soteriology.

The Hebrew Despondency more spiritual than any Heathen Confidence. Anacreon and David. Farewell to the World—Farewell to the Idea of God.

This appears even in their despondency, or their moments of apparent skepticism. There is really something more spiritual in the seeming despair, even, than in many a belief that might be regarded as greatly surpassing in dogmatic statement or conceptive clearness. To the worldly mind, with a dim hope of futurity, or even with one possessing some degree of distinctness, yet without moral power, the agonizing thought in view of death is the leaving behind this fair earth, with its prospects of pleasure or of ambition. See how it meets us in the heathen gnomic poetry, in the Greek monumental verses, and in the Choral odes of the Dramatists. Very affecting are such representations, as they may be all summed up sometimes in that touching expression so common in Homer: ὄραν φάος ἡελίοιο—λείπειν φάος ἡελίοιο—"to see no more, to leave forever, the light of the sun." See EURIPIDES HIPPOL. 4; PHŒNISS. 8; IPHIG. in Aul. 1218, ἴδου ἅρ τὸ φῶς βλέπειν, "For O 'tis sweet the sunlight to behold." To bid farewell to this loved life, with all its worldly hopes: such was the burden of the heathen song, whether tuned to the Anacreontic or the more solemn tragic key. How differently affected in view of death was the pious Shemitic mind, whether as represented in the patriarchal, the Jobean, or the more common Israelitish life. "I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord," says the dying Jacob; though should the Rationalist maintain that there is no evidence of the patriarch having any distinct hope of a life beyond the grave, it would not be easy to refute him. But greater still is the difference, we may say, when all seemed dark respecting that other unknown shore. To the pious descendant of Jacob, in such a season of despondency, the great grief of his departure was the bidding farewell to God—if the expression does not seem too strange—or the going out forever of that idea which had been his life, his higher life, even here on earth: "Shall the dead praise Thee? Shall one speak of Thy goodness in the grave, Thy faithfulness [אֱמִינָתְךָ, thy covenant faithfulness] in Abaddon (the world of the perished)? Shall Thy miracles be known in the darkness, Thy righteousness in the land of oblivion?" Ps. lxxviii. 11, 13. So Ps. vi. 6: "In Sheol who shall make confession unto thee?" It was to be parted forever from that soul-vision of the Divine eternity, the loss of which was sorer than any diminution of their own being considered merely in itself. Hence the affecting contrasts of man's dying, going out, passing away, and God's everlasting continuance. The contemplation of this is the reason assigned in praying for the continuance of the human life. "O take me not away in the midst of my days; Thy years are through all generations." "Thou sendest man back to dissolution (אָפֶּיְךָ, to decay and dust), and thou sayest, return ye sons of Adam." "But Thou art from everlasting unto everlasting;" "of thy years there is no end;" לֹא יָמֵינוּ, they never fail. There is, however, a rising hope of eternity in the very thought, as though reflected back on the human soul that thus contemplated itself in God, and leading it to say: "Thou hast been to us our dwelling-place in all generations;" or in the rapt language of the Prophet: "Art Thou not from everlasting, Jehovah, my God, my Holy One? We shall not die." Hab. i. 12.

It is in these and in similar ways that the inspired feeling—for such we may call it even in its apparent skepticism—breathes itself out in many a passage where not a word is said dogmatically of any future state, and yet the language seems all filled with this "power of an endless life." Thus in the "Psalm of Asaph," lxxiii. 24: "Whom have I in the Heavens (but Thee); and in all the earth there is nothing that I desire beside Thee."—ךָ in comparison with Thee. Take away this æonic inspiration, and all, at once, collapses. The language, regarded as coming from a mere worldly soul, speaking from a worldly stand-point, is wholly overstrained. There is nothing to call out a state of feeling so high and rapturous.*

* My flesh and my heart (my body and my soul) both fail, but Thou art the strength (the rock)

of my heart, and my portion (קֶלֶךְ, my decreed or allotted portion) for ever." Not a word here, it may be said, of immortality, or of any life beyond the grave; no one would quote it as a proof-text for the doctrine dogmatically considered; and yet the power is there—the δύναμις ζωῆς ἀκαταλήτου—"the power of an endless life."

Examples from Job—God mourned for more than his Loss or Pain.

So is it with Job, though the darkness and sadness of his outward state gives a different form to the expression. The loss of property he hardly mentions—his bereavement of his children he barely alludes to; but it is for God he mourns—for the hiding of His face, "the light of His countenance," that ineffable good for which our purest modern religion finds its best expression in the language of this ancient theism. Such a feeling is not inconsistent with the daring, and, as they seem to us, almost profane, expostulations wrung from him by the long continuance of his sharp bodily pains. In every subsidence of this great misery—for there must have been such seasons of remission, or he could not have borne it—there returns again the humbled, mourning spirit, with its divine want: "O that I knew where I might find Him; O that I might set my cause in order before Him; that I might know the words He would answer me," xxiii. 3, 5; "Wherefore hidest Thou Thy face?" xiii. 24; "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him,"* xiii. 15. From the lowest depth, hope springs up. Just after he had said, "My face is foul with weeping, and the death shade is on my eyelids" (xvi. 16), he cries out, "Even now my Witness is in Heaven, my Attestor is on high,"† xvi. 19; "My friends are my mockers, but mine eye droppeth unto God," 20. The tearful appeal is made as unto a better friend, who, in the days of his prosperity, had never been absent from his soul's most cherished thoughts: "O that it were with me as in months that are past, in the days when God watched over me (שָׁמַר־נִי), when His lamp shone upon my head, when by His light I walked through darkness; when the Almighty was with me; when the secret of God [סֵתֶר, sessus colloquium, His secret presence and communion, see Ps. xxv. 14] was upon my tabernacle," xxix. 2-4. Our highest rationalism has now no such remembrance and no such mourning. It may talk of the dimness of Job's views, the inadequate conceptions entertained by the author of the poem in respect to the character of God, or the absence of any clear mention of a future life, but his darkness is better than their light; his intense theistic feeling is stronger than their theory; they have no such skepticism, perhaps, because they have no such faith.

Longing for God as distinguishing the Hebrew Theism from all other.

It is the same feeling, as characteristic of this ancient theism, which breaks out in that ecstatic longing before alluded to: "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after Thee, O God!" Picture the image of the thirsting animal (moaning, with outstretched neck, as עָרַב vividly denotes) in its intense desire for the refreshing element; then transfer it to the rational sphere, and we see that it is a superhuman, earth-transcending good that is so ardently sought. "My soul thirsteth for God, for the living God"—for the God of life. The epithet is not a superfluity. It distinguishes Him from the dead idol, on the one hand, and the equally dead idea, or theosophism, on the other. "It is Thy favor which is life, Thy loving-kindness which is more than life." Again, Ps. lxiii. 1: "O God! O Thou my God! my soul thirsteth for Thee, my flesh longeth for Thee (כָּלָה, denoting that strong passion which makes even the body faint under the intensity of its desire) as in a dry and thirsty land wherein no water is." Our Saviour shows His estimate of the power of this language by consecrating the image in His own highest term for spiritual blessedness—the "water of life," the "fountain leaping up to everlasting life." There is no mistaking the significance of such an appeal to God. No joy in this world without the beatific sense of the divine presence.

* The Keri here (לֵךְ for לָךְ) of the Masoretic text must be very ancient, since it is sustained by the Syriac, the Targum, the Vulgate, and the Arabic of Saadias. It is in the closest grammatical harmony with the verb אָלַךְ; and no one can deny that the rendering produced is in perfect consistency with the spirit of the whole Book.

Transition from Despondency to Rapture. Job xix. 25.

Such was this ancient theism. It carried with it "the power of an endless life," without any dogmatic mention, and this is the reason why the highest emotion of modern religion still finds in it its most adequate, as well as its most impassioned, expression. There is less of it in Job; but there, too, we find it, carrying him, sometimes, out of the deepest despondency into a spiritual region where his sharpest pains seem, for the moment, forgotten. In the first part of ch. xix. it seems to be all over with him. No hope, either for body or for soul: "He hath fenced up my way, that I cannot pass; He hath set darkness in my path; He hath broken me down on every side, and I am gone; He uproots, like a tree, my hope; my bone cleaves to my skin, and to my flesh; I am laid bare, the skin from my teeth."* A little before (xvii. 1), he had said, "My breath (my breathing) is exhausted" (הִנָּחֵל, not "corrupt," but from the other sense of הִנָּחֵל, denoting great pain, as of one in travail, hard and painful breathing, quick panting); my breath comes hard, my days are going out (נִינְכִי), the graves are my portion." v. 11, 12. "My purposes are broken off, even the treasured thoughts of my heart," all my pleasant earthly remembrances. The light is departing. "They† are putting night for day:" the shades of death are gathering fast around him. All hope of life is gone, much more the expectation of restored wealth and worldly prosperity, which the rationalist would regard as the only significance of the triumphal strain that follows, xix. 25. He is in extremis; but such is the very time when this "power of an endless life" asserts itself. At the lowest ebb, as though such a time had been necessary to bring out its returning force, he breaks forth with those ever memorable words so sublime and super-earthly in spite of every lowering strain that criticism will put upon them, the words he wished "engraved," as his monument, "with an iron stile and lead in the rock forever:"

I KNOW THAT MY REDEEMER LIVETH:

My Avenger, who takes my part against my murderer or the great unseen evil Power of whose hostility Job sometimes seems to have a kind of dreamy consciousness. There is the same idea of survivorship so touchingly alluded to in the Psalms. He is my אַחֲרִי, my Nachmann, my Next of Kin. He lives on; "and after they‡ have broken up this skin of mine, yet from my flesh (or out of my flesh, translate it as we will) shall I see God"—see Him with the eyes of my soul, and not with any outwardly derived theoretical knowledge—see Him as the Living God, as my God, and not a stranger. This beatific thought of God as "all his salvation and all his desire" carries him out of and far away from himself. It becomes an insupportable rapture giving rise to that same intense language before referred to in the 63d Psalm, and elsewhere. It is that most passionate verb בִּלַּה, having for its subject the paronomastic noun כְּלִיָּת (the reins, renes, φρενες), denoting the most interior part of the body, regarded as in nearest connection with the spiritual emotion: "My reins faint within me," כלו כליותי בחקי. Consuming, exhaustion, completion, are the primary sense, hence, of disappearing (schwinden), going out, fainting, swooning with ecstatic joy. Ewald's treatment of the passage is most admirable. He, however, refers יך to Job himself, and makes the personal idea conveyed by it one of the chief elements of his insupportable bliss: "Nicht ein Fremder, no more a stranger. It is no other than myself; no, no; all doubt is gone. It is I (ich, ich), I that shall thus behold Him. So deeply does he feel the bliss, that he seems to have wholly forgotten the outer world; and finally, in the highest transport, like one swooning, he cries out, O ich vergehe, O I am almost gone; I faint from trembling joy and insupportable desire." EWALD, Job, p. 200. He refers to Psalms lxxxiv. 3, cxix. 8. Compare also the use of οίχεται by the Greek Dramatists, καρδία γὰρ οίχεται.

* It would seem to denote that ghastly look, and that ghastly condition of extreme emaciation, when the skin will no more close over the protruding teeth. This sense may be got for כָּלֵל without going to the corresponding Arabic word. It is closely connected with the common Hebrew sense of escape or deliverance (one thing parting or parted from another). It is like the accusative with preposition after passive verbs denoting condition. I am parted, the skin of my teeth, or in the skin of my teeth—that is, the flesh that covers my teeth. It denotes the extreme of emaciation and suffering.

† יִשְׁכֹּן. "They are putting." Who are they? It is one of those cases where the agent, real or supposed, is not named because of something fearful, perhaps, associated with it. "They"—invisible powers, it may be, either actually believed or used figuratively or proverbially to heighten the effect of the language. Grammarians call it the using of the active for the passive impersonal, but this does not explain the matter. As parallel passages, compare Job vii. 3, iv. 19, xviii. 18, xix. 26; Ps. xlix. 15, and especially the Greek of Luke xii. 20. It is generally used by way of deprecating something hostile. But it may also be from reverence. See Isaiah ix. 11.

‡ The same idiom referred to in the note above. They, the agent, too fearful or too revolting to be named, may refer to the worms reducing his skin to shreds, or to the strange hostile powers that were then destroying his body through disease, regarded as produced by evil agency.

Similar Fluctuations of Faith and Hope. Job xiv.

It is the same feeling, though in a calmer or less ecstatic form, that prompts the language, Job xiv. 13: מי יתן בשאול תצפני, "O that Thou wouldst lay me up (like a deposit) in Sheol, that Thou wouldst keep me secret till Thy wrath should turn (שׁוּב), that Thou wouldst appoint me a time and then remember me." Is it really so? The thought suddenly breaks out of his gloom: "Is it really so: If a man die, shall he live again?" Every thing depends here upon what we regard as the emotional point of the question. The musing, soliloquizing style should also be remembered. It is not so much answering his friends, as talking to himself, and pausing between each solemn utterance. It may be the language of skepticism, or of rising hope, not denying the idea, but expressive of wonder at some new aspect of its greatness. It may have been intended—and the thought is not unworthy of inspiration—that different readers, according to their different degrees of spiritual-mindedness, might take higher or lower views of the strange interrogatory. Even for Job himself it may have had its various aspects. There may have been intended the denial or the doubt; or there may have been the feeling of wonder before mentioned; or it may have been an entirely new view, carrying with it a rising assurance: "If a man die, shall he live?" May it be that death is the way to life?—that through it we attain the real life? However momentary the feeling, it immediately raises him to a higher confidence. Its first fruit is the earnest prayer for remembrance and security in Sheol; then the stronger faith grounded on the more unreserved submission: "All the days of my appointment" (what he had prayed for in the verse preceding) will I wait until my change † shall come." And now we have language which seems to mount

* It is the same style of musing query given in Plato, Gorgias, 493, A, by way of extract from a lost drama of Euripides:

Τίς δ' οἶδεν, εἰ τὸ ζῆν μὲν ἐστὶ κατθανεῖν,
τὸ κατθανεῖν δὲ ζῆν;

Who knows but life, the present life, be death,
And death be living?

Socrates explains it from the saying of the wise men of old, "that we are now dead and buried in the body." Who shall say that the same, or a kindred thought, may not have come to an Idumean sage, as well as to the old σοφία to whom Plato ascribes it?

† Umbreit and other commentators of the same school will have it that the change here is that from life to death. The arguments against it are threefold. There is, first, the consistency of the context. Secondly, if חליפה stood here alone, without any thing to determine it one way or the other, it might be said that in other passages the transition denoted by the root is that of renewal, whenever connected with the idea of life, as in Ps. xc. 3; Ps. cii. 27, where it seems to denote a new garment for nature, a change of raiment in the sense of renewal. There is, thirdly, the direct use of יחליף, the Hiphil, for reviviscence, in the seventh verse, as applied to the comparison of the tree. Would the noun here, so obviously from it, so soon lose the same idea, and be taken in another directly opposite? and is there not the strongest critical reason for regarding the use of the noun in ver. 14 as suggested by the parallel thought, ver. 7: "Even as there is hope of a tree that it will germinate again (יחליף), so also will I wait until my springing forth, my חליפה, come." "For Thou wilt call," etc.

to almost full assurance: "For Thou wilt call and I will answer Thee; Thou wilt yearn * towards the work of Thy hands." The darkness soon comes over him again; but these words stand, nevertheless, like the monumental engraving that describes the rapture of the later passage. Even as Ewald describes him then, he seems, for a short period, so carried away by the deep question he is pondering, as to have forgotten the outer world and all his surroundings. "Thou wilt have regard to the work of Thy hands; Thou wilt call and I will answer." It is "the power of an endless life," carrying him for a moment beyond the thought of death, or suffering, or human injustice. It is, however, but a transient gleam, and the close of the chapter—following, we may suppose, a pause or pauses in his soliloquy—becomes again as mournful as its beginning. One inference most strongly suggests itself from all this. There is a true experience here, an actual life that is lived. A soul went through these sorrows. It had these transitions of hope and despair—now moaning and expostulating with God, now rapt in the deepest meditation, now praying and trusting, now utterly cast down, and now, when "the light is just before darkness," as Dr. Conant renders xvii. 12, rising suddenly to a height of rapture in which every thing disappears before the beatific vision of God. To a mind in a right state there comes from this an irresistible argument for the actual truthfulness of the history, not only in its general outlines, but also in what has been called its dramatic representation. This is not an invented picture. It would require a power and a style of writing not only unknown to the early world, but surpassing the highest skill of modern fiction, even could we suppose the greatest dramatists of Grecian, German, or English literature capable of describing such a state of soul, or of descending, without divine aid, into the depths of such an experience.

Bidding Farewell to God; this Idea in the Psalms connected with the Temple and Ritual Worship.

In language like this we have quoted from Job and the Psalms, every hope of future being, or of any greater or higher being now connected with the earthly life, is sustained by, and derived from, the idea of God. It is this which gives such a preciousness to everything associated with the divine name. In the Psalms, however, there is a peculiar feature most worthy of note, because leading to a most important inference. In the expression of the glorious divine attributes, and of man's great need of God, their theism is substantially the same with that of Job and the Patriarchs. A new element, however, appears in the passionate language used in respect to the outward divine worship. The occasional feeling of despondency in view of death, as before referred to, is enhanced by the thought of leaving every thing on earth associated with the divine name,—the temple, the sanctuary, the altar, "the courts of Thine house." See the prayer of Hezekiah, Isaiah xxxviii. Similar to this is the longing expressed when circumstances, even in this life, have cut them off from privileges so highly prized: "O when shall I come and appear before the face of God?" "How lovely are Thy tabernacles, O Lord of Hosts! Longs, yea, even faints (נכפפה נגם כלתה) my soul for the courts of the Lord; my heart and my flesh cry aloud (רינני) for the Living God." Hence that endeared expression בית יהוה, "the house of the Lord," used not only for the temple, the place of worship, but for the people of God who worship there. A still further extension of the idea makes it denote the religious as distinguished from the worldly life, or even as something transcending the earthly state, though undefined in time and space. As Ps. xxiii. 4: "I shall dwell in the house of the Lord for ever." In that verse our translation may be amended. The words שבת בבית יהוה, all belong to the subject of the sentence, as even the accents show: "My dwelling in the House of the Lord—shall be, לארך ימים, for length of days," that is, continuously, or without interruption: My religious life shall not be simply on Sabbath-days, or on the stated festivals, but one unbroken adoration. Comp. Rev. iv. 8. It is thus that, when far removed, or deprived in any way of this divine presence, they so earnestly pray :

O send again that heavenly hour,
That vision so divine,

"Even Thy strength and Thy glory, as we have seen them in the Sanctuary. For better is Thy love than life; our lips shall ever praise Thee. Thus will I bless Thee while I live; thus, in Thy name, lift up my hands. As with marrow and fatness (beyond comparison with any earthly pleasure), so shall my soul be satisfied; with songs of joy shall my mouth glorify Thee." It is a spiritual joy, transcending any "good of corn and wine." It is a soul-worship, a soul-rapture, no mere affair of trumpets, incense, altars, or cherubic symbols, no imposing ceremonial, however gorgeous or comely its forms, however elevating or pietistic its influence. "In the shadow of Thy wings do I trust." The outward temple worship suggests the image, but it is in deepest retirement that its power is felt: "For surely I remember Thee upon my bed; I meditate upon Thee in the watches of the night; my soul followeth hard after Thee; Thy right hand upholdeth me." It is an absorbing devotion; the whole heart is there; the highest thoughts of God are there; it is a model which our best modern worship may strive to reach but cannot surpass. "For better is Thy love than life." No mere rationalistic theism now talks to itself in this way; it was no mere theosophy, much less any known form of patril or local worship that used the language then. It is an abiding sense of the power of this ancient devotion that has made the Psalms, in all ages, the Litany of the Christian Church.

Inference from the Absence of all such Language in Job.

It is true that there are no passages of this latter kind in the Book of Job; but the inference from the fact is most obvious as well as most important. The story of that book, and even the seances (the dramatic discourses) as recorded, to say nothing of any later writer or recorder, were long before those inspiring temple and tabernacle ideas. They were before the Mosaic Law. That has been ably maintained as proof of the patriarchal character of the book, and we think that some of our modern Evangelical Commentators, such as Hengstenberg, and others, have been rash in giving up a view sustained by so profound a scholar as Spanheim, and indirectly supported by so learned an Orientalist as Schultens. Ni historia sit, fraus scriptoris, says the former. A pure dramatic work, avowed to be such, or carrying evidence of its dramatic character upon its very face, might have a place in inspired Scripture regarded as given by God for human instruction. Almost every other style of writing is there. But a parable, an allegory, a myth even, we at once know to be such. There is no concealment, no attempt to conceal, no artifice employed to put in what does not belong to the time of the composition, or to keep out what would at once undeceive the reader in regard to the appearance it would maintain. Such an intention, so employed, seems certainly akin to fraud. No subsequent writer was ever led to regard our Saviour's Parables as actual histories; but such, certainly, was the view derived by the Prophet Ezekiel from this Book of Job, then a part of the Jewish Canon. He no more regarded it as unreal than the histories, as contained in the same Canon, or firmly held by tradition, of Noah and Daniel.

Difficulties of the pure Dramatic view in excluding all reference to the Divine Law and Testimony so frequent in the Psalms.

According to the pure dramatic view, the writer selects a "hero," wholly imaginary, or faintly disclosed in the dimmest nucleus of an ancient legend. He clothes him with the character of the patriarchal age. He carefully keeps from him, and from the speakers with whom he is associated, the least reference to the Mosaic law. This might be comparatively easy, if it lay before him as a written document, which he might at any time examine, comparing it with his own work, and expunging or modifying as the case might demand. But there would be something far more difficult. The Jewish liturgical writings, older than the time ascribed by most modern critics to the Book of Job, abound in references to this old law. They give it a great variety of names, such as statutes, judgments, ordinances, testimonies. See how this kind of language is multiplied in the cxix. Psalm, and in others certainly older, if the cxix. is to be carried down to a late date. Language is taxed to express this ardent devotion of the soul, this ecstatic love of the comparatively limited revelation God had as yet given to the world, and that, too, veiled, for the most part, under outward and ceremonial ordinances. Yet what a rapture does it call out for the spiritual mind: "O how love I Thy law! Thy word is very pure, therefore Thy servant loveth it; The entrance of Thy word giveth light; Great peace have they who love Thy testimonies; Thy precepts are my delight (שְׂשׂוֹן, in the plural, deliciæ meæ, my exceeding joy) sweet to my taste, yea, sweeter than the honey, or the droppings of the comb." What care must it have taken to avoid anything of this kind! How still more difficult to keep clear of any such language as we first set forth, not referring to the Law, even indirectly, but deriving its spirit from it, and full of those remembrances of the sanctuary, and of the outward worship which were its fruit. All this kept out!* not the slightest anachronism to be discovered, nothing but what is perfectly consistent with that far more ancient Patriarchal age to which the writer evidently wishes the reader to regard his imaginary hero and history as belonging. It is incredible.

Such Dramatic Skill and Invention out of Harmony with the Idea of Inspiration, and even of the highest Order of Genius.

It would be wholly at war with that simplicity and truthfulness which we cannot separate from the idea of a holy and inspired writer. Such studied precaution would be inconsistent even with the lower human enthusiasm demanded for such a work of genius. It would simply be the genius of invention, and not even a miracle could carry it out of itself and into that higher sphere towards which it soars. Moreover, such a style of writing is inconsistent with any idea we can form of the earliest times. Modern fictitious writing has carried the art to its utmost capabilities, but even here it stops short (as from the very nature of the case it must) of the highest order of genius. It always fails when it attempts to meddle with the most sacred themes. We may confidently repeat it, therefore, that such success in such an effort, by a writer of the days of Solomon, is simply incredible.

But why not, then, take it as it purports to be—a true story of the Patriarchal age—and a substantially true report of discourses arising out of it, given in that chanting semi-rhythmical style that we know was earliest employed for the expression of all thoughts of a higher order, or regarded as having an extraordinary value. It is the same reflective, meditative, self-repeating rhythm, requiring little or no outward artifice, that we see in some of the earliest chants in Genesis, in the Song of Miriam, and in the Oracles of Balaam, the Prophet and Poet of the early East. It was the same, probably, from which the later fixed style of Hebrew poetry derived its origin. There seems to be demanded some ancient work of great repute to be the standard of authority for the later parallelistic chanting, and to give it rule and fixedness; just as Homer became the model of the Hexameter for all later Epic poetry of the Greeks.

Internal Truthfulness. Place of Job in Hebrew Literature.

There are other alleged stumbling-blocks, and other objections to the historical reality of the Book, such as the appearance of Satan in the Prologue, the round and double numbers in the narrative, and the theophany at the close, which may be treated elsewhere. In regard, however, to the substantial subject-matter of the story, it may well be asked, why may it not be received, as we receive the early narrations in Genesis? What is there in the testing, the sufferings, and the final integrity of Job, more difficult of belief than the similar account and similar lesson of Abraham's temptation, or of Jacob's long probation, or of the strange vicissitudes of Joseph's history, or of the exile and severe trials of Moses? Such questions it would, indeed, be difficult to answer; but the main thing here is that for which there have been cited these glowing passages from the Psalms, containing ideas so apropos to the author's supposed times, but which have no counterpart in the record of his hero's thoughts and sayings, either by way of resemblance or of contrast. The inference is a very rational one. It shows that Job lived—and the first reporter, too, we think—not only before the giving of the Mosaic Law, but at that still earlier time when there was, indeed, a most sublime theism, but when there had not yet been developed the forms or the idea of local outward worship in gathered assemblies. There were no temples, no sanctuaries, no sacred places. It was at the time when the family was the Church, in which the father was head and priest; when pious men knew each other, and held intercourse, as did Abraham and Melchizedek, but when holy days and rites (except sacrifice), and outward collective worship, as such, were things unknown. That such things should have been before the time of Job, and yet without the most remote allusion to them in the Book, seems most incredible, even though the greatest pains had been taken to keep them out. The spirit of such ideas, and of such observances, would have somehow come in, in spite of every effort to exclude the letter. To this collective or temple worship, or sanctuary holiness, revelation had not yet educated even the pious mind. To say nothing, however, of inspiration, or of the divine purposes, and viewing it as a mere question of criticism, it may be maintained that the consistency of Hebrew literature, as we find it, demands that there should be assigned in it a very ancient place to the Book of Job. Such we believe, too, would be the almost unanimous decision of Rationalism, should a similar question, and on similar grounds, be raised in regard to Greek or Hindu writings.

* The author is represented as showing the most marvellous skill in keeping out every allusion to things most deeply interwoven in the Israelitish life. All is foreign and antique. And yet Commentators who maintain this, find the grossest anachronisms in the Book, whenever they can serve the purpose of assigning to it some comparatively modern period. Thus, Merx, p. xlii, finds in ch. xv. 15, 19, an allusion to the Assyrian invasion of 760, or to the fact that foreigners were in the land, and obscuring all the old ideas. Eliphaz is made to refer to the older people "to whom alone was given the land." It is very much the same as if one professing to give a dramatic picture of the Pilgrim Fathers, and striving to keep every thing in harmony with that early time, should suddenly betray himself by an allusion to the late Rebellion. But, with some, the greatest inconsistency is excusable, if it will favor the latest date that can be given to the Book.

IDEAS OF A FUTURE LIFE AMONG SURROUNDING NATIONS;

Alleged to be more clear than those of the Hebrews.

At any date that may be taken for the Book of Job, there was, unquestionably, among the surrounding nations a belief in a future life that had assumed the form of a dogma possessed of a good degree of definiteness in regard to state and conceived local aspect. Such was the case even with Shemitic nations other than the Hebrew. The Syrians had it. Paréau has shown that such a belief existed among the early Arabians. There is proof of it, moreover, from the Koran, all the more satisfactory as it comes in incidentally by way of unquestioned reference. Repeatedly in the contests of Mohammed with the infidels of his day do they characterize as fables of the ancients,* as ideas once firmly held in the earlier simple world, but now regarded as antiquated and wholly obsolete, asatiru 'lawwalina, those doctrines of a future life, and of a resurrection, which he professed to revive and to urge upon them. If we may trust Herodotus and Diodorus Siculus, the most ancient Egyptians had a similarly clear belief. Says the latter, Lib. I., sec. 51, "The abodes of the living they call καταλύσεις, temporary lodging-places or inns, those of the departed (τετελευτηκότων, the dead, not as extinguished, or non-existent, but as a state of being), they call αἰδίωνς δυνονς, everlasting mansions." The idea of the present life as a pilgrimage would seem akin to that expressed in the patriarchal language: "Pilgrims and strangers upon the earth," and may have been derived from it; but there the Hebrew mind, and the Hebrew imagination was stayed. A home to that pilgrimage was indeed implied, and in that they rested. "They went out, not knowing whither they went," nor making any inquiry, nor indulging in any fancy about it, but committing everything to their covenant God. The Egyptian imagination, on the other hand, unchecked by any divine purpose in the development of the doctrine, ran on and made a distinct Hadean world of it, with its distinctly conceived abodes. The idea being separated, too, almost wholly, from that of the personal God, or being independently held as something by itself, became gross and earthly, as though it were a living in catacombs and pyramids, and surrounded by a funereal imagery. Other ancient peoples pictured the thought with lighter and more cheerful accompaniments. We need not refer to the Chaldeans, the Persians, and the Hindoos, as early possessing the idea of a future life; for with them the rationalist has no difficulty. It is only in regard to the Jews that he finds it hard to believe in anything spiritual or unearthly. They could only have learned it from foreign sources; but, in regard to these foreign sources themselves, no questions need be raised. All is easy, except when some strange feeling—of the true nature of which they are, perhaps, not distinctly aware—prompts them to deny all traces of such ideas as originating in the Scriptures, or as being first held, or independently held, by the Hebrew mind. So far, however, as regards these surrounding nations, they are undoubtedly correct. They all had a more or less distinct doctrine of a future life. On that of the Greeks we need not dwell. In the times referred to, in the Iliad and the Odyssey, a local Hadean world of spirits was distinctly conceived and universally held. So was it among the people of Western Europe. The best testimony shows that the Druids, or Celtic priesthood, possessed it, even in that early day.

* See Surat. xxiii. 85: "How is it that when we are dead, and have become dust and bones, that we live again? They are only fables of the ancients, v. 38. Away, then, with what we are threatened with! There is no other life. We live and we die, and then we live no more. They are but stories of the early times." See, also, xxvi. 137, xxvii. 69, 70.

And now here is the wonder which has stumbled many. How is it that such a belief, so universal, so intimately connected, as it would seem, with the very life of religion in any form, and without which we find it difficult to conceive of its having any power for the soul—how is it that such a belief should have been so faint among the people who are called the people of God? Why so little mentioned, if mentioned at all, by those who were chosen as depositaries of the great world-ideas, or the truths by which the race was finally to be regenerated? The wonder is enhanced by the fact that this Hebrew people, the pious among them, had the most exalted ideas of the Divine Being, and the Divine Holiness, so far surpassing all who seemed to be before them, in a distinct conception of the other doctrine. How is it that in Homer the belief is so clearly expressed, whilst in Job it is so veiled? It is altogether stranger from the fact that in Homer there seems little or no demand for it—no moral demand, we mean—whilst in Job the attending spiritual circumstances are such as would appear to call for it in almost every appeal, whether of charge or response. It would have cleared up the great debate at once. So we would have thought. Instead of being used, however, for any such purpose, it seems actually repressed when about to make its appearance. In places where it may be said to have actually broken through the surrounding darkness, it is only for a moment that it shines. It is laid aside; the gloom returns; the old difficulties again crowd the path of their ever-circling argument. So is it elsewhere in the Old Scriptures. The more pious the mind, the more exalted its conceptions of God, the greater the reserve on this point; so that even when it seems to be expressed, or implied, the greatest care is used to exhibit its dependence on the higher idea. The personal God is ever the controlling as well as the fundamental thought: "Thou wilt show me the way of life;" "I shall be satisfied when I awake in Thy likeness;" "Thou wilt guide me by Thy counsel, and afterwards receive me to glory."* In other cases, it is simply the

* It was only, however, by the more pious and meditative, or those who were chosen as the mediums of the written revelation, that the power of this reserve was chiefly felt. That the vulgar Jewish mind had the same views of a ghost-world as prevailed among other nations of antiquity, and as now popularly prevail, is proved by the most unmistakable evidence. We need only refer to such passages as Lev. xix. 31, xx. 6, 27; Deut. xviii. 11; 2 Kings xxi. 16; Isa. viii. 19, xxix. 4. They show a belief so strong and prevalent, in the continued existence of the dead, that there had arisen, in the very earliest times, a class of persons who professed to be mediums of communication between the two worlds. They are called אֹנִיּוֹת, דְּרֵשִׁיִּים, Necromancers, or "Seekers to the dead," דְּרֵשִׁיִּים אֶל מֵתִים. Our modern Spiritualism is only a revived form of this impiety, so early condemned. Another example is furnished by the case of Saul and the Witch of Endor, 1 Sam. xxviii. 3. Whether these were wholly or partly imposture, makes no difference in the argument. Such practices could only have been grounded on a very prevalent popular belief in a ghost-world. Here as elsewhere, the idea, when left to itself, became only the nourisher of a pestilent superstition; because the thought of God, as the conservative expression of the divine care for man, and the strange importance attached to his acts and moral condition; as when Job says, xiv. 3, "Upon such a one dost Thou open Thine eye, and bring me into judgment with Thee?" "What is man that Thou shouldst be so mindful of him?" Again, it is the expression of a soul absorbed in Deity, as it were: "Whom have I in Heaven, or upon the earth, but THEE?" No mention is made of another life, but the power, as we have said, is there; the dogmatic presence is simply veiled in the splendor of the higher idea.

Reasons for this Reserve.

Now there must have been some divine purpose in all this. May we not reverently conclude that such a reserve, in respect to the precious idea of the human immortality, was for the very purpose of preserving it in its highest strength and purity? All other nations had marred the doctrine. They had early received it, and early perverted it. They exercised upon it all the license of an unrestrained imagination. They turned it into fables. They deformed it in every way; or, in endeavoring to add to its mythical interest, they took from it all its moral power. God did not mean thus to give up His own people to their fancies. He had some better thing for them, especially for the more pious and spiritual in Israel. Hence this veil upon the sacred idea, and its indissoluble connection with the divine. It was not because the Hebrews were deficient in imagination. The vulgar belief in a ghost-world, to which we have referred (see note, p. 13), shows that they let it rove, just as all other ancient peoples did, and even to an extent which required divine legislation for its suppression. We can not compare the mythical fancies that seem so universally prevalent with the reserve that was maintained in the Book of Job, or in the utterances of David, Solomon, and the Prophets, without acknowledging the presence of a divine restraint, making the Jewish literature, in this, as well as in its sublime theistic aspect, so different from that of all surrounding or cotemporary nations.

Objections to the Hebrew Scriptures. Alleged Superiority of the Greeks. Homer, Pindar, et al.

And yet this very thing has been urged as an argument against the Bible, and against the spirituality of the Old Testament writers. The very fact that it was esteemed too awful a doctrine for utterance, or even for the imagination, has been used as a testimony against its existence in any form. Witness the effort to explain away every passage which may seem, in any way, directly or indirectly, capable of such a meaning. The Greeks, it has been said, were far beyond them in the development of the doctrine of another life. As early as Homer, and long before Homer—for it could not have sprung up at once—they had a defined topography of the Hadean land. Besides the mysterious spirit-world in its general aspect, as graphically detailed in the XI. Book of the Odyssey, there was the more special abode of the blessed, according to the Greek conception of blessedness. Beyond the earth, or at the extremity of the earth, ἐς περίπαρα γαίης, Odyssey, iv. 563, they had their "Elysian Plain, where presided in judgment the golden-haired Rhadamanthus, where life is ever free idea, became dissociated from it, just as in the modern doctrine, and the modern practice that so closely resembles it. Hence such a belief, instead of being encouraged, is most sharply condemned in the Scriptures. The great guilt consisted in meddling with what belonged solely to God, to be revealed or veiled according to the divine wisdom. The practice of such necromancy prevailed most under the most wicked kings, such as Manasseh; and its evil in the Divine sight is shown by the vehement denunciations of the Prophet: The farther the people departed from God, the more common became this "seeking to the dead."

Glimpses, however, of a better popular belief in some higher and purer spirit-world appear in the Book of Job itself. Whether the word רוּחַ, in the Vision of Eliphaz, iv. 15, denote a spirit, or a breath, the whole context intimates a communication supposed to come from another world. Calling it a dream makes no difference, since dreams show the course of human thinking and belief. The thing, however, most worthy of note in this view, is the nature of the communication made. How different, in this respect, from the modern spiritualism referred to! There is nothing to gratify curiosity—no talk about "spheres," and "progress, or a "coming light," but a most solemn moral announcement. It is for this alone that the separating curtain is for a moment withdrawn. No disclosure is made of states or scenes within. The regulating divine idea is all controlling. That must first of all be learned in its ineffable holiness: "Shall man be more just than God? shall mortal man be more pure than his Maker?" Everything else is withheld, as though until this is firmly established in the soul, the doctrine of a spirit-life may be, in itself, morally powerless, and even unfavorable to a true piety.

from care and toil, where tempest never comes, nor rain nor snow invade, but evermore sweet-breathing gales of Zephyrus refresh the souls of men." Hesiod gives the same picture, Works and Days, 154; and adds to it, as a then current mythology, the conception of "The Isles of the Blessed."

ἐν μακάρων νήσοισιν ἀκηδέα θυμὸν ἔχοντες.

Of which Pindar, not long afterwards, gives such a glowing description, Olymp. II. 110* (BOECKH): "Where the sun is ever shining, where the souls of the just spend a tearless eternity, ἀδακρὺν νέμονται αἰῶνα (or a tearless existence); whilst those of a still higher degree "Take the way of Jove that leads to Saturn's tower, where Ocean's gales breathe round the isles of the blessed, where flowers of gold and fruits immortal grow." In comparison with this, how poor, as some would estimate it, is the dark, shadowy, unlocalized, and wholly indefinite conception of the Old Testament writers, if it can be called a conception at all.

Greater Moral Power of this Old Testament Reserve. Its connection with a Pure Theism.

To a true theological insight, however, there are two thoughts which must reverse the scale, and lead to a very different conclusion. In the first place, there is in this Greek picture but the dimmest idea of God (if there is any such, except in the local designations where divine names seem to be employed), or of any divine righteousness. It is such a view as might be entertained by a writer, who, in another place, PIND., Nem. vi. 1, makes us all the children of nature, gods as well as men. The second thought is its utter lack of moral power. We feel this as we read, and find it confirmed by the fact of the little influence the Greek Hadean conception actually had upon their moral or religious life. In the Hebrew conception, as held by the pious mind, the idea of God, so prominent, so controlling, more than makes up for its dimness, and more than fills out all its scenic or local deficiency. "THOU wilt show me the way of life;" "O that Thou wouldst lay me up in Hades," Job xiv.; "Thou wilt call, and I will answer; Thou wilt have regard to the work of Thy hands." To say nothing now of such a triumphant outburst as we have, Job xix. 25, "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" or such clear hopes as are expressed, Ps. xvii. 15, "I shall behold Thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied when I awake, Thy likeness;" the comparison might be rested on one of the briefest declarations of Scripture, in which death is contemplated as a going to God, and the whole idea of immortality is reduced to a single trust in some undefined blessedness. As Psalm xxxi. 6: בִּידֶךָ אֶפְקֶד רוּחִי, "Into Thy hands do I commit my spirit; THOU hast redeemed me; Lord, God of truth." It matters but little whether we regard this declaration as made in extremis, or in view of some great danger. It is, in either view, the committing of the whole being unto God, as something belonging to Him, in virtue of an eternal relation, expressed by the word, פְּרִיתָהּ אֹתִי, "Thou hast redeemed me," and the covenant idea appearing in אֱמֶת, which ever means truth, as trust or faithfulness, or truth in its personal rather than in its abstract or speculative aspect. "Into Thy hands;" that is all; but how immensely does it transcend in moral power—in "the power of an endless life,"—all those Homeric, Hesiodic, and Pindaric pictures which some would regard as so rich in comparison with the Hebrew poverty.

Comparison of the Early Hindu and Shemitic Belief. Merx' Claim of Superiority for the former.

This lack of a true moral and theological insight is strikingly, though unwittingly, shown by MERX (Das Gedicht von Hiob., p. x.), where, in respect to this belief in another life, he asserts the superiority of the Vedas to the Bible. "In the representations of such an existence after death," he proceeds to say, "there is a deep difference between the people

* It may be said, too, that in this passage of Pindar there is fully developed the other idea, or the doom of the wicked. See line 120.

Τοι δ' ἀνπροσάρατον ὀκχέοντι πόνον.
A woe on which no eye can gaze.

of our race (the Arian) and the Shemitic. The latter know no Isles of the blest, where the noble heroes live. All that is included in that word hero seems to them a reckless audacity. The old men of renown (משׁכִּי, or men of name), appear to them as impudent evil doers. The Semites, in consequence of living with their herds in the plains, and shunning the mountain peaks, fail in the development of the loftier energies. It was otherwise with our ancestral kindred, as we learn from the monuments of their religion. It is true that, in the Vedas, allusions to a life after death do not often occur. They had too much to do with the present world. Still, as a reward for piety, there was held to be admission to the abodes of the Heavenly Powers.* As a proof of the superiority of the Hindu to the Shemitic belief in this respect, he gives us passages from the Rigveda, ix. 113, 7-11, in the rhythmical version of Prof. Roth.

Da, wo der Schimmer nie erlöscht,
Zur Welt des Sonnenlichtes hin,
Der ewigen unsterblichen—
Dahin, O Soma, bringe mich.

Wo König ist Vivaswant's Sohn,
Und wo des Himmels Innerstes,
Wo jene Wasserquellen sind,
Dort lasse mich unsterblich sein!

Wo man behaglich sich ergeht,
Im dritten hohen Himmelsraum,
Wo Schimmer alle Räume füllt
Dort lasse mich unsterblich sein!

Wo Wunsch und Wohlgefallen ist,
Die Hölh', zu der die Sonne klimmt
Wo Lust ist und Befriedigung,
Dort lasse mich unsterblich sein:

Wo Freuden und Ergötzungen,
Wo jubelndes Entzücken wohnt,
Wo sich ein jeder Wunsch erfüllt,
Dort lasse mich unsterblich sein.

Other extracts are made, and of a similar kind. There is a striking sameness in their imagery—all joy and glitter. The first thought that occurs is a doubt whether a writing containing such ideas, and so expressed, can really be regarded as very ancient. There is something about this Epicurean Heaven so full of sunshine,* with such a glee, as it were, arising from the immediate gratification of every desire, and the instantaneous fulfilment of every wish, that is inconsistent with the gravity, the awed contemplative spirit, and solemn reticence of great antiquity. The second thought is its destitution of moral power. It is a mere picture of what is held best on earth, transferred to a supposed higher sphere. It is a pure poetic fancy, the product of the Brahminic imagination, artistic and artificial. It was never inspired in the highest sense. It was not born in any soul travail, nor nursed by the contemplation of any holy or divine idea. God is not in it as the chief and controlling thought. Its heaven is not made by His presence. The mind that dreamed it was not wholly atheistical, but it had no such conception as that of a covenant God and Redeemer, educating men in their first lesson of immortality through the ideas inseparable from such a relation. In other words, these Vedic, Homeric, and Pindaric fancies, so extolled above the dim Hebraic conceptions, were lacking in that element to which we have so repeatedly alluded, δύναμις ζωῆς ἀκατάλυτου, "the power of an endless life," of a being indissoluble, because of its

* The resemblance to the Odyss., iv. 565, vi. 42, and especially to the latter passage, is very striking. A close comparison strongly favors the conclusion that the lines of the Veda, if the translation be correct, must have been, in some way, drawn from these of Homer; a supposition not extravagant, if we suppose them later than Alexander's expedition, and the knowledge that may, perhaps, have come into India from that source.

Wo Schimmer alle Räume füllt, connection with the divine. The Vedaic theology, even in its pantheistic mysticism, has no true recognition of this. To its outward, or Epicurean picture, it is wholly lacking. It knows nothing of the αἰώνιος ζωῇ of the Scriptures, or the true immortality. The sonorous refrain—carries with it no higher conception than that of mere undyingness. It is but a living on in some way differing from the present simply by a higher joyousness, in some higher locality, whether above the Himalaya, or on the summits of Olympus, or even in the skies themselves, with the gods as merely a higher class of companions. The Scriptures were intended for a higher education than this, and hence their very silence is oftentimes more expressive, more suggestive of ideas that are full of life than the most positive language of other ancient writings. "O that I knew where I might find Him." How poor this groping, sighing despair, it may be said, in comparison with the rapture which Merx gives us as a specimen of the higher and clearer ideas of our Arian kinsmen! But Job's darkness is better than its light. The subdued trust of the Psalmist is better than its vain soaring: "Yea, though I walk through the valley of the death-shade (the terra umbrarum, see Job x. 21, xxxviii. 17), I will fear no evil; for THOU art with me." Sombre as are the thoughts suggested by the Hebrew Tzalmaveth, the idea of the redeeming Presence gives it a glory transcending all the sunlight, all the shimmer, and sparkle of the Vedaic hymn.

Dort lasse mich unsterblich sein,

Merx proceeds farther with this contrast, attempting to sustain it by reference to the modes of burial or burning that arose from the different views entertained of death. In every thing of the kind the superiority is assigned to the Arian races. The translation of Enoch had been regarded as an early intimation of a higher life with God, to which one was taken who had "walked with God" on earth. But the condemned Shemites must be robbed even of this. "How widely different," says Merx, that is, how inferior, "were the views of the Hebrews, of whom we must not judge from any thing in the Enoch legend (der Henochsage), since the Hebrew origin of it is more than doubtful."* It is certainly a curious phase of "the higher criticism," as it calls itself, this constant tendency to depreciate the Shemitic Scriptures, whilst never allowing a doubt as to the antiquity or value of any thing, however poor its supporting testimony, that they may choose to place in contrast with them.

Still the fact remains a very strange one, especially as judged by the ordinary criticism, that in this peculiar Shemitic race, and at this very early day, there should have been such a deep religiousness, such a lofty piety, and yet with a conception of a future life so very dim, if it existed at all. We wonder most to find it so deeply veiled in this Book of Job, where the clearer view seems so greatly needed. The divine wisdom, however, in such a veiling, such a reserve, will be the more readily seen and acknowledged, when we think of the wild fables and mischievous notions to which the unguarded Hæcan doctrine gave rise among other peoples of antiquity, and especially as it became more and more dissevered from any regulatng divine idea. Of this we have already spoken. It remains to say that in our own times we find a still more striking proof of the moral danger of such a severance. The modern "spiritualism," as it calls itself, would be unworthy of grave notice here, were it not as a manifestation of such a tendency. It is becoming almost wholly naturalistic, and even atheistical. Its continual babble about natural laws shows its strong desire to keep out, as far as possible, the ideas of God and moral causation. The same may be said in respect to some aspects of modern science. How strong the aversion which is manifested, in certain quarters, to the idea of a personal God, with its necessarily associated ideas of Providence and Prayer! They interfere with the doctrine of fixed evolution, or of uninterrupted physical causation. And yet it is most worthy of note, that there is no such aversion to the mere idea of a post-mortem existence. Some who have gone to the very verge of atheism have expressed a willingness to patronize the other dogma, provided it can be presented in some scientific form. Separate it from the thought of God, or of any dread moral government; reduce it to a mere physical fact, and there need be no objection to it. There is nothing in the way. The theories of the origin of life, as held by many, are quite consistent with its continuance in some finer organization, or in some higher physical development.

* "More than doubtful." What knowledge has he enabling him to make so nice an estimate? The reason given is that "Enoch is representative of the departed year gone to the Ewigkeit." We may see by this what rapid progress Rationalism sometimes makes. What Ewald hazarded as a mere conjecture, founded on nothing stronger than the coincidence (very remarkable among so many stated numbers!) of Enoch's age with the number of days in the year, Merx treats as a settled point, which none now would think of calling in question. Nothing, however, is more improbable. Those very "wise Egyptians," as late as the time of Herodotus, had not yet determined the year by five days, still treating it, in some respects, as 360, and yet these critics would have it not only settled in the days of Enoch, but so well settled as to make a myth out of it. Then, again, it would be a mere sentimentalism, sultry well in modern times, but inconsistent with a great antiquity.

Atheism and Materialism not Inconsistent with some Doctrine of Future Being.

In this way, the most crass materialism may have its future state, possessing, perhaps, a memory of the former; since memory and consciousness are merely the results of organization, and may thus be carried through from one to the other. Even atheism cannot wholly shut out the idea, or the phantom, if it would. It may have a ghostly world of the future, even as it makes a ghost of the present. It may have its spectres and its demons, all the product of natural laws, even if it has no God. It cannot escape the thought of the fearful by denying the existence of any power above nature. Who knows what forms of being such an omnipotent and eternal nature may produce? And who can say that they may not be inconceivably dire and monstrous? If one says, that cannot be so,—there must be something in the universe, as a whole, which prevents the predominance of what we call evil, whether physical or moral—the question at once arises, how does he know that from any science, with its infinitesimal experience? He is unconsciously taking refuge in a higher doctrine, or borrowing ideas from the condemned theological sphere of thought. Even the Democritic, or the Atomic philosophy, whether in its most ancient or its most modern form, may have its future state. Among the endless phenomena of the physical universe, man may re-appear; the very same man, so far as there can be any such thing as personal identity. Given infinite time, and infinite space, and infinite variety, of working, and the atoms which compose his brain may come together in the same proportion, site, and arrangement as before. When this takes place, there he is again, with the same feelings, thoughts, knowledge, memory, consciousness,—all being, as before, simply the results of that peculiar material organization which alone makes him what he is. The idea of another life after death is not, in itself, an absolute essential of religion; since, as Genesis and this Book of Job most clearly prove, there may be even a lofty piety where there is only the dimmest conception of such a state. In its perversion, on the other hand, it may even become the ally of irreligion. Severed from the divine idea, it may be the parent of the most monstrous superstitions, or link itself with some gross doctrine of a physical metempsychosis—becoming, in either case, a more evil thing than the densest skepticism.

A PURE THEISM TO BE FIRST TAUGHT.

The Great Lesson of the Book—The Absolute Sovereignty of God.

The distinctions made in the preceding pages have been the more largely dwelt upon as furnishing a reason, we may reverently suppose, why, in the early revelation, this doctrine of a future life is kept so much under the veil. It is that the other and the diviner doctrine may be the more fully learned, and firmly fixed in the human mind, as the conservative principle, the purifying power of all other religious beliefs. The subordinate idea, as we have said, is not wholly excluded from the Book of Job. It now and then appears amid the darkness; but there is made no use of it in enforcing the great lesson, which is, to teach the absolute moral sovereignty of God, and the unqualified duty of human submission, as to a demand carrying in itself its own inherent righteousness. The theism, the theodicé of the Book is its great feature. Never were the divine personality, the divine holiness, the divine government unchallengeable, in a word, the absolute divine sovereignty, more sublimely set forth. Here there is no reserve: God most wise and good, most just and holy, to be acknowledged as such whether we can see it or not; God who "maketh one vessel to honor and another to dishonor," who "setteth on high or casteth down," who "bindeth up or breaketh in pieces," who is to be regarded as having the holiest reasons for all this, yet "giveth no account of His ways," allowing "no one to touch His hand, and say unto Him what doest Thou?"

Such is the lesson taught. This is the problem solved, if we may use the language most commonly employed in reference to the Book. We do not, however, regard it as the best. The idea that the poem, or drama, of Job is intended for the solution of a problem, or as the authoritative decision of a debate, has led astray, we think, from a right view of its true character. There is no objection to the word, if it is used simply as a name for the great lesson undoubtedly taught, and which Job so thoroughly learned, namely,—this holy divine sovereignty,—but when we attempt to specify any other issue regarded as involved in the arguments of the speakers, and as finally decided by the divine appearing, we fall into endless confusion, as is evinced by the number of varying and discordant theories to which such a view of the Book has given rise. The design certainly cannot be to teach a future state. What has been already said is sufficient in respect to that point. Neither can it be to prepare the way for such a doctrine by furnishing representations which drive to its necessary acknowledgment as the only solution of the alleged problem.* The hope of compensation such views might seem to involve would be out of harmony with that other and greater acknowledgment which Job at last makes so unreservedly, and some idea of which seems to pervade the Book from beginning to end. In respect to all such ideas of compensation, whether in this life or in any other, it is sufficient to say that no mention is made of them in the divine address, whatever may have been the subsequent fact; they are not assigned as having any bearing upon Job's affliction, or as clearing up, in any way, the mystery that surrounds it. The same may be said in regard to any disciplinary purpose, on which Elihu so largely insists. The divine voice makes no allusion to it. The criminations of his friends, Job's assertions of his integrity (in those most eloquent concluding appeals of chapters xxix., xxx., xxxi.), and Elihu's "pretentious wisdom," as some have characterized it, are all dismissed as being, so far as the great mystery is concerned, but a "darkening of counsel by words without knowledge."

VARIOUS VIEWS OF THE BOOK.

Delitzsch, Merx, Umbreit, etc.

"Why do afflictions befall the righteous man?" "This," says Delitzsch, "is the question, the answering of which is made the theme of the Book of Job." "This answer," he proceeds, "if we look at the conclusion of the Book alone, is, that such afflictions are the way to a two-fold blessedness." The first of these is the restoration of the earthly good of which he had been deprived. This, however, Delitzsch pronounces inadequate as a solution, and not, in general, true. The second is the internal blessedness which the righteous man finds through such a process. "It is the important truth," he says, "that there is a suffering of the righteous which is not a decree of wrath, but a dispensation of love, and this is the heart of the Book of Job." To this general view he gives two divisions: 1. The afflictions of the righteous are a means of discipline and purification; 2. They are proofs and tests of character coming from the love and regard of God. In short, "they are disciplinary and they are testing." All this may be admitted as, in some way, taught in the Book, or truly suggested by it. So, also, there are other theories presented in various ways by other writers, but all coming to nearly the same thing. Some express themselves with more freedom in respect to the question of fact, whether the Book really furnishes the solution it seems to propose. Merx, the latest interpreter, does not hesitate to pronounce it a failure. After saying much of the Vergeltungslehre of the Mosaic religion, and of the Old Testament generally, and of this Book as being polemically opposed to such a doctrine of retribution—all of which Delitzsch justly estimates as "a phantom of the Rationalists"—he goes on to speak, in the highest terms, of the artistic excellence of the work, patronizing it even to extravagance, but does not shrink from saying that the solution it proposes is not only inadequate but false. The great problem is still unsolved, and the writer intimates that it all comes from the fact that the author of the Book was ignorant of "the Critical Philosophy." "Of this," says Merx, with more naïveness than he ascribes to the old poet, "he does not seem to have had the faintest notion." How the Critical Philosophy would have saved the difficulty, or rather would have shown it to be wholly imaginary, he endeavors to tell us, but it seems far less clear than the Book of Job itself, and may be dismissed with the same sentence of failure and inadequateness. Still the objections made by such commentators as Umbreit and Merx have much force in them as applied to many of the so-called solutions. A stronger objection to some of them is that they receive no countenance from the prologue, or from the address of Jehovah at the close,—where, if anywhere, such a clear solution of the problem might have been expected.

Key in the Prologue—A Super-earthly Probation.

If we are to judge it solely as an artistic production, then the plan and design of it are to be sought in the prose introduction, just as we look there for the design of a Greek drama,—and this without any nice discussion of the unimportant question, whether the book is to be called dramatic, any more than lyrical or epic. Here is a preface with the evident design of explaining what the mere poem might leave unknown, and without which, as has been tersely said, the dramatic speeches would be artistically a mere torso,—a trunk without a head. In this introduction we do find something which, in the absence of other considerations, we should be required to take as the leading idea of the work. It is, that there are reasons for human events, even for the sufferings of good men, that may wholly transcend this earthly sphere, having no reference to any human probation, for its own sake, either by way of discipline or retribution, but designed to serve a purpose in the super-human world. It is a problem for the בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים the Sons of God, one in which they are interested, by which they are to be influenced, but in which a man is the sufferer, the testing patient through whom the truth is exhibited. Thus, earth may be the theatrum in which dramatic events are represented for the instruction of higher beings. It may be to show them that there is such a thing as human virtue, that man immersed in nature, and exposed to the strongest temptations, may "serve God for nought," that is, disinterestedly, or from pure love of the service; as Job did, both in his prosperity and in his perfect submission, at last, to a dispensation unexplained and inexplicable. Such a thought seems plainly in the prologue; but be it what it may, there is a conceivable design of this kind sufficiently great and beneficent to justify the ways of God, even to our reason, without any demand of compensation to the one by whom the example or the test is made,—especially in view of the fact that such a demand, or even such an expectation, would be the most direct proof of its failure.*

* Some such thought of a superearthly drama appears in what the Apostle says, Eph. iii. 10: "That now through the Church there might be made known to the Principalities and Powers in the Heavenly World (ἐν τοῖς ἐπουρανίοις), the manifold (πολυποικίλος, immensely varied) wisdom of God." See Olshausen on the text: "The Church (good men on earth, whether in their piety or their sufferings) is the theatre (seiner Wirksamkeit) through which this manifold wisdom and teaching are made known to the angels." In support of the idea, Olshausen very properly cites 1 Pet. i. 12: εἰς ἃ ἐπιθυμοῦσιν ἄγγελοι παρακύψαι: "Which things the angels desire to look into" (to bend eagerly forward for that purpose) and Paul's language, 1 Cor. iv. 9: θεάτρον ἐγενήθημεν τῷ κόσμῳ καὶ ἀγγέλοις.

The Lesson of Unqualified Submission.

The design may be discipline or punishment, having reference solely to the individual. All that need to be maintained is, that it is not necessarily such. They may be admitted as subordinate aims, in connection with something higher and more universal. As thus subordinate, they may even become prominent in the dramatic teaching, as seems to be the case in Job, and yet without furnishing the idea, or the grounds, of the great lesson. Or it may be the design, aside from these, or in connection with these, to teach the lesson of absolute and unconditional submission to the divine will, and an acknowledgment of its necessary wisdom and goodness, whether we see it or not, either in the present or in any other life. This is quite different from a stoical fatality, or from any mere arbitrariness. It is not that the divine will makes right, but that it constitutes for us an evidence of its absolute righteousness that is not to be called in question. The because, we may say, has reference to our judgments. He does it because it is absolutely right in itself; we say it is right (in the absence of other knowledge) because He does it. As the Psalmist says, xxxix. 10: "I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because Thou didst it." It is a theism inadequate, impure, tainted by some ideas of fatality, or of a power higher than God, that hesitates in making this full and absolute affirmation. The reasons of the divine procedure in any particular case may be wholly or partially hidden. They may have reference to the individual experience, discipline, or purgation of the sufferer, and yet be wholly unknown to him. Job vehemently asserts his innocence. There is something noble in his expostulations; it was not a vain display of self-righteousness; he was driven to it by unjust criminations; and yet there might have been hidden evils whose existence his inexplicable sufferings should have led him to suspect, aside from the question whether they were, or were not, the sole cause of the calamities which had come upon him. He should have searched for them as the Psalmist did, and prayed for self-knowledge. His earnest appeal to God: "O show me wherefore Thou thus dealest with me," is indeed very touching, but it manifests too serene a confidence in his entire integrity. It is not like the prayer of David: "Cleanse Thou me from secret faults;" or of him who said: "Make me to know wisdom in the inward parts;" or of the later exile, who so fervently prayed: "Search me, O God, and know my heart; prove me, and know my thoughts, and see if there be any evil way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting." If it be said that Job was very defective here as compared with some others of the Old Testament worthies, it may be urged, on his behalf, that the accusations of his friends, charging him with open transgressions of which he knew he was not guilty, led him away into a mode of defence just in respect to them, but not maintainable before the All-knowing, as he himself afterwards most clearly saw.

But aside from this, or along with this disciplinary purpose, there may have been other reasons belonging to the ἀόρατα, the ineffable, the mysterious, transcending, perhaps, the human faculties, but which he was bound to admit as possible, however much he or others might fail in finding an explanation of the severe trial to which he had been exposed. "He giveth not account of his ways." Such a view may be characterized as harsh and arbitrary, but it is perfectly consistent with the highest estimate of the Divine clemency. "God knoweth our frame; He remembereth that we are dust." He hath pity upon man. Even the thought of his depravity, the fact that "the imagination of the heart of man is evil from his youth," is mentioned (Gen. ix. 21) as one of the grounds of the divine compassion. But he knoweth, too—are we not warranted, from the tenor of revelation, in saying it—that the loftiest height to which the human soul can attain, and ultimately its highest blessedness, is the acknowledgment of God's absolute right, as the acknowledgment of His absolute glory! It is that to which the human soul of the Saviour attained when, in the great struggle with Satan, in the mysterious and inexplicable agony, he said, "Thy will be done."

The Absolute Divine Sovereignty before any Doctrine of Human Destiny.

Thus regarded, the value of a pure theism, in which the absolute divine sovereignty holds its sovereign place, is beyond that of every other dogma.* Without it, all other religious teaching may become not only vain but mischievous. Without it, the doctrine of a future life may become the source of the greatest moral evils, leading, at last, to atheism, after having been the ally of the grossest superstitions. On this account, may we say again, was there need of a reserve that might hold in check the roving imagination,—of a veil, not wholly obscuring, but allowing only the faintest glimpses, now and then, to keep the soul from utterly sinking. Such a schooling of the chosen people, as the world's representatives, was demanded, we may say, until the other great and conserving truth should be perfectly learned, and indelibly stamped upon the soul. Far better a dim shadowy belief in a future life, or a mere feeling without any distinct conception of state or locality, or resolving itself into a pure elementary trust in a covenant God,—far better this than an unrestrained imaginative picturing, destitute of all true moral power, and to which the thought of God, as a moral sovereign, is, in a great measure, alien, if not wholly lost. Far better the old patriarchal and Hebrew reserve in this respect than such a Hades, and such an Elysium, as we read of in the Greek poets, or any such rhapsodies as the Rationalist so triumphantly quotes for us from the Rigveda. Among the many other solutions, then, of the Book of Job, this seems certainly entitled to respectful attention. It is the teaching of such a theism, whilst throwing into the back-ground, to say the least, not only the dogma of a future life, but every thought of compensation,† discipline, or anything else, that might interfere with the absolute unconditionality of the greater doctrine.

THE THEOPHANY.

Its One Idea: The Divine Omnipotence. \ God "can do All Things."

If the solution of the problem, as some call it, is to be found anywhere, it is in the address of the Almighty. That is what every reader naturally expects, and is disappointed, to some extent, in not finding. No explanation, however, is given of the cause of Job's mysterious sufferings, nor any decision made in regard to the matters in debate between him and his antagonists. Instead of that, one idea, predominant and exclusive, pervades every part of that most sublime exhibition. It is that of power, omnipotent power, first as exhibited in the great works of creation,‡ and afterwards in those greater productions of nature that * It is not too much to say that even now, in this advanced age of theology, there is arising a new need of this idea. There is something in the naturalistic tendencies of our science, and our literature, which more and more demands a revival of the thought of a personal, holy, omnipotent, unchallengeable God, who "doeth all things according to His good pleasure," whether through nature, or against nature, or above nature. The sharpening of this would give a new edge to every other religious dogma. The ideas of sin, holiness, accountability, would receive a new impress of clearness and power. The doctrine of a future life would get a moral significance, throwing in the back-ground those naturalistic and merely imaginative features which are now making it a matter of curious speculation, or of physical, rather than of ethical interest. Such a sudden sharpening of the divine idea would have a startling effect, like the actual witnessing of a miracle, in bringing so near the thought of God as to set it in a new and surprising light, resembling vision rather than theory, and calling forth something like the exclamation of Job, when "the hearing of the ear" had become an actual beholding.

† As matter of outward fact, indeed, there is set forth in the close of the drama a full compensation. It forms, what some, who are fond of the more artistic criticism, call "the outer disentanglement," or Die Lösung in unserer Wirklichkeit; but we are nowhere told that this entered into the idea of the poem. As such, it would be inconsistent with the thought so prominent in the prologue, or the possibility of a man's serving God for nought. As a mere outward scene, however, it has a certain appropriateness, like the matter-of-fact close of a Greek drama, sometimes brought in as a satisfaction to the reader, to save him from pain, by making a harmony in the outward narrative. But in Job the great lesson is complete without it. We read it with pleasure, as something simply due to dramatic consistency, that when the spiritual drama is over, the hero, as the Rationalists, with some propriety, call him, may not be left in his state of suffering; but the great inward design is concluded by the submission of Job, which would have been utterly spoiled by the intimation of any expected recompense. The apparent design, too, of the prologue is satisfied without it. When Job submits, Satan is baffled, and God's judgment is true.

‡ It is worthy of note how the appeal is made alike to the great natural and the great super-natural, as though the seem next in rank to the creative power itself. Nothing is said of any purpose in the great trial, or of anything which should be made known to Job as preparatory to his submission. There is no hint in respect to ultimate compensation as a motive for endurance, such as is held out in the Gospel to the Christian: "They that endure unto the end, shall be saved." There is no allusion to any scheme of discipline, no suggestion of afflictions which are only evils apparently, since they are designed for purification, or as a preparative for a higher blessedness. The curtain is not withdrawn to disclose to us any vision of optimism as a motive for the creature's submission. Nothing of this kind appears, but only that idea of power, omnipotent power, thundered forth in tones that seem intended to silence rather than to convince. However strange it may seem, this is all the voice we hear, startling and confounding at first, but soon causing us to forget everything in a feeling of its sublime appropriateness: "Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth?" What knowest thou of the divine purposes in thy own creation, or in that of the universe? What right, therefore, hast thou to challenge any of them as unrighteous or unwise, much less to dream of any fatality, or of any nature of things by which they might be baffled, whether they be purposes of justice or of clemency? It would seem as though its only design was to overwhelm, and it is overwhelming. Job falls upon his face and acknowledges that he has learned the lesson. It is not mere terror. Deep is the reverence; but there is also the conviction of the understanding and the conscience: "I know that Thou canst do all things, and that no purpose* of Thine can be hindered." Had he doubted it before? It would certainly seem so, whether at the time he had been fully conscious of it or not.

The Old Idea of Fate—The Name El Shaddai as Opposed to it.

A feeling of something irresistible in the vast surrounding nature, something with which it is vain for man to struggle, and against which not even a divine power could help him, shows itself, more or less, in all the early heathen religions, as it appears afterwards in the systems of philosophy. They called it fate, μοῖρα, doom, destiny. It was superior to gods as well as to men. It was irrational, inconsistent with any true theistic conception, but its ever-pressing nearness, as well as the vastness and indefinableness of its aspect, gave it an overpowering weight. That some feeling of this kind, some beginning of a fatalistic idea, may have been in the minds of God's people, tainting even the otherwise pure theism of the patriarchs, would seem probable from the stress laid upon that assuring epithet, אל שרי, occurring so often in Genesis and Job, and furnishing such strong evidence of the antiquity of the latter Book. "Almighty God," אל שרי, Deus potentissimus, omnipotens, παντοκράτωρ, the strong God, Deus sufficiens, כאומה, אשר לא יבצר ממנו, "from whom nothing can be hindered," to whom nothing can fail—this was the great name of strength and encouragement which God Himself employs to cheer the hearts of those early men, and keep them from fainting in their pilgrimage: אני אל שרי, "I am El Shaddai, therefore, fear ye not, but walk before me." Thus regarded, too, much of the language of the Old Testament respecting the divine power, the divine sovereignty, and the extreme jealousy that guards against the least impeachment of these attributes, loses all its seeming harshness. Like the denunciations of idolatry, it is conservative of pure religion. It is a protest against the nature-worship, the fatalistic ideas that were everywhere coming in to pervert the true theistic conception. Thus viewed, distinction had not then been made; or the line drawn, as in our modern thinking; or as though to the Divine Mind such a distinction was of no account. Nature and law are clearly recognized in the Bible; but both departments, the natural and the supernatural, are regarded as equally illustrating the power and greatness of God as manifested in all. The same may be said of the appeal to the great animal creations, surpassing man in strength and magnitude. It is not to show design, or utilitarian ends, as in our modern natural theology, and hence to demonstrate the existence of a Deity. Job is not addressed as doubting that, or as needing any proof of God's wisdom and goodness. Everything, on the other hand, bears upon this one idea of omnipotence. It is to show that God "can do all things"—a truth which Job confesses (xlii. 2), in language intimating that he had not before fully realized it.

* Literally, "hindered from Thee." לצר has its Syriac sense of diminution, restraint, failure. LXX. ἀδυναρεῖ δὲ σοι οὐδέν. The Syriac has "nothing can be hidden from Thee," and in this it resembles our common version. Dr. Conant's is better: "And from Thee no purpose can be withheld;" but fails, we think, in giving the full thought, which is that of insufficiency, or want of power in the execution.

it is the language of paternal Deity, encouraging to faith and submission as the only blessedness of the human state: "Fear not, for I can do all things."

The Fatalistic Idea betrays Itself in the Speeches of Job and his Friends.

Such a misgiving dread of some insurmountable fatality, putting his case beyond the reach even of any divine help, seems to lurk in the speeches of Job at the times of his extremest despair. The friends were not pressed to it, as he was, by an anguish unendurable. They had not his experience to breed a doubt. Free from pain and trouble, they could theorize complacently on the divine excellencies, "speaking good words for God," as Job taunts them, and expatiating at their ease on this attribute of omnipotence. Here the speeches of Zophar and Bildad are peculiarly eloquent, however ill-timed. Job, too, is roused to emulation, and strives to surpass them (see especially chs. xxv. and xxvi.). And yet this very style of speech seems, now and then, to betray a want of the confidence it so loudly assumes. The speaker seems to indulge in it as a mode of fortifying himself in a faith not wholly free from a lurking skepticism. None of them, however, ever intimated a doubt of the justice and wisdom of God. In his extreme anguish, Job may seem to be approaching some thought of the kind, but immediately revolts from it, as from the edge of an abyss. He cannot give it up: God is good; He is righteous; He is most pure and holy; but may it not be that there is something, be it fate, be it nature, be it an invisible, fiendish* power, that baffles all His mercy and all His wisdom. "The earth is given into the hands of the wicked," ix. 24; is this the work, or the permission, or the weakness of God? אם לא אפני כי הוּא, "if not, who then?" Would there be such sore evils? Above all, would they come upon the innocent, if he could help it? Is there not a nature, a fixed order of things (as Job, according to Merx, would have said, had he understood "the Critical Philosophy," or the distinction between "the moral and the practical reason,") which cannot be set aside?

The Divine Address adapted to this Fatalistic Idea.—Job's Renunciation of it.

He has not ventured to say it openly in words; the very thought seemed to demand repression whenever it showed itself, however dimly, to the consciousness. It was there, however, as is shown by the language of the divine address so directly adapted to such a state of soul, and the closing acknowledgment of Job, expressing a new and clear conviction that admits no doubt. It is absolute certainty, — the certainty of sight, as compared with any abstract theorizing, or any traditional "hearing by the ear:" I know, — it is like the ecstatic assurance he had of his Redeemer's living — "I know† that Thou canst do all things; and

* There is language in chapter xvi. from which it would seem that Job had such beings in view, — a multitude of them, in fact, as well as the great enemy mentioned in the prologue. Such expressions as those in verses 9 and 10, of that chapter, can hardly be used of the three friends: "His anger rends me; he lies in wait for me (שָׂטָן), cognate with שָׂטָן (Satan); he gnashes on me with his teeth; mine enemy (צָר), sharpens his eyes upon me (glares at me); they gape upon me with their mouths" (בָּעֵר), like the yawning Orcus, Is. v. 14). We are shocked at the very thought of such words being applied to God, although most of the commentators have so taken them. The language that follows: "God delivers me up," etc., though strong, is in a different style; simply presenting the idea of an unjust surrender into Satan's hands. It might be said, too, that the absence of any expressed subject (simply implied, he, they, etc.) is evidence of something fearful in the thought, as in the cases mentioned, note, p. 7. The referring them to God, would be inconsistent, moreover, with the appeal to the Witness on high, ver. 20. The language of vers. 9 and 10 shows an imagination wildly excited, as though at the sight of fiends making hideous faces, scowling, and glaring at him. It would seem strange, too, that Satan should so figure in the prologue, and that afterwards no allusion whatever should be made to him. It would not be artistic, if that, as some say, is the chief character of the book. Is there not an implied reference to this great persecutor and murderer (ἀνθρωποκτόνος, John viii. 44), in the appeal to the Avenger or Redeemer, xix. 25? Raschl speaks very confidently in respect to the language, xvi. 9, as though it could not admit of a doubt: "Satan here is the enemy;" והשָׂטָן הוּא הַצָּר.

† Merx, the latest commentator on Job, in the short notes he adds to his new text and translations, is very fond of putting the word dogmatic to the renderings, ancient or modern, which he rejects. He means by this to stigmatize them as made in a dogmatic interest, even though sometimes giving the only possible meaning which the Hebrew will admit. He ought to have seen how greatly his own version is affected by that precisely identical kind of interest, which we may call the dogmatic anti-dogmatic. He cannot understand this passage according to the text, and so he does not hesitate to give a different punctuation, allowing him to render it: "Thou knowest that Thou canst do all things," an answer which wholly mars the force of Job's appeal. Although it may still be taken as his confession of the great truth, yet the putting it thus in the second person makes it not only a pointless assertion, but seems greatly to change the aspect and spirit of the that nothing is hindered from Thee." It is as though he had said: Now I am sure of it; if the continuance of my misery is not from Thy want of goodness and mercy, much less is it from Thy lack of power; nothing is too hard for Thee; no nature can baffle Thee; no fate stands in Thy way; no invisible power of evil, however mighty, can prevent Thee from "doing according to Thy sovereign will, either in the armies of heaven, or among the inhabitants of the earth." He bows before this divine utterance as conclusive, not only of its own truth, but in respect to everything in the character and government of God that may have been, either directly or indirectly, called in question. It is Thou then who hast done it, and therefore is it holy, just, and wise. Once shown that it is truly God's act—not nature's, merely, or Satan's—and that, if it had not been such, everything in nature that stood in the way would have been crushed out if necessary,—all else follows to the believing soul. Thou hast done it, therefore, is it right? I ask no farther. "Surely have I uttered what I did not understand; things wonderful," far beyond my knowledge. But, oh! "hear me now; let me speak; let me ask of Thee, and do Thou give me knowledge. By the hearing of the ear had I heard of Thee; but now Thou comest near, and I confess Thee as the Almighty. Wherefore, I reject myself (my arguments), and repent in dust and ashes." There is deep feeling here, as of one who has come to a new view of himself and of his relations to God. It is to be noted, however, that it is not from any disclosure of the causes of his sufferings, nor from any hope held out of their alleviation, but altogether from this thunder voice, the tones of which, however varied in the presentation of the great natural or the great supernatural, ever modulate themselves to this one key of Omnipotent, unchallengeable power.

God the Only Power in the Universe.

Not only no other God, but no other power than God in the universe. Compare Isaiah xlv. 6: "I am the first, and I am the last; beside me there is no God." It reminds us of the oft-repeated Arabic formula, so concise, and yet so full: No God but God, which must have entered most significantly into the early religion of the Arabians, as we may judge from its prevailing use in the later Koranic. The Mohammedan fatalism, as it has been called, may sometimes have a superstitious aspect, but, in its pious form, as thus expressed, it is rather a protest against a physical fatalism, or against any other power than God, such as is made here in the challenge of Shaddai, the Almighty. There is not only no other personal Deity, but no power in Nature, or in Fate, or in any system of things, that can, for a moment, stand in His way, if the vindication of His holiness, His wisdom, or His goodness, demand its breach, or its removal.

In this view, we see the force of that musing, wondering language which intervenes, ver. 3, where Job seems, without any reason, to be repeating to himself the words of the Almighty, as though they struck him in a new aspect, or suggested something which he had not thought of before: "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?" They seem so strange, that Merx and others, with a lack of critical insight, we think, reject them as an interpolation or a misplacement. As first uttered by Jehovah, we have reason to regard them as most directly applicable to the speech of Elihu, who, although uttering great truths (the soundest ethical doctrine, and approaching the nearest of all the speakers to a solution of the supposed problem), had yet done it in a somewhat pretentious manner. As the last speaker, too, he may be regarded as first noticed in the divine address. It does not militate against this that it is said: "The Lord answered Job out of the whirlwind." There passage. It would be as though he had said: I submit, I lay my hand upon my mouth, because any other course would be of no avail. Thou knowest, Thyself, that Thou art infinitely strong, and canst do as Thou pleasest; of what use, then, any remonstrance? God knoweth the difficulties and darkness of our minds as well as our bodily frames. We may, therefore, believe that a doubt in respect to His power would be less displeasing to Him than such a captious irreverence. There is a shadow of authority for Merx. The pointing is of the first person, but the closing yod is supplied by the Keri. It is the same in this respect as in Ps. cxl. 13. יִדְעֶתָּ for יִדְעֶתָּ, in full, and in עֲשִׂיתָּ for עֲשִׂיתָּ, Ezek. xli. 19. It may be also taken as an Aramæism, as it would doubtless have been called could it have been made to suit a rationalistic purpose.

is nothing in the way of regarding these first words as the briefest allowable notice of the man whose voice had just done sounding,* stopped, as it were, by the sudden interruption, and then followed by the turning, in a different style, to Job the subject of the general answer: "But gird up now thy loins, like a man; I have something to say to thee." In this second appeal, xlii. 3, Job seems to take the language to himself, and yet in a manner which shows that it had not been his first thought. In a sort of dreamy maze, he says over the former words of Jehovah, which had made so deep an impression on his mind: "Who is this? Who is this that darkens counsel by words without knowledge?" Yes; it is I. I am the man; I see it now; I am that man who has uttered what he understood not. It is a still deeper feeling of what he had said before: "Surely I am vile (MEXX, weak—dogmatic), what shall I answer Thee? I lay my hand upon my mouth. Once, twice have I spoken, but I will not answer. I say no more." "Who is this (dost Thou ask) that darkens counsel by words without knowledge?" To whomsoever else they are applicable, surely they apply to me. In his deep confession and self-abasement, he thinks only of himself and his position in the sight of God. And herein lies the difference between Job and the others. They stand in amazement, it may be, awed by this display of the divine majesty, yet without prostration or confession. Still confident in their own wisdom, they may actually regard these thunder-tones of omnipotence as a decision in their favor, as their vindication, in fact, instead of their rebuke. For had not they, also, all of them, expatiated on this idea of the divine power, to the crushing and humiliation of the trembling Job? The repetition of the words, "who is this?" has the appearance of interrupting the train of thought and feeling. On this account, the critic rejects what a closer insight into this rapt, soliloquizing, ejaculatory style,

* The genuineness of the speech of Elihu, which has been much attacked, may be defended on three grounds that, aside from their moral weight, are entitled to attention from those who patronize the Book chiefly on its alleged artistic merits. These are—

1st. That, without it, the appearance and address of Jehovah must be taken as immediately following ch. xxxi., in which case the words, "Who is this that darkeneth counsel," etc., must refer directly to the clearest, most consistent, and most eloquent speech in the Book, namely, Job's noble vindication of his fair life against the damnable accusations of his friends. It is a most manly appeal, undeserving, we reverently think, of being thus characterized as vain and dark, at least in comparison with those of the others. Besides, the term, מַצַּי, counsel, teaching, argument, cannot be applied to it as it can to the speech of Elihu, which is ostentatiously didactic. Job's appeal, ch. xxxi., is simply a vindicatory statement of fact, in opposition to unrighteous charges. If he is divinely commended for anything, except his last words of submission and repentance, it must be for this noble defence.

2d. The language, "Who is this, etc." would be applicable to much in the general style and spirit of Elihu's discourse. Although the divine answer, as a whole, is addressed to Job, yet nothing would seem more natural than such an incidental reference to the last speaker, who is seemingly interrupted in his eloquence by the sudden rebuke of the supernatural voice. It was a giving counsel, an assumption of wisdom, a claiming "to speak for God;" and although we think that those critics altogether overstrain the matter who charge Elihu with being merely a loquacious babbler, or a vain pretensions disputant, yet, as an attempted vindication of the divine ways, it was a more fit subject for this comparative censure, than the honest and glowing words of Job in ch. xxxi., to which it immediately, or without the least preparation, succeeds, if the part of Elihu is left out. The repetitions of this last speaker, on which some have so much insisted, are of little consequence. They may be blemishes, or rhetorical excellencies, according to the stand-point from which they are viewed. The specimens we have of the old Arabic Seance, or Consensus, show that such a repetitive style of sententious moralizing was held in literary repute. At all events, it is characteristic, and this they should regard as a dramatic merit in what they call a "work of art." But, aside from this, there is something in the whole of ch. xxxvii., and especially in the closing verses, to which the language is very applicable, as referring to the last speaker, although the divine address is described, generally, by the historian, as made to Job, to whom, personally, it immediately turns. The words "darkening counsel," etc., denote invalidity of argument, doubtless, but, along with this, they are descriptive of the apparent timidity, abruptness, and awe-struck confusion that seem to characterize the close of Elihu's harangue. It is the language of one gazing on some strange appearances. The emotion and the exclamations thence produced mingle with his didactic utterances, so that he says, ver. 19: "Tell us what we shall say, for we cannot order our speech, by reason of darkness." And this suggests the—3d Ground, namely, That the whole scene is a reality, and that this interlude of Elihu, and especially his abrupt exclamatory closing words, are a convincing evidence of it. It is either a painting from the life, or it is the most consummate art. There is the strongest internal evidence that, during this speech of Elihu, there is represented the approach of the storm-cloud, the rising tornado, interrupting and confusing his words, calling away his attention, and giving rise to broken remarks on the vivid phenomena that accompany it, until he is suddenly silenced by the awful voice. Some of the best commentators have thus regarded the language as referring to an actual coming storm. Delitzsch cites Bridel for the opinion that the thunder, mentioned xxxvii. 1, is not a mere matter of eloquent description, but something actually presented to the senses: "L'éclair brille, la tonnerre gronde." It is the language of an eye and ear witness, or if it is a mere work of art—it is so arranged and expressed as to convey that impression. So Rosenmüller, in the words of Bouillier: "Inter verba Elihu, dum hæc loqueretur, tonitru exauditus; ad cuius cæcum murmur, mox in fragorem horrendum et fulgur erupturum, circumstantes jubet contremiscere." So, also, on the comment on מַצַּי, ver. 22: "Ceterum splendoris shows to be in harmony with the tone and spirit of the scene. The seeming irregularity gives vivid evidence, not only of its artistic, but of its actual scenic truthfulness. It supplies that emotional connection which carries us over all seeming logical or philological breaks.

Job Distinguished from the Others by his Submission.

For what else is Job commended but for the completeness of this submission, with its deep humility and hearty penitence? It would be difficult to find any answer to this, except what has arisen from the theory, very ancient, indeed, and supported by the highest authorities, that the design of the Book, and especially of the theophany at its close, is the decision of a debate, or to determine which party had the better of this long argument about the cause of Job's sufferings. As the traditional view we are reluctant to call it in question, and yet it may be very defective, if not in itself, yet by rejecting or ignoring another which is important as collateral, and, in certain aspects, may be regarded as presenting the predominant lesson. Job is approved not for what he said, or chiefly for what he said, in chs. iii. or xvi., or even in chapters xxviii. and xxxi., but for the few words spoken, xl. 4, xlii. 2-6. This is in accordance with the opinion of Abenezra, the most judicious of the Jewish commentators, who restricts the words of God, xlii. 7: "Ye have not spoken to me the thing that is right, as my servant Job hath done," solely to the confession Job had made (xl. 4, xlii. 2-6), and they had not.

ex aquilone mentio pertinet ad descriptionem appropinquantis media in tempestate Dei." We find the beginning of this in the close of ch. xxxvi.: "His thunder is announcing Him;" the cattle (בְּקֵרָה), feeding on the plains are startled by the ominous noise (xxxvi. 33). Then, immediately (xxxvii. 1), "At this" (אֵן לִזְמַן, as though pointing to something coming on and visible to all), "my heart trembles, and leaps out of its place." "Hear, O hear, the roar of His voice, the muttering that proceedeth from His mouth; under the whole heavens He is sending it; His lightning to the far horizon. After it, hark, a sound is roaring (שֹׁאֵן, descriptive future). He is thundering with His majestic voice, and we cannot trace them when that voice is heard." It is all most graphic, calling to mind the speech of Prometheus (Æsch. Prom. Finct. 1081) as he goes down in the midst of the storm:

βρυχία δ' ἤχῳ παραμυκάται—

how it bellows long and loud. Here, as there, it is the deep baritone thunder reverberating all round the horizon. "There is no tracking it (לֹא יִקְרָךְ), though the sound is heard." It seems to be everywhere; there is no determining the long roll to any particular quarter of the sky. Then follows a stillness for a time, during which the black כְּעֵרָה is slowly rising. Again the speaker, though there is an awe upon his soul, attempts to go on with his moralizing on the voice and the marvellous works of God; in all of which he seems more or less influenced by the signs in the heavens as they become more and more startling, or give rise to occasional sudden remarks upon particular phenomena: "See how He spreads His lightning cloud (COSAINT), and turns it with His guidance every way" (v. 12). The tempestuous wind (v. 17), is growing in heat and strength; the intervals of darkness become overpowering; he "cannot order his speech by reason of them." But, lo, a new and startling appearance,—a strange light coming out of the North. He calls it זָהָב, gold, literally, but here most probably a golden sheen (LXX. νέφη χρυσαυγούρα), some electrical or auroral light (aureus, aurum), suddenly gleaming forth from the Borealis region, or, it may be, lining the edge of the nimbus, as is sometimes the case when it is heavily charged with the electric fluid. "From the North, see, the amber light is coming," comp. Ezek. i. 4 (אֶתֶר, descriptive future). It is this phenomenon, so remarkable and so suddenly arresting the attention of all, that gives the subsequent language its ejaculatory character. There is terror mingled with the glory: "Surely with God there is dreadful majesty." What follows is in the same broken and elliptical style. שֵׁר, "Shaddai. He it is; we cannot find Him out." All through there are those descriptive features indicating something coming on of an eventful character. The language becomes more and more that of one subdued in spirit, and awed by the sense of a near divine presence, driving him from his loquacious wisdom: "Great in strength and righteousness; He answers not" (לֹא יַעֲנֶה) in Kal, instead of Piel; surely should we fear Him;" that is now more becoming than argument, however seemingly profound; for "He regardeth not the חֲכָמִים לֵב, those who are wise in their own understandings," and presume to judge of His ways.

"Then answered Jehovah from the storm-cloud," הַכְּעֵרָה, with the article, the storm-cloud that has been described.

As thus viewed in connection with Elihu's speech, and especially the latter part of it, so broken and abrupt, there is a power in the whole representation which compels us to regard it as consummately artistic or, what is still more credible, an actual palating from the life, a real scene from that olden time, and an actual theophany, like those witnessed by Abraham, Moses, and Elijah. On the other hand, cut out the speech of Elihu, or bring the divine address right after ch. xxxi., and we seem to have a hiatus in the drama which all criticism fails to mend.

The remarkable language, v. 22, about "the gold coming from the North (the Borealis aurora) may well be compared with Ezek. i. 4: "A storm (כְּעֵרָה) coming from the North, and a brightness in the circuit, and in the midst of it, הַחֲשֵׁמֶל (כַּעֲן) like the color of brass (aurichalcum) Vulg. quasi species electri."

FOUNDATIONS OF JOB'S COMMENDATION.

Origin and Progress of the Dispute.

In order to determine how far such a view may be defended, let us briefly review the general course of the narrative, and of the argument, so far as it can be called by that name.

In the first stages of Job's grievous affliction, he seems to have borne it perfectly. Philosophical stoicism must confess itself immeasurably transcended by such a declaration as is ascribed to Job i. 21: "The Lord gave, the Lord hath taken, blessed be the name of the Lord." What is there in Seneca or Epictetus to compare with this conception of "the old Dichter," as the Rationalists call him? Again, that declaration afterwards made to his tempting wife: "Shall we receive good at the hand of God, and shall we not receive evil?" No language could more clearly and strongly express that idea of unconditional submission on which we have insisted,—that unreserved surrender that asks no questions as to the cause or the issue, makes no demand of compensation, hints at no injustice, seeks for no other reason of its being right than that God hath done it, and that, therefore, it must be right. "In all this," it says, "Job sinned not with his lips," ii. 10. The latter words in this place—though not occurring in the previous passage, i. 22, where it is said, absolutely, "Job sinned not,"—must have a significance. They may denote the beginning of a change, to a degree, perhaps, of which he was yet unconscious. Raschi regards it as a negative pregnant, implying that, though his words were right, there was the beginning of something wrong in his thoughts and feelings; אבל בלבו חטא, "but he sinned in his heart." Below the lips, ἐν τῇ καρδίᾳ, in that deep unconscious place lying beneath the thoughts, and out of which, as our Saviour says, thoughts ascend (ἀναβαίνοντες), there had been some working of that hidden force which afterwards breaks out so irrepressibly. Another supposition may be indulged, that there had come upon him, or doubtless had greatly increased, that severe bodily anguish which, in its protracted continuance, is so unendurable. Christian martyrs have borne it with divine aid, such as we may suppose Job here not to have had, and because of the briefness of the pain, soon destroying itself, or leading to insensibility. Without this, or when there is no remission or alleviation, it may be safely said that such anguish continuing on, and beyond a certain degree, cannot be endured. The man cannot refrain from fiercely crying out, and it matters but little what the language of his cry may be, since it is only, in any sense, a physical expression of this unendurable agony. "He knoweth our frame." God doth not blame Job for this; neither should his friends have blamed him. But this is what they did, and it was the beginning of that wrong direction taken in their subsequent discouragements, and growing more and more devious and confused at every step. They could not put themselves in Job's position. They were astonished at his wild outcries, leading them to imagine something terrible in his state of which they had never thought before. It was this that first led to their chiding tone. They regarded it, not as the involuntary language of extreme suffering, having little of any more accountability attached to it than the mere physical manifestations of tears and groans, but as the evidence of rebellion in the spirit, or of some unknown actual guilt. They had witnessed this during the days of their astonished silence, until they can refrain no longer. His violent language seemed to them like an outburst of profanity; they undoubtedly knew of his fair reputation in the days of his prosperity, corresponding to the character which God Himself gives of His servant. "They had heard of all this evil that had come upon him." Immediately each starts "from his place;" they make an appointment (וַיִּשְׁמְרוּ) "to go and mourn with him, and to comfort him." At the sight of their friend, so changed by suffering that "they knew him not, they wept aloud, and rent their garments, and threw dust upon their heads." In all this there is the deepest sympathy, but no unfavorable judgment.

No Polemical Interest—The Rationalists' Fanciful Vergeltungslehre.

Neither had they any polemical interest against him in maintaining the old Vergeltungslehre, "that phantom of their own imagination," of which the Rationalists are so fond.

There is no evidence that they had come, "each from his place," to dispute with him about that. There is no such doctrine of retribution in the Mosaic Law, as differing from the later Christian, or from the universal experience of the world in either the earliest or the latest times. Always have men believed, and had reason to believe, both truths, that in-pious deeds are often strikingly punished, even in this world, and also that the righteous often suffer in a manner that seems inexplicable. The Rationalists describe their Vergeltungslehre as peculiar to the old Patriarchal and Mosaic times; but there is abundant evidence to the contrary in the narratives of Genesis. Good men are represented as suffering, without any impeachment of their characters, either on the part of God or man, or on the ground of any specific guilt assigned as the cause of it. The lives of Jacob, Joseph, and Moses prove this. So does the whole history of the Israelites in their sore bondage, for which there is no evidence that the immediate sufferers received or expected compensation, and who certainly were not worse, to say the least, than the nations around them, who had none of those severe trials which were sent upon God's chosen people. So far as there was any basis for the idea in the Mosaic institutions, it will generally be found in connection with promises made to families and nations, rather than to individuals. This is the case with the Fifth commandment, which is so often cited in support of this imaginary Vergeltungslehre. Although seemingly addressed to individuals, yet it is in the national aspect that that motive is chiefly held out. It was the nation that was to reap the direct benefit. It was not simply long life, but length of days, continued generations, "in the land which the Lord thy God giveth to thee." And so it is in regard to other blessings promised to the Israelites. Their political aspect is everywhere specially predominant, and, in this sense, they ever held most true. The people among whom filial reverence was maintained, as a foundation virtue, along with that deference which a new generation owed to the experience of the elders—such a people would have "length of days;" their institutions would derive a strength and a permanency from such a cause which no other could give. The words "in the land," show this. Promises thus made to nations have no such reserve as must be supposed to be connected with them when made, really or apparently, to individuals whose cases are affected by such a multiplicity of outside moral and physical relations. They have no exceptions, expressed or implied, and history would show that, in such a civic sense, they always hold true. The nation has only an earthly being, and this difference was felt, even before the individual after-life was distinctly maintained. The individual virtue stood on a higher platform. It was connected with a higher order of ideas. Though the thought, as a conception, was not dogmatically formed, or consciously received, yet there was in it this mysterious "power of an endless life." Hence, the question which Job's friends mistakingly put in reference to the individual, might have been fairly asked in reference to a people, "When did a nation perish, being innocent?" When did a people cease to flourish that perseveringly obeyed God's commands, and acknowledged Him to be its Lord?

This fantastic Vergeltungslehre, as thus held by the Rationalists, is inconsistent moreover with the tone of the most important and most serious of the Psalms. Comp. Pss. lxxiii., xvii., etc. In Ecclesiastes it is most expressly repudiated. In the Proverbs, a purely ethical book, there seems to be more of it, but nothing more than any system of popular ethics, ancient or modern, must admit, namely, that virtue is, in the main, favorable to happiness or prosperity in this world, and that the practice of it, therefore, may well be recommended by the moralist on that ground. In the Proverbs themselves, however, there is evidence that the general truth has its exceptions, not arbitrary, but arising out of circumstances and reasons connected with a higher ground, demanding a higher rule transcending the ordinary experience.

Job's Violent Language the First Cause of Crimination—Opening Address of Eliphaz.

There is no evidence that Job's friends held this secular Vergeltungslehre as a thing exceptionless. Their own speeches frequently admit the contrary idea. They would, perhaps, have advised Job to examine himself, try his ways, pray God, as the Psalmist does,

"to show him if there might be some unknown evil thing in him," that thus he might be "led in the way everlasting." They might have urged him, as the calmer Elihu afterwards did, to regard afflictions, however sore, as sent in love for some mysterious good of discipline or purification. But it is not at all probable that they would have charged him with crimes, had they not been led to do so, in consequence of the seeming profanity of his violent language, and his own apparent criminations of the divine justice. This first explains the doubt; and then the increasing harshness of their imputations is the natural consequence of the controversial spirit engendered, becoming the more personal, paradoxical as it may seem, in proportion as it becomes more dogmatic and abstract. Yet still the opening language of Eliphaz is that of a true friend—a pious friend who wished to soothe the sufferer, and yet mildly rebuke his violently complaining spirit. Together with astonishment and compassion, it manifests a tender diffidence which is very finely expressed in Dr. Conant's translation: "Should one venture a word to thee; wilt thou be offended? but who can forbear speaking?" It seems to come after a silence occasioned by a subsidence in the great anguish. There had been, too, a sort of cadence in Job's language which lets us into the interior of the man, showing that his former state, though outwardly fair and prosperous, was not free from spiritual trouble: "I was not at ease, I was not tranquil, I was not at rest, yet trouble came" (iii. 26). There was something strange about the case; yet the words of Eliphaz, that follow, are far from crimination, or even suspicion. It is the gentlest of reproofs, reminding him of what he himself had done to others in similar cases of suffering, and counselling him now to do the same for his own support and consolation: "Lo Thou hast admonished many: Thou hast strengthened the feeble hands; Thy words have confirmed the faltering." Surely this testifies to a belief in Job's previous reputation for benevolence and piety. Nothing could be farther from the spirit of the harsh charges that seem to be made by this same Eliphaz, xxii. 5-10. "Thou hast comforted many"—it is the mildest of rebukes, if it be a rebuke at all—"but now it comes to thee, and thou faintest; it toucheth thee, and thou art confounded. Is not thy religion thy confidence (so רִאיוֹן, should be rendered); thy hope, is it not the uprightness of thy ways?" Job's character for integrity is remembered and admitted, with the intimation that he should now derive comfort from the thought. Keeping before us this most natural view of Eliphaz's attempt to comfort, we have the key to what follows. It was not received as it should have been; and hence the beginning of that personal controversy which arose, in a great measure, from Job's violent retorts. He begins it; although he has the better of them afterwards, when the polemical spirit, thus aroused, has driven them far from the sympathy they came to express.

Had it not been for the effect produced upon our minds by this latter turn, or had this speech of Eliphaz stood alone, we should have carried with us a different feeling, resulting in a different style of interpretation. The words that follow would have appeared to us in another light: "Remember now"—consider your own experience, try and recall a case—"when has the innocent perished?" The perfectly innocent, some would say in order to soften the imputation, but the emphasis is on the word אָכַר. The use of it is consistent not only with the belief, but even the firm persuasion, of Job's comparative guiltiness, and the hope of his speedy restoration after a temporary trial. אָכַר is an extreme word of perdition. Here, especially, as the spirit of the context, and its association with that other strong term נִכְחָד very clearly show, it denotes a final, irrecoverable doom. It is suggested by the idea intimated above, that Job should not forget his religion, his confidence in God, but should derive a pure comfort from the thought of "the uprightness of his ways." God does not mean to destroy you; you shall not utterly sink under this trouble; all will come right at last. Such is the spirit of the appeal. Good men may suffer affliction, but where have you known the innocent to perish? "Therefore, hope thou in God; for thou shalt yet praise Him, who is the salvation of thy face (thine open salvation), and thy God." There is nothing forced in such a view. There may have been a want of appreciation of Job's extreme suffering, such as an outside comforter would find it difficult to conceive, but it seems the best thing that he could do, and the best advice he could offer him under the circumstances,

It is confirmed by the repetition of the question in language still more emphatic, and intended to be still more assuring: "When were the righteous cut off (נִכְחָרוּ)—finally cut off? Cheer up, therefore, give not way to despair, God will not forsake thee."

It is not a questioning of Job's righteousness, but an assuming of it, in fact, as the ground on which he should yet exercise hope in the divine restoring goodness. The remark, however, here as well as elsewhere, leads to an enlargement on the doom of the wicked man: but any application of this to Job would be inconsistent with the evident assumptions of the context. This doom of the wicked is not thy doom. He has no fear (no religion), no hope as thou hast. Severe as may be thy pains, thy case is very different from that of the men "who plough iniquity and reap mischief." Thou shalt not perish as those "roaring lions" of evil. He who "breaks before thy teeth" shall bind up thy wounds. Therefore, hope on. Then follows that sublime account of the spiritual appearance, and the moral lesson it brings from the unearthly sphere, so different from the gabble which the modern naturalizing "Spiritualism" would have given us in its stead, as has been before remarked. It is still that grand theism, presented all alone, and in its ineffable purity, as intended to precede all other articles of faith—God's personal being, and His immeasurable holiness: "Shall a man (אִישׁ, weak mortal man) be just with God? Shall a man (גִּבּוֹר, the strongest and most confident man) be pure before his Maker?"† He had indeed given Job credit for uprightness; he had clearly intimated that he might and ought to find comfort in the remembrance; but here comes the vision of the night, the solemn, sober, second thought,—that there is something far more holy than our best righteousness, high as that may seem when a man compares himself with other men, or any standard of human ethics. It is an intimation that even Job, with all his uprightness, and though fully corresponding to that charming account given of his moral character in the prologue, cannot yet so stand upon his righteousness as to cry out against suffering—even extreme suffering—as though it were a strange injustice. Far different, indeed, is his case from that of those "lions" of iniquity to whom Eliphaz alludes,—those utterly Godless transgressors to whom their utter perdition is but a "reaping of what they have sown;" but still he is not righteous, he is not pure before God.

Increasing Severity—Cause of it—Mutual Recriminations—Note on the Atrocious Charges of ch. xxii.

Such is a fair interpretation of this fourth chapter. As uttered in a similar spirit, must we regard much of the language of the fifth; although, probably from some signs of impatience in Job, it seems to increase in severity: "Call now; is there any one who will answer thee" whilst indulging in such extravagant appeals? Who of the Holy Ones can listen to thy imprecatory language? "It is the foolish (evil) man whom wrath slayeth; it is the simple man whom envy killeth." The noun, קִנְיָה, could be better rendered jealousy. It furnishes the key to the train of thought, or the view Eliphaz took of Job's state of mind, as complaining of God, because men manifestly wicked had lived and died more free from pain than himself. Though the language be dark, and full of a passionate abruptness, such seems to be the meaning of what he had said, iii. 14–17, about "kings and counsellors" who, after lives of uninterrupted prosperity, have lain down beneath their costly monuments, leaving their houses full of treasure. Why could he not have "so lain down,"‡ at the end of * The primary sense of כָּחַר is abnegation,—treating a thing as though it was not, or casting it off as utterly false and vile. Hence in Hiphil it gets the sense of putting out of sight (ἀφανίζειν, which is used in the Greek to denote extreme destruction), extirpavit, deletit. The Niphal is passive of Hiphil. See its strong sense, Exod. xxiii. 3; Zech. xi. 8.

† More just than God, more pure, etc. So our translation and Luther have it, with which Dr. Conant agrees. The Vulgate, Dei comparatione. Umbreit, Ewald, Delitzsch, Dillmann, Merx, Rosenmüller, et al., reject the idea of כֵּן, comparative, and regard it as equivalent to עַם, xxv. 4; Coram Deo, and in Numb. xxxii. 22; Jeremiah ii. 5. The reasons are that the other rendering, "more just than God" would be an utterly extravagant thought, which no one would think of seriously holding. And yet it might be suggested by Job's bitter complainings.

‡ III. 13. שְׁנָתִי: "I should have slept; then would there have been rest to me"—לִי יָנוּחַ to me, or even to me. The impersonal form with the preposition is emphatic. This feeling of distrust and jealousy is made more clear by what he says at the close about his want of rest, even in the day of his prosperity: "What he had somehow feared had come upon him," iii. 25.

an untroubled life, and "been at rest." To correct this murmuring jealousy, Eliphaz insists upon what his own experience had taught him to the contrary: "I have myself seen the wicked taking root, but soon I cursed his habitation" (his seemingly undisturbed stability). I have seen what followed them, the ruin of their posterity, the restorations they were compelled to make. He is not here charging Job with personal crimes, but cautioning him—and surely there was need of it—against being led into complaints of God as one who lets the wicked live and prosper, and die, at last, without any "bands (dolores, Ps. lxxiii. 4) in their death." This experience of Eliphaz was true. There is a Vergeltungslehre. God does not let the wicked ultimately prosper, even in this world. During their own lives, and in their posterity after them, this general law of the divine government receives its manifestation. Job's mere groaning under his misery as something inexplicable, is very different from the feeling which suggests such comparisons, as though there were really no God ruling in the earth, and all things happened alike to all, or, what is worse, God actually favors unrighteousness. He himself, Job seems to say, with all his uprightness, was in fact more miserable, had a more grievous lot, than those wicked tyrants. It was this רָעָה, or envy, that was killing him. So it seemed to Eliphaz, and it is enough in interpreting that the idea furnishes the clue to the train of thought. God's favoring the wicked, or suffering them to go with impunity, is very different from the idea that he may send suffering, explained or unexplained, upon the comparatively righteous—Eliphaz is here repelling the former idea.

Some similar view may be taken of most of the speeches of the friends in controversy.* They can be explained, or regarded as essentially modified, without supposing that, in the beginning, they had any thought of charging him with crime. That would have been wholly inconsistent with the friendly motive which brought them from their distant homes to mourn and weep with him. The story, it will thus be seen, is best interpreted by regarding it as an actual picture of actual life. But even artistic, or dramatic propriety would be grossly violated by such a preposterous fact, that they should, all of them, all at once, fall to making charges against him, not only so atrocious, but so motiveless and abrupt.

* Even the harshest parts assume something of a different aspect when we thus take into view the origin and progress of the controversy. Many of these charges will appear to be essential y hypothetical. For it is clear that the friends of Job had no knowledge of any crimes that he had committed. In ch. xxii. Eliphaz seems to charge him directly with the most atrocious deeds. But the beginning of the chapter is evidently the repelling of the idea, on which Job seems strongly to insist, of a personal controversy, as it were, between him and God, or as one contending with him. It is not, as Eliphaz would seem to argue, such a personal contending whatever else it may be; for that could only be on account of some great sins which had truly roused the divine anger. This hypothetical view may be carried clear through the chapter: "Will He for fear of thee rebuke thee, or enter with thee into controversy? Is it not rather (הֲלֵיךָ), or would it not be rather רָעָה רָעָה, thy great evil, or for some great evil of thine?" So the Vulgate takes it as a hypothetical question instead of a direct charge: Numquid timens arguit te et non propter malitiam tuam plurimam; "Would it not be on account of thy wickedness, and because of thine iniquities numberless?" Thus stated, hypothetically, the כִּי that follows is specificative. Would it not be on account of thy numerous iniquities, namely, that thou hadst taken a pledge, that thou hadst stripped the naked, favored the mighty, and oppressed the widow, etc.? The manner of stating these crimes (the standing Bible examples of great wickedness) would also seem to show that the imputations were hypothetical, instead of direct. It may be a suspicion occasioned by Job's vehement complaints, but it would hardly seem to amount to anything stronger,—or a mere conjecture, as Cocceus regards it: "Nam fortassis pignus cepisti, etc.—conjecturaliter et disjunctive explicio, nulla repugnant Grammatica, ne crudeliores sententias quam ipsi amici in Jobum eudam." Umbreit and Ewald express surprise at the particularity of these atrocious accusations, and wonder how Eliphaz came to the knowledge of them, but the charges themselves they would easily explain by their all-explaining Vergeltungslehre: Job suffered severely; therefore, he must have been an enormous sinner.

What soon follows shows that we must somehow modify the interpretation that makes these charges to be direct, or as something truly believed by the speaker: "Acquaint now thyself with Him (ver 21), and be at peace" (שָׁלֵם) give up this idea of a contention, or be composed. There is, indeed, a general exhortation to return to the Almighty, and put away evil; as it had also been said that he was in darkness and terror, on account of the spirit he showed (vers. 10, 11, 23). But it is not the kind of language we should expect to be used towards one who had robbed widows, and broken, the arms of orphans. Nothing less than unconditional repentance and restitution would have been thought of. But how different the advice of this reproving friend: הִסָּכֵן (the Kal, ver. 3, and denoting quieting, profitable intercourse) Here, in Hiph'il, it is well rendered "acquaint thyself," be quiet before God become familiar with Him, learn to think better of Him and His ways; "lay up His words in thine heart." It is addressed to one supposed to be in the wrong, yet still having some degree of favor with God, or, at least, one with whom God was not contending, as He contends with the hardened and atrocious sinner, so particularly described.

The Dispute turned into the Defensive on the Part of the Friends—Does God favor the Wicked?

In all the steps of the discussion, it will be discovered that it is not so much a disposition to impute actual crime to Job as to repel his seeming assaults upon their theoretical views of the divine justice. The question, whether afflictions may not come upon the righteous, is lost sight of in another which engages all their zeal: Does God favor the wicked? Does He let them prosper, and ultimately die in peace, as Job sometimes seems to assert? They strongly maintain the negative. This leads to the most vivid pictures of the doom that awaits an evil life. Job, not to be outdone, and not heeding his consistency,* is drawn to vie with them in the assertion of his own experience to the same effect. Sometimes they all seem to say very much the same thing, and then it is worthy of note how some commentators strive to give a good aspect to Job's language, and a bad look to theirs; all coming from the traditional assumption in regard to the judgment at the end of the Book. And their apparent recriminations may, in fact, be taken in two ways: Such is the doom of the wicked, the enormous evil-doers; but you, Job, are not one of them, although you are now behaving very wrongly; therefore, you may yet hope in God. Or it may be an actual imputation of crime. The first, as we have seen, may be the view taken of Eliphaz's early address; the second, as the effect produced by the exasperation of debate. It is thus they get themselves entangled in a question truly collateral, yet seemingly connected with the other and more important issue: Are sufferings, in themselves, evidence of crime? Why they are sent upon good men, or why they are permitted even, may remain a mystery; and that mystery, we think, is not solved or attempted to be solved in this Book of Job. But surely it is something quite different from the other thought, that God suffers the wicked to go with impunity, or makes no difference between them and His servants, even in this world.

The Didactic Value of the Speeches as Inspired Scripture.

The idea that the chief design of the Book is the decision of a debate has had an effect, more or less, in perverting its exposition. It all depends upon the view we take of the language used, ch. xlii. 7, and the object of its most immediate reference. Before dwelling on that, however, there may come in here a remark in respect to the value of the various speeches in their didactic use. It is true that, in a dramatic work, we look to the great lesson which it teaches as a whole; and in consistency with this, much of what is said may be regarded merely in its dramatic propriety, and not in its absolute didactic truth as uttered, more or less, by all the speakers. It may be a question, however, whether we can apply this strictly to a composition we deem inspired, or divinely given, even though there may be grounds for calling it dramatic. God may instruct us by this style of writing, as well as by other kinds to which we give the names, historical, poetical, parabolic, ethical, or even mythical, if the evidences of such, or such a kind of diction appear on the very face of it. Thus, Job may be said to contain internal evidence of a dramatic intent. It is not a mere collection of precepts, or lofty sayings, but a great spiritual action, a true praxis or drama, the instructiveness of which does not absolutely depend upon the precise truth, or exact moral value of every utterance that composes it. This is easily understood, and not to be dwelt upon. And yet the thought is not irrational, that such an inspired drama, or one that has a true divine authorship, and for a divine purpose, through whatever media it may have been composed, may be so written, so arranged, and so acted, as to combine both ideas, the dramatic and the preceptive. Even if we regard the speeches of Job's three friends as wrong in their applications, they may, nevertheless, form a body of * This appears especially in chapters xxi. and xxvii., where Job would seem to aim at surpassing them in this kind of painting. Sometimes the transition is quite sudden, as though he had felt he had gone too far in the opposite direction. The surprise occasioned by this has led to forced constructions. Thus, xxi. 17, some would render כִּי־לֹא, "how seldom," or, "how often," with the implied idea of doubt, or with a sarcastic reference. This is contrary to the constant usage of כִּי־לֹא, and Ps. lxxviii. 40, cited by Gesenius and Hupfeld, does not support it.

preceptive truth of the highest value, far beyond anything to be found in Seneca or Epictetus. In this view it may be said of each one of them, that they are Sacred "Scripture, profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for instruction in righteousness," or that they are divine words "most pure," as the Psalmist says, "like silver tried in an earthen vessel, and seven times purified." Thus regarding them, the practical expositor, and the preacher, may study them with confidence, as golden sentences containing golden truth, and which, when "opened up," as the old lovers of Scripture used to say, will furnish, each by themselves, most profitable themes of meditation. It would be difficult to point out a single utterance made by the three friends of Job that does not contain, in itself, such a golden thought, and worthy of a writing for which there is claimed a divine authorship. All ancient and modern books, Oriental or Occidental, will be searched in vain for a purer or loftier theism than that set forth in these speeches of Eliphaz, Bildad, and Zophar. The same may be said of Job's language, when regarded as a calm utterance, or something more than a dramatic groan. His impassioned assertions of his integrity, his casting away of all false humility, his vehement expostulations with God, so almost terrifying us by their boldness: "Wilt Thou put in fear the driven leaf; wilt Thou pursue the withered chaff?"—all this may be regarded even with reverence as viewed from the stand-point of the sufferer. There is no cant about Job; no affected piety; no mere sentimentality; no cold and showy theorizing. All this seeming irreverence, nevertheless, is consistent with a manly piety, most anxious to understand its true relation to the Holy One. He seems, at times, upon the borders of profanity. He makes the boldest declarations; but they are all renounced afterwards, when a new aspect of the matter is presented to his mind, leading him to say אָנֹכִי, "I reject;" I throw them all away; I cannot bear them now. He argues no more; neither does he remain silent like the others; but falls upon his face, saying, only: "I repent in dust and ashes." Here he said "the thing that was right," wholly right; but even during the calmer periods given to him from suffering, he seems to rise immediately to a higher position. It is after such pauses that he brings in those impassioned soliloquies in which the disputants around him seem wholly lost sight of; as in that meditation on the unsearchable Wisdom, ch. xxviii., or when he breaks out with that sublime appeal: "I know that my Redeemer liveth;" or when he says, "O that I knew where I might find Him;" or when he shows that he can surpass Zophar and Bildad in magnifying the divine glory, whilst he is behind none of them in sententious wisdom.

If, however, there are to be found in the Book any utterances in themselves false or evil, they are to be looked for in those passages in which Job seems to pass almost entirely beyond the bounds of reverence, if regarded as speaking of God (as in ch. xvi.), and not rather of the evil being, of whom, in some way, he seems conscious as a great and malignant antagonist. (See note, page 7.) But the exposition which proceeds upon the idea of the Book being the solving of a problem, or the decision of a debate, must find these false things "said about God," or to God (אֱלֹהִים), in the utterances of the three friends. This might, perhaps, be maintained if there is intended, not their abstract truth, but their practical application to the sufferer; but then they could hardly be called, with consistency, "wrong things about God." They would have been, rather, wrong things said about Job. Now it may be admitted, that, with all his errors and extravagances, there was a general rightness belonging to Job's position. In spite of his expostulations and vehement upbraidings, even of Deity Himself, there was something in his impassioned sincerity, that called out the divine pity, the divine admiration, to speak anthropopathically, so as to give even his errors, in the divine sight, an interest beyond that of the cold, theoretical, unappreciative, casuistical wisdom of his antagonists. In reference to the whole action of the drama, instead of the mere dialectical merit, it might have been said, in the old patriarchal style, that "Job found favor, or grace, in His sight;" and in this way the traditional exposition may be accepted. We may take it as implied also in any form of the decision, and it may stand, if insisted on, as the leading solution of the Book: "Job found grace in the sight of God." With this, however, the question may still be raised, whether, in the declaration, xlii. 7, לֹא דִבַּרְתֶּם אֵלַי נְכוֹנָה, "Ye have not spoken," &c., there was not intended a more special saying, a particular and noted declaration standing by itself, as outside of the long discussion—not something which Job had said better than they, but something which he had said, and they did not say at all,—not something said about God, but directly to Him, and according to the almost exceptionless usage of that most frequent preposition, אֵל.

Meaning of אֵל, xlii. 7.

This is, in the first place, an almost purely philological question. The particle is one of the most common in Hebrew, and we might also add, one of the most uniform in its meaning and application. Let us, therefore, examine whether אֵל, in this place, has been rightly translated by the makers of the English and other versions. If not, it might be asked, why have so many commentators taken the wrong direction? The answer may be found in the influence of the view, so early entertained, that the Book was intended as the solution of a problem, and the decision of a debate. The supposed dramatic character and construction aided this idea. The tendency thus given would at once affect this passage, and the same feeling would perpetuate the peculiar interpretation it had originated. Instead of taking as a key the clear and usual sense of the preposition, they made it subservient to a hypothesis derived from other sources. This inverse method appears very plainly in one of the notes of Tympius (285) to Noldius' Concordance of the Hebrew Particles: "Luth., Anglic., Trem., Piscat., Belgic., Schmid, Glass, Geier, de me. Nam amici Jobi, non ad Deum loquuti sunt, sed de Deo." Here it is taken for granted that there is a decision of something said concerning God, and the preposition is rendered accordingly. Tympius, with the LXX., Syriac and Vulgate, would render it before me, but it is from the same idea of a judicial debate, only carried still farther in that direction; "for the friends," he says, "non sinistre loquuti sunt de Deo tantum, sed et de Jobo, de cruce fidelium, de impiorum in hac vita prosperitate," &c. Some commentators, when they come to this place, simply say אֵל for עַל or אֵלַי for עָלַי and that is all the notice they take of it; or they content themselves with rendering it about, concerning, in respect to, von mir, in Beziehung auf mich (see Dillmann, Delitzsch, Rosenmüller, et al.), without giving any reasons. But אֵל for עַל is as rare in the Hebrew as ad for de in Latin, or the English to in the same sense. We say, indeed, speak to a question, or to a point in debate, but this is a technical sense; it is figurative, moreover, denoting direction, or keeping the mind intent upon a thing, and never used with a person or a personal pronoun. How infrequent in Hebrew is this supposed use of אֵל for עַל, may be seen from the few cases* given by Noldius, and of out many hundreds adhering to the common usage.

* From these we may at once exclude those in which אֵל follows the verb נִפְּאָה, or הִתְנַבֵּא, to prophesy. They may be rendered, prophecy concerning; but the preposition does not lose its original idea of direction—prophecy to, or at, or against. So also where Noldius renders it propter as Lam iv. 17: "our eyes are consumed," אֵל עֵזְרֹתֵנוּ, "on account of our help." The idea is, looking to or for our help, elliptically expressed. There is the same kind of ellipsis in the few other examples he gives, as I Sam. iv. 21: "this she said (looking to, in view of) the taking of the ark," &c. There is no need of rendering it propter; the vivid pathos is lost by so doing. 2 Sam. xxi. 1: "And the Lord said," אֵל שְׂאוּל—there is an ellipsis any way. "And the Lord said—to Saul"—that is, look to Saul. Noldius fills it up tamely: "(it is) on account of Saul and his bloody house." 1 Kings xix. 3: "He went, אֵל נַפְשׁוֹ, for his life"—a peculiar phrase, but may be rendered literally, instead of by propter, on account of. Ps. lxxiv. 3, "My heart and flesh cry out," אֵל-אֵל חֵי, rendered by Noldius: "On account of the living God," but far better literally, "to the living God." So in the cases where he would render it de, it will be found that the object is ever present, and there is the idea of direct reference, or pointing to it. As I Sam. i. 27, where Hannah says, "I prayed, אֵל הַנֶּעַר הַזֶּה, for this child," as something present—the direct object. 2 Kings xix. 32, "Thus saith the Lord," אֵל מֶלֶךְ. It was indeed about the King of Assyria, but how much more vivid is it when taken directly, to, at, against; Deodat. French Version, touchant le roi. The two or three others under that head can all be resolved in the same manner. 2d Psalm 7, אֲסַפְּרָה אֵל חֶק, cannot be rendered "concerning the decree." Gen. xx. 2, "And Abraham said, אֵל שָׂרָה, to Sarah, she is my wife." Sarah was present, and the saying was to her—as an intimation to Abimelech.

Commentators find it difficult to determine for what sayings, in the general argument, Job is commended. The word נְכוֹנָה, xlii. 7.

Another argument for the view here taken is derived from the disagreements among commentators in respect to the things said for which Job is commended and the friends are condemned. According to Ewald and Schlottmann, נְכוֹנָה denotes subjective truth, uprightness, integrity. Zöckler takes the other view: It was Job's correct knowledge, and truthful assertion of his own general innocence, in which he was right, and they were wrong, because they failed to acknowledge it, or were silent about it. So Delitzsch says: "The correctness in Job's speeches consists in his holding fast the consciousness of his innocence without suffering himself to be persuaded of the opposite." This would make it almost contrary, in spirit at least, to the language of his confession, when he says אָמַת: "I reject (throw away, renounce, recant), and repent in dust and ashes;" or in the other place, xli. 4: "I lay my hand upon my mouth; once have I spoken—twice—I will say no more." Raschi takes this "once—twice" as referring specially to Job's two hard sayings,* ch. ix. 22; the first: "He consumes the righteous with the wicked," the second: "When the scourge destroys suddenly, He mocks at the distress of the innocent." It is as though Job meant to specify these, because they were the only ones he could remember. In his Rabbinic particularity, Raschi overlooks the Hebraism: "Once—twice," repeatedly, over and over again, "have I uttered what I understood not, things too hard for me, which I knew not." See, too, how Dillmann strives to make out a case for Job against the friends, and labors with his distinction between the subjective and the objective truth; as though the declaration itself of the Almighty needed defending and clearing up as much as Job's integrity. In some senses, he would maintain, both were right and both were wrong. Not every word he uttered in itself was true, nor were their's all wrong; but only on the whole, or on the question of Job's innocence, was the balance of truth in his favor. Truly this is a very unsatisfactory view of the great matter which God decides, as though it were a mere question as to the weight of argument in a debate about Job's absolute or comparative innocence; it being a fact, too, of which Job had knowledge, whilst they could only judge from outer circumstances. A man should maintain his integrity, if he is not guilty of particular crimes laid to his charge; that is true; but is there no higher lesson taught in this Book? Again, this mere summing up of a balance of right, with so much difficulty about it as to occasion such a diversity of comment, is inconsistent with the clearness and peculiar nature of that word, נְכוֹנָה. It is not used of personal moral character, either subjectively or objectively, like צָדִיק, יֵשׁוּעַ, etc. Such a view of the word would seem to confine it to things said about Job, instead of something said about God and addressed directly to Him. The radical idea of the word is firmness, that which shall stand; hence completeness, security, perfection. When used of an outward object it expresses its best and most finished state, as in the infinitive form, Prov. iv. 18, נִכְוֵן הַיּוֹם, the perfection of the day, σταθέρων ἡμῶν, when the sun has reached its height, and seems to stand—"clearer and clearer unto the perfect day." As a saying, it is here the one most perfect saying that could be said—a saying expressing all.

The Real Utterance for which Job is Commended.

We must search among Job's sayings for something corresponding to the high and distinguishing commendation expressed by this word נְכוֹנָה,—something that stands the test, clear, decided, full. When found there will be no mistaking it. It will have a superlative, a finished, and not a mere comparative excellence. Other things said may have been more or less correct, but this is right, exactly right, the very thing,—something which, if it had not been said, would have left all else dark, undecided, insecure. Such was the saying, ch. xl. 4, xlii. 1-6, and for this we may believe that Job was specially commended. It was also said directly to God, and this perfectly suits the preposition לָ, xlii. 7, without any necessity of giving it a sense which, to say the least, is very unusual, and only to be resorted to when the context allows no other. This is certainly not the case here. In giving to לָ the same sense which לָ has immediately above, in the words לָלֵךְ, there is suggested a reference to Job's confession; and we venture to say, that, had it been so rendered, in the early versions, there would hardly have been a thought of any other interpretation. Commentators, generally, as Aben Ezra has done, would have restricted it to that memorable saying unto God, and so have avoided the never-to-be-settled disputes as to the particular respects in which Job had the better of the argument against his three friends. There is also something in the appointment of Job as the sacrificing and interceding priest for the others that is in beautiful harmony with the view here taken of the difference between him and them. They had not fallen upon their faces, and laid their hands upon their mouths; they had not confessed, and "repented in dust and ashes." This Job had done. He humbled himself, and therefore did God highly exalt him to be a priest and a mediator for the others. We will not say that this might not have been a proper distinction conferred upon him for his success in the argument by which he maintained his own righteousness; but the whole spirit of the Scriptures, old and new, seems more in harmony with the interpretation which regards the other as the prominent, if not the only view to be taken of this great decision. It need only be further said, in this place, that the LXX. have rendered לָ, ἐνώπιόν μου, the Vulgate, coram me, in my presence—before me. To the same purport the Syriac קִרְבִּי. These are better than the modern versions, since they leave open the question of reference. They are in better harmony, too, with the usual sense of the preposition than the renderings of, or concerning, in Beziehung auf mich, etc.; but even these translations have been influenced by the idea of a debate held in the presence of a judge, or umpire, who is to decide on the merits of the argument. It is a notion quite plausible, closely connected with the dramatic conception, but receiving no countenance either in the abrupt address of Jehovah, or in anything previously said by the several speakers.

THE BOOK OF JOB AS A WORK OF ART.

Errors of Interpretation arising from so regarding it.

The tendency to this idea of a problem to be solved, or of a debate to be decided, appears especially in those commentators who have most to say about the Book of Job as a work of art, lauding it greatly in this way, as though to make up for what sometimes seems lacking in a true appreciation of its divine merit. It has given rise to supposed plans and divisions as variant as they are artificial. The great outlines of the Book are marked upon its very face; but when the attempt is made to discover, under this main scheme, a more artistic development, the result is very unsatisfactory. Besides the prologue and epilogue, which are evident enough, the main body of the work has been arranged under certain divisions, or stages in the dramatic action, all regarded as having been regularly planned in the mind of the artist. These are described by technical names invented for the purpose. There is the δέσις and the λύσις,—the envelopment and the development, the tying up and the loosing. The subdivisions are arranged most artificially, though we can hardly call them artistic, the great excellence of which is the absence or concealment of all studied artificialness. For example, some give as 1st. The Anknüpfung, or Introductory Statement, of which nothing need be said; 2d. The Movement of the Debate, or the Commencing Development, iv. xiv.; 3d. The Second Movement, or the Advancing Development, xv., xxi.; 4th. The Third Movement of the Debate, or the Most Advanced Development, xxii., xxvi.; 5th. The Transition from the Development (or rather the maximum Envelopment), to the Solution, or from the δέσις to the commencing λύσις, Job's Vindication, xxvii., xxxi.; 6th. The Consummation, or the Durchbruch, the breaking through, the transition from the δέσις to the ἁόαι, the Speech of Elihu, xxxii., xxxvii.; 7th. The Solution in the Consciousness, xxxviii. 42; 8th. The Solution in outward Actuality, Job's Restoration to Prosperity, xlii. 7-17. This is Zöckler's. In the scheme of Delitzsch we have 1st. The Introduction; 2d. The Opening; 3d. The Entanglement; 4th. The Transition to the Unravelment; 5th. The Unravelment Divided into 6th. The Unravelment in the Consciousness; 7th. The Unravelment in outward Reality. There is no need of giving the Divisions of Umbreit, Ewald, etc. They are all marked by the same artificialness. They may be an assistance to the memory; but the reader feels that he is getting little or no help from them in regard to the governing idea of the Book, or the meaning of particular passages. The very fact of the differences existing between them detracts from their reliability. Thus regarded, they may be in the way of a true appreciation of the Book, whatever aid they may seem to give in its critical study; for almost any division furnishes some facility in that respect. If, however, the old author really had no such scheme mapped out in his own mind,—if, under the influence of some divine enthusiasm, he was simply giving vent, irregularly it may be, to thoughts of which his soul was full,—or was truthfully relating a story which he had heard, and which was firmly believed in his day,—then all reasonings from such artistic divisions would be “a darkening counsel by words without knowledge,” leading farther and farther from the actual fact, and from the divine thought. It all proceeds upon the fixed idea that the object of the Book is solely a debate, dramatically presented and dramatically concluded. There is a problem to be solved, a δίσαι, or an entanglement first to be made, as intricate as possible, and then to be untied. For this purpose, God dramatically appears at the end, like a Deus ex machina, and closes the debate by deciding in favor of one of the parties, and against the others.

It is a clear answer to the above dramatic view, that the divine speech itself decides nothing, though Job may be regarded as afterwards commended for the humbling and penitence-producing effect it had upon him. We may say this without irreverence. That most sublime address hardly takes notice of any of the points about which they had been wrangling, whether regarded as matters of fact, or of abstract truth. It had a higher purpose, a grander lesson to teach,—that lesson of unconditional submission, without the learning of which all solutions of problems, whether higher or lower, would be of no avail. God “makes His glory to pass before them,” as He did before Moses when hidden in the cleft of the rock, or before Elijah, in Horeb, when “he wrapped his face in his mantle at the presence of the Lord.” So Job fell on his face before God, whilst the others stood speechless in bewildered astonishment. To him the vision presented itself in its most interior aspect. He saw something in it beyond the eye of sense,—he heard something, as he himself seems to affirm, beyond “the hearing of the ear.” They stood ἐντροί, like Paul's companions on the journey to Damascus, ἀκούοντες μὲν θεωροῦντες δ' οὐ, hearing the outward sounds, distinguishing the words, it may be, in their lexical and logical sense, but having no spiritual perception. Perhaps they, too, had they fallen on their faces, might have had their inward eye opened, as Job's was, and with the same spiritual effect. But he alone “made confession unto righteousness;” therefore, he was justified and they were condemned. We are not attaching too much importance to this divine appearance in making it the central idea as well as the central fact, of the Book. Why should it be turned into a poetical drama, any more than other similar manifestations recorded in the Scriptures? There is no other part of the Bible in which the theophany so belongs to the very essence of the revelation. It is here the very lesson taught. It is something given for its own sake, and not merely as a scenic means to something else. It is that to which all the parts of the wondrous narrative are preparatory, and in which all its words, and all its ideas, all its arguments, true or false, have their culminating significance. Though formally solving no problems, it is not a mere barren display. What more instructive than such an announcement of a personal divine presence challenging to itself the homage of all rational beings? And such is the very idea of revelation. It is not primarily to teach us doctrines, or to give us moral precepts, or to solve questions of ethical or even theological casuistry, but to bring nigh to us the divine power, and right, and vivid personality. All revelation, in short, is the revelation of the glory of God. To those who say that this seems a harsh and arbitrary teaching, the answer is, that it is most intimately connected with the loftiest human well-being. For men to see it is, in fact, their most satisfying knowledge, to confess and feel it is their highest blessedness.

SPEECH OF ELIHU.

The chasm its rejection would leave between the last words of Job, chap. xxix.-xxxi., and the Divine Appearance.

Had the Book of Job ended with the speech of Elihu, the reader would have had good grounds for regarding this portion as containing the solution of the problem of which so much has been said. Suffering, as intended for purification and discipline, and therefore consistent with the goodness of God, and a general righteousness in the sufferer; this is the main idea it enforces, and in a way to bring out some of the best practical ethics to be found in this or any other book. No part of Job is, in this respect, better adapted to the moralist or the preacher. Chapter xxxiii., especially, is a mine of precious instruction, clear and practical, full of consolations to good men amid all the trials of life, and of strength for the performance of its duties.* He comes the nearest, too, to the speech of Jehovah, so far as any approach can be made to it, in the descriptions of the divine power as exhibited in the greater natural phenomena. This seems to be done, too, for a similar purpose; to show that God is hindered by no physical fatality; every thing that takes place is by the divine decree, or the divine permission. "He hath done it," and therefore (not as a reason in itself, but as demanding the assent of the finite intelligence) is it holy, just and good. "Why dost thou strive with Him (יִכְוֶה, litigate, reason, argue); for He giveth no account (לֹא יִנְיָה, He maketh no answer) in respect to His matters" (xxxiii. 13). We have already dwelt on a few of the arguments for the genuineness of this portion of the Book, and especially on the difficulty that would be occasioned by having nothing between the noble vindication of Job xxix.-xxxi. and the sudden mention of the whirlwind out of which Jehovah speaks. But there are also internal evidences in its favor. As before said, it is remarkably characteristic, and, in fact, the very traits that are urged against it should commend themselves to those who claim so much critical insight. It is true that Elihu hesitates and repeats, but for this there is a fair and natural explanation. He gives us the impression of one personally diffident in the presence of the older and the wiser, so esteemed, yet conscious of having important and timely truth, the utterance of which he cannot suppress (xxxii. 18-20). He asks pardon often, as Eliphaz had done in the beginning, but with a good grace, manifesting reverence for age, and respect for suffering, but still more respect for what he deems true and right. The "higher criticism," as Davidson says, "cannot maintain its gravity over these peculiarities, and discharges at them a great amount of bad language." "His speeches," it says, "are filled with gemachtes Pathos, and erfolglos Forcirtes," with other charges of a similar kind. Now, nothing is less reliable, or more uncertain, than this kind of jaunty remark in respect to an ancient composition. It is a pretentiousness worse than any that can be imputed to Elihu, which would pretend to judge thus of words, and style, and the genuineness of certain kinds of phraseology, in a literature affording such scanty means of comparison. Besides, it is very easy to imagine some critical theory of the Rationalists in which these very peculiarities, or similar ones, would probably be cited as all-important. Striking Arabian circumlocutions, they might be called, such as marked the old seances, and were regarded as a literary excellence, or marked Kohelethisms, or any thing else that might be thought to have a critical interest, or a bearing upon the question of some supposed place or time of authorship.

* The substance of the argument for and against the much controverted genuineness of the Elihu passage, is briefly yet clearly given by Rev. A. B. Davidson, in his excellent Commentary on Job, the first volume of which was published in 1862. After presenting the main objections in the text, with very satisfactory answers of his own, as well as from Stickel and others, he gives, in a note to page xli., some others which he justly styles "examples, less of reason than of critical petulance": "As the following, (1) That Elihu does not appear in the Prologue. But Job's three friends are not named as coming to debate with him; their object was condolence. (2) Elihu is not named in the Epilogue. But there was really nothing to say of him; so far as he agreed with Job he is commended in his commendation; so far as he agreed with the words of God, he has his reward in hearing his own sentiments repeated by the divine lips. The reference made even to the friends of Job, in the Epilogue, is but casual; for the drama concerns Job only, and takes end with him; and even Satan, who should have come before the curtain humbled and prostrate, to receive the jeers of an assembled world, nowhere appears. (3) Job makes no answer to Elihu. And for the best of reasons: His heart is stricken by Elihu's words. (4) Elihu addresses Job by name, as the original disputants do not. But Elihu comes in as an arbiter, and must use names to distinguish between both parties whom he addresses; and God Himself adopts the same mode of addressing Job in opposition to the friends." The objection arising from Elihu's alleged Aramaisms, is well answered by Stickel (cited by Davidson), in saying: "that Elihu is himself an Aramean (ch. xxxii. 2, of the family of Ram, that is, Aram), and naturally spoke in that dialect." But these Aramaisms are greatly overstated. There is evidence in several places of other persons being present during parts, at least, of this long discussion—some to pity, some to mock Job, and some as silent spectators.

† הַסְּעָרָה. The article (the storm) is very natural, if we take it in connection with those strong premonitory symptoms of an approaching tempest that marked the close of Elihu's speech. In the other supposed connection it is far from being easy, though possibly allowable.

If Elihu is the last speaker, then the words, "who is this that darkens counsel," &c., might be regarded as spoken of him incidentally, or as first disposing of what had just preceded, although the address, generally, is to Job. There might be assigned reasons for this, consistent with the favorable view we have taken of him. The confusion of speech, before alluded to as occasioned by the appalling approach of the storm, and which, he himself confesses, would furnish a ground for it. These opening words resemble very much his own language, as though echoed back to him from the thunder-cloud: "Is it told Him that I am speaking? (אֵלֶיךָ תִּדְבָּר) tense of description) we cannot order our speech in the presence of (בְּפָנָיו), or by reason of the darkness." Or, again, it might be called a "darkening of counsel," not in respect to its abstract truth, but when presented as a solution of the great problem, to the exclusion of other grounds in the proceedings of Him who, according to Elihu himself, "giveth no account of His ways."

THE BOOK NOT A SOLUTION OF THE PROBLEM OF EVIL.

One might be led to think, at first view, that the great matter worthy of such a sublime Book as this, would be the solution of the problem of evil—how sin came into the world, and man is held accountable. It is the question of the ages, to the settling of which not even the Critical Philosophy makes an approach. There is, however, no allusion to it in the divine allocution, except as comprehended in that awful declaration of power and sovereignty, seeming to say, as the voice said to Moses: "I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious—forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin—visiting iniquities unto the third and fourth generation, and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me and keep my commandments." Beyond this, no solution is offered, and Merx is right in saying, however irreverent it may seem, that if any clearing up of this dark problem had been the design of the Book, it must certainly be regarded as a failure;—that question stands just as it did before.

The Divine Address, and the modern Natural Theology. No argument from Design.

It has been said that this speech of Jehovah contains an implied argument similar in substance to the one offered by our modern Natural Theology. So MERX, Das Gedicht von Hiob, pa. xxx.: "It is to exhibit the theology of nature, and that the rational aims visible therein furnish proof that God has like rational aims in all His government, moral as well as physical." With this he connects what Job says about Wisdom,* ch. xxviii., etc., as a preparatory or transition step in the Lösung or Solution of the Problem. The argument may be thus stated: The divine speech is an exhibition of God's wisdom in nature; therefore must we regard it as intended to show that He must be equally wise in His spiritual government. But that would not be a solution. It would be simply an assertion, on a grander scale, of what is assumed by all the speakers throughout the Book, all of whom seem to vie with each other in lauding the divine wisdom. Job especially dwells upon its greatness and unsearchableness (xxviii. 20, &c.), leaving to man, as his peculiar and highest wisdom, the duty of reverencing it (ver. 28), acknowledging it, and "departing from evil." Architectural excellence is, indeed, a pervading idea of this divine address; but that power, almighty power, is the predominant one, is shown not only in the general style of its thunder tones, but also in its effect on Job, whose first words in reply are: "I know that Thou canst do all things," as before cited: Now I know it, whatever misgiving thought of some fatality I may have betrayed in former words now wholly renounced. It does not tell us in general that God acts solely from moral reasons; there is something in the language that gives the idea of artistic purposes regarded as having a value in themselves, aside from any moral or utilitarian considerations. He may make worlds, and lesser works, such as some of the great animals, for the glory and beauty of them, irrespective of any benefit* to man, or to other rational beings.

* It is in respect to this that Job is assigned, by many commentators, to what they call the Chokma portion of the Bible, making it coeval with the Proverbs, or the time of Solomon, a little earlier or a little later. Delitzsch supposes the Wisdom of the Proverbs to be an advance development, and therefore later. Merx, on the other hand, regards the author of Job as "polemizing" against the Proverbs writer. But why not the other way, if there is a difference, the author of Prov. viii. "polemizing" against the older author of Job?

The Divine Ways Transcending and Ineffable. Eph. iii. 10; John ix. 3.

There may be æsthetic reasons. And then, again, there may be others altogether ineffable, whose explanations man could not receive if God, or super-human beings, should offer them. What right have we to apply the measure of our Ethics, or our Psychology, or our Ontology, to Him "whose ways are above our ways, and whose thinking is above our thinking, even as the heavens are high above the earth," that is, immeasurably and inconceivably beyond us? Sober Scripture sanctions such a representation. As before intimated, the designs of God, in His dealings with men, may be connected with effects to be produced in higher spheres (Eph. iii. 10, before cited); and so what He does, or permits to be done, to individuals may have relations, wise and just, extending far beyond them, whether in the present world or in any other. We are safe here in simply receiving the teaching of our Saviour (John ix. 2) when "the disciples asked him: Rabbi, who sinned, this man himself, or his parents, that he was born blind?" It was for the sin of neither, is the answer, "but that the works of God might be made manifest in him." Here is no throwing it upon nature, as the Rationalist would have done, but a positive assertion of a Divine purpose, and yet that that purpose had respect to something altogether separate from any punishment, discipline, or general well-being of the individual sufferer. "Who art thou that repliest against God? Shall the thing formed say unto him who formed it, Why hast thou made me thus?" Such is the idea that is brought to us by this voice from the thunder-cloud. It is that of a personal omnipotence unchallengeable, doing all things wisely, all things well, yet giving no account (לֹא עֲנָה, answering not) to any who demand the reason of its ways. It is the first great truth for man to learn—the predominant truth to take rank before all others—the fundamental truth, not for the infancy of the world merely, but most especially needed in this age of naturalism, of scientific boasting, of godless spiritualism.

THE TRUTHFULNESS OF THE NARRATIVE.

Is Job a truthful narrative, a legend with a dim nucleus of fact, or a pure fiction? In answer to the first of these questions, some would deem it sufficient to say, that the book is a poem on its very face. But this does not settle the matter. It may be so called unquestionably; and yet it may well be doubted whether, at the date of its authorship, even assigning it to the Solomonic period, there was that clear line of distinction between prose and poetry that afterwards existed. All high and animating thought has a tendency to measured language, to some kind of formal emphasis or repetition called parallelism, and which, in the Shemitic tongues, at least, is the beginning of rhythmical movement. It seems to be a demand of strong emotion, or of some strong interest in the thought expressed, whether devotional,

* The modern Natural Theology has very little like it in the Bible. It may be said, too, in general, to be out of the line of the ancient thinking, Pythagorean and Platonic, as well as Shemitic. Ideas, divine thoughts, as having in themselves an artistic or intellectual excellence, in a word, the glory of God, take precedence of mere utilitarian final causes.

prophetic, or sententious. There is reason, too, for thinking that the more animated colloquial style among the Hebrews and other Shemitic peoples had much of this parallelism or germinal poetry; as in the language of Abigail to David, 1 Sam. xxv. 28, 29, or in the pleadings of the widow of Tekoah, 2 Sam. xiv. 13, 15, and other places that might be cited, where just in proportion as the thought or feeling rises in earnestness, do the words also seem to rise into a species of parallelism, and take on more and more of a rhythmical aspect. Thus viewed, the style of the speeches in Job may be held to be the natural one for the expression of such thoughts, requiring neither study nor artifice. That was the way men talked when deeply earnest, or under the influence of strong emotion, or when the gravity of the ideas discussed seemed to demand something corresponding to it in the style of utterance, some measured cadence, be it of the simplest kind, that might mark them as grave and emphatic. The exact prose style, on the other hand, may have been, in fact, the more artificial, as carefully avoiding this kind of sententious, emotional utterance, so ill adapted to statistical narrative, though suiting well the thoughtful soliloquy, or some forms of animated colloquialism. There is, therefore, really nothing unnatural, nothing artificial—rather the reverse—in the fact that these speeches in Job have this easy rhythmical cadence, which the reader, if he have taste and feeling, must acknowledge to be in perfect harmony with the gravity of the subjects discussed. Far removed as we are from this Oriental style, we should have been a little surprised, nevertheless, had the lamentations of Job, and the responses of his friends, been carried on in the same kind of talk we have in the prologue and other narrative Scripture.*

* Instead of a sense of artificialness, it is truly with something like a feeling of ease and freedom that we emerge from the curt, statistical dialect into these more spontaneous utterances, in whatever parts of the Bible they may occur. As when Moses, as though weary of his lawgiving, breaks out into song:

Give ear, O ye heavens, and I will speak;
And hear, O Earth, the words of my mouth.

Equally unconscious of anything artificial was Isaiah when he opens his prophecy with similar language, or predicts that men

Shall beat their swords into ploughshares,
Their spears into pruning-hooks;

Or the sententious Solomon thus falling into measure in the utterance of his prudential wisdom:

My son, hear the instructions of thy father,
And forsake not the law of thy mother.

It is found everywhere in Scripture, and in the mouths of all classes, whatever may be their variety of character:

Lord, when Thou wentest out of Zion,
When thou marched'st out of the field of Edom.

—DEBORAH.

Where thou goest, I will go;
Where thou lodgest, I will lodge;
Thy people shall be my people,
Thy God my God.

—RUTH.

The soul of my lord is bound in the bundle of life;
The souls of thine enemies cast forth from the sling.

—ABIGAIL.

For we must needs die, and are as water split,
But God doth gather again his banished ones.

—WIDOW OF TEKOA.

The Spirit of the Lord spake by me;
His word was in my tongue.

—LAST WORDS OF DAVID.

The Lord maketh poor and maketh rich;
He bringeth low and lifteth high.

—HANNAH.

So in Luke, Elizabeth, and Mary, and Simeon, break out spontaneously in this same rapt measured language; and in like manner does John in the Revelation rise into poetry, if we choose to give it that name. It is, however, nothing essentially different from what we have in the Psalms and Job, and even in Ecclesiastes. Those who made such utterances did not think they were speaking or writing poetry as a studied or artificial language. The state of soul, as caused by the moving circumstances, made it spontaneous; usage made it easy; it was a natural speaking—not an improvising as some might be inclined to call it; for that implies something like knack or skill, however acquired, and has, besides, but little of value or significance beyond the mere surprise it occasions. It need only be said, that we have something of an echo of this old style in the Koranic rhymes and cadences, though there the artifice is clearly visible.

The Book of Job a Drama, and yet subjectively true.

The two ideas are perfectly consistent. It may have the dramatic form, the dramatic interest, the dramatic emotion, the dramatic teaching, and yet be substantially a truthful narrative. Making allowance for what are merely matters of language, such as the use of round and double numbers to express things that are beyond statistical estimate, we may believe in the general outward verity, whilst regarding this mode of stating the vastness of Job's possessions, and the suddenness of his calamities, as itself evidence of a subjective truthfulness. It testifies to the deep impression left by the story as explicable only on some basis of actuality consistent with emotional hyperbole, but repelling the thought of artistic skill or frigid invention. It is this subjective truthfulness which is all that is required for a true faith in the divinity of the Holy Scriptures. It includes every thing else of value, and, once firmly held throughout, brings with it the idea of the outward supernatural as not easily separable from such a book, and such a history, lying, as it does, in the midst of such cotemporary human surroundings. We are compelled to take with it a corresponding measure of objective truth, regarded as separate from the necessarily emotional language, or as far as may be demanded for the moral and spiritual impression. In this way, what we have called subjective truthfulness may be very easily defined. It is the perfect honesty of the writer or writers whom God has chosen as the recorders of the great objective events which constitute the revelation He has made to the world. We are only to suppose that they heartily believed the truth of what they wrote, according to its evident intent as historical, dramatic, or allegorical, to be judged of according to the clear marks left upon its style. When we thus believe in the perfect honesty of the writers, we shall find ourselves, if truthful and candid, compelled to believe in a great deal more. Applying this to the Book of Job, we can thus hold that the writer, whoever he may have been, and in whatever age he may have lived, truly believed the substantial historical verity of what his pen has transmitted to us. This subjective truthfulness is unaffected by the steps or media through which such a belief may have come to him. It may have been in one of three ways: the writer may have been an eye-witness; or he may have received it from near cotemporary testimony, in which he fully trusts; or it may have reached him through a tradition, of whose substantial truthfulness he has no doubt. There has thus come to him the substance of the story: a rich and prosperous man suddenly reduced to the extreme of poverty, bereavement, and pain; his sore trial, the treatment of his friends, the prolonged discussions between them, the alleged divine interposition, and the sufferer's restoration to a state of still greater prosperity. Along with this is the idea of a super-earthly nexus of events, originating the providential means by which the trial is brought about, and furnishing a reason for the strange suffering. This revelation of events belonging to the superhuman sphere, and the modes by which they may be supposed to become known to the human mind, whether as pictorial accommodations, or in any other way, present a question standing by itself. The ground of faith in them, is the same as that of other Scriptural narratives which carry us above the plane of human knowledge. It is enough for one who believes in the Bible as truly a divine book, that they are spiritually and dramatically consistent with the earthly events of the story and the spiritual design to which they furnish the key. On the round numbers we have already remarked. They should disturb no one who is familiar with the style of the Bible. They are simply methods of expressing vastness without regard to statistical accuracy. It may be said, indeed, that the use of units, tens, and hundreds, in such narratives, would have furnished good ground of suspicion, or actually detracted from our perfect trust in this subjective truthfulness of the writer which we rationally regard as beyond every other excellence. The same may be said in respect to the rapid connection of the events. It is a picture giving us the most vivid impression of suddenness, or one trouble coming whilst another is fresh in its effect and remembrance, breaking the victim, as Job says, "with breach upon breach." Human experience confirms this as something not infrequent in the great trials of life, to whatever causation they may be referred. Such a story leads to hyperboles. They may almost be said to be its natural and therefore most truthful language. Their absence would betray an unemotional state out of harmony with the deep interest of the events believed.* They would characterize the style even of an animated eye-witness. Still more might they be expected in one who gives such an account its second transmission; and thus this language of emotion would become its fitting, or, as we might even call it, its truthful vehicle, getting a traditional form which is the strongest evidence of a once vivid actuality, easy to be distinguished from the wild myth, or the more fanciful legend. The same view may be taken of Job's restoration. In itself, it is not an improbable event. The round numbers here are doubled, but this, too, is matter of language. It is a mode of expressing the fact that the restored prosperity greatly exceeded that of the former state; as in sober descriptive Greek we may have διπλάσιος used as only another term for πολυπλάσιος, or the multifold.† In judging of this truthfulness, it is enough if we can be satisfied of the absence of all invention, or of any thing that looks like literary artifice. There is abundant internal evidence, that the scenes and events recorded were real scenes and real events to the writer, whoever he may have been. He believed the story; he gives the discussions either as he heard them, or as they had been repeated, over and over, in many an ancient consensus. The very modes of transmission show the deep impression it had made, in all the East, as a most veritable as well as most marvellous event. It may be this, and yet as truly a drama, with its heroic action, whether outward or spiritual, and having as much right to the name‡ as any others, so-called, which are inventions, either in whole or in part.

* It is, in fact, this very kind of language, indicating, as it does, the absence of invention, which shows the state of the writer's mind in relation to it, and his firm belief in the substantial truth of the story, whether derived from near witnesses, or from remoter tradition. As we have elsewhere remarked (Note to Lange Gen., p. 319), "there is something in this subjective truthfulness as denoted by wide and rounded statements, which is far more precious to a right faith, than any attempt at objective or scientific accuracy." "All the high hills under the whole heaven," Gen. vii. 19, is evidently the language of a spectator deeply moved by the scene as he beholds it. How much more full of satisfaction is this to a right thinking, than any numerical or geographical settlement of the question about the extent of the flood. In the emotion evidently denoted by such words, there is carried the vivid impression of reality, and this is what we most need. So, too, Acts ii. 5: "And there were dwelling in Jerusalem Jews devout men out of every nation under heaven!" We cannot resist the feeling of some most real memorable assemblage, that gave rise to such an impassioned description. It is not at all the style of legend but of deep emotion. A still more remarkable proof of our seeming paradox, is the language of the loving and beloved disciple, John xxi. 23. What a vivid reality must there have been in that character which calls out the seemingly extravagant language: "Not even the world could contain the books that should be written." The comparison is to be taken, not as a measure of outward fact, but as an expression of devotion, of admiration, of boundless love. In this sense it is no extravagance; the hyperbole wholly disappears. When John wrote that Gospel, the world of sense, with all its images, failed to set forth the excellence of Christ. "Heaven and earth were full of his glory." He must have lived, most objectively lived, who produced such an impression. Inwardly it was the most truthful of utterances. Let us suppose that the statement had been more guardedly made, and instead of the world it had been said: "Hardly a folio volume would have sufficed for the recital of what Jesus had done;" how would it have diminished that real power and truthfulness to which the strongest utterances were inadequate.

The same view may be taken of all parts of the Old Testament, where immense numbers, especially round numbers, are employed; as in the emotional statements of certain great battles with their countless slaughter. The case is different when statistical accuracy enters into the very essence of the account, as in the details of the Tabernacle and of the Levitical sacrifices.

† A difficulty is made from the statement of Job's age at the close of the Book. It comes from adding the number there mentioned (140 years) to his supposed former life, which could hardly have been less than 50 or 60 years, thus making, in all, two hundred years or more. But there is no need of this; the most easy and unforced rendering would take this term, 140 years, as the entire length of his life. He lived till he became 140 years old. This is in harmony with his seeing his children to the fourth generation, or great grand-children, even though born after he was fifty years old. The words אַחֲרָיו אַחֲרָיו, "after this," are not in conflict with such a view. It may very easily be rendered: "After this Job lived on, even to the age of 140 years." Such an age is not improbable, even for a later time than the patriarchal. There are examples of such longevity in quite modern times.

‡ There are the best of reasons for calling Job a drama, if we do not take the word in too narrow a sense. It has all the essential parts of such a composition: its Prologue, its Dialogue, and its Crisis. It has, moreover, its great ἀδλον, trial or prize. It is the very heart of the Book, possessing even an Epic grandeur of interest. The integrity of Job, the very soul of Job, we may say, is the matter of this test, the subject of this ἀγών, or strife between God and Satan. To accommodate Homer's language, Iliad xxii. 160, to a far higher theme:

οὐχ ἑρπῆιον, οὐδὲ βοεῖν, ἀλλὰ περὶ ΨΥΧΗΣ μάρανται θανάτου.

Even if its action were wholly spiritual, it would, none the less, be entitled to the name dramatic. It has, however, as much of outward movement as the Prometheus Vinculus of Æschylus, or the Philoctetes of Sophocles. In the latter, too, the dramatic interest is chiefly in the spiritual strife arising out of intense bodily pain.

Or it may be regarded as purely poetic, in fact as well as in form, with the exception, perhaps, of a few human elements, whether legendary or historical, that may have aided in inspiring the idea of its composition. By those who adopt this view, as is done by some of our most pious as well as learned commentators, it is, of course, held that the Prologue, and the Theophany at the close, belong to the dramatic scenery. As maintained, however, by men like Hengstenberg, Dillmann, and Delitzsch, this theory of poetic invention does not come from any such aversion to the very idea of the supernatural as characterizes the whole Rationalist school. It is not with them the mere shunning of difficulties, or for the sake of making the Book more credible and acceptable as a part of Holy Writ. They think that they discover in the Book itself, in its apparent plan and style, evidence of such dramatic intent. And this does not diminish its value. There is almost every style of writing in the Bible, historical, devotional, ethical, allegorical, and even mythical. God may employ this dramatic mode of representing truth as well as any other. It may be received as we receive the parables of our Saviour. There would be demanded, however, a method of exegesis different from that which would be proper for such books as Genesis and Samuel. Another reason is that they regard this kind of didactic representation as belonging to what they call the Chokma period (the Wisdom or Philosophy period) of Hebrew literature, and, therefore, not to be judged by the same rules that would be applied to the older Scripture. This view of Job as being, in the main, a poetic invention, at least in its superhuman representations, may be regarded as the one now current in the Christian Church. The weight of critical argument may even seem to be in its favor; and yet it may not be amiss to consider what may be said for the older view, and whether there is such a difference, in this respect, between Job and other parts of the Bible.

The Rationalist is repelled by the supernatural everywhere. He has a most irrational, and yet an easily-explained, dislike to the very idea, in whatever part of the Scriptures he may meet with it. Viewing it then as a question wholly by itself, it may well be asked, why the superhuman accounts in Job may not be received just as we receive them in the narrations of Exodus, or of Luke's Gospel, or of the Acts of the Apostles. The question may refer to the supernatural simply when displayed upon earth as visible matter-of-fact, or to superhuman scenes narrated as transpiring in a superhuman sphere. In regard to the latter, it may be said, as we have before hinted, that the difficulties are by no means peculiar to the Book of Job. The question as to the mode of inspiration, or the way in which such superhuman or ante-historical facts become known to the writers, meets us in other parts of the Bible. The same mystery hangs over the first of Genesis. It suggests itself immediately in reading such accounts as that of 2d Chronicles xviii. 18-21, or the recitals of divine messages coming to the prophets. If, however, we are convinced, on general grounds, that the Bible is a divine book in the honest sense of the word, that is, given specially by God for our instruction in a way that other books are not, the minor difficulties vanish. If the Book of Job, or any other book, is truly inspired, and we receive it as such, then may it be trusted that God provides for all such communications, whether by trance vision, by symbolic imagery, or by filling some human mind with the general idea and the accompanying emotion, then leaving it to its own modes of conceiving, as controlled, more or less, by its measure of science, and clothed in its own necessarily imperfect human language. Thus may it be given to us in the Holy Canon as the representative of a superhuman fact, some knowledge of which is demanded as a fact ineffable, or incapable of communication in any other way. To deny the possibility of this is simply the bold irrationality of affirming that there can be no communication between the infinite and the finite mind, or of still more recklessly asserting that there are no superhuman scenes—that between man and God, if there be a God, there is an infinite blank, unoccupied by beings or events, and in which nothing can

We may say, too, on the ground of the same authorities, that its historical truth, be it more or less, does not at all stand in the way of its dramatic character. Some degree of such historical truth, real or supposed, is, in fact, demanded by it. All the Greek tragedies are so constructed on old narratives believed to be real; such as those of the Trojan and Argonautic ages. It needed something of the kind to inspire them; so that while a few, like the Persæ of Æschylus, are almost wholly historical, none are pure fictions.

take place that may, in any way, affect the course of the human history either collective or individual. Some such general view in regard to modes of revealing may be rationally adopted by one who regards the book of Job as true and inspired—that is, in some way given by God as other books are not. If uninspired, if a mere human production, then this Book of Job has for us simply an archaic interest, like the early Arabian songs, or some Carmen Moallakat written in golden letters, and suspended in the temple at Mecca. If no higher view can be taken of it than this, then, surely, the vast amount of comment bestowed upon it, by Rationalists as well as by believers, has been far beyond its deserts. The immense labor might have been better devoted to other and more useful purposes.

The Supernatural in Job not to be Rejected.

A rejection of the book on the ground of its supernatural and superhuman origin is simply in accordance with the procedure of the Rationalists everywhere. They even think it too much for its poetry, unless regarded as fiction throughout, or without any nucleus of truth, however dim and legendary. Thus, in defiance of such passages as Isaiah vi. 1-4, Umbreit asserts that the Old Testament recognizes no theophanies after the times of Moses. In Job, therefore, it was a pure poetic fiction, hardly admissible unless the action and the scenery are dramatically assigned to the Patriarchal period. And so he asks with an expression of contempt for any one who might even imagine the contrary: "Wenn die ganze Sache Dichtung war, was war denn die Gotteserscheinung im Sturme? Wahrheit?" It is not, however, the degree of outward splendor in the theophany, or the magnitude of the sense marvel, as we may call it, that makes the difficulty for this class of interpreters. The objection is to any idea of God in the world as a manifest causation, whether it be in "the whisper," or in "the thunder of his power" (Job xxvi. 14). They are haunted by the thought of their dislike to the miraculous in any sense, or of any divinely-caused deviation from the course that things would otherwise take, whether in nature or in history. And yet they must reject the most undeniable facts, or admit marvels greater, in truth, than any that may be styled physical miracles—strange deviations from the general course of things in the moral and spiritual human, that, to a thoughtful contemplation, are more inexplicable than any analogous departures or irregularities, seemingly, in nature. Such an anomalous spiritual phenomenon is the very position of this old book of Job, or this old "poem," lying, as it does, in the literature of the ancient heathen world. Let the serious yet intelligent reader fix his mind upon the cotemporary theologies and mythologies. A little to the south-west lies Egypt, so lauded now for its ancient culture, and its alleged longæval supremacy in what is called civilization, or the peculiar condition of "the higher man,"—Egypt, so well known then as the land of crocodile and serpent worship, of the grossest animal superstition, of the most debasing, God-forgetting worldliness. Not far to the east, or just beyond the Indus, are the monstrous forms of Nature worship, as exhibited in the strangest combinations of mystic, pantheistic, and polytheistic ideas. To the Mediterranean west, yet still within the Shemitic knowledge, are the myriad fancies of the Greek mythology, with its Bacchanalian festivals, its worship not only destitute of moral power, but the cherisher everywhere of impure ideas—æsthetic, it is true, famed for its ideas of the beautiful in art, yet most unclean. Almost in contact with it lies the Dagon idolatry, or fish worship, of the Philistines and the Phœnicians. To the north, on the Euphrates, the weird Chaldean and Babylonian superstitions, as we learn from the dark phantoms of them that haunt us in reading the book of Daniel. Right below it, on the south, the Sabæan idolatry, or star worship, which had infected the primitive monotheism of the Shemitic Joktanites. There is no need of going farther in such a summary. Everywhere was there the rapid verifying of Paul's words (Rom. i. 21-28), setting forth the ways in which men destroy for themselves the pure knowledge of a personal God. Now think of this book of Job in the midst of such surroundings—the transparent purity of its religious ideas yielding in no respect to the loftiest of modern conceptions, the marvellously sublime representations it makes of the divine personality, omnipotence, infinity, unsearchableness, wisdom, grace and holiness—in a word, its distinguishing theism jealous even of the admiration of the heavenly bodies, the "sun in its splendor, the moon walking in brightness," lest it might seem to detract from the reverence due to Him "who setteth his glory above the Heavens." What restraining and conserving influence kept it so clean, so rational, so holy, in the very midst of such abounding impurities? If tendencies so universal and so constant may be called nature, then surely must there have been here the manifestation of a divine power. That One above the human sphere should sometimes speak to us, even though it might be in a voice from the cloud, is not a greater marvel for the reason, though it might be more astounding to the sense. For reason, too, has its marvels, and one of them—the greatest of them, perhaps—would be such an everlasting silence of the super-human worlds, or that to man—himself a supernatural as well as a rational being—no direct communication should ever come from a higher plane than that of nature.

It is the moral sublime of the book of Job that makes the supernatural—if fair criticism should allow us to regard it as having such an element—all the more easy of belief. With such an accompaniment, it becomes all the more natural—if we may use the seeming paradox—or the more to be looked for in the whole course of things including every movement, moral and spiritual as well as physical. It seems fitting that there should be a theophany in such a drama; and this fittingness would be none the less if we regard the human elements as being, at the same time, an outward historical reality. And so we might say of the supernatural everywhere in the Bible, so different from the wild, grotesque, unmeaning, or monstrous supernatural that meets us in all those "other ancient mythologies" with which the Rationalist is so fond of classing the Hebrew Scriptures. In these other books, these "other mythologies," there is nothing to give significance to the miraculous, whereas throughout our Holy Book, from the opening creative scenes to the apocalyptic closing, it is the great moral and spiritual, the great theological ideas, that make the supernatural events narrated seem its fitting and most reasonable accompaniment. It would be strange, on the other hand, that, in connection with such grand unearthly teaching, the appearance of a super-earthly power, the intervention of a super-earthly mind or voice, should be wholly lacking.

It is thus that we may hold in respect to this Book of Job. Is there internal evidence, as some of the best critics maintain, for regarding it as a divine poem, and the opening and closing events as the appropriate dramatic scenery? Such a view is entirely consistent with a belief in its inspiration, and of its being designed to occupy a high place in the Divine Canon. Aside from such a theory, however, and such alleged internal evidence, or regarded simply in themselves, the supernatural events that appear to be set forth in this book may be received just as we receive similar narrations in other parts of the Bible. What is there in the voice from the storm cloud, or even in the prolonged utterances that follow it, more incredible than the voice from Sinai with its specific law-givings, the voice to Elijah in Horeb, the voices that, in some way, came to the Prophets, the voice from the burning bush, the voice that spake to Paul from the midday sky? Above all, what is there in it more strange or faith-surpassing than what is told us in respect to our Saviour's baptism, when the Heavens opened, and the Spirit descended like a dove, and a voice from the firmament was heard saying: "This is my Beloved Son in whom I am well pleased?" In all these cases the exceeding greatness of the moral sublime throws in the back-ground the physical strangeness. There is a harmony in it which not only favors, but demands assent. Granting the human elements of the story, just as they are narrated, in all their human and natural grandeur, the supernatural, whether voice or appearance, seems but its fitting complement. It is true, that to those who are eye-witnesses of the event, the miracle is the attestation of the doctrine; but for minds that read or contemplate it, the converse also holds: it is the glory of the truth that makes the miracle easy of belief.

SPECIAL INTRODUCTION TO THE RHYTHMICAL VERSION.

The term Rhythmical is preferred to Metrical, because the latter name, though in itself appropriate, is also used of Biblical translations not strictly in Rhythm, or Metre, but only adopting the metrical division, ἐν στίχοις, or as suggested by the Hebrew parallelism. The present is an attempt to give the Book of Job in a true rhythmical form. The determination of that form, however, requires careful study. There are, it is said, some old English Versions of Job in rhyme. That, however, was not to be thought of. Aside from the difficulty such a method would make in preserving the exegetical accuracy demanded, it was felt that to such a production as Job the jingle of rhyme would be altogether belittling. Our common blank verse line of five feet would present no great difficulty in itself. With a little change, even our Common English Version might be put into that form with a preservation of all such accuracy as it possesses. But there were two objections to it. The first is that such blank verse, though having more dignity than rhyme, would become too monotonous, as the reader would presently feel, and would, therefore, be poorly adapted to the exceedingly passionate and abrupt parts of this divine poem. In the second place, it would require a disregard of the Hebrew accentuation and parallelism as determining the close of lines, and demanding inequality. What we call blank verse is, in fact, only rhythmical, or, rather, measured, prose. The divisions into lines on the page of the book are but for the eye. The thought goes over them, not only to the completion of sentences, but of clauses and subordinate divisions. In other words, the ends of lines are not marked by any peculiar cadence either in the rhythm, as in Greek, or in the thought, as in Hebrew. By the ear alone, one could not tell whether the reader was at the beginning, at a mid cæsura, or at the ends of verses. Now the Hebrew parallelisms, whether they have within them what may strictly be called rhythm or not, are ever marked by distinct closings, determined both by the cadence of the thought, and by the position of the accents. This must be attended to,—and the translator has aimed at its strictest observance. For such a purpose, inequality of lines is absolutely demanded, since the Hebrew divisions thus made are of very different lengths. Besides, such inequality, if rightly managed, is an excellence and a beauty in itself. It prevents monotony, and gives, moreover, the freedom that is wanted in the more impassioned parts,—especially in Job's sighing, soliloquizing, and sometimes almost delirious utterances.

Thus the reader will perceive, that in order to preserve these important elements of parallelism and accent, there has been employed a very peculiar kind of rhythm. It bears an outward resemblance to what is sometimes incorrectly called Pindaric in English verse. But this is a misnomer, because the true Pindaric has different kinds of feet, or measures, as well as different lengths of lines. Here, however, one kind of foot, the iambus (—) or the iambic spondee, is universal. Other feet, as they very rarely occur, are merely substitutes for it. Thus the anapest (— — —) is used sometimes at the beginning of a line, as also a choriamb (— — —), occasionally, but ever in such a way as to commence a dipode with the stronger ictus. The tribach (— — —) very rarely occurs. It is avoided as unmusical, though commonly regarded as admissible among English iambs.

In regard to the lines, the principal one is the common pentameter, or blank verse line of English poetry. The Alexandrine comes in much more rarely, and almost always in the second or closing part of a parallelism. In such a position, especially at the end of some impassioned utterance, comes, now and then, the heptameter, or long line of seven feet, used by Bryant in some of his poems, and by Chapman in his translation of Homer. It is equivalent to two lines of our Common Metre, but much more harmonious, on account of its long unsevered movement. As in the first line of the following couplet:

And thou thyself | in ripened age | unto thy grave | shalt come,
As sheaf that in its season to the garner mounts;

the second being an Alexandrine. Mingled with the common blank verse line of five, there comes very frequently one or more of four feet; whilst in the transitions, and in the commencement of some new peculiar strain, there are short lines of three, and occasionally of two feet, or a single dipode. The trimeter not unfrequently makes a very satisfactory close after pentameters:

Higher than Heaven's height! what canst thou do?
Deeper than Sheol's depths! what canst thou know?
Its measurement is longer than the earth,
And broader than the sea.

But what need of this? it may be said. The great thing is to get the idea, however it may be expressed, in English. Attempts at verse must necessarily impair the force and clearness of the thought. To this it may be replied, in the first place, that facility, smoothness in reading, are to be desired, if the sense is not sacrificed, and that the feeling accompanying the thought may be a most important part of the thought itself. In the second place, paradoxical as it may seem to some minds, it may be maintained that the sense is actually made more clear in a rhythmical translation, if properly done, inasmuch as it gives that element of emotion without which the sense, in its essence and entirety, is not truly received. There may, indeed, be an overloading, and an obscuration, arising from too much artificialness; but whether that can be charged upon the present attempt, is left to the judgment of the reader. For fuller reasons in support of a position that may seem so paradoxical, he is referred to the Introduction to the Metrical Version of Ecclesiastes, Vol. X. of the LANGE Series, page 171. The ground taken is that we cannot do justice to poetry unless we read it as poetry,—that is, not simply knowing it to be such in the original, but feeling it to be so as we peruse the translation. Now this cannot easily be done in a rough unrhythmical prose version. The disorder in the dress is constantly interfering with this feeling we wish to have. Thus reading it as prose, in spite of our knowledge of its being poetry, we are constantly expecting the more logical transitions; and when they are not found, it seems all a disconnected and, sometimes, unmeaning rhapsody. A very simple rhythm, if it be smooth, may give the feeling that should accompany, whilst yet keeping as close to the lexical and grammatical sense as any purely prose translation could do. By this simple outward process, the soul of the reader is set in the right direction. The subjective predominates. He gets into the current of thought and feeling, and the purely emotional transitions become not only easy, but natural. When they occur, they are felt to be something we might expect,—and the mind thus prepared, not only apprehends them at once, but sees in them an exquisite emotional appropriateness. Thus the passage is actually better understood from the very fact of its rhythmical form. In this way a verse translation of a poem in another language, with the same number of words, or with a very small difference, may carry the whole sense, that is, both emotion and idea, more surely and more distinctly than any prose version could have done that had been constructed with the utmost regard to lexical accuracy. This may be tested by a comparison which would appeal to every reader's common sense, as well as literary taste. Take Bryant's translation of the Iliad. Its blank verse is not only very smooth, as verse, but remarkably faithful. It is an evidence how near one may bring the English to the Greek, and yet preserve a simple though musical metrical form. Let the effect of this be contrasted, not with the overloaded rhymes of Pope, but with the best prose translation that could be made, having for its aim the utmost lexical accuracy, and availing itself of every help that could be derived from the study of Eustathius, and of all the scholiasts. Certainly, Bryant carries us farther into the very soul of Homer than any such prose translations could possibly do, even though aided by so complete a scholastic apparatus.

From such a view, the Biblical commentator himself, dry as his work generally is, gets a new insight, as it were, by coming into the emotional spirit of the language he is explaining. But all this, it may be said, is interpreting by the imagination; it is letting one's self be led away by a feeling which may, or may not, have come from the passage. There is, indeed, danger of this; but then it may be truly said that a man with no emotion from what he is studying—a man having a mere intellectual interest, or possessed of little or no imagination—can never be a good commentator, or a good translator of Job, or of the Psalms, or of the Hebrew Prophets, or even of Homer. He must certainly fail in what is more essential than any mere grammatical exegesis, most valuable and important as that may be.

Again, there is a great deal of emphasis, and of what may be called emotional or exclamatory power in certain Hebrew words and idioms, which the corresponding words in English, and the nearest English idioms, fail to express. There is needed some interjection, some qualifying particle, which comes in easy and natural when it so comes from the sustained flow of rhythmical feeling instinctively, as it were, selecting the right words. One of the coolest temperament cannot read Job without seeing that there must be in it much of this post-scenic language. It may be a tone, a sigh, a pause of silence, an imploring or a deprecating look, a demonstrative gesture, all of them intimated in the words themselves, or revealed in the answers of the disputants who understand their fullest import, and all making up that life-scene, that unmistakable reality, which is insisted on in the Addenda, Excursus I. and II., pp. 5-6.

It is this consideration to which the translator would appeal as justifying epithets occasionally, though quite rarely, applied by him to Hebrew nouns. In all such cases it will be found that they belong to the emphasis of the passage, and that, without them, the English reader would receive a deficient idea, and certainly a deficient feeling, of the substantives to which they are attached. Thus "visions dire," vii. 14; the epithet is necessary because חִזְיוֹן means more than vision in this place. It is more than the seeing: it is the thing seen—a phantom, a spectre. So תְּרֻמָּה, iv. 13, rendered "vision-seeing trance," is more than any slumber, however deep. Its vision-seeing or clairvoyant nature appears from Gen. ii. 21: Adam's deep sleep; Gen. xv. 12: Abraham's vision-seeing trance; 1 Sam. xx. 12: the sleep that God sent upon Saul. It is used, indeed, of deep slumber generally, but in Job iv. 13 it evidently has this mysterious trance significance which is so unmistakable in the passages referred to. A similar remark applies to those occasional cases where the translator has placed words in brackets, though forming a part of the movement of the line. They denote something quite evidently to be implied, whether as hidden in some emotional particle, or as indicating a thought that has come in during some touching pause of silence, especially in the speeches of Job (see Addenda aforesaid, pa. 6), and which, though unexpressed in words, appears in the coloring it gives to what follows as something well understood by the repliants and all who were spectators of the scene.

A few words in regard to the language and style of the Version. Of the first, it may be said that the aim has been to make it as pure Saxon-English as possible. Words of that kind have ever been preferred. Some very plain and even homely expressions have been used, as having all the more force and pathos by reason of their plainness. Much use has also been made of the poetical element of inversion, but not at all, it is thought, beyond the degree of which the English is capable. It has often seemed to the writer that, throughout the English Bible, the translators might have kept much more of this than appears; as in that beautiful example, Acts iii. 6: "Silver and gold have I none, but what I have, that give I unto thee." In this way, whilst making the Scriptures more impressive, and even more clear, they might have enriched our language with vivid forms of speech, which the very reading of the Bible would, long ere this, have completely naturalized, even had they seemed strange, or semi-poetical, in the beginning.

In this matter of style, too, may be mentioned the use of the nominative independent, which is of frequent occurrence in English, especially in animated or poetical English, and is still more marked in the Arabic, where the subject so often stands by itself, as l'inchoatif, to use De Sacy's and the native Arabic technic, whilst the pronoun representing it is expressed or included in the form of the verb. It is also quite common in Hebrew, so that whilst it may be used freely in an English translation of any Hebrew sentence containing subject and predicate (l'énonciatif), it is actually demanded when the subject stands first,—as, for example, xi. 2:

A flood of words, demands it no reply?

Or, again, where it is the object of the verb that is thus treated:

That night! thick darkness seize it.

Other similar features of style, in respect to which pains have been taken, might be mentioned, were it not for the fear of making this Introduction too long. There need only be a reference to the pauses and notes of silence introduced in some places, especially in Job's hesitating and panting speeches,—as the whole subject is fully discussed in the Addenda, pp. 178, 179, to which the reader is directed.

To the text of the Version there have been added in the margin quite full exegetical notes. These have been intended to explain, not only every departure from the Common English Version, but also every thing in the Version offered that might seem to demand elucidation for the reader, besides a careful presentment of those difficult passages on which all commentators have dwelt, more or less. In this part of the work the author has taken pains to avail himself of the best helps. The old Versions (Greek, Latin, and Syriac) have continually been consulted, the Targum, the Jewish Commentary of RASCHI, the old Commentators as their opinions are given in POOLE'S Synopsis, the best of the more modern, such as LUD. DE DIEU, SCHULTENS, UMBREIT, EWALD, DILLMANN, DELITZSCH, SCHLOTTMANN, PAREAU, MERX, DAVIDSON, GOOD, ROSENMUELLER, BARNES, NOYES, together with CONANT and our own ZÖCKLER, who are not the least among them. More or less consulted have been other German commentators, such as HEILIGSTEDT, VAHINGER, HIRZEL, et al. Important aid has also been derived from the French Version of RENAN. To these may be added that immense work, CARYL on Job, in two very large folio volumes. (1650.) This quaint old Puritan Commentator has not been appreciated as he deserves. Equal in Biblical learning to the most learned of an age abounding in such men as USHER, POCOCK, LIGHTFOOT, BOCHART, he excells them all in that spiritual discernment which makes him especially serviceable to those who would obtain the deepest acquaintance with this Book of Job. It is to him not a work of art, not a drama, not a fiction in any sense, but a divinely given case of religious experience. His critical as well as practical remarks are all penetrated with this idea, giving him an insight, even into Hebrew words and idioms, which the learning that lacks such a conviction so often fails to supply.

The translator, moreover, does not hesitate to say that after giving these valuable helps all due attention, he has not wholly rejected his own independent judgment. Often has it been yielded in deference to superior authority and further study. In other cases, however, it is maintained, though always, he thinks, with a becoming diffidence.

The whole is submitted to the reader with the hope that it may be regarded as making some contribution to our Biblical Literature.

RHYTHMICAL VERSION

BOOK OF JOB.

CHAPTER I.

- 1 There was a man in the land of Uz whose name was Job. This man was pure
- 2 and just, one who feared God and shunned evil. There were born to him seven
- 3 sons and three daughters. His wealth was seven thousand sheep and goats, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and a very great household of servants. And this man was great above all the Sons of the East.
- 4 Now his sons used<sup>1</sup> to hold a feast, each one of them at his own house, and on his own day; and they sent invitations to their sisters to eat and drink with them.
- 5 And it was<sup>2</sup> the way of Job when these festival days came<sup>3</sup> round, that he sent and purified them. To this end he rose early in the morning, and offered burnt-offerings according to the number of them all; for it was a saying<sup>4</sup> of Job: it may be that my sons have sinned and cursed<sup>5</sup> God in their hearts. Thus did Job continually.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 5. And it was the way of Job. "And it came to pass" will not do for the rendering of וַיְהִי here, since that would denote only a single event.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 5. Came round. On account of the Hiphil form הִקְיִפּוּ, some would make sons the subject, giving it a permissive sense, as Conant does: They let the feast days go round. There are examples, however, of Hiphil verbs used intransitively, and it may here have the sense of Kal. Isaiah xxix., although the Kal, in its primary idea, seems to have a very different significance, namely, that of cutting, as in Isaiah x. 34; Job xix. The incongruity of the apparently intransitive Hiphil would probably disappear if we knew the exact connection between the primary and secondary senses of the root. We may still give it something of a Hiphil rendering, and yet keep הַיָּמִים הַנִּשְׁתָּהִרְוּ for the subject: When the days had made their round—their end or section. Or it may borrow its sense from the unused root קָיַם, whence הִקְיִפּוּ, Ps. xix. 7, a circut, or occursus, κατάρτημα, a meeting, as the Vulgate and LXX. have it in that place.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 5. It was a saying of Job. The general aspect of the passage demands the frequentative sense for אָמַר; or it may be rendered he thought (אָמַר פִּלְשׁוֹ), He said in his heart, Gen. xvii. 17; Ps. xiv. 1); or it may be thus taken without the ellipsis, like φημι in Homer.

Hence, in Piel to bless, to pray for good, or, as here, for evil, that is, to curse (the English word itself, according to Webster, having had a good origin in cross—to pray evil in the name, or with the sign, of the cross). In like manner, the corresponding verbs, both in Greek and Latin, ἀπαύειν, precor (the latter with the same radical letters as the Hebrew verb, PRK, BRK) have, also, the two senses of prayer and malediction, although the bad sense, from the greater cursing tendency of the Greeks, is so much more frequent than in Hebrew. So also κατεύχουαι, joined with ἀπαύειν, Æsch. Soph. Theb. 633—οἷας γ' ἀπάται καὶ κατεύχεται τύχας.

Hence ἀπὰς ἀπαύειν, found frequently (or some similar phrase) in the dramatic poets, may have the benedictory or the maledictory sense. The former is the more ancient (as we have it ILLERONTUS i. 132, ἀπαῖσαι ἀγαθά, and just above in the same section, κατεύχεται εὖ γινέσθαι), the latter the more common. It is true, that they generally have an object expressed, or a substantive noun, like ἀπὸ ἀπὸ, which seems to determine their application; but then there is the same peculiarity about the noun itself. Thus ἀπὸ more commonly means a curse; but it has also the older sense of blessing or prayer; as in ILLERONTUS vi. 63; ἀπὸ ἐννοήσαντο παῖδα γινέσθαι, "they made a prayer that he might have a son;" and therefore he was called Demaratus, "the people-prayed-for" king. If the context helps to determine which sense is to be given to the Greek verbs, there may be said to be the same demand of the context in such passages as these in Job and in 1 Kings xxi. 10. At all events, the facility with which these verbs are used in this double way furnishes an argument for those who hold to a similar tendency in Hebrew. It might, perhaps, be thought that, in some of the verbs referred to, the imprecatory force came from the compounded preposition, as in καταράσθαι κατεύχουμαι, imprecor. The preposition, however, only gives direction to the action of the verb, and may be consistent with either sense— blessings upon, or curses at.

Besides, in the case of the Greek ἀπαῖσαι and the Latin precor, the cursing sense occurs, when the context demands it, without any preposition—bene precari or male precari being equally independent uses. It is worthy of note, too, that, according to LANE, the corresponding Arabic verb in the viii. Conjugation (أَتَكْرَهُ) has the sense of vituperation, reviling, detraction. There is, moreover, the analogy of other similar words in Latin. Sacro, for example, may mean to consecrate or to make accursed. So sacer may mean holy, sacred, or impious, accursed, horrible. Vino, auri sacra fames, "accursed hunger for gold." In this way sacro and exsecror (exsecrate) come to be used in the same way. The same law of contraries seems to prevail in respect to some other Hebrew words of a similar kind. Thus the verb קָרַשׁ polluted, consecrata in the bad sense of the Latin sacrata. So קָרַשׁ (as a verb, or as a noun) may carry the idea of something holy, consecrated, or something doomed, accursed, ἀνάθεμα. There is the same quirkiness in the Arabic haram. It is not without a natural ground, this diversity and almost contrariety of meaning. It comes from the fact, that the feelings of reverence and of awe, on the one hand, and of fear, detestation, and even of abhorrence, on the other, do sometimes approach each other. The terms are thus used in respect to things or ideas to which we cannot stand indifferent. This is the case with the idea of a personal God. Fearful as is the thought, yet experience, as well as Scripture, teaches that where there is no love for Him, there must be aversion. Not to bless, as Job does, ver. 21, is to curse.

קָרַשׁ mundus fui—holy, clean—and קָרַשׁ, meretrix, one

The argument for the old translation is strengthened by the invalidity of the reasons given for the new. In the first place, there is no evidence that the Hebrew קָרַשׁ ever means "to bid farewell," like the Greek χαίρειν, or εὖ χαίρειν, unless this place is found to bear testimony to it. And, secondly, there is but slight evidence that the Greek phrase itself is ever used in malam partem. Its etymological signification, to rejoice (like the Latin vale, Greek ἔσσω, be well, be strong), is out of harmony with such a use. It is a bidding farewell, and may thus come to mean abandoning, giving up, especially when connected with εὖ, but ever with sorrow, never with bitterness. It does not mean to renounce or denounce in this harsh way. And if it did, that would be so near to cursing as to take away all its value as an explanation of the seeming difficulty. Such a formula would be most peculiarly inappropriate to the charge against Naboth, 1 Kings xxi. 10, "Thou hast said farewell to the king," as a mode of renouncing. There is not a particle of evidence in the Old Testament that treason or rebellion was ever expressed in that way. The Vulgate and the LXX. in rendering it literally ἐλθέσθαι and benedictis, thou hast blest the king, either misunderstood it or regarded it as a sneering irony on the part of the witnesses. Here, too (1 Kings xxi. 10), the faithful Syriac renders it cursed (ܐܬܝܢܐ ܕܡܠܝܚܐ). Profanity of some kind, some evil speaking, careless or presumptuous speaking about God (mala dictio) would be the sin the young men would be most likely to fall into when heated by wine; and this was the very thing that made Job so solicitous about them, even as he was ever solicitous for the honor of God whom "he feared." It shows, too, how justly he was entitled to the character given to him as one who not only feared God, but shunned evil—everything that had the appearance of evil, or that might lead to it. See his own description of the highest human wisdom, xxviii. 28. See also the remarks on this touching recital of his God-fearing, paternal solicitude, EXCURSUS iv., p.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 6. The day. The article, as CONANT says, denotes here a particular time, as set for this purpose. The rendering, therefore, of E. V., there was a day, called for amendment.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 6. The Lord. The translator has followed E. V. in this rendering, instead of the rendering Jehovah which CONANT gives whenever יהוה occurs. His is the more faithful translation undoubtedly, and yet it was something entitled to a better name than superstition which led our old translators to avoid the frequent mention of this highest of the divine appellations. We can hardly condemn the Jews for carrying the feeling still farther, even to the avoidance of the writing it, except in copies of the Holy Scriptures. It is the great and ineffable name, and the effect must be bad if its pronunciation is repeated everywhere in the numerous cases of its occurrence throughout the Scriptures. What would make it sound worse is the fact of its being the proper name of Deity, as it were, in distinction from others which are descriptive. If used thus, it would come to sound like ZEUS in Greek, JUPITER in Latin or ORMUZD among the Persians, or THOR of the Scandinavian mythology, and that is the reason, doubtless, why the scoffing infidels are so fond of giving the name in full in their offensive and irreligious caricatures. The thought is of importance at the present time, when Bible revisions are so much talked of. Dr. CONANT's, or the new Baptist version, is, in many respects, an improvement on the old, and we can only hope, therefore, that, before it goes into common use in that denomination, there may be a change back to the old method. Still more exceptionable are the new modes of writing and pronouncing this sacred name such as Jahveh, Jehveh, etc. Etymologically, they may be more correct than that given by the vowels long attached to it; but it disturbs the sacred feeling that inheres in the name as pronounced on solemn occasions, and as it appears in the few cases of its expression by our old translators. Some of the German Rationalists seem to delight in being especially offensive in this way. It occurs a number of times in this Prologue, and comes again in the Epilogue, or the two closing chapters, but in the dramatic, or spoken part, it occurs but once, xii. 9, and that in a declaration more than usually solemn and emphatic. If we regard them as actual discourses, it is evident that the speakers shunned the utterance of the name. If it is a poetical invention merely, then the writer must have felt that its frequent introduction in the dialogue parts would have been a violation of a sacred dramatic propriety. There is one occasion, as it occurs in the Prologue, in which it was deemed best, by the present translator, to give the name itself. It is in Job's most solemn act of submission, ch. i. 21, where strong emotion causes him to break out into the chanting style.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 6. The Accuser—the Adversary. The meaning of the name is given here on the ground that it would be suggestive to the reader in those passages of the dialogue where Job speaks of "his enemy," and would give a deeper significance to what he says, xix. 25, of his Goel, Avenger, Redeemer.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 7. Going to and fro—walking up and down. Dr. CONANT's version, roaming over—walking about, is undoubtedly more in accordance with modern speech, and therefore, an improvement; but the present translator must confess his preference of the old English, as more graphic. Compare the language, 1 Pet. v. 8: "The Accuser, like a roaring lion, walks about seeking whom he may devour." It must have come from the Apostle's familiarity with this language in Job.

9 Then Satan answered the Lord and said: Doth Job fear God for nought?
 10 Hast thou not made a hedge<sup>10</sup> about him, and about his house, and about all that he hath on every side. Thou hast blessed the work of his hands: his wealth has 11 spread abroad in the land. But put forth thy hand now and touch all that he 12 hath, and see if he will not curse thee to thy face. And the Lord said to Satan:
 Behold, all that he hath is in thy power; only against his person put not forth thy hand. So Satan went forth from the presence of the Lord.

13 Now it was the day that his sons and his daughters were eating and drinking 14 wine in the house of their brother, the first-born. And there came a messenger to Job and said: The cattle were ploughing, the she asses were feeding beside them, 15 when the Sabæans fell upon them and took them; The servants also have they smitten with the edge of the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

16 While he was still speaking, there came another and said: The fire of God fell from heaven, and burned the flocks and the young men, and consumed them; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

17 While he was still speaking, there came another, and said: The Chaldæans made three bands, and set upon the camels and took them. The servants also have they slain with the sword; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

18 While he was still speaking, there came another and said: Thy sons and thy daughters were eating and drinking wine in the house of their brother, the first-19 born. And behold, there came a great wind from the direction of the wilderness, and struck upon the four corners of the house, so that it fell upon the young people, and they are dead; and I only am escaped alone to tell thee.

20 Then Job arose and rent his garment, and shaved his head; and he fell to the earth and worshipped. And he said:

21 All naked from my mother's womb I came,
 And naked there shall I again return.
 Jehovah gave, Jehovah takes away;
 Jehovah's name be blessed.

22 In all this Job sinned not, nor charged cruelty<sup>11</sup> upon God.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 10. Made a hedge about him. Among the striking epithets which the Greek poets affix to the name of the supreme god Zeus, no one is more suggestive of certain scriptural ideas than that of Ζεὺς Ἐπειός (derived Latin Jupiter Hæcæus) literally, "the God of the household," of the enclosure" (from ἔπος, a fence, hedge, or wall)—the "God of families," of the domestic relations. It is thus the style of Scripture not to shrink from placing side by side, as it were, the two extremes in the divine idea: the "God Eternal, Almighty, Most High" (see the names El Olam, El Shaddai, El Elyon, as they occur in Genesis) in close connection with epithets denoting patrilial, local, and even family relations. He is the God of the universe, παντοκράτωρ, and at the same time, a θεὸς πατρίων, God of Israel, the God of His people, of his elect, in a closer sense than was ever dreamed of in any Grecian mythology. This epithet is a gem from the ancient mine of ideas. The thought it carries is from the patriarchal days. "Thou hast made a hedge about him and about his house, and all that he hath." God does not deny what Satan says, although, for his own transcending reasons, He gives him permission to enter that sacred enclosure, and lay it waste for a season, that it may be restored to a state of more perfect security. He is called Ζεὺς Ἐπειός, say the Scholiasts, because his statue stood in the ἔπος, and that these frigid souls, and many modern critics with them, think to be enough. They never think of asking the question that lies back of this: why was his statue placed in that spot? There was in it the same idea that is represented in those words of the Latin poet:

"Sacra Dei, sanctique patres"—

so pregnant with a meaning of which he himself perhaps had a very inadequate conception,—the sacred family idea, now so fiercely assailed in some quarters—those holy domestic relations so closely allied to religion, and where Righteousness lingers last when taking its departure from the earth:

"extrema per illos

"Justitia excedens terris vestigia fecit."

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 22. Cruelty, תַּכְלָה: enormity. Any thing abnormal, anomalous, inexplicable. See the note on the word, ch. xxiv. 12.

CHAPTER II.

- 1 Again it was the day when the Sons of God came to present themselves before the Lord; and Satan came also among them to present himself before the Lord.
- 2 Then said the Lord to Satan: Whence comest thou? And Satan answered the Lord and said: From going to and fro in the earth, and from walking up and down in it. Then said the Lord to Satan: Hast thou observed my servant Job, that there is none like him in the earth, a man pure and just, fearing God and shunning evil? And still he holds fast his integrity, though thou didst move me against him to destroy him without cause.
- 4 And Satan answered the Lord and said: Skin after skin<sup>1</sup>; yea all that a man hath will he give for his life. But put forth thy hand now, and touch his bone; touch his flesh; and see if he will not curse thee to thy face! And the Lord said to Satan: Behold, he is in thy hand, only spare his life.
- 7 Then Satan went forth from the presence of the Lord, and smote Job with a grievous sore, from the sole of his foot to his crown. And he took a potsherd to scrape himself therewith, as he sat among the ashes. Then said his wife to him: Dost thou still hold fast thine integrity? Curse<sup>2</sup> God and die. But Job said to her: Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaks. Shall we, then, accept<sup>3</sup> good at the hands of God, and shall we not accept evil? In all this Job sinned not with his<sup>4</sup> lips.
- 11 Now three friends of Job heard of all this evil that was come upon him. And they came, each one from his place, Eliphaz the Temanite, and Bildad the Shuhite, and Zophar the Naamathite, for they made an appointment together to go and mourn with him, and to comfort him. And they lifted up their eyes afar off, and knew him not; and they wept aloud, and rent, each one, his mantle, and to the bone, and to the quick or tender flesh. It represents the outside goods, ra' f'wa, such as property and even children. These may be stripped off, like one cuticle after another, but the interior life, the bone and the quick-flesh, is not reached. Touch that and see if he will not cry out in a different strain. Satan wanted to try the effect of severe bodily pain. He knew how intolerable it was, and that other afflictions, though deemed greater, perhaps, when estimated as matter of loss, could more easily be borne. The history shows that it was not the fear of death that was so terrible to Job, since he sometimes expresses a desire to die. נָפְשׁוֹ then, here rendered the life (end of ver. 4) is not life, as existence, but life as feeling, feeling of severe pain. At the end of ver. 6, the context demands the other sense. He will give any thing, says Satan, to get relief from that when it becomes excruciating. See Remarks on this idea of unendurable pain in the Introduction to the Theism of the Book, p. 28.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 4. Skin after Skin. Heb. עֹר בְּעֹר, for his life. But it comes to the same thing. From the sense of after, which certainly belongs to עֹר, and, in Arabic, is the prominent sense, comes that of exchange, one thing after another, or taking the place of another; the preposition coming before either the price or the thing exchanged. But what is the meaning of it? It would require a large space to give the different views that have been entertained. The reader will find a very full list of them, as given by Dr. CONANT: Skin for skin—skin of another for skin of one's self—skin for the body—skin for skin, a proverbial saying, like for like—skin after skin, as Schultens explains it: that is, a willingness to be flayed over and over again, that is, figuratively, to be stripped of all his possessions, etc. It seems strange that none of them seek the explanation of the language in any thing beyond itself. After so much discussion, it is with diffidence the translator makes the suggestion that the whole difficulty is cleared up by simply adverting to the words עֲצָמוֹ and בָּשָׂרוֹ ("his bone and his flesh") in the next verse. עֲצָמוֹ bone is used for the very substance of a thing, in distinction from its outside, or incidental properties. See Exodus xxiv. 12. So עֲצָמוֹ sometimes. But take it here for bone, as something more interior than the skin, or as containing the medulla, or as connected with the flesh which has in it more of the life, the feeling, than the skin, and we have just the comparison desired. It is the interior flesh, the quick flesh, as contrasted with the less sensible skin. So in xix. 25, it is the contrast between the raw flesh to which he points (אֶרֶץ), as yet remaining, and the skin which the crawling worms, bred by his disease, had already nearly devoured. The comparison seems obvious. The skin is outside

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 9. The reasons for this rendering are still stronger here than in the other passage, i. 5. The wife's vehemence, and apparent bitterness, demand the strongest expression.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 10. Accept. This is a more suitable word, and denotes more than receive. The latter word does not determine the manner, being, like the Hebrew לָקַח קָבַל, occurs in Daniel and Ezra, and may be called an Aramaism; but such examples, as has been fully shown, prove little or nothing in respect to the date of the Book. There are still more decided Aramaisms in Genesis and Judges. There are reasons, in some cases, for regarding them as marks of antiquity rather than of the contrary.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 10. With his lips. The Jewish commentators infer from this that while Job preserved correctness of speech, he was already sinning, or beginning to feel a want of submission, in his heart. But there hardly seems any good warrant for this. See Int. Theism, p. 28.

13 sprinkled dust upon their heads toward heaven. And they sat down with him upon the earth, seven days and seven nights; and none spake a word to him; for they saw that his pain<sup>6</sup> was very great.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 13. Pain was very great. נֶאֱדָה, means, properly, bodily pain, although used sometimes for affliction generally, or dolor cordis, the aching of the soul (see Isa. lxx. 14). But even this is on account of the dolor corporis, which may become so great as to overpower everything else. This has not been sufficiently attended to by commentators. See remarks Int. Theism, p. 28, etc. Job's grievous cry, ch. iii., was simply the expression of this intolerable pain, which the fell disease was bringing upon him. Satan was now touching his bone and his quick-flesh, instead of his skin, that is, any outward good. See Note on ver. 4. The conduct of the friends shows this. Had it been mental sorrow alone, however severe, there would have been no reason why they should not have spoken to him. But to a man writhing in such extreme bodily anguish, speech would be useless, if not an aggravation.

CHAPTER III.

- 1 After this Job opened his mouth and cursed his day.
- 2 And Job began and said,
- 3 Perish the day when I was to be<sup>1</sup> born,
The night that said,<sup>2</sup> a man child is conceived.
- 4 That day! O be it darkness evermore;
Eloah never seek it from above,
Nor ever shine the light upon its face.
- 5 Let darkness and the death shade call<sup>3</sup> it back;
Dense clouds upon it make their fixed abode;
And dire eclipses<sup>4</sup> fill it with affright.
- 6 That night! thick darkness take it for its own.
In the year's reckoning may it never joy;
Nor come into the number of the months.
- 7 Lo! let that night be barren evermore,
And let no sound of joy be heard therein.
- 8 Who curse the day, let them forever curse it,—
They who are doomed<sup>5</sup> to rouse Leviathan.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 3. אָוֹר בּוֹ. When I was to be born.—We follow Raschi, who gives the future here its prospective significance. The post-anticipating imagination goes back of birth, and takes its stand before the coming event, as though deprecating, praying against, its appearance. "The day on which I was going to be born," he renders it וַאֲנִי לֹא הָיִיתִי נֹלָד "and was then not yet born." Unless there had been some such idea as this it is not easy to see why the preterite would not have been used, as it is in the parallel passage, Jerem. xx. 14: אָרוּר הַיּוֹם אֲשֶׁר יֻלְּדֵתי בוֹ, "cursed be the day in which I was born."

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 3. The night that said.—More grammatical as well as more significant than our English Version. Night is personified. This is now generally acknowledged.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 5. Call it back.—UMBREIT, einlösen, redern it, buy it back. Darkness and Tealmazeth are called upon to take it back as something which had been loaned or mortgaged—reclaim it as their own—a terrific image.—The other sense of נָאָל, namely, that of staining, which some give it here, will not do at all.

to Hirek in the construct state. The other rendering makes כְּ comparative, and takes מִיָּד as equal to אֵרֶךְ Hiph. part. of אָרַר: like those who curse the day. This, however, would make what follows in ver. 8 but a tame repetition, which is not likely. From כָּכֹר we get the sense of convulsion, wrapping or rolling together. Hence the image of any great obscuration, veiling or darkening of the heavens.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 8. Doomed.—The primary sense of עָתִיד is a near futurity, something impending, hence prompt, prepared, and from that the sense of skilled which, however, does not occur elsewhere in Hebrew, and seems to have been made by Gesenius and others, for this one place. The primary sense, given nearly in E. V., will do here, and, in connection with it, it is easy to take Leviathan in its usual sense of some great monster, and the whole passage as denoting persons exposed to some imminent danger, or in the extreme of misery: let it have the cursing of such—that is, the deepest cursing. DELITZSCH, and others, refer it to a superstition built upon the fable of the dragon swallowing the moon in an eclipse. Those who raise Leviathan are enchanters, who, in this way, are supposed to produce eclipses. It seems very far-fetched, and has about it an aspect of artificiality quite alien to the deep passionateness of the passage. There is, besides, not the least evidence of any such superstition among the Jews or the ancient Arabians.

- 9 Be dark its twilight stars.
For light let it look forth, and look in vain;
Nor may it ever see the eyelids of the dawn.
- 10 For that it did not shut the womb when I was born,
Nor hide the coming sorrow from mine eyes.
- 11 Why at the birth did I not die—
When from the womb I came—and breathe my last?
- 12 Why were the nursing<sup>6</sup> knees prepared?
And why the breasts that I should suck?
- 13 For now in silence had I lain me down;
Yea, I had slept and been at rest
- 14 (With kings and legislators of the earth—
The men who build their mouldering<sup>7</sup> monuments—
- 15 Or princes once enriched with gold,
Their homes with treasure filled),
- 16 Or, like the hidden birth,<sup>8</sup> had never lived;
Like still-born babes that never saw the light.
- 17 For there the wicked cease from troubling;
There the weary are at rest.
- 18 There lie the captives all at ease;
The driver's voice they hear no more.
- 19 The small and great alike are there;
The servant from his master free.
- 20 O why does He<sup>9</sup> give light to one in pain?
Or life to the embittered soul?
- 21 To those who long for death that never comes;
Who seek for it beyond the search of treasure;
- 22 Who joy to exultation,—yea,
Are very glad, when they can find the grave.
- 23 [The grave!<sup>10</sup>] 'tis for the man whose way is hid,— Whom God hath hedged around.
- 24 For still my groaning goes before my food,
My moans like water are poured forth.
- 25 For I did greatly fear,<sup>11</sup> and it hath come;
Yea, it hath come to me, the thing that was my dread:

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 14. Mouldering Monuments.—חֲרֻבֹת. DELITZSCH, ruins. So UMBREIT. Monuments so called because now abandoned to neglect,—mouldering like the memories of those who built them. There is here a bitter irony, as UMBREIT says.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 16. Had never lived.—לֹא אָחִיָּה in sense connects back with 'שָׁנִית', ver. 13, and what intervenes may be regarded as parenthetical comparisons: The first אֵן, ver. 15, is simply connective of vers. 14 and 15.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 20. Why does He?—God is evidently the subject of [חָיָה]. It is as though Job feared to name him otherwise than by the pronoun. There is no need of taking it passively, as in E. V., and thereby destroying much of the power and pathos of the passage. Such avoidance in Hebrew of the direct naming of the subject almost always denotes something fearful in the thought of the act or the agent.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 23. Were it not for the Masoretic accentuation and division, קָבֵר, end of ver. 22, might be taken with the clause that follows: the grave is for the man, etc. In that case, however, the preceding verb would have needed an objective suffix representing קְבוּרָה, ver. 21. The force of the word קָבֵר may, at all events, be regarded as carried over into the following verse, as the still sounding refrain: the grave—it is for the man whose way is hid, etc.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 25. Did greatly fear.—The language is soliloquizing. It may be regarded as a resuming, after a pause in which there occurs to the mind of Job this silent protest, anticipating, as it were, something of the kind of charge

- 26 For I was not at ease, nor felt secure, Nor rested thoughtlessly—yet trouble came.

that might, perhaps, be brought against him by the friends. I was not presumptuous, he seems to say; this trouble could not have come as a punishment for any such feeling. He had thought of adversity in the midst of his prosperity; "his heart had not been haughty, nor his eyes lofty." He may refer to a fear he had had of this awful disease, the elephantiasis, which had, at last, come upon him. It is not easy to discover the reason why some commentators turn these distinct preterite verbs of fear, 'גרת', 'פחדת', into presents, as though he then feared some other terrible thing as coming upon him. So DELITZSCH renders it, although the verbs in the next verse, having precisely the same form, and standing in precisely the same grammatical connection (namely, שְׁקַטְתִּי, שְׁלוֹתִי, etc.), he takes in the past. It seems like treating the Hebrew tenses as though they could be made to mean anything which a commentator might wish to bring out.

CHAPTER IV.

- 1 Then answered Eliphaz, the Temanite, and said:
2 A word, should we attempt, wouldst thou be grieved?
Yet who from speaking can refrain?
3 Lo many hast thou taught,
And strengthened oft the feeble hands.
4 The faltering steps thy speech hath rendered firm,
The sinking knees made strong.
5 But now to thee it comes, and thou art weary;
It toucheth thee, and thou art all amazed.
6 Is not thy pious<sup>1</sup> fear thy confidence?
Is not thy hope the pureness of thy ways?
7 Call now to mind; when has the guiltless perished?<sup>2</sup>
And where were just men hopelessly destroyed?
8 It is as I have seen, that they who evil plough—
Who mischief sow, they ever reap the same.
9 By the breath of God these perish utterly;
By the blast of his fierce wrath are they consumed.
10 (Hushed is) the lion's cry, the schachal's roar;
The strong young lion's teeth are crushed.
11 The fierce old lion perishes from want;
The lion's whelps are scattered far and wide.<sup>3</sup>
12 To me, at times,<sup>4</sup> there steals a warning<sup>5</sup> word;
Mine ear its whisper seems to catch.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 7. The emphasis here is on the verb, אָכַז and נִכְחַז, both strong words. The first might be rendered lost, utterly gone. The second is well expressed, in the English version, by the Jewish phrase, cut off. Instead of as yet charging Job with crimes, or even insinuating them, this language is meant to be encouraging. "The just, such as thou claimest to be, and as we believe thee to be, are never utterly lost, destroyed, cut off from God's people. Therefore, hope thou for healing and restoration."

<sup>3</sup> Vers. 10 and 11. MEXX puts these verses in the margin of his text, in smaller letters, and regards them as a displacement. They certainly have that look, unless we may regard them as a specimen of the way in which animated Arabian speakers run out their comparisons, as Homer sometimes does, until they seem to lose sight of the primary idea. What seems, too, to favor this view of MEXX is the apparent lack of any verb, or verbs, for the nouns in the first clause, unless they are connected with נִכְחַז, which seems only applicable to the teeth. The translator has endeavored to supply this by the words in brackets. Such ellipses seem allowable when it is easy to understand a verb agreeable to the nature of the nouns, and suiting the context. It may, however, be regarded as a case of zeugma.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 12. Although the Hebrew here is so very short in expression יָנֵק דָּבָר (אֵלַי דָּבָר יָנֵק), only three words, the translator would defend his version as neither superfluous nor deficient. The latter charge would seem to be against the omission of the conjunction; but י, here, is only a transition particle. It connects nothing, and, therefore, as any full English conjunction would only encumber the thought, the י is best rendered by being left out (see note on the omission of the conjunction xiv. 2). The Pual יָנֵק is rendered deponently; the passive form denoting merely ease or gentleness of motion, as though from no agency of the subject. Literally was stolen; but the idea is evidently the same as we sometimes express by the active steal, as in Milton's lines:

A soft and solemn breathing sound
Rose like the scent of rich distilled perfumes,
And stole upon the air.

- 13 In troubled thoughts from spectres of the night,
When falls on men the vision-seeing<sup>6</sup> trance,— 14 And fear has come, and trembling dread,
And made my every bone to thrill with awe,<sup>7</sup>—
15 'Tis then before me stirs a breathing form;<sup>8</sup>
O'er all my flesh it makes the hair rise up.<sup>9</sup> 16 It stands;<sup>10</sup> no face<sup>11</sup> distinct can I discern;
An outline is before mine eyes;
Deep silence!<sup>12</sup> then a voice I hear:
17 Is MORTAL<sup>13</sup> MAN MORE JUST THAN GOD?
Is BOASTING<sup>14</sup> MAN MORE PURE THAN HE WHO MADE HIM?
18 IN HIS OWN SERVANTS, LO, HE TRUSTETH NOT, EVEN ON HIS ANGELS DOTH HE CHARGE<sup>15</sup> DEFECT.
19 Much more to them who dwell in homes of clay,
With their foundation laid in dust,
And crumbled like the moth.

At times. This is justified, and even demanded in order to give the true conception of the future form in יָנֵב.

It is the frequentative future, denoting repeated happening, a coming of things, one after another, and therefore future to each other as a picture, though all past as a narration. The pictorial Hebrew language uses this future in prose, sometimes, as well as in poetry. There is an example of it, ch. i. 5: "Thus did Job continually," כִּכָּה יִעֲשֶׂה אִיּוֹב.

(thus would he do, כָּל הַיָּמִים "all the days"—time after time). We may render it by a past tense; but there is a subjective or relative futurity in it. There is, moreover, something in this form, as here used, that gives an anticipatory, a looking-out sense to the whole passage. It is painted as something coming on, as though the speaker placed himself in medias res, or rather back of all, and regarded the events as they appeared to him in each time of his having this clairvoyant experience; for the whole style of the language seems to convey such an idea; as in the case of the δαιμόνιον of Socrates which so frequently appeared to him, though not always, perhaps, in the same way. The plural nouns in the first clause of ver. 13 confirm this view: "in seasons of serious thought—in visions of the night;" as though it had often happened.

To render יָנֵב in the past, without any wau conversive, or any affecting particle, or any thing in the context to justify it, seems very arbitrary, besides overlooking the whole spirit of the passage. As the formal future ("will steal") would not suit our idiom, or our Occidental modes of expressing relative time, the best thing we can do is to imitate the pictorial manner by putting it in the present, with some word to denote its repetitive idea as an experience, and something to express the subjective anticipatory feeling. To this latter service, no word is better adapted than our word seems, as used in vers. 12 and 15.

Similar remarks are applicable to the futures that follow, namely, יִחַלֶּה, a peculiarly visionary word, and הִכָּמֵר, ver. 15, and יַעֲבֹד, ver. 16. The preterites mingled with them (הִפְתִּיר and קָרָאֵנִי) have more of the narrative in distinction from the descriptive style; but these, too, may be regarded as subjective retro-transitions, or shiftings of scenic event. It may be maintained, also, that they are all affected by the peculiar subjective character given to the whole passage by the starting future יָנֵב, ver. 12.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 12. Warning word.—דָּבַר, here, has its sense oracle, as in Num. xxiii. 5, 16, and frequently in the Prophets.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 14. Thrill with awe.—הִפְתִּיר is an intensive verb of fear, but does not, of itself, mean to shake, as E. V. renders it. The Hiphil form makes it here peculiarly strong.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 15. A breathing form. Some render רוּחַ here a spirit (a spectre, phantasm); others, simply a wind. The rendering above given combines both ideas—not for the sake of compromise, but because it is supposed to be most descriptive of the fact intended: a stirring, or movement in the air, produced by a spiritual presence, thus, as it were, taking form and position for the sense, or, in this way, announcing itself. Walter Scott may not have thought of Job, but he has something of the same conception in respect to the effect produced by the presence of spirits, when William of Deloraine disturbed the grave of the wizard. Michael Scott (Lay of the Last Minstrel, Cant. ii. 16):

Strange sounds along the chancel past,
The banners waved without a blast.

We have, along with this, that most peculiar verb רוּחַ, generally denoting some mysterious, indescribable change. The simplest word, however, answers the purpose here. It was a stirring in the air, just making, or seeming to make, itself perceptible to the sense.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 15. Made my hair rise up: תִּכָּמֵר. There is no reason why this Piel verb should not have its transitive sense, though most commentators render it intransitively, making hair the subject. If taken transitively, רוּחַ (wind or spirit) is the subject; or the feminine may denote a general or indefinite subject, the event itself.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 16. It stands. יַעֲבֹד—takes position after the breathing motion, and before the announcement.

<sup>11</sup> No face. כִּרְאָה, aspectus, visage, something that has features. It is a more distinct word than תְּמוּנָה in the next clause, and makes a contrast with it stronger than the words form and image as used by E. V. and CONANT. It is the mere outline without any look, or any internal lineaments.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 16. Deep silence! דְּמָמָה might, perhaps, be taken interjectionally, as we sometimes use the noun silence for hush! as though the narrator, in his vivid apprehension, is carried back, and loses himself in the scene: "Hush! 'tis a voice I hear!" or, am about to hear (subjective future אֶשְׁמָע).

- 20 From morn till night they're stricken down,
Without regard they perish utterly.
21 Their cord<sup>17</sup> of life, is it not torn away?
They die—still lacking<sup>18</sup> wisdom.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 21. Their cord of life. יָתֵרֵם בָּם. This rendering is adopted by the most modern commentators. It gives us the same image as the mournful language of Hezekiah, Isa. xxxviii. 12, מִדְּלֵה יִבְצָעֵנִי. Life, as a cord or thread, is a common figure in many languages.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 21. Still lacking wisdom. וְלֹא בַחֲכָמָה. literally, but not in wisdom, or with wisdom. It may be taken as referring to the deep wisdom of God, Job xxviii. 13 —"not found in the land of the living," that is, among mortal men at all. Or it may be referred to the highest wisdom of which man is capable, "the fear of God," xxviii. 28, but which comparatively few men possess.

It is not exactly certain where the metaphor ends. Critics of the Lowthian school might deem this a fault. In the sacred writings, however, metaphors are not employed for embellishment. It may be thought, too, that in this case the effect is strengthened by the very uncertainty. We hardly know where the moth ends and the man begins, or where the one fades away into the other.

CHAPTER V.

- 1 Call now. Does any answer thee?
To whom among the Holy dost thou turn?
2 Grief slays the foolish man;
It is the simple one whom anger kills.
3 I've seen myself the foolish<sup>1</sup> taking root;
But soon I cursed his home.
4 His sons, from safety far removed,
Are trampled in the gate—no helper near.
5 His harvest doth the hungry man devour;
Even from the thorns<sup>2</sup> he seizes it;
Whilst thirsty robbers swallow up his wealth.
6 Be sure that evil comes not from the dust,
Nor trouble grows as herbage from the ground.
7 Ah no!<sup>3</sup> Man's woe is from his birth.
Thence rises it as rise the children of the flame.
8 To God then, surely, would I seek;
To God would I commit my trust;
9 To God whose works are vast, his ways unsearchable,
His wonders numberless;

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 5. Even from the thorns. This intensive rendering is demanded by the union of the prepositions מֵאֵל and מִן—to and from. They glean close, even the stray heads of grain that grow among the thorns. צִמִּים is best made here from צָמָה with the sense of צָמָה in thirst (ZÖCKLER, UMBREIT, EWALD, MEYER). One version has robber, with little or no authority, unless regarded as metaphorical from the idea of the thirsty, with which we have combined it in the version above. DILLMANN, DAVIDSON, CONANT, render it the snare, as in xviii. 9, though it seems quite forced here, and entirely out of harmony with שָׂאף, to gape or pant after. The Vulg. has armatus for robber. The Syriac renders it thirsty, which certainly seems to make the clearest contrast with hungry (רָעָב), and therefore to be preferred notwithstanding xviii. 9.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 7. Ah, no! כִּי is not only strongly adversative here, but evidently implies a negative; οὐ μὲν ἀλλὰ. Children of the flame; literal rendering of בְּנֵי רֶשֶׁף, whether regarded as metaphorical of sparks, or of ravenous birds, as GISENIUS and others take it.

- 10 Who giveth rain upon the earth,
And sendeth waters o'er the fields.
- 11 The lowly ones he sets on high;
The mourning souls in safety are exalted.
- 12 He foils the cunning in their vain device;
Their hands are powerless to work reality.<sup>4</sup>
- 13 He snares the wise in their own craftiness;
Whilst the dissembler's plot is hurried on to ruin.
- 14 These are the men who meet the darkness in the day;
Who grope at highest noon as in the night.
- 15 God rescues from the sword, from their devouring mouth,
Yea, from the very hand, so strong, He saves the poor.
- 16 And thus the weak has hope;
And foul injustice shuts her greedy mouth.
- 17 O blessed is the man whom God reproves;
The Almighty's chastening, therefore, spurn thou not.
- 18 'Tis true he woundeth, yet he bindeth up.
He smiteth, yet 'tis his own hand that heals.
- 19 In troubles six will he deliver thee;
In seven—still no harm shall touch thy soul.
- 20 In famine, he from death<sup>5</sup> will thee redeem,—
In war, from the sword's edge.
- 21 From the tongue's smiting thou art hidden safe;
Nor shalt thou fear war's wasting when it comes.
- 22 At devastation and at famine shalt thou laugh;
Of forest beasts<sup>6</sup> thou shalt not be afraid.
- 23 For with the very stones hast thou a covenant;
All creatures of the field hold peace with thee.
- 24 So shalt thou know thy tabernacle safe;
Thine household muster, and find nothing gone.<sup>7</sup>
- 25 Then shalt thou learn how numerous thy seed,— Thine offspring as the earth's green growing herb.
- 26 And thou thyself, in ripened age, unto thy grave shalt come,
As sheaf that in its season to the garner mounts.

Lo this; we've pondered well; this is our thought.
O hear and know it; take it to thyself.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 20. Death here is represented as a tyrant or a conqueror, and therefore there is used the word פֶּדָה to redeem.

CHAPTER VI.

- 1 Then Job replied
- 2 O could my grief be weighed,
And poised<sup>1</sup> against it, in the scale, my woe!
- 3 For now it would be heavier than the sand;
And thence it comes, my incoherent<sup>2</sup> speech.
- 4 For Shaddai's arrows are within my flesh;
Their poison drinketh up my soul;
God's terrors stand arrayed before my face.
- 5 Brays the wild ass when the green herb is nigh?
Or lows the ox when fodder is before him?
- 6 Unsalted, tasteless—how can it be eaten?
What relish is there in the white of eggs?<sup>3</sup>
- 7 [So with your words]. My soul refuses taste.
'Tis food<sup>4</sup> I loathe.
- 8 O that my prayer were heard;
That God would grant the thing for which I long.
- 9 Let him consent and crush me down;
Let loose his hand and cut<sup>5</sup> my thread of life.
- 10 For here would be my comfort still,
That I could yet endure,<sup>6</sup> though HE spare not—
The Holy one, whose word I've not denied.
- 11 But what then is my strength, that I should hope?
And what mine end that I be patient still?
- 12 My strength! is it the strength of stones?
Or is my flesh of brass?
- 13 Is not my help within me gone,
And driven from me life's reality?<sup>7</sup>
- 14 Unto the faint, love still is due from friends,<sup>8</sup>
Even though he had the fear of God forsaken

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 3. Incoherent. Primary sense of עָהָה is swallowing, as our translation gives it. The secondary sense is confused and difficult utterance, as though the words were choked or swallowed.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 6. The white of eggs. This comparison that seems so little poetical, is evidently significant of the unsavoriness and tastelessness of the counsel just given. How vivid is all your moralizing as contrasted with the pungency of my insupportable anguish! See the remarks of A. B. Davidson, a late but most admirable commentator, who is very full on this and the following verse.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 7. רֹחֵם לִי. Lit., diseases of my food,—sickness of my food, or food of sickness—unsavory, or that makes me sick.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 10. Endure; וְאֶכְלֶנָּה. Most modern commentators follow Schultens in his deduction of this once occurring word from the Arabic عَظَرَ, to paw the ground as a horse, thence getting the sense of exultation. It seems extravagant, and out of harmony with the other language.

Better take it from the Chaldaic כָּלַךְ, which has the sense of burning. Hence also, as senses in use, those of contracting drawing ones-self firmly up. See the example given, BUXTORF, Chald. Lex. 1481, from BERESCHITH RABBA, וּנְכַשׁוּ

כֹּלֵרֵת עֵלְיוֹ. anima ejus contrahitur, retrocedit in eo. Our Eng. Ver. harden myself is not far from this idea. Though He spare not, or, let Him not spare. The 3d clause. Literally: For I have not denied the words of the Holy One.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 13. הַיֹּשִׁיעַ, from the substantive verb יָשָׁע. Anything substantial and real in distinction from the failing and the evanescent.

- 15 Not so my friends—illusive as the brook,
As bed of streams whose waters pass away ;
- 16 Whose turbid floods are darkened from the sleet,
As on their face the snowflakes hide<sup>9</sup> themselves.
- 17 What time they shrink,<sup>10</sup> deserted of their springs,
As quenched in heat they vanish from their place,
- 18 'Tis then their wonted ways are turned<sup>11</sup> aside ;
Their streams are lost, gone up in emptiness.
- 19 The caravans of Tema look for them.
The companies of Sheba hope in vain.
- 20 Confounded are they where they once did trust ;
They reach the<sup>12</sup> spot and stand in helpless<sup>13</sup> maze.
- 21 And thus are ye—but nought ;
A fearful spectacle ye see, and gaze in terror.
- 22 Have I said, give to me ?
Or from your wealth be liberal for my<sup>14</sup> sake ?
- 23 Or save me from the hostile<sup>15</sup> hand,
Or from the invader's power redeem my life ?
- 24 Give me your counsel, and I'll hold my peace ;
And let me clearly know where I am wrong.
- 25 How mighty are the words of righteousness !
But your reproving ! how does it convince ?
- 26 At words do ye your censures aim ?
At wind—such words as one may utter in despair ?
- 27 It is as<sup>16</sup> though you cast lots for the orphan's wealth ;
Or traffic<sup>17</sup> made of one you called your friend.
- 28 And now, O turn to me, behold my face.
I will not speak before you what is false.
- 29 Return, I pray ; let not the wrong prevail.
Return again ; there's justice on<sup>18</sup> my side.
- 30 Is there perverseness in my tongue ?
Cannot my conscience<sup>19</sup> still discern iniquity ?

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 16. Hide themselves. It does not represent a frozen stream, but a dark scene of winter, or of the rainy season, when the wadis are full. It is the snow falling on the swollen waters and immediately disappearing; the same exquisite image that Burns so happily employs:

Or as the snow falls In the river,
A moment white, then gone forever.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 17. Deserted of their springs. נִצְמָתוֹ—cut off from their fountains. The word נִצְמָתוֹ occurs but once. It is best derived from the Syriac נִצְמָתוֹ coarctavit. The sense drying up is closely allied to this, and also to that of heating, which is commonly given to the verb. See DILLMANN and UMBREIT.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 18. Zöckler here, we think, is right in referring to אֲרִיחָתוֹ to the streams themselves, instead of rendering it caravans like many others. The process is by way of evaporation; "they go up into tohu," the waste atmosphere. It is not easy to apply this language to the caravans, though it is admirably descriptive of the drying up of the streams. The verb יִלְפָתוּ, they twist to one side, well represents an abandoned channel.

<sup>13</sup> יוֹפְרוֹ, literally, blush with shame. The expression is not too strong when we think of the sickening disappointment of men travelling days in the desert, sustained by the hope of the cooling water, and finding at last only the parched bed of the wady.

לִי: For me, pro me—propter me, as though by way of ransom or deliverance from an enemy. See note 953 to Noldius' Concordance of Hebrew Particles.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 23. Hostile hand. Job seems to be ever thinking of some great and terrible enemy, who is not God. Comp. xvi. 9, 11.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 27. Or traffic made. כִּרְרָה with the sense emul, like the corresponding Arabic, and as used Deut. ii. 6; Hos. iit. 2. So SCHLOTTMANN und verhandelt euern Freund.

CHAPTER VII.

- 1 Is not man's life a warfare on the earth ?
His day, the hireling's day ?
- 2 As gasps the servant for the shadow's turn,
As longs the toiler for his labor's end,<sup>1</sup>
- 3 So am I made the heir to months of wretchedness,
And nights of pain they number<sup>2</sup> out to me.
- 4 When I lie down I say :
How long<sup>3</sup> till I arise, and night be o'er ?<sup>4</sup>
Then am I full of tossings till the dawn.
- 5 My flesh is clothed with worms<sup>5</sup> and clods of earth,
My leprous skin heals up<sup>6</sup> and runs again.
- 6 My days are swifter than the weaver's dart,
They pass away without a gleam<sup>7</sup> of hope.
- 7 Remember that my life is breath ;
Mine eye shall not again behold the good.
- 8 The eye that sees me now shall look on me no more ;
Thine eye shall seek me, but I shall be gone.<sup>8</sup>
- 9 As fades the cloud, and vanishes away,
So one goes down to Sheol, never to ascend.
- 10 No more to his own house he cometh back,
The place that knew him knoweth him no more.
- 11 ['Tis so with me]. I'll not withhold my words.
In anguish of my spirit let<sup>9</sup> me speak,
And moan<sup>10</sup> in bitterness of soul.
- 12 Am I a sea, a monster of the deep ?
That thou should'st o'er me watch.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 3. כִּנְיָ לִי. Number out; the active used for the passive, say the grammarians; but that explains nothing. There must be a reason for the idiom. Compare Job iv. 19; xviii. 18; xix. 26; xxxiv. 20; Ps. xlix. 15. In these and similar cases, it will be seen that the real or supposed agent is something fearful, or repulsive, as in Job xix. 26. There is a kind of superstition in it; an aversion to the mention of the name, as the Greeks feared to speak the name of the Furies. As remarked in note on vi. 23, Job seems to be haunted by the thought of invisible tormentors, as he had good reason to think from what is said in the introductory narrative, and as appears in the terrible language of ch. xvi. 9, 10. This fearful allusion appears, Ps. xlix. 15, בְּצֵאן לְשִׂאוֹל שְׂרָף. "Like sheep they put or thrust them (the wicked) into Sheol"—stabulant in Orco. The idiom passes into the Greek of the New Testament, Luke xii. 20: ἡ ψυχή σου ἀναιρούσιν ἀνὸ σοῦ—"they demand thy soul of thee." Who are they? Fiends, evil beings, said the old interpreters; "they will come after thee." No good reason can be given why it is not the true interpretation. In some cases this reason does not appear so evident. It may be reverence or admiration rather than shuddering fear. As in Isaiah ix. 11, the glorious description of the New Jerusalem: "Thy gates shall stand open day and night"—literally: "they shall keep them open." Instead of passive, it is the piel, most intensely active, גִּפְתָּרוֹ. Who are they? The holy angels, or warders of the New Jerusalem. If not this precisely something very glorious and mighty was in the mind of the prophet, leading him to use the expression. It is quite evident, however, that in Job xvii. 18: "THEY shall thrust him out from light to darkness," as also in Job xxxiv. 20, and Ps. xlix. 15, the evil or fearful agents are in the thoughts. See Glassius Phil. Sacra., 817.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 5. Worms. רִמָּה. Many commentators would render it rottenness; but there is no need of departing from the usual sense.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 6. Gleam of hope. אֶפֶס the least particle, the very extremity; hence used as a negative to denote total privation—all gone.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 11. Let me speak; אֶרְבֶּה. Paragoric future: Language of entreaty.

<sup>10</sup> And moan, שָׁח, to make a low murmuring sound—talk to ones-self.

- 13 I said, my bed shall comfort me;
My couch shall lighten my complaint.<sup>11</sup>
- 14 'Tis then thou scarest me with dreams,
To fill me with alarm from visions dire.
- 15 So that my soul even strangling would prefer,— Death, rather than these bones.<sup>12</sup>
- 16 I loathe the sight, I would not thus live on.<sup>13</sup>
O let me then alone; my days are vanity.
- 17 For what is man that thou should'st make him of so great account?
That thou should'st set thy heart upon him?
- 18 That thou should'st visit him each morning as it comes,
And try him every moment?
- 19 How long wilt thou not look away from me?
Nor leave me till I draw my laboring<sup>14</sup> breath.
- 20 Watcher of men, if I have sinned what can I do to thee?
That thou should'st set me for thy mark;
That I should be a burden unto thee?<sup>15</sup>
- 21 Why not lift up [the burden of] my sin,
And put away all my iniquity?
- 22 For soon shall I lie down in dust
And thou shalt seek me but I shall not be.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 13. Taken from Dr. CONANT's Version, which is often rhythmical, although he did not aim at making it such.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 16. The meaning of this verse has been much discussed. The old rendering "I would not live always" seems too sentimental when unqualified. SCHLOTTMANN and others take from it the idea of suicide. I loathe life; I will not live. But this is repulsive. The version given exactly suits the condition of the sufferer.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 19. The rendering usually given is the literal one; and its correctness is put beyond doubt by the Arabic usage (see Hariri, Seauce xv., pp. 164, 167, De Sacy's Ed.) It denotes impatience: Let me have time to swallow. The version here adopted is merely a substitution of another expression giving the same idea. It is one of the very few cases in which the translator has thus attempted to modernize.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 20. Burden unto thee. We follow DELITZSCH here, who adopts the Jewish traditional reading of עֹלִי.

CHAPTER VIII.

- 1 Then answered Bildad the Shuhite and said :
- 2 How long wilt thou speak thus?
And like a mighty wind pour forth thy words?
- 3 The God above—does He in judgment err?
The Almighty One—does He pervert the right?<sup>1</sup>
- 4 If so it be thy sons have sinned,
And He hath given them up to their own wickedness.
- 5 If thou thyself should'st early seek to God,
And to the Almighty make thine earnest<sup>2</sup> prayer—
- 6 If thou thyself wert right and pure,
Then surely would He wake for thee,
And make secure thy home of righteousness.

have been changed, as is usual in the second member of the parallel. The idea most earnestly depreciated is that of Omnipotence perverting justice,—or might making right.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 5. Suppliant prayer. Intensive form הִתְחַנֵּן.

- 7 However small might be thy first estate,
Thy latter end should prosper gloriously.
- 8 Ask now the generation gone before.
Yes, of their fathers set thyself to learn.
- 9 [For we are but of yesterday, and nothing know;
So like a shadow are our days on earth].
- 10 Will they not teach thee, speak to thee,
In parables<sup>3</sup> of deep experience?
- 11 Grows high<sup>4</sup> the reed except in marshy soil?
Or swells the flag, no water near its root?
- 12 In its rank greenness, as it stands, uncut,
It drieth up before all other herbs.
- 13 So are the ways of all who God forget.
So perishes the hope of the impure.
- 14 His confidence reveals its worthlessness;<sup>5</sup>
His trust,—it is a spider's web.
- 15 He leans upon his house, but it abideth not;
He grasps it, but it will not stand.<sup>6</sup>
- 16 Or like the herb so green before the sun,
Whose shoots go forth o'er all its garden bed;
- 17 Hard by the fountain<sup>7</sup> do its roots entwine;
Among its stones it looketh everywhere.
- 18 If one uproot him from his place,
It strait disowns him;<sup>8</sup> thee I've never seen.
- 19 Lo this the joy of his brief way.
('Tis gone), but (like it) from the dust shall others spring.
- 20 Lo, God the upright never casts away;
Nor takes He by the hand the men of evil deeds.
- 21 (Wait then) until He fill thy mouth with joy,
Thy lips with jubilee.
- 22 Thy haters shall be clothed with shame
While tents of evil men are seen no more.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 10. In parables. כָּלִים is more poetical than וְכָרִים, and more sententious: sayings, adages, apologues, parables, (כְּשִׁלִּים) comparisons; suggesting the tropical language of the reed, the flag, and the spider, that immediately follows. כָּלִים, from their heart: denoting here, as is most common in Hebrew, understanding, experience, rather than feeling. The literal rendering would give to the modern reader a false idea. Hence the paraphrase.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 14. The well established sense of קִט is fastidire, to loathe, with כֵּן when taken transitively. Intransitively, to be disgusting, or, when used of a thing, to disgust; Ezek. xvi. 47; Ps. xcvi. 10; Niph. Ezek. xx. 43; xxxvi. 31; Hiph. Ps. cxix. 158; cxxxix. 21; see Gesenius. Thus viewed, it would be literally. his confidence (כִּסְלוֹ) disgusts, like the sense Hieronymus gets, only he renders כִּסְלוֹ vecordia—non-placebit ei vecordia sua. It becomes, or shows itself worthless to him. This is the idea given in the version above. The view which regards it as another form of קָצַץ = קָצַץ (to cut) seems arbitrary. Besides it would produce an incongruity of metaphor. The figure of cutting, if it had not been used just above, would be consistent with תְּקוּהָה, hope; for the primary idea there is extension, drawing out (hope as a line or thread); but כִּסְלוֹ has no such figure. It denotes confidence as derived from the ideas of strength, thickness, resistance, support, and hence it is used for stultitia, folly, brute confidence, stubbornness. What is meant to be said here is, that this confidence fails; it is seen to be vile and worthless. Non placebit, as Hieronymus says. It disgusts instead of strengthening. It cannot be objected that it is applied to the plant, for the person figured is kept in view, and the metaphor is mixed. Such failure of confidence is exactly expressed by the same word (in Niphal) Ezek. xx. 43; xxxvi. 31: "And ye shall become disgusted in your own sight" (בְּכִסְלֵכֶם יִקְוֹט) because of your evil, = יִקְוֹט.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 18. See vil. 10; Ps. ciii. 16. The speaker enters so into his figure that he personifies the plant. Hence the personal him is to be preferred to the impersonal it.

CHAPTER IX.

- 1 Then answered Job and said :
- 2 Most surely do I know that so it is.
For how shall mortal man be just with God ?
- 3 Be it His will to call him to account,—
For one in thousand of his sins no answer can he make.
- 4 Most wise in heart, most strong in might !
Who braves him with impunity ?
- 5 'Tis He that moves<sup>1</sup> the mountains and they know it not ;
Who overturneth them in His fierce wrath ;
- 6 Who makes the earth to tremble from its place,
Its strong foundations rock.
- 7 'Tis He who bids the sun, and it withholds its rays ;
Who sealeth up the stars ;
- 8 Who bent<sup>2</sup> the heavens all alone,
And walks upon the mountain waves ;
- 9 Who made the Bear, Orion, and the Pleiades,—
The hidden<sup>3</sup> constellations of the South ;
- 10 Who doeth mighty works—unsearchable,—
And wonders infinite.
- 11 Lo ! He goes by me, but I see him not ;
Sweeps<sup>4</sup> past, but I perceive him not ;
- 12 See ! He assails ; then who shall turn him back ?
Or who shall say to Him, what doest thou ?
- 13 (Vain check ! ) Eloah turns not back His wrath Until the boldest<sup>5</sup> aids go down beneath His hand.
- 14 How, then, can I reply ?
And choose my words in controversy with him ?
- 15 I could not plead it, even were I just ;
But to my Judge<sup>6</sup> must supplication make.
- 16 If I had called, and He had answered me,
I could not trust that He had heard my voice,

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 5. That moves. A contrast evidently is intended between כַּעֲתִיק and the stronger word הִפֵּךְ. The first is the gentler and more gradual change, imperceptible though powerful (they know it not). See ch. xiv. 18. Hence its other sense of growing old, which it has in Hebrew as well as in Arabic. The other word denotes something sudden and violent.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 8. Who bent. The reference is to the work of creation, though regarded as a work still continuing. It is phenomenal language: the mighty force required to bend that strong arch, and keep it bent. Er neigt den Himmel ganz allein: UMBAUER. In Ps. xviii. 10, the figure is that of bowing, or bending down the heavens to descend.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 9. Hidden constellation. Hebrew, chambers. The reference is to the southern celestial spaces, where there are no conspicuous constellations visible to our hemisphere.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 13. Boldest aids. עֲוֵרֵי רַהַב. Rahab is used here and elsewhere, for any one, or anything, proud or ferocious. See Isa. II. 9; Ps. lxxxvii. 4; lxxxix. 11; Isa. xxx. 7, etc. When used as a personification it is thought to mean Egypt. It may mean here Satan, of whom, as several passages show, aside from the Introduction, Job seems to have had some idea as his great enemy—the Devil and his allies.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 15. My judge. כִּשְׁפֵטִי, an unusual Poel form. So UMBRETT, COVANT, DELITZSCH, et al. Gesenius: Adversary, litigator, Davidson: Assailant.

- 17 He who<sup>7</sup> o'erwhelms me with a whirlwind storm,
And without cause my wounds so multiplies;
18 Who doth not suffer me to catch<sup>8</sup> my breath,
But fills me with exceeding<sup>9</sup> bitterness.
19 Speak I of strength? A strong one!<sup>10</sup> Lo! how strong!
Speak I of right? who sets for me a time?
20 If I claim righteousness, my own words prove me wrong;
Should I say I am pure, He'd show me still perverse.
21 I pure!<sup>11</sup> I would not know myself;
I should reject my life.
22 'Tis all the same, and therefore do I say it;
The pure, the wicked, He consumes alike.
23 Comes there the pestilential scourge that slays so suddenly!
He mocks the trial<sup>12</sup> of the innocent.
24 Earth is abandoned to the wicked's hand;
The faces of its judges doth He veil.<sup>13</sup>
If not, who is it then, (the cause and source of all)?
25 My days are swifter than the post;
They flee apace; they see no good;
26 As sweeps the light papyrus bark,
Or as the eagle dashes on its prey.
27 When I resolve, my mourning I'll forget,— Cast off my look of sorrow, smile<sup>14</sup> again, 28 Then, with a shudder, I recall my woe;
So sure am I Thou wilt not hold me guiltless.
29 Yes, I am wicked; (be it so);
Why labor then in vain?
30 Even should I wash myself in water pure as snow,
And cleanse my hands in lye;
31 Then would'st thou plunge me in the ditch;
So that my very garments should abhor me.
32 For He is not a man like me, that I should answer him.
In judgment, then, together might we come.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 17. He who. אֲשֶׁר here, besides its meaning as a relative, also shows a reason, like the Greek ὅς, and the Latin qui = quia, or quoniam. There may be an anthropopathic reference to the tumult of the storm or whirlwind. Not hear me, since he is the very one who overwhelms, etc.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 19. A strong one! The ascribing the latter part of each of these clauses to God, by way of a supposed sudden answer, as is done by DELITZSCH, DAVIDSON, EWALD, and others, is exceedingly arbitrary. The sense is better satisfied by the simpler construction, though a very passionate and broken one. After the closest study of these abrupt and exclamatory verses (19–22), it is difficult to find anything better than what is substantially given in our English Version, somewhat improved by CONANT. It is a wild, despairing utterance. There are, indeed, inconsistencies in it, but the attempt to remove them only takes away from the pathos, as well as the passionateness of the whole passage. Job has no false humility. He is utterly in the dark, and almost maddened by his sharp sufferings. God seems to him to be dealing very hardly with him: and he must say it though doing his best to preserve reverence.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 21. I pure! טָהוֹר אֲנִי. In the 21st verse, differs neither in force, nor in construction, from the same expression in the 20th; yet a number of commentators, EWALD, SCHLOTSMANN, DAVIDSON, DELITZSCH, et al., make the second a positive, instead of a conditional declaration: "I am innocent," said emphatically: I'll say it though I die for it. This is opposed to the spirit of the whole passage, which, though one of deep complaining, exhibits no defiance.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 27. אֲבִלְיָנָה. A beautiful word. The sudden lighting up of the face.

- 33 But now there is no umpire who can chide,
And lay his tempering hand upon us both.
34 O, would He take His rod away;
So that His terror might not awe my soul;
35 Then fearless would I plead my cause;
For now I'm not<sup>15</sup> myself.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 35. I am not myself. כִּי לֹא אֲנִי עֹמְדִי

A number of the best modern commentators take this as a denial of guilt: "For I am not conscious to myself of wrong;" CONANT, literally, For I am not so in myself. Now, in many languages, some such expression as this is used to denote derangement—being not one's self, or firm (כֵּן) in one's self—the mind wandering; as poor Lear says of himself:

I fear I am not in my perfect mind.

This seems to be ROSENMUELLER's view: haud quidem metum compos. HIERONYMUS: Neque enim possum metuens respondere. See Note on עֹמְדִי רַךְ xxiii. 10.

CHAPTER X.

- 1 I am weary of my life,
Unto my inward plaint I yield myself;
O let me speak—my soul in bitterness.<sup>1</sup>
2 Unto Eloah will I say, condemn me not;
O, let me know why thou dost strive with me?
3 Is it thy pleasure that thou should'st oppress?
That thou should'st cast away thy handy work,
And shine upon the counsel of the wicked?
4 Hast thou the eyes of flesh?
Dost thou behold as mortal man beholdeth?
5 Are thy days such as his,
Or even like the mighty<sup>2</sup> man, thy years?
6 That thou should'st seek for my iniquity,
And hunt up all my sin.
7 'Tis to thy knowledge I appeal; I'm not (this)<sup>3</sup> guilty man
But none can save me from thy power.
8 Still thine own hands have wrought me, fashioned me,
In every part—all round. Dost thou destroy?
9 Remember, now, that thou hast made me as the clay;
And wilt thou turn<sup>4</sup> me back to dust?
10 Hast thou not poured me out as milk?
And curdled me like<sup>5</sup> cheese?

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. My soul in bitterness. כִּי is an adjective (amarus). The phrase כִּי נַפְשִׁי is, strictly, bitter of soul; bitter in my soul. The rendering given, if admissible, suits better the broken and passionate context.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 5. The mighty man: A sub-contrast seems intended between אָנוּשׁ and גִּבּוֹר as in iii. 17. גִּבּוֹר, validus—miles, Jud. v. 30; Jer. xli. 16; Chald. גִּבּוֹר, heros, miles, Ezek. ii. 20. Comp. גִּבּוֹר Isa. ix. , גִּבּוֹרִים Gen. vi.

<sup>4</sup>—giants—μακρόβιοι. The want of the distinction makes the rendering very lame, as in E. V.: "Are thy days as the days of man? Are thy years as man's days?"

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 7. [This] guilty man. There is no claim of perfect innocence, but only that he is not the sinner whom his friends hint, or his own inexplicable circumstances would imply.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 9. Turn me back to dust. The argument here goes beyond the first appearance; for Job certainly knew that he must die, even if he had not heard of the declaration, Gen. iii. 19. It is the remediless remaining in this state that he deprecates, whether or not distinctly conscious of it as a dogma, or an idea. In such an abandonment there seems something inconsistent with God's care for men, and the pains he had taken in their construction, whether we call it creation or evolution.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 10. Like cheese. The use of this kind of language in the Koran (see Surat xxii. 5; xcvi. 2, and other places) points back to ancient Arabian conceptions and modes of speech. See also the same process more fully described in the Arabic of the old book of Apologues, entitled Calila Wa Dimna, p. 71, De Sacy Ed.

- 11 With skin and flesh, hast thou not clothed me round ?
With bones and sinews<sup>6</sup> woven firm my frame ?
- 12 With life and goodness hast thou favored me,
Whilst o'er my breath thy providence hath watched.
- 13 But these things wast thou hiding in thy heart.
All this, I know, was fixed in thy<sup>7</sup> decree.
- 14 When e'er I sin, thine eye is noting it ;
And thou wilt not absolve me from my guilt.
- 15 Yes, woe to me if I act wickedly ;
If righteous, still may I not lift my head ;
So full of shame am I ; but see<sup>8</sup> my misery ;
- 16 For it swells<sup>9</sup> high ; so like a lion dost thou still pursue,
And still repeat thy wondrous dealing with me.
- 17 Against me dost thou bring new witnesses.
Thine anger with me dost thou still increase,
As ever changing hosts against me come.
- 18 Why didst thou bring me from the womb ?
I should have died with no eye seeing me ;
- 19 I should have been as though I'd never been,
From womb to grave translated speedily.
- 20 How few my days ! O let Him then forbear
And turn from me, that for a moment I may smile,
- 21 Before I go whence I shall not return,
To the land of darkness, and the shades of death ;
- 22 A land of gloom tenebrous,<sup>10</sup> dense as night,
Land of the death shade, where no order reigns,
Where day is but a darkness visible.<sup>11</sup>

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 15. But see רָא. is imperative. To the objection that in so taking it the construction is broken up, the answer is, that it is all the more expressive. It was meant to be broken. The language is passionate, ejaculatory.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 16. וְנִשְׁבָּח. EWALD, DILLMANN, UMBREIT, DAVIDSON, all refer this to שָׂרָא, the head, in the preceding verse. MERX says, characteristically, that it is sinnlos, has no meaning, and proceeds to change the text. שָׂרָא seems too far off, for a subject, and there is nothing conditional in the language: Should it lift, or if it lift up itself, then, etc.; DAVIDSON. CONANT also adopts this rendering. The B. V. refers it to "עֲנִי" my affliction just mentioned: it increaseth. So Rosenmüller, as also the Jewish Commentators, RASHI and ABEN EZRA. To the objection that וְנִשְׁבָּח is not congruous to "עֲנִי" affliction, the latter answers well that it is personified as elate and swelling in its triumph over the sufferer. Hence the rendering above.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 22. Gloom tenebrous. The true impression of this remarkable language (vers. 21 and 22) can only be obtained by a close study of the words עֲפֹכֶת and הַפֶּעַם. They are of a class which, in distinction from חֹשֶׁךְ, or mere privative darkness, represent its positive idea, whether real or imaginary, as having something of form, and thus a kind of visibility,—a dark, shadowy, waving, flying, floating thing,—a faintly glimmering, gleaming, gloaming, wavy motion, shading off from light (gleam, glimmer) into gloom, or darkness visible. A vibratory, pulsatory, flying, fluttering, or undulation of some kind, is the radical image in this whole family of words (עֵינִי, עֵפֶךְ, עֵפֶיךָ, by metathesis עֵפֶיךָ), and hence, along with flying, the apparently contradictory images of light and darkness. See LANGE Gen. Am. Ed., p. 179, Note. So in the Greek imagery, darkness has wings. Night is called (ARISTOPH. AVES. 699) μελανόπτερος, black winged. (Compare VIRG. Æo. II. 360, VI. 856). There is the same radical image in the expression עֲפֹכֶי שָׁחַר III. 9, XLII. 10. palpebræ auroræ, eyelids of the dawn,—the morning twilight, ἀμέγας βλέφαρον SOPH. Antig. 104. Compare the words כְּעֹנֵן and כְּעֹנֵן, Isa. viii. 22, 23.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 22. Darkness visible. Some commentators take this in a sort of conditional way: Its very light (if it had any) shines as darkness, or its day (daytime) is as midnight darkness—"the blackness of darkness." So we have given it, though the verb הִפֵּעַ seems to have something more positive than this,—it shines as darkness. We cannot help thinking that Job had something of the Miltonic conception. HIERONYMUS, Sempiternus horror inhabitant.

CHAPTER XI.

- 1 Then answered Zophar the Naamathite and said,
- 2 A flood of words; demands it no reply?
A man all lips! shall he be justified?
- 3 Thy clamors, shall they silence men?
That thou may'st thus rave on without rebuke;
- 4 And say, my doctrine, it is pure,
I'm guiltless in Thy sight.
- 5 O were it so that God would really<sup>1</sup> speak;
And for thy silencing<sup>2</sup> His lips uncloze;
- 6 And show thee wisdom's hidden depths,—
Truth's twofold<sup>3</sup> form.
For know it well; less than thy debt doth God exact<sup>4</sup> of thee.
- 7 Eloah's secret,<sup>5</sup> canst thou find it out?
Or Shaddai's<sup>6</sup> perfect way canst thou explore?
- 8 Higher than Heaven's height, what canst thou do?
Deeper than Sheol's depths, what canst thou know?
- 9 Its measurement is longer than the earth,
And broader than the sea.
- 10 When He is passing by, and makes arrest,
And calls to judgment, who can answer him?
- 11 For well He knows the men of vanity;
Their evil sees, though seeming not to heed.<sup>7</sup>
- 12 Since man, vain man, has madness in his heart;<sup>8</sup>
A foal of the wild ass, so is he born.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 5. Or, were it really so: The force of אֱלֹהִים: Would God take Job at his word and appear in very truth?

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 5. עָפַץ, in controversy with thee, as elsewhere used. For thy confounding; to stop thy mouth.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 6. DELITZSCH, literally, "that she (wisdom) is twofold"—overlooking הוֹשִׁיעַ. DAVIDSON paraphrases: Double, he says, is equivalent to manifest, and הוֹשִׁיעַ he renders insight, as EWALD does. Most commentators give the literal sense, double. Do we not get a good explanation of this from ch. xxviii., where two forms of wisdom are set forth, namely, the Divine wisdom, or the mystery of God's providence, and the wisdom mentioned at the end of that chapter, the wisdom which is for man, "the fear of the Lord," submission, and "departure from evil." הוֹשִׁיעַ is substance, reality, truth—things as they are, שֶׁ. אִשָּׁא; but it is to be contemplated under two aspects, as pertaining to God, and as pertaining to man. See SIRACH xxxiii. 15: xlii. 24: πάντα διόσα, ἐν καρτίῳ ἐνός, κ. τ. λ.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 6. EWALD renders: "Overlooks much of thy guilt," which is not far from E. V. UMERIT, DELITZSCH, DILLMANN, DAVIDSON, with the Targum, give it the sense of נָשָׂה (Hiph. הִשָּׂה), to forget, or cause to forget, giving in כִּי מִעוֹנָךְ the force of a partitive: from or of—a portion of thy sin. "God remembers not all thy sin." The Syriac renders it, forgiveth. Vulgate has the other sense of נָשָׂה, that of exacting like a creditor. And this is the rendering of E. V., which, after all, seems the best, and most in harmony with the context. It is grammatical, too, since כִּי מִעוֹנָךְ may denote the comparison of less, as well as that of more, to be determined by the context. The partitive rendering: "a portion of thy sin," seems tame. The rendering above given preserves well the association of ideas. This is one of those secrets of God's wisdom,—the upper wisdom, or the side of the duplicate seen by Him. For God only knows what human sin deserves, and every chastisement, short of the great retribution, has mercy mingled with it. And then this admirably leads to the train of thought that follows in the exclamations below, ver. 7. עוֹן is rendered debt to preserve the figure, which is sanctioned in the New Testament: "Forgive us our debts; our sins."

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 11. וְלֹא יִתְבּוֹן. The meaning is that it does not require from him a special act of study or attention, as it does from men. He never loses sight of it. He sees it though he does not seem to be looking at it. The conjugation Hith. has this sense of making to be, or assuming to be what the verb signifies,—to make one's-self observant. RASCHI explains it well of God's "keeping still, and long-suffering, as though he did not take note of it"—כִּמוֹ שֶׁלֹּא יִתְבּוֹן.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 12. יִלְכֵּךְ. The word does not denote wisdom, as many commentators take it, or the want of wisdom, directly, or in the sense of stupidity, as GESENIUS interprets it, but to be full of heart, in the sense of courage (cor, Latin cordatus sometimes), spirit, eagerness, mettle, fierceness, etc. In Cant.

iv. 9 the piel, לִבְכֹּתִי (of which this may be regarded as the passive), means, thou hast excited, roused, warmed my heart. There can be but little doubt as to the meaning, since the second clause gives a figurative explanation of it. It suggests Ecclesiastes ix. 3, הוֹלִלּוּת בִּלְבָבָם, "madness in their hearts"—whence the above translation. Some accommodation to it in English might be found in the words heady,

- 13 (But as for thee), If thou prepare thy heart,
And spread thy hands (in humble prayer) before him,—
- 14 Putting<sup>9</sup> it far away, if sin be in thy hand, Nor letting wrong abide within thy tents,—
- 15 Then shalt thou lift thy face without a stain;
Then shalt thou stand secure,<sup>10</sup> with nought to dread.
- 16 For thy sharp pain shalt thou forget,
And like the passing waters, think of it no more.
- 17 Brighter than noon shall life<sup>11</sup> again arise;
And what is darkness<sup>12</sup> now shall be like morn.
- 18 Then shalt thou be assured that there is hope;
Though now ashamed,<sup>13</sup> in peace shalt thou lie down,
- 19 And take thy rest with none to make afraid;
Whilst many [who have scorned] shall seek thy face.
- 20 But as for wicked men, their eyes shall fail;
Their refuge perishes;
Their hope—'tis like the parting breath.

headstrong; לִבִּי, heart, in Hebrew, being used for feeling or passion, as well as for intellect. UMBREIT, EWALD and DELITZSCH take it as a proverb, and give it the forced rendering (in the words of the latter)

Before an empty head gaineth understanding,
An ass's foal would be born a man.

This is not only frigid, in itself, and forced, and at war with the gravity of the original, but cannot be brought grammatically out of the words. Man, vain man. The repetition is to give emphasis to that expressive word בְּבִיחָא.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 14. This verse evidently comes in parenthetically, and therefore the participial form gives the best mode of rendering.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 15. בְּבִיחָא. Primary sense fusion, thence molten, thence the idea of a metallic column figurative of firmness and solidity. It may be that the meaning here is derived from the cognate בְּבִיחָא (בְּבִיחָא) stabilire.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 17. חַיִּי. Atw—time-passing—a very pathetic word. Comp. Ps. xxxix. 6; xvii. 14; lxxxix. 48.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 17. חֹשֶׁךְ. Darkness. חֹשֶׁךְ—a word of the same class with those mentioned in note on x. 22.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 18. אֲשָׁמוּ. This is the rendering of Gesenius, giving to אֲשָׁמוּ the same sense it has in vi. 20. The other sense of the verb, to dig, and that derived from it, search, are very forced here. See E. V., DAVIDSON, DELITZSCH, and others. UMBREIT gets from SCHULTENS, and the Arabic, the sense of protecting, which better suits the context, but is philologically without weight. The Vulgate gives the sense of digging. The LXX, as is most commonly the case in Job, is worthless. Merx renders very beautifully, though freely—

Und, ob beschämt zuvor, noch sicher ruh.

CHAPTER XII.

- 1 Then answered Job and said:
- 2 Ye are the people, there's no doubt;
And wisdom dies with you.
- 3 But I have understanding like yourselves;
In nothing do I fall below your mark.
Who knoweth not such things as these?
- 4 Sport to his friend! yes, such am I become,
Though one who calls on<sup>1</sup> God, and whom he hears;
A sport, (your) sport! A man upright and true!

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 4. Who calls on God. I who call on God. Job means himself here, not only as a man of prayer, קָרָא לַאלוֹהִים, but as one known among men for the public or official performance of religious worship. So CAREL intimates, referring to Ps. xcix. 6, "Moses and Aaron among his priests, Samuel among those who call upon his name,"

בְּקָרְבָּאֵי שְׁכֵנִי. His offering sacrifice, i. 5, shows something of the priestly character. The verse is a vehement torrent of righteous indignation, and the best translation is that which keeps nearest to the Hebrew with all its abruptness. It was probably called out by Zophar's comparing him to "the wild ass," xl. 12.

- 5 As wasted lamp<sup>2</sup> to splendors of the proud,
So is the man who stands on tottering feet ;
- 6 Whilst quiet are the spoilers' tents,—
All confident<sup>3</sup> the men who anger God,
Into whose hands<sup>4</sup> Eloah sends (his bounty).
- 7 But surely ask the beasts and they will teach ;
The birds of heaven will make it known to thee ;
- 8 Or converse<sup>5</sup> hold with earth, and it will speak ;
The fishes of the sea will tell it thee :
- 9 Who knoweth not, by every one of these,
Jehovah's hand it is that doeth this ?
- 10 In whose hand lieth every breathing life ;
The spirit of all flesh—of every man.
- 11 Doth not the ear try words,
As tastes the palate food ?
- 12 So with the old is sage experience ;<sup>6</sup>
With length of days doth understanding dwell.
- 13 With God, too, there is wisdom, strength is His,
Counsel to plan and never-erring<sup>7</sup> skill.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 5. A wasted lamp: לִפְדִּי בֶּן. Literally a lamp of contempt, but the figure demands the idea of that for which it is despised—worn out, exhausted, either in its structure or its oil, and, therefore, thrown away as useless. The passage has been regarded as very difficult. Obscuritatem summan kufus versus omnes interpretes agnoscunt, says Schultens. "The words of this text are dark," says the learned Puritan CARYL in his quaint style, "and there are not a few who make the lamp the darkest word in it." And then he goes on to note the other rendering given by Aben Ezra, and which has since been adopted by the principal modern interpreters, except UMBREIT. It divides the word לִפְדִּי into the noun פִּיד destruction, calamity or misfortune generally, and the servile ל, the preposition, with the sense of for or in place of: "for misfortune, contempt." The translator was at first inclined to this view. It is, however, full of difficulties, though in some of its aspects seeming quite plausible. The rendering which EWALD, DELITZSCH and others give to the words immediately following seems to suit it, especially as expressed in the concise and happy way of MEAX:

Dem Unglück Hohn, so wännen Sichere:—
For suffering scorn ; so fancy the secure ;
Scorn ever ready for the tottering man.

So the translator first rendered it, relying for the sense of נָכוֹן on Ps. xxxviii. 18, אֲנִי לְצִלָּע נָכוֹן, ready to fall.

A more thorough study, however, produced the conviction that the older rendering of the Vulgate, the Syriac, the Targum, the Jewish commentators KIMCHI, RASCHI, BEN GERSON and others, JUNIUS and TREMBLIER, LUTHER, E. V., MERCELAUS, VATABLUS, COCCIEUS, and of the best of the authorities cited in POOLE'S Synopsis, is the correct one. ZIEGLER says: "The sense of lamp makes an incongruous image in the picture." That depends, however, on what the picture is supposed to be. "A consumed or expiring lamp," says CONAN, "would be pertinent; but a torch despised is like anything else that is despised, and the epithet requires some ground for the application." All this question of metaphorical congruity, however, depends upon another, namely, whether the right rendering is given to עֲשֵׂתוֹת. The primary sense of the verb עָשָׂה is certainly to shine. See Jerem. v. 28. Hence the noun, if rendered thoughts, must be regarded as figuratively denoting splendid, brilliant thoughts, imaginings, vain imaginings,—not simply coagitations. So עֲשֵׂתוֹתָי, Ps. cxlvi. 4: In that day his proud imaginings (his splendid hopes) all perish. This is quite different from his thoughts, his thinking, as the annihilationist perverts that text. In Jonah i. 6 the Hitpahel may very pertinently be rendered shine upon, instead of,

"think upon." It thus makes a very appropriate prayer for men in such a dark tempest: that the sky would clear up, or that God would shine upon them through it. So in Cant. v. 24, עֲשֵׂתוֹת means something shining, polished. So COCCIEUS and some of the older commentators, Christian and Jewish. If we give to עֲשֵׂתוֹת here this primary sense of shining, splendor (whether of the thoughts or of the outward state), then the antithesis it presents to לִפְדִּי, the cast off, used up torch, is no longer "incongruous," but very happy: the poor wasted thing, which Job so much resembled, as contrasted with the splendors of wealth, or the high imaginings of a soul at ease. It is the very image used Isai. xlii. 3, the sputtering wick or lamp, פֶּתֶחַ כֶּהוֹ, (the "smoking flax"), and cited by our Saviour, Matt. xii. 20.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 6. Into whose hands, etc. This is rendered by some: "who take God in their hand;" regarding ל as repeated here from the line above. So DAVIDSON and DELITZSCH. The sense they get is, that wicked men make their hand (their own power) their God. For this there is cited Habak. i. 11, and VIRG. Aen. x. 774: 27. Dextra mihi Deus. DELITZSCH renders it very strangely: "who take Eloah in their hand." The use of Eloah, however, seems strongly against this. The ellipsis in the other rendering is quite facile.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 8. Delitzsch excellently renders עֵשׂוֹ "look thoughtfully to the ground." The reference in this whole appeal (vers. 7 and 8) is not, as Ewald thinks, to the destined purpose or divine reason in suffering and in pain. That belongs to the wisdom which "the eagle's eye hath not seen, and which is hid from all the fowls of the air;" xxviii. 7, 21,—the deep wisdom of God. The allusion is rather to Zophar's expression of the fact, so pretentiously set forth, as it seemed to Job, when all nature, animate and inanimate, proclaims the existence of inexplicable mystery in the divine dealings. It is not the reason that we get from nature, but the fact, whether we understand it or not, that the hand of the Lord doeth all.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 13. חֲכָמָה here is discernment or wisdom in adapting means to ends. The epithet is necessary because there is an evident intention to set in contrast the divine discernment, or perfect foresight, and the best human experience, as mentioned above ver. 12. DELITZSCH defines חֲכָמָה as "that which can penetrate to the bottom of what is true or false." There is here again a duality in wisdom as in xi. 6

- 14 Lo! He casts down; it never shall be built;
He shutteth up; there is no opening.
- 15 The waters He withholds; the streams are dry;
He sends them forth, and they lay waste the earth.
- 16 With Him is power, eternal truth<sup>8</sup> is His;
To Him alike are known deceiver and deceived.
- 17 'Tis He that leadeth counsellors despoiled,<sup>9</sup>
And makes the judges fools.
- 18 'Tis He who breaks the bonds of kings,
And binds their loins with cords.
- 19 Priests too He leadeth, stripped<sup>10</sup> (of sacred robes).
The long established<sup>11</sup> (thrones) He overthrows.
- 20 The trusted He deprives of speech,
And takes away the judgment of the old.
- 21 On nobles doth He pour contempt,
And renders weak the girdle of the strong.
- 22 Deep things from darkness He reveals;
Tzalmaveth<sup>12</sup>, world of shadows, brings He forth to light.
- 23 He makes the nations grow, and then destroys;
Extends their bounds, then lets them pass away.
- 24 Chiefs of the earth, of reason he deprives,
And makes them wander in a pathless waste.
- 25 They grope in darkness, where no light appears;
He makes them stagger like a drunken man.

(כַּפְרִים), though not exactly the same with that referred to by the would-be philosopher Zophar above, or by Job himself, xxviii. 23-25. It is two-fold: the wisdom of God in the processes of designing or adapting (תְּבוּנָה), skill, discernment), and the higher wisdom (חִכְמָה as עֵצָה), which is in the design of the designs.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 16. Power—eternal truth. There is no desire to find too scientific or too philosophical a meaning in Job; but these are the best renderings we can give to those contrasted words עֵץ and תְּבוּנָה. The latter is the reality of things, that which makes them to be what they are, their ideas, laws or principles as distinguished here from power or force, to use the word now such a great one in science—or dynamical energy. See Daniel xi. 38, מְעֵזִים אֱלֹהִים, the god of forces. DELITZSCH renders תְּבוּנָה existence, and defines it as the real in contrast with what appears. Better to have rendered it being—that which truly is—all that is, as God's truth. See Note to xxvi. 3.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 17. שְׁוֹלָל, used collectively. Either literal, or as the phrase is used in Latin, captos mente, despoiled of reason. See Ps. lxxvi.: אֲשֶׁתוֹלְלוּ אֲבִירֵי לֵב.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 22. This word Tzalmaveth, together with Sheol and Hades, should have been naturalized in our English version.

CHAPTER XIII.

- 1 Behold all this mine eye hath seen;
Mine ear hath heard and understood it well.
- 2 What ye know I do also know;
In nothing do I fall below you.
- 3 For truly 'tis to Shaddai I would speak.
With God to plead—this is my strong desire.
- 4 But ye indeed!<sup>1</sup> forgers of lies are ye;
Physicians of no value are ye all.
- 5 O that you would be altogether still.
For that would surely be your wisest way.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 4. But ye indeed. Force of אֱלֹהִים.

- 6 But hear my pleading now ;
O listen to the strivings of my lips.
- 7 For God,<sup>2</sup> will ye speak what is wrong?
And utter specious things<sup>3</sup> in His behalf?
- 8 Dare ye His person to accept<sup>4</sup>?
Is it for God,<sup>5</sup> indeed, that ye contend?
- 9 Say, is it well, that He should search you out?
Or as man mocketh man, so mock ye Him?
- 10 Sure, He will make your condemnation clear;<sup>6</sup>
If thus, in secret, partially ye deal.
- 11 Shall not His glory fill you with alarm?
His dread<sup>7</sup> upon you fall?
- 12 Pictures<sup>8</sup> in ashes drawn, your maxims grave;
Your strong defences are but mounds of clay.
- 13 Be still; let me alone;<sup>9</sup> that I may speak,— Whatever may befall.<sup>10</sup>
- 14 My flesh,<sup>11</sup> why should I bear it in my teeth?
My very life, why take it in my hand.
- 15 Lo! Let Him slay me; still for Him I'll wait;<sup>12</sup>
And still defend my ways before His face.
- 16 Yes, my salvation shall He be;
For in His presence the impure shall never come.
- 17 Hear now, O hear my word;
My declaration, hold it in your ears.
- 18 Behold me now; I have prepared my cause;
I'm sure I can maintain my right.
- 19 Who then is HE,<sup>13</sup> that shall against me plead?
For now if I keep silence I must die.
- 20 Only two things do not thou unto me;
And then from thine appearing I'll not hide.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 7. For God. The Hebrew order is carefully observed since the surprise is that such a thing should be done for God.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 8. The English phrase, though now becoming obsolete, is still understood from its Bible use, and is very expressive.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 10. The intensive double form, הוֹכִיחַ יוֹכִיחַ, denotes strong and open conviction. Thus it furnishes the antithesis to סֵתֶר (in secret) in the second clause. Something of the kind seems intended. It suggests, too, the idea of something almost prophetic of the conviction of Job's friends, and their open condemnation, xlii. 7.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 12. מַשְׁלֵי אֶפֶר. The rendering pictures here, may be an accommodation, but it is in harmony with the etymological and general meaning of the root. SCHLOTTMANN: Eure Denksprüche sind Aschensprüche.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 13. Our E. V. is very happy here. Be still from me, which is the literal rendering, is opposed to our idiom.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 14. A climax: flesh and life. The literal rendering of the verse is clear. For the different views of its application see DELITZSCH.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 15. I'll wait. In regard to this disputed verse, everything depends on the reading, whether אֵל, or לֵא, as it is in the Keri. The Masoretic authority is in favor of the latter. So are the ancient Versions, Syriac and Vulgate. See the evidence most fully and fairly summed up by DELITZSCH, who adopts the rendering that has prevailed in the Church. In regard to the internal evidence, as he well says, nothing could be more Job-like. See xiv. 14, 15; xix. 25. Job's lowest despondency is generally the season when his strangely supported spirit mounts up to the strongest expression of his never to be extinguished hope.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 19. Who then is HE? The one challenged here would seem to be God, although commentators generally do not thus regard it. If so, מִי would properly be exclamatory, rather than interrogatory: What kind of a one? The view has some confirmation in what follows, (ver. 20), unless we suppose an abrupt change of person, a thing which indeed often occurs in Hebrew, but would not be necessary here. It explains, too, the language of the second clause. Some render this, "then shall I be silent and expire." But such a construction as אֶחָדִישׁ אֶחָדִישׁ suggests something conditional, as it is well rendered in E. V.: "If I hold my peace, I shall give up the ghost." It looks as though Job shrunk from the challenge, but felt that he must utter it or die. The VULG. seems to have had this view in its interpolation, veniat! Let him come—let him appear: Veniat; quare lacens consumor! If the view be correct, then, there would be an emphasis on אֶחָדִישׁ, expressed, it may be, in the tone, or δεικτικῶς, as the critics say, and which is here attempted to be represented by capitals.

- 21 Far off withdraw thy hand from me,
Nor let thy terror fill me with alarm.
- 22 Then call thou ; I will make response ;
Or I will speak, and do thou answer me.
- 23 How many are my sins—my trespasses—
My errors—my transgressions? Let me know.
- 24 Why hidest thou thy face from me?<sup>14</sup>
Why hold me for thy foe?
- 25 A driven leaf would'st thou affright ?
The withered chaff pursue ?
- 26 For bitter things against me thou dost write ;<sup>15</sup>
And to my youthful sins, thou makest me the<sup>16</sup> heir.
- 27 My feet thou puttest in the stocks,
And guardest all my ways,
Making thy mark<sup>17</sup> upon my very soles ;
- 28 Whilst he<sup>18</sup> (thus watched) in rottenness consumes ;
Or like a garment which the moth devours.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 24. DELITZSCH well says: "The bold confidence expressed in the question and challenge of ver. 23 (and he might have said of ver. 19) is here changed to a sort of mournful abasement at God's not appearing, and his seeming to hold him as an enemy without an investigation of his case."

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 26. Literally, make me inherit. Others render it, possess; but that loses the most impressive figure: the old man heir to the young man's follies.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 27. Making thy mark. Here, as elsewhere sometimes, the most literal rendering gives the best clue to the meaning. The translator must express his surprise at the way in which commentators have gone round and round the idea without exactly hitting it. Most of them take it as meaning "to set a bound about the feet," to prevent his going beyond it. So HEILIGSTEEDT, HIRZEL, DILLMANN, SCHLOTTMANN, CONANT, who cites them, and others. GESSENIUS: circa radices pedum meorum effodisti fossam, "dug a trench around them." EWALD, citing Aben Ezra, held this view at first, but afterward changed it for another. He renders תחקה dich versicherst, makest thyself sure of, which is true as an inferential conclusion, but can, in no way, be taken as a sense of תחקה. To get it, he goes a great way, and most unnecessarily, to the Arabic chakka, v. conjugation, tachakkaka ala, certus factus—a secondary Arabic sense, derived from an older secondary Hebrew sense of the Poel, decrevit, legisla vit; and then he compares it with tachakkama ala. Besides, tachakkaka is not followed by ala, but by min. Everything in the context goes to show that חקה here, — חקק, has its primary sense of marking. Tremellius renders it quite literally: super radices pedum meorum imprimeris, and is followed by our English Version: "thou sellest a print upon the heels of my feet." This gives the exact idea, except in its failure to represent the reflex, or Hithpael, sense of תחקה, which DELITZSCH finds a difficulty, although he renders it, like so many others, "thou makest for thyself a circle around the soles of my feet." It is not easy to see how he and others get from the words the sense surrounding, or to set round. The Hithpael, like the Greek Middle, may be often rendered by the addition of the personal possessive pronoun. Thus, Kal, Thou markest; Hithpael, thou makest thy mark—thy mark for thyself. This at once suggests the idea which our E. V. and Tremellius come very near expressing. It is, in general, the owner putting his mark somewhere upon his beast, that he may know it, and, in this case, more especially, putting a mark upon the foot—as on the camel's hoof, for example, that he may track it when wandering in the desert. The Vulgate: vestigia pedum meorum considerasti, seems suggested by this, and may itself have suggested Ewald's interpretation. The grievance Job complains of, in this case, would be like putting such a mark upon an old worn-out camel, which, instead of straying, was unable to stand up. Thus Job represents the dealing with himself, so watched, so marked, and yet so helpless. It is in perfect harmony with the complaint above, "Thou guardest all my ways," and with what is said about "the driven leaf," and "chasing the withered" chaff: it is all so useless, and therefore cruel. In this interpretation, there may, perhaps, be found a clue to the sudden change of person in the next verse.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 28. Whilst he. Job still has in mind the animal to whom his figure refers, but, at the same time, intending himself, as one thus watched, and having a mark put upon his feet to track him if he strays, although he is a poor emaciated creature, without strength to move or stand. To a Hebrew reader accustomed to it, this change (though the transition from the 1st person to the 3d is rare) would be felt as very touching. We can only supply it by an ellipsis as the translator has endeavored to do.

CHAPTER XIV.

- 1 ———<sup>1</sup> Man of woman born ;
Few are his days, and full of restlessness.
- 2 He comes forth like a flow'r, and is mown down ;
Flees<sup>2</sup> like a passing shadow—makes no stay.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 2. Flees. Heb. and flees. The frequent Hebrew conjunction י is often a mere breathing, a transition particle, merely indicating a going on of the thought. In such cases, we come nearer to the spirit of the original by leaving the passage unbound (devoicé), than by clogging it with our heavy connective and. See the rendering of xlii. 23 as compared with the original.

- 3 On such a being,<sup>3</sup> openest thou thine eye,
To bring me into judgment with thyself?
- 4 O could<sup>4</sup> there come one pure from the impure!
But there is no such one.
- 5 If now his days are all decreed,
And fixed the number of his months by thee;
If thou hast set a bound he cannot pass;
- 6 Then turn away from him and let him rest,
Till like a hireling he enjoy his day.
- 7 For a tree there still is hope.
Cut down, it springs again;
Nor do its suckers fail.
- 8 Though in the earth its root be old,
Its stump all dead and <sup>5</sup>(buried) in the dust;
- 9 From waters inhalation will it bud,
And send forth shoots like a new planted stem.
- 10 But man—he dies and fallen<sup>6</sup> wastes away;
Man draws his parting breath, and where is he?
- 11 As fail the waters from the sea;<sup>7</sup>
As wastes the flood and drieth up,—
- 12 So man lies down to rise no more;
Until the Heavens be gone, they ne'er awake,
Nor start them from their sleep.
- [A BRIEF PAUSE.]
- 13 O that in Sheol thou would'st lay me up;
That thou would'st hide me till thy wrath shall turn,<sup>8</sup>—
Set me a time, and then remember me.
- [A MUSING SILENCE.]
- 14 Ah, is it so?<sup>9</sup> When man dies, does he live again!

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 3. עַל כֵּן: on this; δεικτικῶς; either by tone or gesture indicating that he means himself; as is shown by the sudden change of person. MEER wholly destroys the pathos of this by arbitrarily changing אֵלָּא into אֵלָּא.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 4. O could. The optative rendering here is not only according to the usual use of אִם, but gives more distinctly the idea of inherited human depravity, and consequent disease, which here forces itself upon the mind of Job. On this account, it may be thought singular that it should be generally adopted by the more rationalizing commentators. There is here, says UMBRETT, the Oriental (!) idea of the Erbsünde; but then he immediately qualifies it as usual by saying: "Not, however, in the sense of the subtle dogmatic definitions."

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 10. נָפַל unites both these senses: fallen—wastes. It puts him in contrast with the fallen tree.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 14. "Ah, shall he live?" הֲיִחְיֶה. This language is neither that of denial, nor of dogmatic affirmation. Between these lie two states of soul: one of sinking doubt, the other of rising hope. It depends upon the tone and manner of utterance, whilst these, again, can only be recalled to us by something in the structure of the sentence, or by the context. The particle הֵן is the hinge on which the sentence opens. It may be taken two ways. Its force may be regarded as confined to its own clause locally, or, with more reason, may it be supposed to rule the whole sentence; since אִם is merely transitive, and here implies no doubt. It is exclamatory, as well as interrogative. If a man die, or when a man dies, ah, shall he live again! That, in English, might possibly be the language of doubt, though much would depend upon contextual considerations. Or, take the other style of utterance (in English, we mean): Ah, is it so, when man dies, does he live again? This would correspond to the idea of the interrogative הֵן influencing the whole verse; אִם being entirely subordinate. It is not despairing, nor even desponding, but an expression of wonder, rather, at the greatness of an idea striking the mind in some fresh and startling aspect. It is surprise, rather than doubt, or the state of soul which Homer so naturally, as well as vividly, represents, Iliad xxiii. 103. Achilles, like all the other Greeks, believed in the reality of a spirit world, as distinctly held in his day; yet when the dream, or the appearance of Patroclus, startles him with an unusually near and vivid thought of it, he cries out:

*Ο πόποι ἦ ῥά τίς ἐστι καὶ εἰν Αἴδαο δόμοισιν
Ψυχὴ καὶ εἰδωλον;

O wonder! Is there truly in that unseen world
Both soul and form?

And so even the Christian believer might speak when the momentous thought comes suddenly before him with some

- Then all the days appointed me I'll wait, Till my reviving<sup>10</sup> come.
- 15 Then thou wilt call, and I will answer thee;
For thou wilt yearn<sup>11</sup> towards thy handy work.
- 16 But now thou numberest my steps;
Thou wilt not set a guard<sup>12</sup> upon my sin;
- 17 (For) sealed, as in a bag, is my transgression bound,
And mine iniquity thou sewest<sup>13</sup> up.

[A LONGER INTERVAL OF SILENCE.]

- 18 Yes<sup>14</sup>—even the mountain falling wastes away;
The rock slow changes from its ancient<sup>15</sup> place;
- 19 The water wears the<sup>16</sup> stones;
Its overflowings sweep away the soil;
So makest thou to perish human hope.

new impressiveness. There is still another shade of the idea, near akin to this feeling of wonder: When a man dies, does he live? That is: Is death really the way to life? Do we live by dying? See the quotation from Euripides, and the remarks in the INTRODUCTION ON THE THEISM, page 8. In regard to the force of the context, there can be but little doubt. There is certainly a rising of hope which has somehow come in after the mournful language of ver. 12. This prompts the prayer preceding, in ver. 13; then there is the exclamation; and then, as though from some inspiration it had given him, the strong declaration that he would wait for this change, as involving something most desirable, though wholly unknown. Immediately follow words that seem to rise to full assurance (ver. 15): "Thou wilt call, and I will answer thee; thou will have regard to the work of thy hands." This force of the context is very clearly presented by DELITZSCH. The mode of expression implies something of a traditional knowledge, to say the least: Ah, is it so, as we have heard, ὅδ' ἀνυμνέμενον—that saying rumored everywhere? For surely Job must have heard it, or heard of it. The Egyptians had it; see DIOP. SIC. I. 61. According to the Rationalists themselves, the Persians and other trans-Euphratean nations must have had it long before the time they ascribe to the book of Job. If the Vedas which MERX quotes (see INT. THEISM, page 16) are as old as pretended, some rumor of this idea must have crossed the Indus, and reached the land of Uz. The Greeks, we know, had it in the ante-Homeric times. There is good evidence, too, of its having been entertained by the early Arabian tribes; as is shown by passages in the Koran where the Infidels reply to Mohammed, saying: "When we are dead and have become dust and dry bones, how can we be revived? Why, this is just what we were threatened with, we and our fathers of old; away with it; surely this is nothing more than fables of the ancient men." See KORAN Surat. xxiii. 84, 85; xxvii. 69, 70, and other places.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 14. Reviving. חֲלִיפָה: General sense change, vicissitude, from that mysterious root חָלַף. It is used in connection with צָבָא, warfare, time of military or other service, x. 17. Here the change, naturally suggested by the context, is release from Sheol, as from a warfare, when that set time comes. There can hardly be a doubt, however, that the use of the word here is suggested to Job by the verb חָלַף, which he had taken, ver. 7, to denote the regermination of the tree. This, of itself, would seem to settle it that the change in view is one of reviviscence, and the idea derives still farther aid from the use of the word. Ps. xc. 5, where the Kal is applied to the flower growing up in the morning, and Ps. cii. 27, where the Hiphil denotes the reviviscence of nature in the new Heavens and the new Earth. As change, it is never change from life to death; and if that were the meaning intended here, a more unfit word could not be found.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 15. Wilt yearn. תַּכְסֵּךְ: a word of great strength and pathos, well rendered yearn by CONANT. In Ps. lxxiv. 3, the Niphal is used to express the longing of the soul for God and the services of his house. There it is joined with כָּלָה: "pines, yea faints my soul for the courts of the Lord." In Gen. xxxi. 30, it is used to describe Jacob's intense longing for home. And this is the word which, by a blessed anthropopathism, is used here to express God's longing for the handy work which he had once so curiously and marvelously made.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 16. עֵל gives תַּשְׁמֹר here an intensive sense. The connection only occurs elsewhere in Prov. v. 22, where it is taken in bonam partem. In both cases, it has the sense of guarding for the sake of preserving. The idea is that there is no need any more of guarding or watching over Job's sin, lest it should be lost, for it is sealed up—tied fast in God's fasciculus, or bundle (compare the same word, צִוּר, ver. 17, as used I Sam. xxv. 29, for the "bundle of life"). Such seems to be the train of thought, and it makes clear a passage which has been supposed to present no little difficulty in consequence of an apparent disagreement between its two clauses. The interrogatory rendering, as given in E. V., and elsewhere, is a forced help. The Vulgate regards תַּשְׁמֹר לֹא as a prayer: Do not watch over my sins—parce peccatis meis; but that makes an unnecessary variance of construction between the two clauses and the two verbs תַּשְׁמֹר and תַּכְסֵּךְ. The word חָתָם following gives a clue to the explanation.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 17. Sewest up. Gesenius gives טָפַל a secondary sense suggested by the Greek phrase δόλον πάττειν—"to sew falsehood against my iniquity." This suits Ps. cxix. 69; but there it is עָלַי, against me, against the person, not against the sin, which would be an absurdity. It would be here, moreover, an unnecessary departure from the other figures.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 18. Yes, even the mountain. The expressive particle, אֵלֶּם, as it occurs in Job, often denotes a kind of soliloquizing pause. It makes an emotional rather than a logical transition, suggestive rather than adversative. It may be supposed to refer to something thought, rather than expressed. What is the point of the comparisons that here start up in the mind of the musing, partly controverting, partly soliloquizing Job? It is a question which commentators have had difficulty in answering. The connective link would seem to be something suggested by the thought of deliverance from Sheol, ver. 15. But "how long!" O Lord, how long!" as the Psalmist so expressively says. The mind of Job, beginning to fall back into its dependency, is led to a mental consideration of the slow changes of nature, and his breaking out with אֵלֶּם is a sort of answer to the thought that had silently intervened: Ah, yes; God's times are long; the earth, too, and the heavens (see vers. 11 and 12) are passing away. "Yes, even the mountain falling crumbles to decay." The effect of this is to throw a shade over his hope, until at the end of the chapter he seems to have got almost wholly to his old despairing state.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 18. In the version given there is an attempt to combine the two senses of עָתָה, so closely suggestive of each other, namely age and removal. See Note ix 5.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 19. Wears the stones: the pebbles on the beach made round and smooth by the ablation of the waters. It is a phenomenon suggestive, even to the most common mind, of long duration. One might almost fancy it a description of geological changes.

- 20 Thou overpower'st<sup>17</sup> man, and he departs ;
 Changing his face, thou sendest him away.
 21 His sons are honored, but he knows it not.
 They come to poverty—he heeds it not.
 22 By himself alone, his flesh endureth pain ;
 By himself<sup>18</sup> alone, his soul within him<sup>19</sup> mourns.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 20. Thou overpowerest. DELITZSCH: "Thou seizest him," from an Arabic usage. The other rendering, though the verb occurs but in two other places, xv. 24 and Ecclesiastes iv. 12, gives a clear sense, and is to be preferred for its harmony with the figures of the context.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 22. It reminds us of the wailing ghost in Homer. Job could hardly have believed it as a fact, and yet he seems here to have indulged the imagination of the body retaining feeling in the grave, and the soul, or life, in some way, sympathizing with it. It may be regarded, too, as an intensive expression of the dead man's indifference (see Ecclesiastes ix. 5, 6) to all things in the world above. There may, perhaps, be meant the supposed state in Sheol, according to the dark view taken x. 22, as though Job had fallen back to that gloomy conception, unrelieved by the hope that gleams out in some of the verses above.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 22. Within him. Literally, by him, upon him, very near to him. The second עִלָּיו, though a repetition of the one above, may be regarded as including both ideas. It is that thought of continued being referred to, INT. THEISM, pa. 3.

CHAPTER XV.

- 1 Then answered Eliphaz the Temanite and said,
 2 A wise man, shall he utter windy lore ?
 And with a rushing tempest<sup>1</sup> fill his soul<sup>2</sup>,— 3 Contending still with speech of no avail—
 With words that do no good ?
 4 Nay more, thou makest void the fear of God,
 Confession to Him ever holding back.
 5 For 'tis thy sin that rules<sup>3</sup> thy mouth,
 And thou thyself dost choose the crafty tongue.
 6 I judge thee not ; 'tis thine own mouth condemns ;
 Against thee thine own lips do testify.
 7 Art thou the man who first was born ?
 Before the hills wast thou brought forth ?
 8 Eloah's secret counsel hast thou heard ?
 And kept (its) wisdom<sup>4</sup> to thyself alone ?
 9 Tell us—What dost thou know that we know not ?
 What insight hast thou, we have not the same ?
 10 The grey haired<sup>5</sup>—yea, the very old are ours—
 One full of days, beyond thy father's years.
 11 God's comfortings—are they too small for thee ?
 And speech that flows so gently<sup>6</sup> (to thine ear) ?

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 2. Tempest. קָרִים. Literally the East wind (Eurus), but used for any violent blast (Hos. xii. 2 ; Isaiah xxvii. 8, קָרִים, בָּיִם "in the day of the East wind"). In the first clause, as HILGESTEDT says, there is the idea of inanity; in the second, of vehemence.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 2. His soul. בֶּטֶן. EWALD takes this literally, the belly, or stomach, as opposed to the heart. The Hebrew, however, as well as the Arabic word, is figurative of the most interior department of the soul; as in the phrase חֲדָרֵי בֶטֶן Prov. xviii. and xxvi. 22. Same phrase Prov. xx. 27. Comp. Heb. iv. 12.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 5. Rules, or guards thy mouth. So RASCHI, followed by SCHLOTTMANN and DILLMANN. The subject being general, the gender makes no difference.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 5. (Its) wisdom: The deep wisdom of God, as spoken of xxviii. 23–27, which man cannot find.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 10. שֵׁבֶל means the hoary; יָשֵׁן, one still older, and כְּבִיר יָמִים (like the Arabic), one still older—as old as Job's father would have been.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 11. So gently. עָנָה. The older versions and commentators made this a root, and gave it generally a bad sense, supposed to come from the idea of involving, covering—like the Syriac. Hence our E. V. renders it a secret thing

- 12 Why does thy heart<sup>7</sup> so carry thee away?
What means this quivering<sup>8</sup> of thine eyes?
- 13 That thou should'st turn again thy rage<sup>9</sup> on God, Whilst pouring from thy mouth such words<sup>10</sup> as these?
- 14 Say, what is mortal man that he be pure!
Or one of woman born<sup>11</sup> that he be righteous?
- 15 For lo, His Holy Ones He trusteth not;
The very Heavens lack pureness in His sight,
- 16 How much more man, the abhorred,<sup>12</sup> the all defiled!
Yes, man who drinketh in, like water, his iniquity.
- 17 I'll show thee now the truth; give heed to me;
And that which I have seen will I report;—
- 18 What sages clearly have made known to us,
And kept not back—truths from their fathers learned;
- 19 The men to whom alone the land was given;
With whom had never mingled alien<sup>13</sup> blood.

[AND THUS THEY SAY.]

- 20 "The bad man sorely travails<sup>14</sup> all his days,—
The numbered<sup>15</sup> years that for the bandit wait.<sup>16</sup>
- 21 A sound of terrors ever fills his ears;
And then, when most secure, the invader<sup>17</sup> comes.
- 22 He has no hope from darkness to return,
And for the sword, he watches<sup>18</sup> evermore.
- 23 For bread he wanders, saying still—O, where!
A day of darkness, well he knows, is ready to his hand.

(some horror, or mystery). VULGATE: verba prava. Modern commentators, more correctly, make it from שׁוֹן, or שׁוֹנֵן, denoting something gentle, whether of sound or motion,—onomatopoeic, at, at, light moving. The preposition ל added makes it an adverbial phrase. See Isaiah viii. 6, "the waters of Shiloah," הַחַלְלִים לָאֵשׁ, that flow so gently. In this second clause Eliphaz may have meant thus to characterize his own speech, referring probably to the opening words iv. 2, 3, 4. It is certainly not descriptive of the style they soon adopted.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 12. Thy heart. The feeling it must mean here, though לֵב more usually denotes mind.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 12. Quivering. The word רָדָד, or, as in Arabic and Syriac רִדֵּד, is generally rendered to wink; but here seems to denote that rapid, nervous, moving of the eye which is the sign of irrepressible agitation. The rendering, rolling the eye, as of anger or defiance, seems too harsh.

4: xxx. 28; Zech. vi. 8; Prov. xvi. 32; xxix. 11. EWALD, Wuth.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 14. Of woman born. Eliphaz here, as Job xiv. 1 and 4, seems to connect the being born of woman with the generic impurity—the erstwhile, or hereditary depravity.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 16. The abhorred. Exasperated by Job's refusal to make the demanded confession, Eliphaz goes much beyond the corresponding language used by him, iv. 19. There is a mingling of commiseration in that passage. Here it is the blackest painting lacking the tenderness of Paul.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 20. Numbered years. In such a connection כִּסְפָּר denotes fewness, Numb. ix. 10; Deut. xxiii. 6.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 20. Wait; וַצִּפֵּן, are hidden, laid up (see xiv. 13), reserved. So EWALD, whom the translator has followed in sense. There is, however, another rendering which has some claim, and which makes it an independent clause: the fewness of his years are hidden—unknown to the bandit. In the other מִכְסָּפָר is the time how long.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 21. Invader. שׂוֹרֵד, literally waster or destroyer, but most commonly used of an invading host.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 22. Watches. It is in form strictly the passive participle צָפָה for צָפִי, but it makes an intensive expression in whatever way we take it. "Watched for the sword"—preserved for it, aufbewahrt, EWALD. DELITZSCH and ZÖCKLER, "selected," ausersehen E. V., "waited for of the sword," CONANT, "destined." The idea among them all is that he is to die by the sword—kept for that death and no other. In this rendering the preposition אֵלַי makes a difficulty, unless it be meant that the sword is watching for him, looking towards him. The same idea, however, may be obtained, and even more vividly, by taking another view of the word. The Vulgate renders it circumspectans undique gladium, as though they had read the active participle צָפֶה.

It may, however, be defended, without any textual change, by regarding צָפִי here as we take צָפִי, Isaiah liii. 3, in the phrase יָדַע חָלִי, literally, known of pain; rendered, acquainted with grief, knowing pain—pain knowing him. The construction is not exactly the same, but so near that one passage strongly suggests the other. UMBRETT gives it this active rendering: und ängstlich schaut er nach dem Schwerte, and compares it with Cant. iii. 8, כָּלֵם אֶחָוִי חֶרֶב, literally, all held of the sword,—that is, all holding the sword. Such a construction of a passive verb or participle with an object, direct or indirect, is common in Greek.

- 24 Anguish and trouble fill him with alarm ;
They overpow'r him like a chieftain<sup>19</sup> armed."
- 25 For that against the Strong,<sup>20</sup> his hand he stretched,
And proudly the Omnipotent defied —
- 26 Running upon him with the stiffened neck,
And with the thick embossments of his shield,—
- 27 For that his face he clothed in his own fat,
And built the muscle<sup>21</sup> thick upon his loin,—
- 28 So dwells<sup>22</sup> he in the ruined holds,
In houses uninhabited,
Fast hastening<sup>23</sup> to become mere rubbish<sup>24</sup> heaps.
- 29 Nor wealth he gets, nor do his means endure ;
Nor shall his substance in the land extend.
- 30 From darkness nevermore shall he escape ;
The scorching<sup>25</sup> flame shall wither up his shoots ;
In God's hot anger doth he pass away.
- 31 Let him not trust in evil ; he's deceived ;
For evil still shall be his recompense ;
- 32 Before his<sup>26</sup> time is it fulfilled,
His palm no longer green ;
- 33 As shaketh off the vine its unripe grapes,
Or as the olive casts away its flower.
- 34 For desolate the gathering of the vile,
And fire devours the tents of bribery ;
- 35 Where misery is conceived,<sup>27</sup> and mischief born ;
And where the inmost thought deception<sup>28</sup> frames.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 25. The strong. There is not only an emphasis, but a climax in the divine names, אֵל and שָׁרִי, as used here. The translator has attempted to preserve this in the etymological significance of אֵל. Defied: יתנבֹר superbivir, contumax est. Ver. 26, with stiffened neck. Compare Psalm lxxv. 6.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 27. Muscle thick upon his loin. The word muscle as here used, is an accommodation to the sense. Suet or tallow would have been nearer to the Hebrew פִּיכָה, but they would have been unpoetical to an English ear, besides making something like a tautology. פִּיכָה (pima), is the Greek πυμλή, the covering or enveloping folds of fat generally, στέαρ (חֶלֶב), though sometimes the meanings seem reversed. The Greek πυμλή evidently means the enveloping fat, Soph. Antig. 1011. See President Woolsey's clear note upon the passage. Both figures here represent a man prospering, proud, and wanton—growing fat and lusty.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 28. So dwells he. The translator has given וְיִשְׁכֹּן here a consequential sense, though in opposition to DELITZSCH, DILLMANN, UMBREIT, ZÖCKLER, and others. DE WETTE agrees with it in substance, in his rendering darum bewohnt. It is consistent, too, with EWALD's rendering of יָרַח, ver. 27, as making a protasis (Though he has covered, or if he has covered (Hab er sein Gesicht mit Fett bedeckt). ROSENTHAL, too, makes this inhabiting desolate cities a punishment, and, therefore, a consequence. The great difficulty in the other view is the making this dwelling in ruined cities, fast going to decay, one of the bad man's sins, all the more out of congruity, too, by coming so directly after that other sin of so different a character, represented in language figurative of pride, and insolent outward prosperity. DELITZSCH and others make all of vers. 25, 26, 27, 28, the protasis, and commence the apodosis, or consequence, with לֹא עָשִׂיר, he shall not be rich, in the 29th: "Because he stretched, etc.,—and ran—and covered—and abode in desolate cities—therefore, he shall not be rich." The latter part, at least, seems very unconsequential. The objection to the other view is answered by the fact that the conjunction ו may be truly conversive, and yet retain the consequential sense which it so frequently has,—connecting, indeed, but as a logical, instead of a mere eventual following. Whether this is so, in any case, is to be determined by the context, which here certainly seems greatly to favor it. As conversive, it simply makes the tense following take the form of the preceding, and such is the nature of conditional clauses in all languages that the question of absolute times becomes a matter of indifference as compared with the fact of the consequential relation. They may be in the past, or in the present, or in the aorist: He made, etc.—therefore he dwelt: Or, he covers, and therefore dwells. The English may be brought very near this Hebrew idiom by using a lighter transition particle than therefore: He stretches out—he covers—so dwells he, etc.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 28. Fast hastening. The word יתעוֹרֵר has given commentators unnecessary trouble. DELITZSCH renders it appointed, CONANT, destined, which is better. The primary idea of the word is near futurity, something impending—promptly, paratus (עָתִיד). The Hithpael is not passive, but reflex and intransitive.

26: גְּזֵיִם נָצִים, grass-grown heaps.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 30. Scorching flame. שְׁלֹהֶבֶת, an intensive word; see Cant. viii. 6; Ezek. xxi. 3.

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 35: Is conceived. The verbs are in the infinitive active, to conceive, etc., but they are best rendered passively. Literally, at the conceiving, etc. Comp. Ps. vii. 15.

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 35. Deception; כִּרְמָה; not self-deceit, as DELITZSCH and ZÖCKLER take it. That is too artificial.

CHAPTER XVI.

- 1 Then answered Job and said:
- 2 Of things like these, abundance have I heard.
Wretched consolers, surely, are ye all.
- 3 Is there an end at last of windy words?
Or what emboldens<sup>1</sup> thee to answer still?
- 4 Thus could I, also, speak as well as you;
If only your soul were in my soul's stead,
I too against you could array<sup>2</sup> my words,
Against you shake my head in scorn.
- 5 Thus with my mouth,<sup>3</sup> I too could strengthen you, Whilst my lip solace held you (from despair)
- 6 Though I should speak, my grief is not assuaged;
If I forbear, what (pain)<sup>4</sup> from me departs?
- 7 Ah surely<sup>5</sup> now He hath exhausted<sup>6</sup> me.
Yes, thou hast made my household<sup>7</sup> desolate,
- 8 And shriveled<sup>8</sup> up my skin—a sight<sup>9</sup> to see.
My leanness (as a witness) rises up,
And answers to my face.

[A PAUSE.]

- 9 His anger rends,<sup>10</sup> so fiercely it pursues.
He gnashes at me with his teeth.
It is my enemy;—on me he whets his eye.
- 10 (See how) they gape upon me with their mouths.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 3. Emboldens. This sense of יְבוֹרֵץ is determined by vi. 25, 1 Kings ii. 8 (Niph.), and Mic. ii. 10, without going to the Arabic.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 4. Array. אֶחָרֵץ. The word on Hiphil means more than simply joining. It denotes association in bands (fœdus junxit), or a concert of speech and action between his assailants.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 5. Thus with my mouth. E. V. inserts the adversative word but, giving a different turn to the sense; as though he had said: O, no; instead of, that I would have strengthened you. There is, however, nothing that warrants it. The style is direct, seemingly ironical, but full of pathetic reproach. The emphasis of the first clause is on mouth: with my mouth merely, and not from the heart. The same idea in the second clause in נִיר שִׁפְתֵי. The words in brackets, or something like them, are but the complement of the idea. Three passages, Prov. xxiv. 11; Ps. lxxviii. 50; Job xxxiii. 18, to cite no others, place the meaning of יוֹשֵׁן here beyond doubt. In the first it is a holding back from slaughter (rescuing); in the second, from death; and in the third, from corruption. The word thus gets, even when standing alone, the general sense of delivering or saving. CONANT comes nearest to this by rendering uphold. DELITZSCH, to soothe (lindern), is without authority.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 7. Household. So CONANT and DELITZSCH. It may be my clan or tribe, but here it is used of his household, because of its numbers: my domestic congregation. The sudden change of person increases the pathos.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 8. And shriveled up my skin. E. V. gives the same idea: "hath filled me with wrinkles." This rendering of קָשָׁה agrees with the VULGATE, and DELITZSCH returns to it after it had been generally abandoned by the commentators. The word is common in the Syriac, where this sense of wrinkling is constant. See how it is invariably used in the Peschito Version of the Old Testament—Deut. xxxiv. 7 (Moses' face was not wrinkled), Ezek. vi. 9; xx. 53.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 8. A sight to see. Literally it is for a witness or a sign—ecce signum. The accompanying action would probably be Job's showing them his emaciated countenance.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 9. His anger rends. By most commentators the language here and in some of the verses below is used in reference to God. It is, however, not easy to believe that this is wholly so. Raschi says, without any seeming doubt on the matter, הַשָּׂטָן הוּא הָעֵר, "The enemy here is Satan."

Mine enemy sharpens his eye at me. Job must have had some idea of a great persecutor who was not God, and who is spoken of in the Prologue. Or the two ideas may perhaps be mingled. Beginning to complain of God, as usual, the mind turns to this other adversary. Or it may be supposed that the imagination, in his half-maddened state (see Remarks on ix. 35), brings up before him the appearance of a furious mocking fiend, and then the picture takes the plural form. It is a company of fiends: They gape upon me with their mouths; and that brings out the language of ver. 11: God hath delivered me unto the evil one; he hath cast me off into the hands of the wicked, or the malignant; the word עוֹלֵי being used very much as the New Testament uses ὑποκριταί. Some of this language may have reference to his human accusers, such as the second and third clauses of ver. 10; but the other view is more in accordance with his frenzied state, or all these thoughts may be regarded as mingled together.

- With scorn they smite me on the cheek ;
 As one, against me do they fill<sup>11</sup> their ranks.
 11 Unto the evil one hath God delivered me ;
 Into the hands of the malignant<sup>12</sup> hath he cast<sup>13</sup> me forth.
 12 I was at ease, and he hath shattered me ;
 Seized by the neck, and dashed<sup>14</sup> me to the ground ;
 Then raised me up, and set me for his mark.
 13 His archers compass me about ;
 He cleaves my reins—he spareth not ;
 He pours my gall upon the earth.
 14 He breaketh me with breach on breach ;<sup>15</sup>
 He runs upon me like a man of war.
 15 I have sewed sackcloth on my skin ;
 My horn have I defiled with dust ;
 16 My face with weeping is inflamed ;
 And on my eyelids rests the shade of death.
 17 For no wrong<sup>16</sup> I had done ;
 My prayer, too,—it is pure.
 18 Earth cover<sup>17</sup> not my blood ;
 Nor let my cry find place (where it may rest).

[A PAUSE.]

- 19 Even now, behold ! My witness<sup>18</sup> in the Heavens,— Yea, my Attestor in the heights above !
 20 My friends—'tis they who scorn ;
 Whilst unto God mine eye is dropping (tears),
 21 That He<sup>19</sup> himself would plead for man with God, <sup>11</sup> Ver. 10. Fill their ranks. By this rendering the nearly related Hebrew and Arabic senses of כָּלָא are combined.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 11. Malignant. So רָשָׁעִים may be rendered, whatever application is given to it.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 11. Cast me forth ; יָרַם, once occurring, but having clearly the sense of the Arabic رَمَى, precipitem dedii. LXX ἀπέψα.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 12. Dashed. פָּצַץ, dashed in pieces—a very strong word. The context shows the action intended. The view we may have of this awful language, as spoken of God or Satan, does not affect the correctness of the translation.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 14. Breach on breach. It can hardly be doubted that the reference here is to the calamity after calamity that Satan brought upon Job as told in the Prologue. It is certainly uncritical to suppose that Job's great enemy is wholly lost sight of in the subsequent chapters. Nothing, too, could be more undramatic.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 17. For no wrong I had done. Compare the precisely similar construction Isai. liii. 9, לֹא חָטָא, עָלַי, badly rendered : "because he had done no wrong"—rather : for no wrong he had done.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 18. Cover not my blood. There seems certainly here the idea of the murderer and the pursuing avenger of blood. Can Job mean to speak of God in this way? or does he not rather intend the Evil One, by whose idea he seems haunted, whatever might have been the measure of his knowledge of such a being. In the Prologue, Satan appears as his murderer—the same who is called ἀνθρωποκτόνος, John viii. 44—a homicide, from the beginning—the old murderer who slew the human race. There seems to be something of the same cry against him, xix. 25. It is implied in the words : I know that my Goel (my avenger), my Redeemer lieth—my nearest of kin. The language immediately suggests the cry of Abel's blood.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 19. My witness. This pathetic and solemn appeal to the Witness in the Heavens furnishes strong evidence that Job could not have had God in view in any of the harsh language which so marks this chapter.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 21. That He himself. There can be no other subject for וְיֵכֹחַ than God, however strange the aspect it seems to give the sentence. Such is the view entertained by the best commentators, though some of them, like DELITZSCH, give the verb the sense of deciding (CONANT: do justice to), instead of the truer sense of arguing, pleading for. The pure, unmodified idea of the Hiphil is that of arguing, reasoning, contending in words; but whether for or against is to be determined by the context and the subject matter. It may mean the arguing of a mediator, an arbiter, or an advocate. The places in Job that are decisive of the meaning here are ix. 33: There is no arbiter between us; xlii. 3: where הוֹכִיחַ is equivalent to "speaking to, or pleading with the Almighty;" xlii. 15: "I will defend my ways (plead my cause) before Him." Again, the preposition עָלַי in this place modifies it to the same sense as in chap. xxlii. 7. It is true that there the form is Niphal נִכְחַת עָלַי, but that only gives it a middle or deponent bearing, without affecting the general idea. It denotes, in the Niphal, mutual pleading, reasoning together as in Isaiah i. 18. The present passage, and Job xxlii. 7, are the only ones where we find the verb connected with עָלַי, which seems consistent only with the sense of arguing or pleading for. The idea of arguing against would here be certainly much out of place. "Deciding for" (DELITZSCH), or "doing justice to" (CONANT), do not differ much from the idea of arguing for, but they unnecessarily mar the pathos of the passage, whilst DELITZSCH's rendering, "against God," instead of with God (עָלַי), seems entirely unwarranted. It may present a difficulty to the Rationalist, this "pleading of God

- As<sup>20</sup> one of Adam's sons doth for his brother plead.
 22 For a few years will come and go;<sup>21</sup>
 And I shall go whence I shall not return.

with God;" but the mystery, the strange idea, contained in the fearful prayer which his extreme and helpless misery forces from the soul of Job is cleared up in the New Testament. UMBREIT also gives this translation, making God the subject of וַיִּבְרַח, but the view he presents of it is certainly characteristic: "Job, in a melancholy, but ingenious way, says to God, that he must stand by him against God (Gott muss mir beistehen gegen Gott), for it is He who lets him suffer, and He is the only one who knows how innocent he is." Melancholy, indeed, it is to think how blind the otherwise acute eye of the Rationalist to the deep spirituality of a thought so tender, and at the same time so sublime!

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 21. As one. In וְכִי the ו is comparative, as is often the case.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 22. Come and go. The Hebrew אָתָּה includes both directions, like the Greek ἐρχομαι. It demands here its full meaning.

CHAPTER XVII.

- 1 My breath is short;<sup>1</sup>
My days are quenched;<sup>2</sup>
The graves are waiting for me.
- 2 Were it not<sup>3</sup> that mockeries beset me round,
On their sharp taunts mine eye would calmly<sup>4</sup> rest.
- 3 Lay down<sup>5</sup> now; be my surety<sup>6</sup> with thyself.
Ah! who<sup>7</sup> is He that gives His hand for mine!
- 4 (Not they). Their heart from<sup>8</sup> insight Thou hast closed;
Therefore Thou wilt not raise them (over me).
- 5 "When one for booty<sup>9</sup> friends betrays,
His children's eyes shall fail."
- 6 So, as a byword hath He set me forth,
Till I become the vilest<sup>10</sup> of the vile.

[A PAUSE OF SILENCE.]

- 7 Mine eye is dim from grief;
My moulded<sup>11</sup> limbs are like a shadow, all.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. My breath is short. It seems best here to follow the primary sense of חָבַל to bind tight—funem adstringit, contorsit. It is stricture and shortness in the breathing.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 2. Were it not. לֹא אִם makes a strong affirming when there is supposed to be a silent apodosis. It is a kind of imprecation, as though one should say coarsely, or strongly, "I'll be cursed, if it is not so, or so." In this way it comes in Hebrew, and is very frequent in Arabic. There are two reasons against it here, though adopted by so many commentators: 1st, There is nothing in the context that demands anything so strong; 2d, the idea of a silent apodosis is not to be resorted to where there is an open one so clearly expressed. The conjecture may be hazarded that by mockeries, here, הַתְּלִים (illusiones) Job had in view the mocking fiends, whom his imagination, or something more real, perhaps, had brought out, as in xvi. 9, 10—the "gaping mouths," the "gnashing teeth," the "glaring eye." They may be supposed to come from the same cause, whether it be his bodily or mental state, that produced the "scaring visions," vii. 14. It was these mocking illusions that drove him to frenzy. Were it not for these, he could more calmly bear the taunts of his friends, one of which may have been, perhaps, the very language which Job repeats from them, ver. 5.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 3. Lay down now. שָׁכַבָה: lay down the pledge.

in Hezekiah's supplication, Isaiah xxxviii. 14. Addressed to God. The same wondrous thought we have xvi. 21.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 3. Ah who. The interrogative כִּי, here, does not so much express doubt as wonder at the thought of Him, the marvellous Surety.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 4. From insight, that is, from seeing this mystery of God pleading with God for man, and becoming surety with himself.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 5. For booty, לְחָלֶק, for a division of the spoil.

This verse looks like a proverbial saying which Job quotes against their faithlessness. In the direct order, as he gives it, it would be rendered thus:

For booty he betrays his friends;
His children's eyes shall fail;—

the second clause being consequential; as proverbs of this kind sometimes stand in Solomon's collection. We are compelled to supply a relative, or a particle. Or it may be that he is repeating, as before said, one of their own taunts or bywords; and thus suggesting the language of the next verse.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 6. Vilest of the vile. הַפֶּת is literally a spitting, or something to be spit upon; one on whose face any one may spit; (onomatopoeic like Greek πρω). In such a case as this, translating literally is translating falsely, if it gives the modern reader the idea that the e is meant the very action lexically expressed. It is not easy to believe that Job's face was actually spit upon; and therefore it is best to render the phrase by what it represents, and of which the action itself, as pictured, may be called the language.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 7. My moulded limbs, וְיִצְרִי—from צָר to form, fashion. The contrast between his limbs in their original form and proportion, and their shrunken state.

- 8 The upright, sure, will be amazed at this,—
The innocent be roused against the vile ;
9 But still the righteous man holds on his way ;
The clean of hand still goes from strength to strength.
10 But come now, all of you ; come on I pray ;—
Among you all no wise man can I find.

[PAUSE].

- 11 My days are past,
My plans asunder<sup>12</sup> rent,
My soul's most cherished thoughts.
12 For day, they give<sup>13</sup> me night,
To the face of darkness light is drawing<sup>13</sup> near.
13 If I should hope, Lo, Sheol is my home.
Yes, in the darkness have I spread my couch.
14 To corruption have I said—my father thou ;—
My mother and my sister—to the worm.
15 And where, then, is my hope ?
My hope, alas !<sup>14</sup> who seeth it ?
16 To the gates<sup>15</sup> of Sheol it is going down,
When once it finds a resting place in<sup>16</sup> dust.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 12. They give—light is drawing near. ישינו.—They put. But who are they ? See Note Job vii. 3. They may be the invisible enemies whom Job fears to name ; or if he refers to the friends it may be with a like aversion. The first is the more probable. The common grammatical explanation: the active used for the passive, is an evasion. Many commentators almost reverse the sense above given, by supposing Job to have represented the sophistical reasoning of the friends: "They put (as they suppose) day for night" DELITZSCH, "They explain night as day,"—a very forced rendering. UMBREIT: "They would change night into day"—that is, encourage and flatter Job. They had never done this, or, in any way, tried to make things look fair to him ; since the verses, ch. xi. 16-19, are only conditional predictions. There seems, moreover, no good reason why ל in ליום may not have the sense above given to it as most literally translated: for day—instead of day. The second clause, too, has been made more difficult than would seem necessary. It is true that in Hebrew the preposition following קרב is usually ל or אל ; but in such a case as this, there is nothing unnatural in regarding it as denoting a short distance from, so as to make כ the proper preposition—just like the Latin prope abest. The light is near (that is but a short distance from) the face or edge of the darkness (see Job xxvi. 10), like the sun in an eclipse just going into the penumbra, or into the total shadow. And this agrees admirably with the context.

Relationally, ל and כ, though seeming opposites, are so near akin that they are sometimes united to denote both from and to the point which may be regarded as either that of contact, or of separation: As Deut. iv. 32, לכן היום, 2 Sam. vii. 1 ; Haggaïi. ii. 18, and other places, for which see NOLBUS, Concord. Partic., p. 441. The naturalness of this is more easily acknowledged when it is considered that the Arabic verbs of nearness are generally followed by من instead of إلى, and especially is this the case with this very verb קרב, where it has the sense of being near (propinquus *fu*it). Near from, they say, instead of near to. This seems to be SCHLOTTMANN'S rendering, and CONANT'S expressive version is closely allied to it: "light is just before darkness,"—just going out. DILLMANN and others take כ as comparative: näher als das Angesicht der Finsterniss ; but this makes no clear sense.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 15. Alas! The interjection is justified by the pathos of the repetition: My hope ; yes, my hope, alas ; with the emphasis on the pronoun.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 16. Gates: ברי. UMBREIT, ROSENMUELLER, and others, render it solitudines (Oeden), deriving the idea from the supposed primary sense of בר, כדר, לכר, solus. But the better view comes in another way—from the true primary sense of separation. So most distinctly the Arabic بَرَّ.

Hence the sense of vetes, bar, that which separates, so often used in Exodus, etc., in the description of the tabernacle. Hence it may well be rendered gates, as above, giving an idea the same with the שַׁעַר מוֹת gates of death (gates of Sheol) Job xxxviii. 17 ; Ps. cvii. 18. It is the idea of returnlessness—

The undiscovered country, from whose bourn,
No traveller returns.

HOMER uses this same figure of gates or bars. See Iliad xxi. 72, πύλας Αἵδου, the gates of Hades. In the Odyssey. xi. 571, Hades is called εὐρυπύλῃς δῶ, "the house of the wide gates" to indicate the vast population it encloses." There is the same idea of separation in a strange Arabic word Barzakh, meaning the interstice, or separating interval, whether of space or time, between the present and the coming world. Among other places in the Koran, see Surat. xxiii. 102. "Behind them stands the Barzakh, until the day of the Resurrection."

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 16. In dust. על עפר, here, must have the same meaning with לעפר, vii. 22.

CHAPTER XVIII.

- 1 Then answered Bildad the Shuhite and said,
- 2 How long will ye thus make of words a prey?<sup>1</sup>
First clearly understand; then let us speak.
- 3 Why are we counted as the beasts,
And held as worthless in thine eyes?
- 4 See—in his rage, it is himself he rends.
For thee shall earth be desolate?
The rock move from its place?
- 5 Yet true it holds;<sup>2</sup> the sinner's light is quenched;
And from his fire no kindling spark shall shine.
- 6 The sunshine darkens in his tent;
The lamp above him goeth out;
- 7 His steps are straitened,<sup>3</sup> once so firm;
And his own counsel headlong<sup>4</sup> casts him down.
- 8 By his own feet he's driven to the net;
In his own chosen<sup>5</sup> way there lies the snare.
- 9 The gin shall seize him by the heel;
The noose shall hold him fast.
- 10 His cord lies hidden in the earth;
His trap in ambush by the wayside path.
- 11 All round about do terrors frighten him;
[At every step] they start him to his feet.
- 12 His woe<sup>6</sup> is hungering for its prey;
A dire disease stands ready at his side;—
- 13 To eat<sup>7</sup> the very partings of his skin;
Yea, Death's First Born<sup>8</sup> his members shall devour.
- 14 Torn from his tent, his strong security,
Thus to the King of Terrors<sup>9</sup> doth it march him on.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. Of words a prey. קַנְצִי מַלִּים, huntings or catchings of words. For this rendering see the conclusive reasons given by EWALD and DELITZSCH. How long will ye: It is addressed to all. Bildad makes the shortest speeches, and he reproves the other two, as well as Job, for their prolixity.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 5. Yet true it holds. וַיֵּן, yea, verily, so it is. UMBREIT, alldings. It is the view so often presented by him and the others in opposition to an opinion, which they suppose Job to hold, that God favors the wicked. This misunderstanding gives the key to much of their language. See INT. THEISM, p. 33. Bildad means to reaffirm it in spite of all Job may say.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 8. His own chosen way. The Hithpael, תַּהַלֵּךְ, denotes one's way of life whether good or bad.

(Comp. Gen. v. 22; xvii. 1, etc. Ps. xxxix. 7, et al.) There is also in the Hithpael more or less of the reflexive sense—the way of his choice—and that makes a parallelism with the verse above—"by his own feet."

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 12. His woe. The rendering strength here as though it were וֶאֱנִי, vires, instead of the construct of וָאֵנִי, calamity, trouble—makes no satisfactory sense. It is adopted by CONANT from E. V., and maintained by many commentators,

EWALD, DILLMANN, MERK, ROSENMUELLER, et al. HIRZEL and DELITZSCH make it construct of אָנִי, though the rendering of DELITZSCH much obscures the idea. The VULGATE renders it strength: attemetur fame robur ejus. The Syriac (Peschito) the best of the old versions, especially of Job, gives the rendering the translator has adopted, "his sorrow shall be hunger." It hungers after him like a ravenous beast ready to devour." See the figures ver. 13.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 13. To eat. The Fut. form אֵכֵל, in its connection here with the preceding verse, has the force of the infinitive.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 13. Death's first-born. It is an awful personification. Diseases are Death's sons, but the strongest among them, the mighty first-born, is the terrible elephantiasis. If Bildad really meant Job's disease, and Job himself, as the true subject of such a fearful picture as he has drawn, then may he indeed be regarded as coarse and cruel. Raschi has a strange idea here. The בְּרִים, ver. 13, are Job's sons and daughters; מַכְשָׁח, ver. 14, is his wife.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 14. King of Terrors. The awful King; if we may thus render בְּלֹהוֹת, taking it, as most commentators do, for בְּרִלּוֹת. As coming from בָּלָה, it would mean strictly king of wastings, or of emaciations, which would make it in harmony with the idea of Death in the verse above: The Father of Diseases is the בְּלֹהוֹת, or as Homer would style him by a similar figure (see Odys. xi. 491):

- 15 Who dwell within his tent are none of his ;
And o'er his pleasant<sup>10</sup> place is showered<sup>11</sup> the sulphur-rain.
16 Beneath,—his roots dried<sup>12</sup> up—
Above,—his branch cut off.—
17 His memory perished from the land,—
No name now left in all the plain,— 18 From light to darkness do they<sup>13</sup> drive him forth ;
And chase<sup>14</sup> him from the world ;
19 No child, no seed, among his people left—
In all his habitations none escaped ;
20 Men of the West<sup>15</sup> stand wondering at his day ;
Men of the East with shuddering fear are seized.
21 Yes, such the dwellings of unrighteous<sup>16</sup> men ;
And such the place of him who knows not God.

βασιλεὺς νεκρῶσι καταφθιμένοισιν—king of the wasted dead, —the imagery being drawn from the last stages of emaciating disease in this life. It is the idea in the word אֲכָרֶן Job xxvi. 6; xxviii. 22. the Abaddon of Rev. ix. 11, or the one described, Heb. ii. 14, as τὸν τοῦ κράτος ἔχοντα τοῦ θανάτου. If not in sound, yet in idea, would it be a more fearful epithet than the other, as calling up the pallida Mors of the classic poet, and, above all, that most awful image of wasting, emaciating disease, the χλωρὸς ἵππος, the "pale horse" of Rev. vi. 8, with "him who sat thereon, whose name was Death, and Hades following hard after him." The thought of terror merely, falls far below the soul-awing, yet still fascinating, power of such a representation.

Ver. 14. Doth it march him on. DELITZSCH says that "the 'u' here is a secret power, as elsewhere the feminine prefix is used to denote the dark power of natural and supernatural events, though sometimes the masculine is thus employed." This would make it a kind of impersonal fate, or fatality, of which, it is true, there are some traces to be found in the book (see INT. THEISM, p. 28). But there is no need of finding the subject of the verb תַּצְעִידוֹ in such an abstract conception. It may be regarded, in strict grammatical construction, as the hungry woe, or the first-born of Death, although the gender is changed to the feminine to make it more universal—the feminine in Hebrew thus supplying the place of the lacking nenter.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 15. Is showered: יִזְרֶה, lit. is scattered; but here seems to denote a shower like that which fell on Sodom and Gomorrah.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 16. His roots dried up—his branch cut off, etc. It makes it more vivid to render the verbs in this verse and the next, as participles with a nominative independent.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 18. Do they drive. For such use of they, see Note vii. 3. Comp. Ps. xlix. 15, לְשֹׂאֵל שְׂתֵּנִי. They put (or drive) them into Sheol. Comp. also Job xix. 26.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 18. And chase. The idea of Ps. xlix. 15 is also in Prov. xiv. 32, though there it is expressed passively, כִּרְעֵתוֹ יִדְחֶהוּ רָשָׁע, "the wicked man is driven away in his wickedness."

CHAPTER XIX.

- 1 Then Job answered and said
2 How long grieve ye my soul ?
And crush me with your words .
3 Ten times it is that ye have stung me thus ;
Devoid of shame, ye act as strangers<sup>1</sup> to me.
4 Be it so, then, that I have erred ;
My error lodges<sup>2</sup> with myself.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 3. Act as strangers. The translator abides here by E. V. The rendering is obtained by regarding תִּדְרֹכֶנּוּ the Hiphil of the Hebrew root נָכַר (the characteristic ה preserved) with the sense of the piel. SCHULTENS, according to GESSENIUS, thus regards it as for תִּדְרֹכֶנּוּ with which he compares יִדְרֹכֶנּוּ, Jerem. ix. 2. See also יִדְרֹכֶנּוּ, 1 Sam. xiv. 22; xxxi. 2. The later commentators generally get its sense from the Arabic دَرَكَ, and render it stun, or confound. But that is straining the Arabic word, which means simply to affect with admiration, besides leaving wholly unexplained the preposition ל that follows. This is quite natural to the Hebrew verb, and also to the really corresponding Arabic نَكَر, as in the V. Conj. لَ النَّكَرَ, to be estranged, to act like a stranger to any one.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 4. Lodges. תִּלְוִין—pernoctat—tarries all night.

- 5 If still against me ye exalt yourselves,
And plead against me my reproach,—
- 6 Then be assured that God hath cast<sup>3</sup> me down ;
'Tis He that overspreads me with His net.
- 7 Behold I cry of wrong, but am not heard ;
I cry aloud, but there is no redress.
- 8 For He hath fenced my road ; I cannot pass ;
And darkness doth He set o'er all my ways.
- 9 My glory from me hath He stripped,
And from my head the crown removed.
- 10 On all sides doth He crush me ; I am gone ;<sup>4</sup>
And like a tree uproots He all my hope.
- 11 Against me doth He make His anger hot,
And counts me as His foe.
- 12 Together draw His troops ;
At me cast up their way ;
Around my tent they camp.
- 13 My brethren far away has He removed,
And mine acquaintance from me are estranged.
- 14 My kinsmen all have failed,
And my familiar friends forgotten me.
- 15 Domestics,—maidens,—as a stranger hold me now ;
I am become an alien in their eyes.
- 16 Unto my servant do I call—he answers not ;
I have to supplicate him with my mouth.
- 17 My temper<sup>5</sup> to my wife is strange,—
My yearning for the children that she bare.
- 18 Yes—even the very boys despise me now ;

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 6. Cast me down. There is no need of going beyond, here, to get the sense of injustice, as some do. UMBREIT well renders it, nich beugt, bent down, humbled me. ZÖCKLER also gives it clearly by gekrummet, crooked, or curved me. There is indeed complaint in the next verse, but it does not amount to a direct charge of injustice. It may be said, too, that in the language of the 7th verse Job had the friends in view. It was their wrong he cried out against.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 17. My temper—strange. That aversion in some sense is intended here cannot be doubted; but in what way is it signified? The translator had much doubt in respect to רוּחִי, rendered generally breath, but which he has here ventured to translate temper, as the word is used, Prov. xxv. 28, where it is indeed translated spirit, but in the sense of passion, animus agilitus et commotus. This agrees with the immediate context, as well as with what is said of the wife in the Prologue. His spirit was alien to her. She did not understand him, his mind, his feeling, his state of soul. When he said, "the Lord gave, the Lord hath taken, etc.," she regarded it as stoical indifference. She knew nothing of the deep feeling underlying the declaration, his yearning for the lost as measur- ing the depth of his resignation, before insufferable bodily agony drove him to the outcry of chap. lii. (see Int. Thelms, p. 28). She said to him, "Curse God and die." She was not at all the woman to appreciate Job, and under a sense of this he might well say, that she had come to regard him with aversion; and perhaps she had wholly abandoned him. Certainly the absence of all such allusion to incidents mentioned in the prologue would be more strange than their presence. It would furnish an almost unanswerable argument to those who maintained the later authorship of the prose portion. With this rendering would well agree what follows if we keep the common familiar sense of חַנּוּת, whether regarded as an infinitive (like שָׁפוֹת, Ezek. xxxvi.

3) or as a plural feminine noun—my yearning, or yearnings, my tender feelings for the dear ones lost, for my desolate household (see xvi. 7 and note). She repels me from her (he seems to say) even in the manifestation of my deepest grief. The sense of חַנּוּן is very uniform in the Hebrew—tender feeling—gracious feeling—a going out of the soul towards anything. Hence, in Nithpabel, a tender supplication for grace and mercy, coming like the nouns חַנּוּנָה and חַנּוּנִין from the frequent Kal imperative חַנּוּן, have mercy upon me.

Prayer is the saying over of this tender formula. The verb, it is true, has the direct accusative for its object; but in the infinitive it would require the preposition of direction, and none more appropriate than ל or אֵלַי. This is the preposition following it in Arabic; and here it may be remarked that there is hardly another case of two words of the same form, in Hebrew and in Arabic, that so closely agree in all their applications and derivatives. "He was or became affected with a yearning, longing, or desire, or an intense emotion of grief or of joy." Such is the definition that Lane gives from an extended study of the most copious native Arabic Lexicons. This is the very spirit of the Hebrew root. The rendering רוּחִי my breath is not inconsistent with it. The breath may be taken for that which is most familiar in the personality; or if regarded as denoting offensiveness, it may be said to have caused the unfeeling woman to repel everything in him, even his yearning for, or any mention of, his lost children. To get this idea of offensiveness, however, we must give an unusual sense to זָרָה (strange) making it the same

- They flout at me when I attempt<sup>6</sup> to rise.
 19 Men of my counsel<sup>7</sup> from me all recoil;
 And those I loved are turned<sup>8</sup> against the sight;
 20 My bone fast cleaving to my skin and flesh;—
 All shrunk<sup>9</sup> away the covering of my teeth!

with אף fastidium, as used Numb. xi. 20. But they cannot be the same word, as אף there is radical, and the word is evidently allied to the Arabic أف, to repel. There is nothing in the Hebrew אף akin to nausea, and the peculiar offensiveness in Numb. xi. 10, arose from satiety, excessive familiarity, which is an idea the very opposite to that of strangeness. Carrying out the idea which is supposed to be intended in the first clause, many commentators give to אנשי, in the second, a sense derived from another Arabic root channa (instead of hanna) with the sense of fœtor. The arguments against it are, 1, that אנשי, in the usual sense, is a very common Hebrew word. The Hithpahel conjugation is in verse 16, immediately preceding, and the Kal is repeated twice in v. 21, in almost immediate connection: הנני, הנני, pity me, oh pity me, ye my friends. The Arabic channa differs in the diacritical point, but to the reader's eye the word used is the same root in all these places of the same chapter, to say nothing of its very frequent occurrence in all other parts of the Hebrew Scriptures. This certainly makes it seem very improbable that the writer should have gone so far out of his way to get a very foreign and almost opposite meaning in this passage. What makes it stranger still, is that the Hebrew is well supplied with words to express this idea of fœtor. There is the very common באש with its derivatives, besides אנשי, אנשי, which occurs more than twenty times, and another form אנשי, Joel ii. 20. 2. The primary meaning of channa, as given by the Lexicographers, and especially by LANE, the most exact of them all (and who differs from them in his copious citation of illustrating passages) is "the emission of the breath, with a sound, through the nostrils." This shows that it is an onomatopoeic, khanna, a nasal sound, or utterance. If used to denote a disease, it would be something like the catarrh, or a cold in the head. 3. In getting this sense of fœtor, they take the remote Xth conjugation of channa (as given by Gollis and Freytag, with out any references): fœtorem emisit puteus—a sense which LANE relegates to the most unusual ones, and which is most probably dialectical, or coming from some incidental association of sound or otherwise. It is certainly very rare, not to be found in the Ancient Arabic, or in the later classical. It is not in the Koran, or in Hariri, or in Ahmed's Life of Timur, or in the copious Koranic commentary of Alzamakhshari. Besides this, it seems most likely to be derived from anchana, meaning to be warm (especially water). The VIIIth conj. of this root (istachana) would differ only by the doubling of the final consonant from the Xth of the other; and in the Arabic it sometimes happens that the derivative senses thus get mixed together, as istachana and istachana. There is the same argument against bringing it from the Syriac אנשי, anchedus. It is found only in CASTELL without any citations. It may be a late derivative from the Arabic, but more likely a merely accidental accommodation from the old sense of אנשי; hence in Syriac, אנשי, a name for a kind of oil (from the idea of smoothness) afterwards used for rancid oil. Any authority that this might seem to possess is invalidated by the fact that the Peshito Syriac translators would have found this word hanino (bad it been old Syriac) the very one to be used if fœtor were the real meaning intended. Instead of this, they have used the old Hebrew and Syriac אנשי, and given precisely the rendering of our E. V. (אנשי), "I entreated, supplicated for the children of my bowels."

A strong argument against this later rendering of fœtor, offensiveness, is that, in consequence of demanding for ל the sense of to, instead of for, or on account of, it makes it impossible that בני בטן (2d clause) should mean the children of Job, for they were all dead. Attempts have been made to refer it to children of slaves, etc., but this is too far-fetched to deserve notice. UMBRETT and DELITZSCH regard בטן as referring to his mother's womb, called my womb (as in Job. 10 בטן רלתי "doors of my womb"). CONANT states the argument very well and concisely for this; but it does not satisfy. Job is not speaking of himself here; and so the argument from Job. 10, does not apply. In Micah vi. 7, בטן certainly means children, and to get away from it by saying that in that case there is meant the womb of his wife is taking away all definiteness from the phrase, and making it mean anything an exigentia loci might demand. So with the phrase פרי בטן Deut. vii. 13, which DELITZSCH cites בטן means the womb only in a secondary application. Its primary sense is belly, body (Arabic بطن בטן, used in the same way), the interior part; hence used, as in Job xv. 2, 35; Prov. xxii. 18; xviii. 8; xx. 27; xxx. 26; Hab. iii. 16, for the interior spirituality; see Note Job xv. 2. In this primary sense of body it is applicable to the male as well as to the female. And so it is rendered in E. V. children of my body. It is like בני מעי "children of my bowels," בני חלצי "children of my loins." The reference to his children, after the mention of his wife, is most natural; and it should be borne in mind that only four verses above, the brothers of Job, whether uterine, or collateral kinsmen more remote, are mentioned by their own appropriate name (אנשי) as estranged from him, and far removed. They had abandoned him, and could not have been affected by any such offensiveness. The friends alone seem to have remained in close contact with him, and therein, with all their harshness, they were better than his wife and his brethren. Besides, that there should be no mention of children, would, indeed, be very strange. The difficulty clears up when we abide by the old rendering, whilst the mention of his dead children, and his yearning for them, in connection with his wife's aversion, becomes a most touching instead of such an offensive picture, as the other rendering would make it.

4 Ver. 18. When I attempt to rise. אקוּחָהּ: paragogic ה—subjunctive or optative sense—when I would rise, indicating a feeble attempt, as he sits upon the ground, or among the ashes, ii. 8. The boys mock his emaciated form and tottering motions.

7 Ver. 19. Men of my counsel, מתי סודי. See Psalm lv. 15. "With whom I took sweet counsel."

8 Ver. 19. Are turned against the sight. The rendering is not too full for the Heb. הפכו—are turned right round, or right away. It implies a revolting sight, brought out in all its ghastly features in the next verse.

9 Ver. 20. All shrunk away. This verse has given rise to much and varied comment. The things first to be determined are the meaning of the phrase עור שני (skin of my teeth) and the meaning and construction of the verb

אחלטה. The idea of DELITZSCH that the first means the periosteum, a fibrous membrane surrounding the bone, is far-fetched, and could not have been thought of by Job. No meaning can be given to the phrase unless it be the lips or gums surrendering the teeth,—the covering of the teeth. There is no reason he should go beyond the primary sense of the verb

כלט. Both in the Hebrew and in the Arabic, as well as in the cognate فلت it is that of smoothness (levis, glaber, fuit, Ges.) bareness, slipperiness. Hence clapsus est, evasit, he slipped away, he escaped. There is the same primary idea in the English escape. As an escape from danger, however, or difficulty, it is a secondary sense, and found only in the Niphal (the Piel and Hiphil being causative of it). The Hithpahel occurs nowhere else except in this passage, and its reflex form and sense, as will appear, favor the idea above given. The next thing is to examine the Ancient Versions. The Peshito Syriac gives the sense of E. V. The Vulgate, or Hieronymus, renders it derelicta sunt tantummodo labia circa dentes meos, only the lips are left about my teeth—left as something abandoned or deserted. The LXX. δὲν μὲν ἐν δόμοις ἔχεται, which has little or no sense. In the Hexaplar Syriac Version of the LXX. we find in the margin the rendering of the other early Greek versions. AQUILA gives it as in E. V. and the Peshito. SYMMACHUS: "I am hung," or, I adhere to the skin of my teeth. THEODOLOT: I am abandoned of (forsaken by) the skin of my teeth. TREMELIUS has the same rendering as E. V. LUTHER: und kann meine Zähne mit der Haut nicht bedecken. This, with the version of the Vulgate and Theodotion, is the general idea above given, though differently expressed: the teeth exposed and protruded. STICKEL and HARN (as cited and contested by DELITZSCH) arrive at a similar idea, but in a wrong way, by making עור the infinitive of עור with the sense of nakedness. The difficulty appears to be in the first person of the verb. The sense given would seem to demand the third person with וְעַרְוִי for the subject: the skin of my teeth has slipped off—or, slipped off from my teeth. It will be seen, however, that the other is the more touching mode of expressing it, and that this arises from the personal reflex sense of the Hithpael, whilst it also accounts for that form being used. "I am smooth, I am parted, I am bare, denuded, or slipped off, as to (or in) the skin (or covering) of my teeth," seems indeed a very awkward kind of language, and yet it corresponds to the literal English of a very common Greek idiom, found more or less, too, in other languages, and having a natural philosophical as well as philological basis. It is the ascribing to the whole personality a particular act, state, or affection, which affects primarily only a part of the body. The verbs which take such a construction are most commonly middle or reciprocal corresponding to the Hebrew Hithpael, or they are intransitive though active in form. Thus, instead of saying my tooth aches, they would say, I ache as to my tooth, I am shorn, my head, or as to my head—the preposition κατά being generally implied, though sometimes expressed, as κατά is expressed here in בְּעַרְוִי, yet still preserving the same idiom. In regard to verbs denoting pain, it seems more philosophical than our method; since a pain in any part is a pain to the whole. But the Greeks carry it much further, as expressive of states and actions. Thus they would say, without difficulty, ἀπορέμεναι τὴν χεῖρα, or as one says, in the Clouds of Aristophanes 24, ἐξεκόπη τὸν ὀφθαλμὸν. I was knocked out, my eye, or as to my eye, instead of saying my eye was knocked out. See also ARISTOPH. Aves. 334. The preposition in בְּעַרְוִי does not affect the idiom. With or without it, it is equally the case or condition, according to the technical name which the native Arabian Grammarians have invented for one of the aspects of this idiom, which is as frequent in the Arabic as in the Greek.

The other rendering: "I am escaped with the skin of my teeth," seems to have but little meaning, though so strongly defended. From our English it has acquired a sort of proverbial sense—the barest escape from danger; but this is inapplicable to Job. The Arabic formula so commonly cited in its defense: "he escaped with his head," differs in the most important item. Head is, in many languages, used for life; and thus it becomes an expression of exultation, or at least of self-congratulation. But this would be most inconsistent in the case of Job. He does not speak like one who has escaped (got through his trouble), even with difficulty. And then that piteous cry which immediately follows: hau'mi, hau'mi, oh my friends, for it is Eloah's hand that toucheth me, could only have come from a sense of his forlorn, hopeless condition—his projecting bones, his shrunken skin, his protruding teeth, denuded of their once comely covering—all presenting a woful spectacle of misery and wild despair.

There is another view cited by UMBREIT from Michaelis' Suppl., p. 1512, in which a meaning for the Hebrew verb is sought from a secondary sense of the Arabic coming from the common primary idea of smoothness or bareness. It is pilis caruit, or nudavit pilis in Conj. II., smoothing off the beard, like Hebrew כָּרַח. Hence by the skin of the teeth, he would understand the covering heard, which has all come out in consequence of the disease. But this is an interpretation on which there is no need of dwelling.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 21. That toucheth me, וְנִגַּעַנִי. The apparent lightness of the act enhances, by its mighty effect, the greatness of the power: "He looketh at the earth, and it trembles; He toucheth the mountains, and they smoke (the Volcanoes)." Comp. Ps. cxliv. 5.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 23. Satiated. The idea intended is that of remorseless slander compared to a devouring of the flesh. In the SYRIAC it becomes a fixed idiomatic expression for this idea. Hence a Syriac word, אַכְלִיקָרְצָא, meaning the Devourer of pieces, becomes a name for Satan, or Διάβολος, the Accuser. Is 14<sup>15</sup> Ver. 25. <sup>16</sup> Ver. 26. For remarks on the words thus noted see Addenda Excursus, No. 1, p. . The three verses 25, 26 and 27 are printed in capitals to correspond to the idea of the monumental in-crispion (see Excursus I, p. ) evidently designed in verses 23 and 24. The conjunction וְ with which it commences, as it stands in the book, does not interfere with this. In the monumental inscription read as standing by itself cut in the rock, the וְ may be regarded as dispensed with, just as we leave out the Greek ἐν which stands redundantly before a quotation in the New Testament.

<sup>17</sup> Vers. 26 and 27. Shall see, etc. Most worthy of note here as showing the earnestness and assurance of the speaker is the three-fold repetition of the verb to see, expressing three different aspects of the idea: 1. I shall see Eloah; 2. Shall see him mine; 3. Mine eyes shall see him. In the first two cases it is וְיֵרָא, which is used more for spiritual vision, like ὁρῶμαι in Greek. In the third it is וְיֵרָא, connected with the organ as though denoting an actual visual beholding—mine eyes shall see him—the time of וְיֵרָא depending on the picture preceding. Though we have two principal verbs of sight, the translator has used but one (see instead of behold), in order to present more strikingly this most significant repetition. WATTS: "with strong immortal eyes."

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 27. Stranger now no more. DELITZSCH refers וְ to Job: I shall see Him not as a stranger sees Him, or "I shall see him, and not another," as E. V. has it. So CONANT; also the LXX. and VULGATE: et non alius. But on the other hand, GESSENIUS, UMBREIT (doch nicht als Gegner), VAHINGER, STICKEL, HAHN and VON HOFFMANN refer it to God. DELITZSCH has no right to say that וְ does not mean adversary. When applied to the relation between man and God, it does mean that most emphatically. There are two strong reasons for this interpretation which the translator has adopted: 1. The declaration: "Mine eyes shall see him," so strongly made, would render this interpretation of DELITZSCH a tautology—a saying the same thing (myself and not another), only in a more feeble way. 2. The other rendering brings into emphatic prominence the idea for which Job's soul was pining—not so much the sight of God by any objective beholding, as the idea of reconciliation with him—love and peace after estrangement. See this more fully dwelt upon in the excursus above referred to.

[PAUSE.]

- 28 Yes, ye shall<sup>20</sup> say, why persecute we him?
And seek<sup>21</sup> to find in me a root<sup>22</sup> of blame?
- 29 Beware—Beware<sup>23</sup>—the sword.
For there is wrath; yea sins (that call) the sword;<sup>24</sup>
That ye may surely know that judgment<sup>25</sup> is.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 28. Shall say. The supposing a pause of silence, however brief, before ver. 28 greatly facilitates the interpretation of what follows, and which by being brought abruptly in, has given rise to much unnecessary difficulty. The high feeling of the rapturous anticipation has somewhat gone down; but it has made a change in Job, and gives him strength to use a language to the friends different from what he had before employed. There is no recrimination, but he ventures to assume to them something of a warning, and even a prophetic style. It is, however, a general prediction, and there is nothing to show that he had in view the scenes narrated in the close of the book, as some have thought in order to lower the character of his ecstatic vision to a mere guess at returning prosperity. For ye shall say. There is no need of departing from the simple future sense of וְאָמְרוּ. The time will come when ye will take a different view of the case. The וְ is slightly illative, being used, as it repeatedly is, in the Book of Job, to denote a kind of reply to something that has been silently passing through the mind. It is like the commencement of Chap. xxviii. There regarded, the two verbs following (וְרָרָה and וְנִכְלָא) may both be treated as in the same conjugation and tense, future in form, but to be rendered as present, or aorist, depending on וְאָמְרוּ; in which view there is no need of regarding וְ in the second clause as anything more than simply connective. There is no inferential sense in it to be rendered since or seeing that; all of which arises from a wrong view of the connections of the passage.

<sup>21</sup> Seek to find. In כִּלְכֵּל denotes not simply a finding, casually, but a finding what is sought. Here it may be taken as the 1st Pers. Plu. Fut. Kal, instead of the Niphal participle, which the other view seems to necessitate. The change of person, although it makes strange sounding English, the translator has preserved because it is so expressive in Hebrew, this sudden turn to himself as the object of their persecution. Comp. the precisely similar case, xiv. 3, which MEXX has marred by his useless emendation of the text.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 28. Root of blame. When this phrase, רֹחַק שֶׁרֶשׁ, is rendered root of the matter, it seems to have little or no meaning, besides necessitating a different and forced construction of the whole passage. It is in E. V., and maintained by DELITZSCH, CONANT, and other very able commentators; but an examination of the use of רֹחַק in such passages as Exod. xviii. 16-22; xxii. 8 (עַל כָּל דְּבַר פֶּשַׁע), xxiv. 14, and other places, can leave little doubt of the meaning as above given—a ground of accusation or blame. It may have been שֶׁרֶשׁ, root of accusation, as denoting charges inferred without evidence, like those in chap. xxii.,—dog up—hunted for—having no proof upon the surface. ROSENMUELLER: materialis litte.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 29. Beware—Beware. The repetition in the translation is justified by the great emphasis expressed in וּנְכַלְא and וְרָרָה: “Take care of yourselves before the sword.” The strengthening that Job had received rouses him to give them this warning, though not at all in their style of crimination.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 29. That judgment is—surely is—really is— or what it really is—said, perhaps, in opposition to their superficial views about the judgments or dealings of the divine providence: That ye may have an idea of the greater and higher judgment. We have here וְ for אֲשֶׁר—the only place in Job where it occurs, though so common in Ecclesiastes and the later Hebrew.

CHAPTER XX.

- 1 Then answered Zophar, the Naamathite, and said:
- 2 To this<sup>1</sup> my thoughts compel<sup>2</sup> me to respond;
And therefore is my haste<sup>3</sup> within me (roused).
- 3 The chastening of my reproof I hear;
'Tis zeal,<sup>4</sup> with knowledge, urges my reply.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 2. To this. לְכֵן. There is no need to follow UMBRETT and others in their far-fetched explanations of this particle, לְכֵן. Literally to so—for so—for this—there-for or therefore. So כֵּן כֵּן, wherefore. It denotes here an immediate reply.

Fired by Job's saying to them to beware of the sword of justice, Zophar answers indignantly and impetuously. He could be very calm when, free from pain, he discourses so loftily and truly about God's wisdom and “truth's twofold form” (chap. xi. 6). With all theoretical coolness could he exhort Job to repentance. But now when the sufferer, strengthened by his glorious hope (xix. 25-28), turns upon them, as it were, and warns them that they too have need of repentance, Zophar goes off in great haste, as the next clause shows. This heat is continued through the chapter, producing that picture of the wicked man and his doom, most just in itself, and most graphically as well as eloquently presented, but very intemperate and unjust as applied to Job.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 2. Compel me to respond. יִשְׁכַּח alone might mean simply to answer, but the suffix and the context seem to demand the causal sense. It might, however, be rendered  furnish my answer—give me an answer.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 2. My haste. There is no need of going away from the pure Hebrew sense of רוּחַץ, haste. It is just what the context shows to be wanted, and the word in brackets is simply the expression of what is implied in the emphatic repetition, כֵּן רוּחַץ, of the first person: my haste in me.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 3. Zeal. רוּחַץ is here used for anger, temper, zeal or warmth (ira), as it is Judg. viii. 3; Prov. xvi. 32; Isaiah xxv. 4; xxx. 28; Zech. vi. 8. He justifies this outburst of spirit by the following word, כִּינִיתִי, from my understanding. It is not irrational anger, he would say, but justified by Job's provocation.

- 4 Ha!<sup>5</sup> knowest thou this—a truth of olden time, Since Adam first was placed upon the earth?
5 How brief the triumph<sup>6</sup> of the bad!
The joy of the impure, how momentary!
6 Yes, though his pride may mount to heaven's height,
His head reach to the cloud;
7 As is his splendor,<sup>7</sup> so his hopeless<sup>8</sup> ruin;
Who gazed upon him say—where is he gone.
8 As a dream<sup>9</sup> he flies, and is no longer found;
Like a night spectre<sup>10</sup> is he scared away.
9 The eye hath glanced<sup>11</sup> on him—it glanceth not again;
His dwelling-place beholdeth him no more.
10 His children must appease<sup>12</sup> the poor;
And his own hands give back again his wealth.
11 His bones are filled from sins<sup>13</sup> in secret done,
And with him in the dust must they lie down.
12 Though wickedness, while in his mouth, be sweet;
So that beneath his tongue he keeps it hid,—

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 4. Ha! The Hebrew הָא in הָאֵלֶּיךָ is exclamatory as well as interrogative. It is often so. Here it strikingly shows how impetuously Zophar dashes on after his hasty exordium. The force of it is carried all through the high-wrought picture that follows. He begins as though he would overwhelm the unrepentant and presumptuous Job.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 5. The triumph—the joy. These expressions would seem to refer to Job's exultant hope, xix. 26, 27, and his warning, ver. 29.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 7. As is his splendor. Ew.: nach seiner Grösse. The weight of authority is in favor of this rendering, as derived from the Arabic, وَجَلال, glory, splendor. The Chaldaic וְגַלְגַל has the same meaning. It avoids the seemingly indecorous comparison of the E. V. rendering, and has, moreover, in its favor the fact that the Arabic word, thus used, is very common. It may be said, too, that the contrast thus given more strongly expresses the main idea, which is his great downfall. The suffix, too, as CONANT well remarks, is better adapted to this rendering.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 7. Hopeless ruin. Literally, so he perishes utterly. לְנֶצַח does not mean forever in the time sense, but only implies it in its real idea of completeness, finality. The verb אָבַד suggests strongly that awful word Abaddon (אֲבַדּוֹן), the state of the lost.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 8. As a dream—As a night spectre. The rendering is demanded in order to give the true distinction of the words חלום and רוּחַ. The first is simply an ordinary dreaming, especially in a light sleep, which seems to fly away on opening the eyes (volucrine similitudo somno), and we cannot recall it. We only know that we have been dreaming. So the wicked man, after his brief hallucination, cannot be found. Literally: They cannot find him. The other clause of the parallelism is much stronger. רוּחַ denotes a vision as something different from such a mere dreaming. Again, it denotes the object of the vision, as well as the vision itself; like the Greek ὄψις (from ὄψομαι, corresponding best to Heb. רוּחַ), which means the sight (spectaculum), as well as the seeing. This is generally something mysterious and sublime, as in Job iv. 13, or something frightful, as in Job vii. 14: "Thou scarest me with visions"—phantasms, spectres, frightful sights. The vision of Eliphaz (iv. 13-17), whatever degree of objective reality we may ascribe to it, is certainly evidence of a belief in a spectral world, from which came forth things to warn or to terrify men. The rendering spectre is strongly favored by the word following. The verb רָאָה is literally driven, chased away, as E. V. and CONANT render it, but scared away is most fitting to the context: and so the German commentators, such as UMBREIT, EWALD, ZÖCKLER, etc., mainly render it (verschreckt, fortgeschreckt) weggeschreckt. Everything about the passage shows that it was an ancient as well as a modern superstition, if we may call it so, that apparitions from this spectral world departed very suddenly as though frightened, either by the crowing of the cock, or the appearance of morning, or something stern and bold in the human attitude towards such seeming intruders. This is remarkably exemplified by the story Plutarch gives us, in his life of Brutus (sect. xxxvi.), of the apparition (the nachtgesicht) that presented itself to him when reading in his tent at midnight before the battle of Philippi. "Whilst in deep study, he seemed to feel the presence of something entering. Turning his eye, he sees a strange and fearful form of something ἐκφυλάου (belonging to no known species), standing in silence by him. Who art thou, man or god? The phantasm replies, in a hollow tone, I am thy evil genius, Brutus; thou shalt see me at Philippi. I will see thee there, said he." This bold answer of Brutus, as though making an appointment, and the fright of the spectre, is most admirably paraphrased by Cowley:

I'll see thee there, saidst thou,
With such a voice and such a brow,
As put the startled ghost to sudden flight:—
It was as though it heard the morning crow,
Or saw its well-appointed star
Come marching up the eastern hill afar.

So flies the wicked man, scared away, driven away, by the divine judgments, or when the light of truth is let into his soul. The rendering, chased away, also reminds us of Prov. xiv. 32: "The wicked man is driven away in his wickedness." This kind of language has a number of examples in Job, and it may be taken as proof that the phraseology in the Proverbs is derived from it.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 9. Hath glanced. שָׁחַף. A word rare, but clear. Cant. i. 6: "The sun hath looked upon me"—to change my color. Job xxviii. 7: "The keen falcon's eye hath glanced upon it"—the miner's unexplored path. ZÖCKLER gives this very strikingly: eln Auge hat auf ihn gebliekt, es that's nicht wider. Nothing could more distinctly express the idea of transitoriness: one glance, and he is never seen again.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 10. Must appease. This is the rendering of E. V. (seek to please). The argument for it, besides the grammatical one, is the harmony it makes with the second clause. The other rendering, the poor shall oppress his children, demands a new form of the verb רָצַח—רָצַחָם.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 11. Sins in secret done. Literally secret things; but a comparison of Ps. xc. 8 shows at once the meaning. Many render it sins of youth. There is authority for it from the use of עֲלֵימִים, Ps. lxxxix. 46; Job xxxiii. 25, etc., but the general sense here is best, especially as it may also include the other, and perhaps point to them. Secret sins, or sins of youth—the effects of them go with a man to his grave. They lie down; וַיִּשְׁכַּב; singular feminine, but answers for a collective nominative, like a Greek singular verb with a plural neuter to which the Hebrew feminine, in such cases, corresponds.

- 13 Sparing it long, and loth to let it go,
Holding it back, still near his palate's taste ;
14 Yet in his bowels is his bread all changed ;
Within him, 'tis the very gall of asps.
15 The wealth he swallows shall he vomit up ,
Yes, from his very maw shall God's hand cast it forth.
16 The venom of the viper shall he suck ;
The adder's tongue shall slay him.
17 On the fair rivers<sup>14</sup> shall he never gaze,—
The flowing streams of honey and of milk.
18 Toil<sup>15</sup> [wronged], before 'tis swallowed, he restores ;
As wealth exchanged, he has no joy of it.
19 Because<sup>16</sup> he crushed, and helpless left, the poor ;

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 17. On the fair rivers. פְּלֹנִים here, and Judges v. 15, 16, is synonymous with פְּלֹנִים, and means primarily artificial water courses, but the word is used of rivers generally, as in P. lxx. 10, פְּלֹנִים אֱלֹהִים, the river of God. It is used to denote a beautiful, fair flowing stream, as נָהַר represents a fuller and deeper one, or as the Latin amnis in distinction from flumen or fluvius. The flowing streams; literally, flowings of streams; the first noun qualifying the other—the full streams. Is anything special meant here, or is it only a glowing picture representing wealth and prosperity? The latter view seems easy, and is the one generally taken by commentators; but yet it has great difficulties. In the first place, the whole picture is not that of a poor man who never attains to any measure of luxury, but of one who has possessed, and then been deprived of it. In the second place, if Z. phar has Job in view, as we must suppose from the way he brings in the picture, the language, thus understood, is wholly inapplicable. With his "seven thousand sheep and goats, and three thousand camels, and five hundred yoke of oxen, and five hundred she asses, and very many servants," he must be said to have seen "the brooks of honey and milk," that is, abundance of the luxuries of life, or of the good things of this world, if ever a man did. The conjecture may be hazarded, that the fervid and imaginative Zophar has in mind some early Arabian mythical paradise, something unearthly, or belonging to some remote region of the world, like the Greek "Isles of the Blessed." Thus viewed, it may have been the origin of that description we find so often in the Koran, and which must have been much older than the days of Mohammed. See Surat, ii. 23: "For them are the gardens where flow the rivers," etc., and many other places. In Surat xlvii. 16, 17, the language becomes almost identical, in some respects, with that of the passage in Job: "Like the garden promised to the pious, wherein are rivers of living water (water that never loses its purity), and rivers of milk whose taste never changes, and rivers of honey purified, and fruits of every kind, and forgiveness from their Lord." If Zophar had any such idea derived from any quarter, it may have resembled the Vedic conception that MERU thinks of so much importance. See INT. THEISM, p. 15, 16. Why may not such a myth be regarded as having crossed the Indus, if it was there at that early period, or as having arisen from the imagination of the dwellers in Zophar's native land of Naama, נַעֲמָה (the land of delights), wherever that may have been. Such a fanciful Paradise of sense would be immeasurably inferior to the scriptural idea of the ἡδὴ αἰωνίου, far inferior, we might say, to Job's vision of a reconciled God, with no other accompaniments. Wholly without God, as they are, it might be maintained, that such mythical representations, with all their "sweetness and light," have really less moral value than the shadows of Sheol which Job so mournfully deplores, and the bare hope of hearing, at some time, God's voice of deliverance from it (xlv. 15). Whatever may be thought of such a conjecture, the resemblance the passage bears to the Koranic language is certainly very striking. The latter may have been derived from it. Such is the opinion of Good, a commentator from whom much may be learned, notwithstanding his work is so marred by extravagant conceits and arbitrary changes of the Hebrew text. See EXCURSUS I. of the Addenda.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 18. Toil (wronged). גֵּעַ, like גֵּעַ, denotes primarily labor, and then the fruit of labor, whether as coming to the laborer or to his employer. There being no personal suffix, it must be taken generally as the toil, the wages of the wronged toiler, and therefore the word in brackets is simply the complement of the intended idea.

The second clause has occasioned some difficulty. חֵיל is certainly construct (wealth of exchange), and therefore the rendering of E. V. cannot be sustained, or that of UMBREIT, who would arbitrarily regard it as absolute. The construction, however, may be explained in two ways: 1. By regarding the second ׀ as connecting the clause with מְשִׁיב; the first ׀ making a subordinate connection reading thus: 'Restores the fruit of toil, and does not swallow it as the wealth of his exchange, and does not enjoy it.' This makes the two clauses so closely inter-dependent as to form one in fact—a construction which is not according to the usual style of the parallels in Job. 2. The second clause may be taken by itself, and thus rendered: It is as wealth of his exchange, and he does not enjoy. This is, indeed, very awkward English; but it gives the idea. The ׀ may possibly be taken as connecting by way of comparison, which is not unfrequently the case, especially in Proverbs; but a truer view is to regard it as connecting directly וְחֵיל וְנִכְרֹתָיו, a verb and a verbal noun. Taking both as verbs, it would be: Wealth that he exchanges and does not enjoy; or taking both as nouns: Wealth of exchange, and not of enjoyment. "Wealth of restitution," SCHLOTTMAN well renders it. Better still would be: wealth of retribution; and so it might have been given in our Metrical Version:

As wealth of retribution, not of joy;

but it was thought best to keep the word exchange as not only more concise, but more distinctly preserving the figure.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 19. Because. The force of כִּי here, and as repeated in ver. 20, seems to extend to the strong apodotic expression עַל בֵּן in the second clause of ver. 21. Such a carrying of the protasis through several parallel verses, has other examples in Job. See xv. 25-29, where commentators (EWALD, DILLMANN, ZÖCKLER, et al.) continue the protasis, through four verses (weil—weil—weil—deshalb). כִּי is used there in the same way, and is rendered because (because—because, etc.—therefore) although the connection is less clear, and there is no apodotic particle like עַל בֵּן (see note on the passage). Here translators generally break it up, or find subordinate apodotes, at the end, or in the middle of intervening clauses, although the demand for continuance is much more clear than in the other passage, and the strong עַל בֵּן at end seems not to be satisfied with anything less. Thus the כִּי in ver. 19 covers its second clause. The repetition of it in the 20th has not only the same effect, but goes over into the first clause of ver. 21, making the great conclusion with עַל בֵּן all the more emphatic. The 21st verse, it is true, begins with ׀, which is an asserting particle, but that does not make it independent, or to be taken alone as the protasis to the following. The leaving out the copulative particles, and the omission of כִּי at the beginning of ver. 21 only makes it more forcible as the language of passion and impetuosity according to the rule of Aristotle, which

- Seized<sup>17</sup> ruthlessly a house he would not build ;
 20 Because content, within, he never knew,
 Nor lets<sup>18</sup> escape him aught of his desire—21 (No, not a shred for his devouring greed),—
 Therefore it is, his GOOD<sup>19</sup> cannot endure.
 22 In the fullness of his wealth, his straits begin ;
 When every hand of toil<sup>20</sup> against him comes.
 23 Be<sup>21</sup> it the time to fill his greed ;
 'Tis then God sends on him His burning storm of wrath,
 Until He rains it on him in his food.
 24 Does he flee from the iron lance ?<sup>22</sup>
 The bow of brass shall pierce him through and through.
 25 He<sup>23</sup> hath drawn [the sword] ; forth comes it from his flesh ;
 The gleaming weapon from his gall.
 He is gone.<sup>24</sup> Terrors are over him.

must hold true in all languages, that when the sense is clear without them, conjunctions had better be dispensed with. The translator has endeavored to preserve this asyndetic style, and, at the same time, to carry into the English the conciseness of the Hebrew.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 19. Seized ruthlessly. The rendering plunder misleads. It conveys the idea of robbing or despoiling a house of things that are in it. The more common as well as the primary sense of נָלַח is here demanded, not only because it alone is applicable to a house, but because it gives the contrast wanted between the two ideas of violently taking possession, and of building for one's self. The future (יִבְנֶה) expresses not only that which objectively follows in time, but also what is subjectively consecutive, that is, in the order of the thought. In Greek and Latin the future is the mother of the subjunctive moods. In Hebrew, which is so destitute of modal forms, it is used for them. Had built, or builded not, as E. V. renders it after the Vulgate, will not do, because it makes a pluperfect or an objectively finished past prior in the order of the thought.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 20. Nor lets escape. נִלָּח may be regarded, like many other examples of Piel and Hiphil verbs, as permissive or preventive, as well as causal—let escape—make escape. Its future form is because it is consecutive in idea to the previous clause: He is so unquiet or unsatisfied that he lets not, or will not let,—the rendering in English by the future, or the present, coming to the same thing.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 21. His good. Some such word as prosperity for טוֹב might seem more emphatic; but the simpler English word includes it and more. There is intended his summum bonum, or what seems such to the bad man. Therefore his good shall not endure. It sounds like a sentence of judgment, after the arraignment in the previous items. If it is not too cruel a supposition, we may regard the angry yet eloquent Zophar as having Job in view, as though, at every item, he pointed to him as he sat in the ashes, intimating that he is the man: It must be that he had done some most wicked and oppressive act,—crushed the poor—seized a house—gratified himself in everything; and therefore it is that his property and his happiness are all gone.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 23. Be it the time—taken as a supposition. The simplest rendering here is the surest. כִּלְאוֹת, above, suggests the כִּלָּה in this verse, and there must be a similarity of statement and idea. At the very time when his greed is highest, and he is about to satisfy it, then God sends, etc. This makes the 3d clause unmistakable, though it seems to have perplexed commentators. The rain of wrath mingles with the food he is eating, just as in other places tears mingle with the bread one is eating. See Ps. lxxx. 6; xlii. 4. The other rendering makes the filling of his belly in the first clause, God's filling his belly with wrath (by way of irony for food) and then in the third clause, לֶחֶם is made the object of the verb: He rains his food upon him,—to the neglect of the preposition ב, or disposing of it in the facile way of calling it Beth essentialis. UMBREIT renders it "for his meat," or in place of it. So DILLMANN. That is a sense of ב in some cases, but the more usual meaning is better here. DELITZSCH renders it: rain upon him into his flesh, giving two indirect objects to יָטַר, but no direct one. He takes for לָחֹם a sense it seems to have, Zeph. i. 17, and which he derives from the Arabic لَحْم; quite a different word with very different vowels. Besides this, it is not easy to give ב the sense of into after a verb of motion with the idea of attack, especially such a verb as יָטַר. The rendering flash, says DILLMANN, is wholly inadmissible.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 24. Iron lance. נִשְׁק, armor, generally, but here some striking or piercing weapon. Through and through: The rendering is not too strong for that most peculiar and emphatic word תַּחֲלִפְרוּ.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 25. He hath drawn. The translator agrees with UMBREIT in regarding God as the subject of שָׁלַח. The Divine name thus left out makes it all the more fearful as well as emphatic. It might be rendered passively it is drawn—unsheathed—but there is no need of it. Suddenness is the idea the words vividly impress. It is no sooner out of its scabbard than it is through his body; or, between its being drawn from the sheath and being drawn back from his gall is but a moment. The other rendering: he (the one pierced) draws it out, or back, loses all this, besides having very serious philological difficulties. It must, in that case, refer to the arrow just above, but the verb is ever used of the sword in the numerous places of its occurrence, except in Ruth iv. 7, 8, where it means slipping the foot out of the shoe or sandal, and Ps. cxxix. 6, where it is the slipping of the flower out of its calyx, or of the fruit from its gume or husk (entschloffen; see HUPFELD). When used of a weapon it is always the sword, and its drawing is from its sheath. Jud. iii. 22 is only a seeming exception, as there the body is regarded as the sheath, and it is the sword still; no other weapon being carried in a sheath. The word שָׁלַח (S. L. P.) is onomatopoeic, like our word slip—not that the one is derived from the other, but that both are formed on the same principle as signifying an easy slipping motion. The rendering of DELITZSCH and others, makes, moreover, a feeble tautology: "he draws it out; and it comes out." Another reason given by UMBREIT has much force: בָּרַק, fulgur, brightness, is generally used of the sword when applied to a weapon; Deut. xxxii. 41; Ezek. xxi. 15, 20; or sometimes of the spear, he might have said. The barb of the arrow, moreover, would prevent its being easily drawn back by the victim, and tearing, as DELITZSCH renders, would be greatly out of congruity with the verb שָׁלַח. On יוֹגֵה see Note (7) chap. xxxv. 5.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 25. He is gone. The accents separate יוֹהֵל from אֲנִים. The latter word cannot, therefore, be the subject, even if the number permitted. The verb stands by itself. There is an appalling suddenness and abruptness in this whole description, which is best given in measures somewhat irregular. For examples of יוֹהֵל taken in a similar way, see xiv. 20; xix. 10; xxvii. 20. The rendering which

- 26 In his hid<sup>25</sup> treasures lies all darkness hid ;
 A self-enkindled<sup>26</sup> fire consumes it ever more,
 Still feeding<sup>27</sup> on the remnant in his tent.
- 27 His sins the Heavens reveal;
 Against him rises up the earth.
- 28 His wealth to other lands<sup>28</sup> departs,
 Like flowing waters, in His day of wrath.
- 29 This is the bad man's portion sent from God,—
 His lot appointed from the<sup>29</sup> Mighty One.

regards the word as separated, is sustained by ROSENUELLER, SCHULTENS, HIRZEL, et al. The old versions are the other way. The usage, however, of הִלֵּךְ in the places mentioned, to say nothing of the accents, is decidedly against the translation of the VULGATE, etc.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 26. Hid treasures טָכֵן-צָפְנָי. The two words have both of them the idea of hiding, and there seems to be something of a sententious play upon them.

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 26. Still feeding. EWALD, ZUCK., ROSENW., UMBREIT, make רָעַץ from רָעַץ: Uebel geht es dem. The other sense is according to the accents and the metaphor of fire feeding (ignis depascens) which is in so many languages.

CHAPTER XXI.

- 1 Then Job answered and said:
- 2 O listen<sup>1</sup> to my words;
 And let that be in place of your consolings.
- 3 Bear with me, let me speak;
 And after I have spoken, then mock on.
- 4 Ah me! Is my appeal to man?
 Impatient then might be my soul; why not?
- 5 Turn now,<sup>2</sup> behold me—stand amazed,
 And lay your hand upon your mouth:
- 6 'Tis when I think, that I am sore dismayed;
 And trembling taketh hold on all my flesh.
- 7 Why do the wicked live at<sup>3</sup> all?
 Why grow they old, yea giant<sup>4</sup> like in power?
- 8 Before them—with them—firmly stands their seed;<sup>5</sup>
 Their spreading offspring ever in their sight.
- 9 Why are their houses peace, away from fear,—
 No scourge upon them from Eloah's hand?

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 5. Turn now. וְסַב has the sense of turning and looking in the face. On leaving out the mere copulative in such cases, see Note xiii. 23.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 7. Live at all. There is an emphasis on אֵל. The astonishment is at God's suffering them to remain on earth, or even to be born. He goes to the root of the great problem of evil. This was the thought that so dismayed him whenever he called it to mind.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 7. Giant-like. Something of this kind demanded by the strong word גִּבּוֹרִים: Heroes. See Gen. vi. 4.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 8. Their seed. Instead of description intended to be universal and dogmatic, it is clear that Job is simply touched by the contrast between his own state, bereaved of children, stripped of property, suffering acutest pain, with the condition of many a bad man in directly opposite circumstances. The points he makes show this, and it may be in perfect harmony with what follows in ver. 17, where his thoughts tend to take the other and the larger view. See APPENDIX, p.

- 10 The issue of their herds is sure;<sup>6</sup>
 Their kine bring forth without mishance.
 11 Their little ones, like flocks, they send them out;
 Their sons and daughters' mingle in the dance.
 12 To harp and timbrel do they raise their voice;
 In melodies of flutes they take delight.
 13 In joy unbroken<sup>8</sup> do they spend their days;
 And in a moment<sup>9</sup> to the grave go down.
 14 To God they say, Depart from us;
 No knowledge of Thy ways do we desire.
 15 The Almighty! who is he that we should serve him?
 And if we pray to him, what do we gain?

[PAUSE.]

- 16 But lo,<sup>10</sup>—their good is not in their own hand.
 The counsel of the wicked, be it far from me.

[A LONGER SILENCE.]

- 17 [Yet, truth<sup>11</sup> ye say]; how oft goes out the lamp of evil men!
 And comes upon them their calamity!
 When God, in wrath, allots them deadly<sup>12</sup> pangs.
 18 Like stubble are they then before the wind,—
 Like chaff the whirling tempest bears away.
 19 Eloah treasures up his evil for his sons;<sup>13</sup>
 To him He thus repays it—he shall know.
 20 His own destruction shall his eyes behold;
 When from the wrath of Shaddai he shall drink.
 21 For what his pleasure<sup>14</sup> in posterity,
 When sundered thus the number of his months?

[PAUSE.]

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 10. The issue of their herds. In this clear passage, euphemistic language may be allowed.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 10. Sons and daughters. ילדיהם is in contrast with עיילים rendered little ones. It may be taken for the grown-up children of both sexes.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 13. In joy unbroken. Heb. בְּטוֹב, in good. But this is to be taken here for what the wicked man esteems the good, his summum bonum,—pleasure or enjoyment uninterrupted and without stint.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 13. In a moment. A quick death is spoken of as the good fortune of the wicked. "There are no bands in their death," Ps. lxxiii. 4. רִנָּה an instant of time; רָגַע quiet; there would seem to be here intended something of both ideas. שְׁאוֹל here is rendered the grave. It has a further sense, the spirit world, or the under-world. It is, however, best rendered here according to the bad man's conception.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 16. But lo. For a discussion in respect to the remarkable transition here, and in the verse followlag. See EXCURSUS, ADDENDA, pa. 175

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 17. (Yet truth ye say). For the propriety of the words in brackets, and of the interpretation generally, see ADDENDA, pa. 175

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 19. Eloah treasures. There is no warrant for taking this as a question; still less as an ironical taunt on the part of Job, as though making it the language of the friends and then deriding it. Equally defenceless is it, the making יִשְׁלֹם imprecatory here, and thus to differ from all the other futures before and after it. See EXCURS. II. on this chapter; ADDENDA, p. 182. The retribution on his sons is, in fact, retribution on himself, and, in some way, he shall know it to be so. It may be, too, that אֵינָן may have, in this verse, its other clear and frequent sense of strength and wealth.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 21. For what his pleasure. What concern, others render it. A turn may be given to this which may make it seem to favor the other or imprecatory rendering of the previous verse ("for what cares he for his house after him"); but the other changes which this is made to suit are so forced as to invalidate the opposite reasoning, however plausible, in respect to this verse. A connection of thought between vers. 20 and 21 is easily seen without it. A sudden destruction is predicted, ver. 20, when his wealth goes to others, and what pleasure will he have of it? This suddenness is intimated in חָצַץ which means sharp cutting, cutting off in the very midst of his enjoyments,—not a calm old age and easy death closing all cares, which is demanded by the other view. The thought of judicial severity is inseparable from חָצַץ thus used.

- 22 [Ah, how is this?]<sup>15</sup> Shall any man teach<sup>16</sup> God?
Teach Him who judgeth things on high!
- 23 (For see); one dieth in his perfect strength,
All quiet<sup>17</sup> and at ease.
- 24 His breasts<sup>18</sup> are full of milk;
And moist the marrow of his bones.
- 25 Another dies in bitterness of soul,
And never tastes of good.
- 26 Alike in dust do both lie down;
Alike o'er both the worm its covering spreads.
- [PAUSE.]
- 27 Behold I know your thoughts,— Thoughts<sup>19</sup> to my hurt, ye wrongfully<sup>20</sup> maintain.
- 28 For where's the dwelling of the Prince, say ye,<sup>21</sup>—
And where the tent of evil men's abode?
- 29 Have ye not asked the passers by the way?
And know ye not their<sup>22</sup> signs?
- 30 That to the day of doom the wicked man is<sup>23</sup> kept;
To the day of mighty<sup>24</sup> wrath are they brought forth.
- 31 Yet who before his face declares<sup>25</sup> his way?
And who requites him (here) what he hath done?
- 32 Still to the grave (like others) is he brought;
And for him, o'er his tomb, one keepeth<sup>26</sup> watch.
- 33 On him, too, lightly<sup>27</sup> press the valley clods;

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 22. Ah, how is this? A pause here, with an intervening thought, leading to what follows, may be rationally supposed. See ADDENDA, pa. 176. The words in brackets denote the transition. It is a very impassioned speech. Job's mind is revolving like that of Koheleth, when he so often says "I turned"—"I turned again to see"—I took another and another view of things, etc. The chief difference is that Koheleth is in a more calm and contemplative state, and gives outward notice of these mental changes, whilst Job silently broods over them, and then bursts forth. His state of soul, instead of being a meditative rest, is tumultuous, volcanic we might almost style it, as it sometimes shows itself. To expect of him closely connected and logical sequences, is itself most illogical. The statements in previous verses, apparently varying, but, in fact, only two parts of one picture viewed from different stand-points, naturally bring up the thought of the great diversity in the lives and deaths of men,—a fact inexplicable on any human theory. This again calls up the thought of some higher wisdom of God yet unknown to men. It is fully set forth in ch. xxviii., but Job is only approaching it here. It produces the silence of a moment, when he resumes: shall one teach God? and then goes on with the picture of diversity in human condition that had led to it.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 22. Teach God—see note below on ver. 30, and the pages in the ADDENDA there referred to.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 23. All quiet. Heb. שָׁלוֹם. GESENIUS regards this strange form as a compound of שָׁלוֹם and שָׁאֵן.

BEN GANACH, in his Hebrew Grammar entitled SEFER HA RUKMA, page 18, maintains that it is only שָׁאֵן with an euphonic ל giving it a more intensive sense.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 24. His breasts שָׁדָיִם occurs but once. Some give it the sense of station for watering flocks (as derived from the Arabic) and then transferred to the flocks themselves. The parallelism, however, demands a word denoting some part of the body to correspond to bones in the second clause. There seems to be nothing better, after all, than the rendering breasts which E. V. got from the Targum, and which, as an expression of health, may be applicable to either sex.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 27. Thoughts to my hurt. חַשְׁבוֹת. חֲשַׁבֹת, especially with עָלַי, means evil thoughts. From the rendering of E. V., and that of most of the commentators, there would be derived the idea of plots or machinations (stratagema DELITZSCH renders it) or of something to be done to, or against, Job. But the words do not really demand this. חֲשַׁבוֹת may refer simply to the false and unfavorable views they have indulged of Job's case and character.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 27. Wrongfully. חֲסוֹם has generally the associated thought of violence, but the essential idea is that of injustice. It seems to combine the two senses very much as the Greek ὕβρις—ὑβριζω.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 29. Their signs; like mottoes borne on their standards—enigmatical devices,—or, taken generally, any modes by which their sententious or traditional language is made known.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 30. To the day of doom the wicked man is kept. On the general interpretation of this verse, see EXCURSUS III. of the ADDENDA, pa. 182.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 30. Mighty wrath. Literally to the day of wraths, dies irarum. The word עֲבֵרוֹת is the intensive plural.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 30. Declares his way. Who dares tell him of the fearful נֶגֶד to which his way leads, or of the day of wrath to which he is to be brought forth. Nothing could be more appropriate to the view taken of ver. 30 in E. V., and insisted on in EXCURSUS III. If ver. 30 refers to some great eschatological doom, however dimly conceived as belonging to some unknown period, then the word here, as placed in brackets, is implied in the emphasis of the passage.

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 32. One keepeth watch. Various views are taken of this; but no one seems more simple and natural than the idea of a friend or relative keeping watch by the grave, whether as guardian or as mourner. The wicked man, too, has those who loved him in spite of his wickedness. The picture is a very touching one.

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 33. Lightly press. The Hebrew כָּתַק literally means are sweet, but may be applied to anything agreeable, or represented as such, whether in fancy or reality. Compare xxiv. 20: The worm feeds sweetly on him, or, his sweetness is the worm. The idea, in either case, is that of insensibility to suffering, but strangely conceived of as having something of enjoyment. We do not wholly divest ourselves

And after him come all in lengthened<sup>28</sup> train,
As countless numbers thus have gone before.<sup>29</sup>

[CONCLUSION.]

34 How then console ye me? 'Tis empty breath,<sup>30</sup>
Since in your answers still remains offence.<sup>31</sup> of such feelings when we talk of the grave as a place of rest. The clouds of the valley resting upon him give no pain, and are, therefore, conceived of as pleasant. The expression here suggests the classical, levis sit terra. See Euripides Alcestis, 470:

—Κούφα σοι
Χθὼν ἐπάνω πεσείε—γύναι.

Light fall the earth upon thee—lady.

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 33. Lengthened train. An idea clearly contained in the Hebrew כִּשְׁוֹן. See Jud. iv. 6, 7, where it denotes the drawing out of the military line; Ps. xxviii. 3: "Draw me not out (or let me not draw out) with the wicked."

<sup>29</sup> Ver. 33. Have gone before. Life a procession; one part coming, another passing, another gone. It reminds us of the monumental lines from the Greek Anthology:

—τὴν αὐτὴν δόδον
ἦν πάντας ἐλθεῖν ἐστ' ἀναγκαιῶς ἔχον, προεληλύθασιν—

On the road that all must travel have they gone,
A little way before.

All alike; even God's Elect present the same appearance of an ever-passing and disappearing procession:

Part of the host have crossed the flood,
And part are crossing now.

The picture presented by Job is as touching as it is true and universal. The great distinguishing day of doom kept out of sight, the same sad destiny seems to await all mankind. All are marching to the tomb, and seem to lie down in it as their common place of rest. On this verse UMBREIT makes some of his characteristic remarks: Ein bitterer Anspruch! He calls it: "a bitter or rancorous judgment. Is the wicked man extirpated from the earth by death, so follow him others without number." etc. (p. 171). He would represent Job, in saying this, as governed by a spirit of morose misanthropy. On the contrary, the language of this and the preceding verse may be cited as evidence of what the translator has elsewhere insisted on (see ADDENDA, p. 175), namely, the striking difference between the speeches of Job and those of the others. Impassioned, as his language is, in view of his own severe sufferings, there is, after all, the manifestation of a softer feeling when his revolving thoughts lead him to consider the common lot of humanity. In his second picture of the wicked man's wretchedness, or his afterthought, as we may call it, he alludes to their doom in some great judgment, all unknown and undetermined though it be; and that seems immediately to call up a tenderer language which looks very much like commiseration for the wicked man himself. He, too, lies down in the dust, like all other men. He, too, has some one who loves him, and who will watch mournfully by his grave. O, him, too, will "lightly press the clouds of the valley," as upon the most lovely and innocent among "the dwellers in dust." How different are these tender images from the fierce speech of Zophar, especially as it appears in the terrible picture, with which he concludes, xx. 23-27: "The gleaming weapon piercing through his gall," and his very food mingled with "the Almighty's rain of burning wrath." That is the language of one who seems to love such picturing, and actually to exult in the sinner's doom. He assumes towards Job the attribute of moral superiority; and, good man as he is, he cannot conceal the self-righteous feeling with which he so formally passes sentence at the close:

This is the bad man's portion sent from God—
His lot appointed from the Mighty One.

There is more severity in Job's picture, xxvii. 13-23; but here there certainly seems to be an effusion of tenderness not to be found in the speeches of the others. They are cool, philosophical moralists, except when roused to indignation by Job's refusal to confess. He is the true hero, the mighty wrestler with sin and suffering. His moral sense goes deeper than theirs. He is more conscious of his own sin, of the common depravity, and, therefore, the more likely to lose sight of outward moral differences in the contemplation of the universal suffering. Job comes nearer than they to the spirit of Christ and to the spirit of His language when He says: "Think ye that they were sinners above all the Galileans? I tell you nay; but unless ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish."

<sup>30</sup> Ver. 34. Empty breath. E. V. in vain. There is but the Hebrew word הֶבֶל, or הֶבֶל, vapor, lenis aura, ἀτμός—so often used by Koheleth, though with a slightly differing form, הֶבֶל הֶבֶלִים, "vanity of vanities." Here it denotes worthlessness; but the primary sense of words should be preserved in a translation, if possible, and especially if they are very significant.

<sup>31</sup> Ver. 34. Offence. מַעַל; perverse action or thought against any one. Hence wrongful treatment consisting in continually taking a false view of Job's case, rather than actual falsehood in speech, or in abstract opinion.

CHAPTER XXII.

- 1 Then answered Eliphaz the Temanite and said:¹
- 2 The strong¹ man—can he profit God,
That thereby² he may wisely serve himself?
- 3 Is Shaddai, then, concerned that thou art just,
Or is it gain to Him that thou make pure thy way?

¹ Ver. 2. The strong man. גִּבּוֹר as used in Job is generally emphatic—the strong, powerful, or rich man as distinguished from the common man, or man in general. Here Eliphaz would apply it peculiarly to Job as one who may have thought he was doing God service when he was serving himself, as Satan also charged, i. 9.

² Ver. 2. That thereby. Some take this parenthetically; as DELITZSCH: "No indeed! the intelligent man is profitable to himself." So RENAN: Non; c'est à lui seul que le sage est utile. It is not easy to see what warrant there is for it grammatically, or what demand of the sense makes it necessary. The picture suggested is that of a man who thinks he is serving God, profiting God, when his aim is thereby to profit himself, and who makes a great outcry when stripped, as he fancies, of these his gains. The connection and dependence of the כִּי gives the easy and appropriate sense in harmony with all that Eliphaz says afterwards.

מְעִיבִיל, the prudent man. There seems to be just a touch of irony here: Prudent man as he is in such a calculation of the accruing advantages of outward piety. It may be well rendered adverbially: wisely serve himself.

- 4 For thy religion's<sup>3</sup> sake, will He reprove,
Or go with thee to judgment's reckoning?
- 5 May it not be,<sup>4</sup> thy evil, too, is great?
Thy sins beyond thy numbering?
- 6 May it not be<sup>5</sup> that thou for nought hast held thy brother's pledge?
Or from the naked stripped their covering?
- 7 Or failed to give the weary drink,
Or from the hungry hast withheld thy bread?
- 8 [Hast said]<sup>6</sup> the land is for the strong;
The honorable man, he dwells therein;
- 9 Yea widows empty hast thou sent away,—
The arm hast broken of the fatherless.
- 10 Wherefore, it may be,<sup>7</sup> snares are round thee spread;
And sudden fear alarms;
- 11 Or darkness, that thou can'st not<sup>8</sup> see,
Or water floods that overwhelm thy<sup>9</sup> soul.
- 12 Lo!<sup>10</sup> where Eloah dwells! the heaven sublime!<sup>11</sup> Behold! the crown<sup>12</sup> of stars! how high they are!
- 13 "How doth God know?" 'Tis that thy thought is<sup>13</sup> saying:

—thy fear of God—thy professed religion, as in iv. 6; xv. 4.
<sup>4</sup> Ver. 5. May it not be? See EXCURSUS IV., ADDENDA, pp. 185.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 8. [Hast said]. On these words in brackets, and their propriety as an essential part of a clear translation, see EXC. IV., p. 185; also remarks of Rabbi Tanchum there cited, on a similar case, Lam. iii. 36.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 10. Wherefore, it may be. See EXCURSUS IV., ADDENDA, p. 185. The passage treated as conjectural, or hypothetical, from ver. 5 to ver. 10.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 10. Canst not see. This refers probably to Job's supposed mental state, as one incapable, according to Eliphaz, of discovering his true moral condition.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 11. Thy soul. The translation full here, but in the very spirit of the Hebrew which uses נַפְשְׁךָ, thy soul, for the personal pronoun.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 12. Lo! הִנֵּה, here has evidently the force of an interjection calling attention, and is equivalent to הִנֵּה. It is one of the clearest of the many cases specified by NOLDIUS where it has the sense of ecce. See Gen. xlii. 9; Deut. xl. 30; 1 Kings xv. 23, and scores of other places. It is in such cases rendered לֹא by the Syriac (Lo! behold!) as it gives it in this very place. The LXX. in such cases have ἰδοὺ, and the Vulgate ecce. In the Hebrew itself, in passages precisely parallel in Kings and Chronicles (see examples in NOLDIUS)

הִנֵּה and הִנֵּה are interchanged. So also in the Targum renderings. Its interjectional force appears here by its being put in parallelism with רָאָה behold (ἰδοὺ) in the second clause. It is, moreover, the language of emotion here (of admiration) and therefore exclamatory and broken; literally: Lo Eloah! height of Heaven! as in xl. 8, גִּבְרֵי שָׁמַיִם, heights of Heaven! or O, immeasurable height!

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 12. Heaven sublime. גִּבְרֵי (Gaboah) is in Hebrew the emotional word for height in distinction from the more prosaic terms, and therefore the rendering sublime is chosen, not only to avoid a tautology in English, but as most expressive of the emotional. This appears from its other sense of glory. It is height with wonder (ὕψος). It is strictly a construct noun without any words of assertion, or of place: Ecce, Eloah! Sublimity Caelorum! We must supply connective words.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 12. Behold the crown of stars. Literally the head of the stars (רֶשֶׁת). Rendered in various ways:

DELITZSCH, head; so UMBREIT and others; CONANT, summit; RENAN, le front des étoiles. The crown seemed preferable, as denoting some brilliant star or constellations, nearly overhead, as those three brilliant constellations, the Swan, the Eagle and the Harp, with each a star of the first magnitude, appear almost directly overhead in the early part of the autumnal nights. It was first thought of rendering צֶמֶר, the zenith, or the pole, but the first would be too astronomical, and the latter would be incorrect, for the pole star or stars are not overhead, and would not be selected for their altitude. It is a night scene,—a real scene. They are looking up to the very vertex of the heavens, at the constellations shining down upon them from the immeasurable spaces above. Nothing gives such a conception of altitude, when it is regarded as something emotional in distinction from the mere frigid mathematical estimate of abstract number. How very high they are! It is as when we read the old account of the Flood; not simply that the waters rose fifteen cubits, or more, over certain measurements. That may have come from tradition, or in some other way. There is little or no motion in it. But when the writer says the waters rose, up—צָמַח—כָּאֵן—higher—higher—we feel that it is a spectator who is describing the scene, or that it is all a designed and artful deception. So here; this emotional language: Lo! Eloah! sublimity of heaven! See! the crown of stars! how very high they are! ὅσον ὕψος! The rapt simplicity of the language, its broken, wondering utterances all show that if it is a painting, it is a painting from the life, the vivid representation of a real scene in which the emotion overpowers and checks the language. It is a silent, heartfelt, admiration, like that of the Shepherd in Homer's exquisite night scene, Iliad viii. 559—πάντα δὲ τ' εἶδεται ἄστρον γέγηθε δὲ τε φέρεα ποιμήν—

"When all the stars appear, and the Shepherd rejoices in his soul."

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 13. 'Tis that thy thought is saying. But when had Job said this, or anything like it? It would not be easy to point it out, unless in some way, the language, ix. 8, could be tortured into some fashion of such a meaning namely, that God could not see because He was so high, and could not look through the cloud. Eliphaz, however, seems to pride himself upon the greatness of the other view which he assumes to take, namely, that the higher God is, the more keenly does He see every thing below Him. Compare Ps. cxlii. 5, 6, where God is said to be so high that "He stoops down to see the things even in the heavens,"—the lower heavens—as well as things on earth. DELITZSCH renders אֲחֻרָּא thou thinkest, or thoughtest for which there is the authority of Greek verbs of speaking, and in the same way for thinking or speaking to one's self. But Job no more thought this than said it. He could form as high notions of God's space altitude, as Eliphaz, and he never had the crude notion that God could not see from behind the cloud; but space altitude,

- "Behind the dark araphel" can He judge?
 14 Clouds are a covering, that He cannot see;
 All by Himself<sup>15</sup> on heaven's high dome He walks."
 15 Ah! wilt thou call to mind<sup>16</sup> that way of old,
 Which evil men once trod;
 16 They who were withered<sup>17</sup> up before their time,—
 Their strong foundations melted<sup>18</sup> like a flood,— 17 The men who said to God, "depart from us,
 For what can Shaddai do to them<sup>19</sup>?"
 18 When He it was who filled their house with good,
 That way of evil men, O be it far<sup>20</sup> from me.
 19 The righteous see it and rejoice;
 The guiltless make a byword<sup>21</sup> of their doom:
 20 "Now is our enemy destroyed" (they say);
 "And their abundance hath the fire devoured."
 21 O now make friends<sup>22</sup> with Him, and be at peace;
 For, in so doing, good<sup>23</sup> shall come to thee.
 22 Receive instruction<sup>24</sup> from His mouth;
 And treasure up His words within thy heart.
 23 To Shaddai turn;<sup>25</sup> then shalt thou be restored,
 When from thy tent thou hast put far the wrong.
 24 Then shalt thou lay<sup>26</sup> up gold as dust,— Yea Ophir gold like pebbles of the stream.

or space distance, was but little to him compared with that other idea of the Divine nearness to his soul, which he had somehow lost, and for which he so intensely mourned. We see this in the next chapter, and some of his language, there about "not finding God on the right or on the left," may have been suggested by these very words by which Eliphaz sought to overwhelm him. It mattered little to him how high He might be above the stars. It was a present God for whom he longed, when he said, "O that I knew where I might find Him." Without the feeling of His near grace, the theistic idea, with its highest space conceptions, had as little moral value as the modern scientific deity, so far off in time, and who has done nothing since the first projection of "the nebular fluid" in empty space.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 13. The dark araphel. It was thought best to keep in the translation this grand sounding, and most significant Hebrew word. It denotes the nimbus, the black thunder cloud—caligo nubium.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 14. All by himself he walks. DELITZSCH: He walketh at His pleasure יִהְיֶה. The Hithpael keeps the personal or reflex sense, denoting a course of action. Compare it as applied to man, Ps. xxxix. 7. Eliphaz seems to ascribe to Job the idea which Lucretius gives us of the gods as living by themselves, extra mundum, and taking no part in human affairs. See Luc. I. 57.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 15. Call to mind. תִּשְׁמֹר, rendered observe, keep, etc. So CONANT and DELITZSCH. The other sense, to watch, to take note of, Ps. xvii. 4, seems better adapted to the warning style of Eliphaz.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 16. Melted. יָצַק is used of metals melted, dissolved, and thus poured forth, not of water generally. The rendering above given is not only truer, but more expressive. The reference would seem to be not to the flood, but to the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, fused or melted by the volcanic lightning. This is confirmed, ver. 20, in the mockery or by-word of the righteous: "Their abundance hath the fire consumed." The overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah became a by-word in the Hebrew, as in the phrase, "the overturning of Sodom and Gomorrah," so often repeated by the Prophets. The same language passed into the Koran. See Note Genesis (Lange), pp. 442, 443.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 18. That way of evil men. The second clause is a repetition of Job's language, xli. 16. Eliphaz perhaps means to show that he can say this with more sincerity than Job.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 19. By-word. יָצַק here can hardly have the meaning of sport or derision, though that is its usual sense. We must not, indeed, judge it by our modern more Christianized feeling; but such a rendering would be incongruous to an event represented as long past, such as this ever-memorable catastrophe of Sodom and Gomorrah. The way of speaking of it assumed the warning, but not the taunting or mocking form. See Note 18 and the reference there.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 21. Make friends. תִּקְרַב. The Hiphil form here, we may suppose, is suggested by, and still preserves some of the sense of, the Kal., ver. 1. Make thyself truly profitable—serve Him truly, and not with a view to thy own profit, as is intimated, according to our rendering, in the second clause of ver. 1. UMBREIT well gives it: Zeig dich als treuen Diener ihm.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 21. Good shall come to thee. The term good—the divine blessing, as some render. When a man serves God without thinking of his own profit in so doing, then will he be truly profited. It confirms the view the translator has taken of the second clause of ver. 1.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 22. Instruction. תּוֹרָה. The absence of the article and the general style of the exhortation show that it is precept or instruction generally, and not the Mosaic law, or any fixed code, that is intended.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 23. To Shaddai turn. The exhortation here is also in the words of Zophar, xl. 14, "let not wrong abide," etc.

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 24. Lay up gold. The translator is satisfied that our E. V. is right here, though so many commentators vary from it, even so far as almost to reverse the thought. As CONANT, whose version is clearest and best expresses the sense of them all:

*Cast to the dust the precious ore,
 And the gold of Ophir to the stones of the brooks.*

That is, reject it; count it as dross—of no value. There are some very strong objections to this: 1. Such a contempt

- 25 Then, too, shall Shaddai be thy precious<sup>27</sup> ore, Thy silver from the<sup>28</sup> mine.
26 Then in th' Omnipotent shall be thy joy ;
Yes, to Eloah shalt thou lift thy face.
27 Then shalt thou pray to Him, and He will hear,
And offerings thou hast vowed thou shalt perform.
28 The thing decreed by thee shall firmly stand ;
And over all thy ways the light shall shine.
29 When men look down, then shalt thou say—"aloft!"<sup>29</sup> [Look up], the meek-eyed will HE raise."
30 Yes, even the<sup>30</sup> guilty HE shall save ;
By the pureness of thy hands shall they escape.

of wealth is not after the Old Testament style of speaking. Abraham is commended for his wealth; his great possessions are reckoned up as being a part of his own value. So is it with Job at the commencement and at the end. Sheep and camels are as much dross as the gold with which they are bought. 2. The translation objected to makes a jar in the general movement of the passage. There is nothing in its structure demanding a parenthesis, and the other view, which regards the gold and the silver as a blessing, is but an enlarged specification of the promise, good shall come to thee, ver. 21. It is, too, a part of the restoration or building up promised ver. 23, and so remarkably verified in the end of the book. 3. Job had, at that time, no gold of Ophir, or wealth of any kind, to cast away, and such advice to him in Eliphaz would seem to be a mockery, whilst making it the love of gold would be far-fetched here, even if it had any seeming warrant from the words. 4. עָלֹף never means to cast away, prætere, a sense which Gesenius gives to accommodate it to this one place. It is a very uniform word, meaning to put, place, etc., and when used in such a connection as this has invenit the contrary meaning of depositing. laying up, treasuring up, etc. Geseuius' reference to Ruth iii. 15 has no applicability. The easy rendering there is: "He measured the barley, and put it upon her," as a load. 5. In opposition to the idea of rejecting as worthless stands the evident fact, that the point of the comparison in "dust and pebbles" is not worthlessness of value or quality, but greatness of quantity. The other view (that of E. V.) is perfectly consistent with the context before and after. Eliphaz assures Job that if he repents (the common Arabic sense of שׁוּב = הוּב), he shall be abundantly prospered, and gold may be a part of such prosperity as well as any other kind of property. עָלֹף here may be taken as an imperative with a predictive sense; but it is better to regard it as an infinitive connected with הִבְנֶה ver. 23: "Yes, so built up as to put gold, or lay up gold, as dust." For a passage exactly parallel to the second clause, see 2 Chron. i. 15: ix. 27: "Solomon made silver in Jerusalem as plentiful, פְּאֵלֵי־אֲבָנִים, as the stones." עָלֹף, in the first clause, is comparative from the idea of one thing placed by or right over another, or rather with the sense of over or beyond, like κ comparative, or the Greek ὑπὲρ sometimes. In the second clause, instead of בְּצֹר, KENNICOTT found בְּצֹרֶה in the more ancient editions. But it may make the same sense taken either way, as JONA BEN GAN-NA'AN (Aboul Walid), in his Grammar, p. 34, gives a good many examples of what he styles בֵּית הַתְּכֻנָּה, the beth of exchange, that is, of substitution or comparison—one thing in the place of another, and so performing the office of כ. See the late Frankfort edition (Hebrew) of the Sepher Ha Rikma, p. 34. What follows, ver. 25: The Almighty shall be thy treasure, is in harmony with this, and even made more emphatic by it: "Gold thou shalt have, the richest earthly treasures, but above all, and crowning all, the blessing of God." The view here taken was held by the best of the old commentators cited in POOLE'S Synopsis; it is clearly maintained by ROSENMUELLER, and partially by UMBREIT. It is confirmed by the old Versions, especially the Syriac, which is remarkably clear: "Thou shalt gather (תִּכְנֹשׁ, lay up, treasure up) silver like dust, and gold of Ophir like the sands of the sea."

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 25. Silver from the mine. Literally, silver of toilings—obtained by hard labor, either from the depths of the earth (see xxviii. 3, 9), or from the high mountains (comp. Psalm xciv. 4, תְּנִיפוֹת הָרִים, rendered "strength of the hills," or labors of the hills). It is the radical idea of עָלֹף, to be weary—that which is obtained with great pains.

<sup>29</sup> Ver. 29. Aloft—עָלֹף—עֲלֹף, elevation, or elation in general. It is best taken here interjectionally, like our phrases, upward! onward. So ZÖCKLER very happily: Wenn sie abwärts gehen, so sagst du, "empor!" The exhortation here is something like that which Eliphaz gave, iv. 3, 4, when he speaks of Job's having "strengthened the feeble and lifted up the sinking." So here, Job should use his experience for the raising up of the depressed.

<sup>30</sup> Ver. 30. The guilty. אֵין־נָקִי, literally, the not innocent, a milder expression than the guilty. אֵין is a negative, an apocopated form of אֵין, only occurring elsewhere I Sam. iv. 21, in the proper name Ichabod (אֵין־כְּבוֹד), improperly rendered, sometimes, where is the glory? It is literally no glory, or the glory gone. This particle אֵין, as a negative, becomes quite common in the later Rabbinical Hebrew, as in the frequent phrases, אֵין אֶפְשֶׁר, impossible, אֵין הִכְרֵחַ, non necessarium. See, on this passage, the notes of COXANT and DELITZSCH. The latter regards Eliphaz as predicting what was actually fulfilled in himself and his companions, ch. xlii. 8, when they are delivered from condemnation and punishment on account of Job's superior purity.

CHAPTER XXIII.

- 1 Then answered Job and said :
- 2 Again, to day, my plaint—rebellious<sup>1</sup> still ;
The hand<sup>2</sup> upon me heavier than my moans.
- 3 O that I knew where I might find Him<sup>3</sup>—knew How I might come, even to His judgment seat.
- 4 There would I set my cause before His face ;
There would I fill my mouth with arguments ;
- 5 Would know the words that He would answer me,
And mark what He would say.
- 6 'Gainst me would He set forth His mighty<sup>4</sup> strength ?
Ah, no—not that—but He would look on me.
- 7 A righteous one there pleads<sup>5</sup> with Him ;
And from my Judge shall I be ever free.

GENERAL NOTE. Chap. xxiii. seems to mark an interval, or a new scene, or simply a new day, in the dramatic movement. Ewald thinks the discussion extended over several days. This is very probable. When the friends first came, they sat in silence with the sufferer, "seven days and seven nights,"—a mode of expression denoting a number of days at least. What is there improbable in the supposition that days, with intervening nights, were occupied with the discussion itself. Still less improbable is the thought that there were intervals of silence. It would be in harmony with the ways of the Arabian Consensus, marked by patience, and a deliberate waiting of one party for another, to give time for reply or silent thought. And how appropriate would this be in the case of the suffering, exhausted Job. The pauses of silence in the midst of his speeches are elsewhere alluded to, but more or less of an interval may come between some, or all of them, taken as wholes. This chap. xxiii. with its peculiar commencement, certainly does not look like an immediate reply to the preceding speech of Eliphaz. In the very first words, Job seems absorbed in himself, in his own sad case, and although, in the course of it, there are some things which seem to have been suggested by the previous speaker, yet, in the main, it has very much the character of an outburst of feeling, betraying little consciousness of any antecedent or present outward surroundings. Again—they must have had some time to sleep—the friends, at least, though Job could not sleep for pain (see vii. 4)—and the preceding speech of Eliphaz seems evidently to have been in the evening, or in the night somewhat advanced, when "the crown" of brilliant stars, right over head, presented such an appearance of extraordinary altitude. As shown in the notes to xxii. 12, the language in which that vivid night scene is painted reveals emotion, such as must have been felt by actual spectators. Such words were never used by any one speaking in the daytime. Then, again, there is in the close of the speech of Eliphaz a falling off, as it were, from the former harshness, especially as shown in ver. 5 and onwards. A more soothing tone is adopted, as though, soothed himself by the contemplation of the silent heavens, he meant to calm the mind of Job, by a picture of returning prosperity and new gifts of grace,—thus leaving him to get what rest he could. How the others pass the night we are not told, although they must have been very near him. Thus viewed, the commencing words of ch. xxiii. may be taken in their most literal sense of hodie, to-day, and not as a mere intensive expression for the present moment: "Even now," as DELITZSCH takes it, or "after all our efforts." That makes a fair sense, though the one here given is not only the more literal, but the more impressive. Job has been moaning all the night upon his couch of ashes (see vii. 4), and when morning breaks, the first thing heard from him is that mournful refrain, that wailing complaint of God's estrangement, which makes all their labored advice indifferent to him. It may be noted, too, that the stricter sense of hodie is expressed by היום denoting addition, again, still more, another day of sorrow and reproach. So RENAN:

Encore, une fois ma plainte.

And thus he sends up that cry of the first verse which he had been laboring though unable to repress.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. Rebellious still. The weight of authority is in favor of giving כָּרִיב the sense which would naturally come from כָּרִיב instead of כָּרִיב, although the two forms are allied. In the present passage, too, they would come to very much the same thing. DELITZSCH renders it, biddeth defiance. ZÜCKLER, in a similar way, as also EWALD and UMBREIT. RENAN, appelé révolte. Still it does not necessarily mean rebellion against God, but rather rebellion against all his own efforts to suppress his impassioned grief. It bursts forth in spite of all he can do. And this is in harmony with the second clause: heavier than my groaning.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 1. The hand upon me. It is only a true translation of יָד, and of its possessive suffix of the 1st person, if we take יָד, hand, for the plague sent upon him,—as the weight of authority, old and new, seems to require. Severe affliction is so frequently denoted in Hebrew by the words יָד יְהוָה, the hand of the Lord, that the ellipsis naturally arises, and the word hand alone is used for the whole phrase. See Ps. xxxix. 11, where נָנַע, blow or plague, in the 1st clause, is equivalent to יָד יְהוָה, the attack of thy hand, in the second. It may seem harsh to us, but to the Hebrews it would be more easy and natural than to use hand literally, as DELITZSCH does, for the organ as the instrument for the outward suppression of inward feeling: "my hand lieth heavily on my groaning."

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 3. O, that I knew where I might find him! The Psalmist would have said, find my God, אֱלֹהֵי or אֱלֹהֵי. The absence of such personal expressions in Job's speeches is a peculiar feature of the book. It is an evidence all through, of the great want which made Job's chief affliction—that hiding of God's countenance he so mourns for here. There is something, too, very significant in his apparent avoidance, sometimes, of the Divine name: might find Him. It has occasionally, something of an angry look, as in iii. 20: "Why does He give light to the wretched?" Here, however, there is a deep pathos in it: "O that I might find Him"—Him, my estranged God, whom my soul seeketh, but whom I hardly dare to name.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 6. His mighty strength. The reference does not seem to be to the idea sometimes expressed, that a man could not live if God appeared to him in His majesty. There is meant rather the strength of argument (יָד). Would He "be strict to mark iniquity?" Would He set out the tremendous claims of His law and justice? Something inspires Job to say, Ah no; He would just look at me (לֹב יְהוָה put His heart upon me, as the ellipsis is usually filled up), have regard to me,—see my misery; He would "remember that I am but dust."

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 7. There pleads with him. This is the simplest and most literal rendering of the four Hebrew words of the text. There is no need of putting in any potential or subjunctive signs, such as may, might, could, would,

- 8 Lo, to the East I go; He is not there;
Toward the West, but I perceive Him not.
- 9 To His wondrous working on the North,<sup>6</sup> I look, but look in vain;
In the void South<sup>7</sup> He hides Himself, where nought can I behold.
- 10 But my most secret<sup>8</sup> way, He knows it well;
He's trying me; I shall come forth as<sup>9</sup> gold.
- 11 My foot hath held His steps.
His way have I observed, nor turned aside.
- 12 The precepts of His lips I have not shunned;
More than my own behest, His counsels have I prized.
- 13 But He is ever One;<sup>10</sup> who turneth Him?
And what His soul desires, 'tis that He does.
- 14 The law ordained for me He now performs;
And many a like decree remains with Him.
- 15 Therefore it is I tremble so before Him;
I think of Him, and I am sore afraid.

würde, etc. They may be inferred, if the reader chooses, since, in English, pleads (indicative in form) may be equivalent to may or would plead, if the context demands it; as though it were said, that in the place where a righteous one pleads, (may plead) with Him. It may also be remarked that שׁוֹר is also used impersonally for justice, integrity, as in Psalm cxi. 8, where it is joined with truth; so that it might be rendered: there justice pleads, or is pleading with Him. But such a personification is hardly to be expected in Job. It may be held that the sense usually given is the nearer one, and the Rationalist may, therefore, be content with it; but that does not prevent one from taking a higher and wider idea, if the language fairly suggests it; since Holy Scripture, regarded as given by God whatever may be the method of inspiration, may be rationally treated as having a vast fulness of meaning,—not double senses strictly, or enigmatical, but ascending ideas, or stories of thought, the lower the basis of the higher, according to the spiritual-mindedness of the biblical student. When the clause is rendered in its simplest form: “a righteous One there pleads with Him,” it suggests the thought of the Great Intercessor. It is, too, not altogether foreign to the book. It brings up again that mysterious idea which somehow came into the mind of Job, xvi. 21, born in him, and forced out of him, as it would seem, by his extreme anguish or a sense of his spiritual desolation:

Whilst unto God mine eye is dropping tears,
That His Himself would plead for man with God,
As one of Adam's race doth for his brother plead.

There may be here, also, something of that same “melancholy concit” (as UMBREIT styles it) which Job gets into his crazy head, of “God's standing by him against God” (see Note xvi. 21). This righteous One personates, or is personated by, every other one who thus pleads for man on earth. The more near sense suits here, and may be taken, therefore, as the true exegetical interpretation on which all else must be grounded; but what right has this “higher criticism,” as it calls itself, to shut out that greater idea to which the lower mounds, and which so touchingly appears in the other passage: God only can help us with God. On the rendering plead, see Note xvi. 21. שׁוֹר may refer to circumstance or condition as well as place. See Pss. cxxiii. 17; cxxiii. 3.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 9. On the North. The North is the region of the most brilliant celestial phenomena. It is probably suggested to Job by what Eliphaz had said, the night before, about “the crown of stars.” It is not, however, a view of the vastness of God in space which Job so much desires, as nearness, or a sense of His spiritual presence. See Note xli. 12. בְּעֵשְׂרוֹ there (in his working) must refer to some special manifestations of the Divine creative and supporting power in the constellations that surround the pole; and, therefore, the epithet in the translation is necessary to bring out what in the original speaking had sufficient emphasis without it.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 9. In the void South. Here, too, the epithet is as really belonging to the significance of the language, and as justified by the figure contained in עֵינַי. It is the same as that given by the phrase תָּכַן הַדֶּרֶךְ, the secret chambers of the South, ix. 9. Job points to the Southern region of the heavens which seems to be over Teman. It is because few constellations appear there as seen from the Northern Hemisphere. It is more like void space as compared with the brilliant North. Or there may be some idea of the hidden under-world toward which that region is imagined to be the way. See VING. Georg. i., 242.

Hic vertex nobis semper sublimis; at illum
Sub pedibus Styx atra videt, Manesque profundil.

It is to be lamented that this sublime passage should be marred by two of our best commentators. This is done by UMBREIT, who most unnecessarily goes to an Arabic word, which is really not cognate, to get the sense of covering עֹשֶׂה, common Hebrew verb as it is, and by DELITZSCH, who whilst refuting UMBREIT commits a similar fault in respect to the עֹשֶׂה of the second clause,—giving it the Arabic sense of turning aside, instead of the Hebrew sense of covering, wrapping (Pss. lxxv. 14; civ. 2). Between them they have effaced two plain Hebrew words, and blotted out a most glorious contrast so conspicuously set forth in the celestial appearances themselves.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 10. But my most secret way: רֶךְ עֲבֹדִי.

The word עֲבֹדִי denotes something nearer, more familiar than עָם would have done. See Ps. cxxiii. 4, רֶךְ אֹהֶל עֲבֹדִי.

“for thou art with me.” My way that is nearest to me, most familiar to me, and yet better known to him than it is to myself. The phrase רֶךְ עֲבֹדִי, as used here, may help us to the meaning of that controverted place, ix. 35, עֲבֹדִי כֵן, not so with me, which would seem to give us the opposite idea of disengagement, or being not one's self—out of himself—as there rendered. It is there the wild, confused, odorous at-e, instead of the well-known familiar way of the soul's movements. Hence the same metaphor of disengagement, in so many languages. See Note on ix. 35. But he knows.

This is another example of a sudden rising of hope and confidence following immediately after the expression of great darkness or bewilderment. The thought of being known to God,—of God “looking at him” (ver. 6) though he cannot see his beholder,—this immediately revives his sinking spirits by assuring him of the Divine providence, as well as his own seeing God would have done. It was the skeptical feeling, the dark shadow of a theism, or fatality, coming over his soul that he so distressed him. De profundis clamavit.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 10. As gold. זָהָב, aurum purissimum, the shining gold, by way of contrast, and in reference, probably, to what Eliphaz says of הַכֶּסֶף xxii. 24. The true gold is Job himself—the true “silver from the mine” (xxii. 23) that God is so mysteriously working.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 13. Ever one. תָּכַן הַדֶּרֶךְ: Literally, in one. In one way, it may be; but the best commentators regard it as both essential.

- 16 For thus it is that God makes weak my heart;
It is the Omnipotent amazes me.
17 Not from<sup>1</sup> the darkness am I thus cast down,
Nor yet because thick darkness veils my face.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 17. Not from the darkness. The rendering given of this verse in E. V., and which corresponds to that of UMBREIT and other commentators of repute, makes no intelligible sense. It would represent Job as having this awful dread upon his soul because God had not "cut him off before the darkness" came, and then, with a feeble tautology besides, because He, God, "covered the darkness from his face." It all turns upon the rendering of כִּי (or rather the idea for which כִּי gives the reason), and on preserving the analogy between the כִּפְנֵי of ver. 15, and the כִּפְנֵי of ver. 17. The כִּי gives a protest rather than a reason. It was not the darkness that he dreaded so much, as a thing personal to himself, or the difficulty of understanding his own case, as that awful feeling which came over him when thinking of the confusion, blind disorder, apparently, which seems to prevail in all the affairs of the world, especially human affairs. This protest seems to be in reply to what Eliphaz had said, xxii. 11, about the darkness which covered Job, and which, he intimates, had been brought upon him by his sins:

Or darkness that thou canst not see,
Or water floods that overwhelm thy soul.

See the conclusive reasons for the rendering here adopted, as given by DELITZSCH, EWALD, DILLMAN, and ZÖCKLER. The other rendering: "Because I was not cut off before the darkness, neither hath He covered the darkness from my face," would require a sudden change in the use of כִּפְנֵי, כִּפְנֵי, ver. 17, as compared with כִּפְנֵי of ver. 15, or from the causal sense, "on account of," to the averted sense of "before," besides the wrong rendering of נִצְחָתִי. In the second clause of ver. 17, the כִּי in כִּפְנֵי may have its force on פָּנַי immediately following, as CONANT well remarks, or on the whole clause: not for myself, whose face darkness has covered—or: not on account of the fact that darkness (אֶפְרַח black midnight darkness) hath covered my face. This gives a sense most grand as well as significant. Job had lost the spiritual vision of God. He could not find Him,—could not trace Him in his works or in his providences,—all was dark in respect to himself. But there was still support in the belief that God knew him, looked upon him, ver. 6, knew his way perfectly, ver. 10. Whilst this hope remained, he was not altogether lost. But the other thought of fixed law which is nothing else than arbitrary decree (vers. 13, 14), in other words, a blind fatality, whether called God or nature, which had no regard to human affairs at all, no moral concern for man, this was anguish unalleviated. It was this that weakened, דָּרַךְ, in modern phrase, broke his heart (ver. 16). It was when he thought of this, that "trembling seized all his flesh," xxi. 6. נִצְחָתִי, ver. 17. Not cut off, but reduced to silence, awed, confounded.

CHAPTER XXIV.

- 1 How is it,<sup>1</sup>—times from God are not concealed—
That they who know Him do not see His days?

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. How is it? EWALD, UMBREIT, HEILOSTEDT, SCHLOTTMANN, DELITZSCH, ZÖCKLER—a formidable array of authorities—take this as a direct question: "Why are not times reserved (laid up, appointed) by the Almighty?" In the same way, some of the older commentators cited in POOLE'S Synopsis. The English Version, CARTWRIGHT, LUB. DE DIEU, and others, give it a different turn: Quare quum Deo non sint occulta tempora, nihilominus tamen, etc.: "Why, seeing times," etc., or "why if," etc. The Vulgate makes it a direct declaration: ab Omnipotente non sunt abscondita tempora. The Syriac has it: Why are not the wicked hid from God? as though there had been read רָשָׁעִים, instead of עֲתִידִים. The ἀρεταὶ ἀνδρες of the LXX. looks the same way. The authorities just cited generally take נִצְפָּנִי in its secondary sense of laid up, hence reserved, appointed; though some of them give it the primary meaning; Why are times not hidden from the Almighty? As though Job meant to intimate, querulously, that it were better to think He knew nothing about human affairs than that He let things go on in such darkness and disorder. CONANT adheres here, substantially, to our E. V.: "Why, if times are not hidden, etc." The translator is inclined to go with him. Job is speaking according to the hypothesis of his friends. The question, taken directly according to the usual force of נִצְפָּנִי (which means more than why—rather for what reason, Gr. τί μαθόν), would be a strong affirmation of the certainty of the fact, that times are not reserved by the Almighty—a position which Job would hardly dare to take directly, and which, certainly, he would not address to the others as an admitted truth, or one they would not controvert. There is no difficulty about עֲתִידִים and כִּי. All understand them, the first, as denoting events, according to a frequent Biblical usage, and the second, days of retribution or of divine manifestations. The hypothetical idea is certainly very natural to the context, but what grammatical ground it may be said, is there for it? An answer to this is found in the peculiar nature of the particle נִצְפָּנִי, before adverted to. Another reason arises from the fact, that this particle certainly has an influence upon the second clause, even if we take י, in וִירְעִי, as a mere copulative. "Why are times not reserved, and why do those who know Him not see?" This would make it a negation of both propositions, whereas from the context, or rather from the whole chapter, the thing denied or doubted would rather seem to be the connection between them, or some truth admitted in relation to God which is regarded as inconsistent with another having relation to man. There is, however, no absolute need of supplying any such particles as if or seeing that. The broken style of Job's utterance becomes clear when literally and closely followed. It is simply taking the words as they stand, only throwing the force of כִּי on the second clause, and thus giving the intervening part a parenthetical character. In this way, י becomes inferential, that is, it connects by way of inference, or thoughts rather than words. It may then be thus fairly paraphrased: "How is it?—times are not hidden from God, you say—and yet (י connecting illatively, or one fact with another) those who know Him, or claim to know Him, as you claim to know Him, and to speak for Him, do not see His days of retribution?" כִּי רוֹעַ, how is this? τί μαθόν, as GENESIVS gives its etymology. "Times (events) not hidden from the Almighty:" that this idea is intended by Job in this first verse, appears from the fact of its pervading his argument and all the pictures he draws of had men and their incomprehensible impunity. This is the burden of his complaint: God sees it all, knows it all, yet seems to pay no attention to it (see ver. 12)—does not heed the enormity, lets it go on—"lets the wicked feel confidence" in their impunity (ver. 23), though all the time "His eyes are upon them," and upon their doings. It should, however, never be forgotten that all these strong pictures of Job are by way of protest against the representations of the others. He himself has some dream of a great dies retributionis, according to the best interpretation of xxi. 30, but here he confines himself to their views of the present state of things, maintaining that to all appearance, whether the wicked prosper, or whether they meet with misfortunes (there being no real inconsistency, or such as troubles many

- 2 Yes,<sup>2</sup>—land marks they remove ;
They seize on flocks they pasture as their own.
- 3 The orphan's ass they drive away ;
They take the widow's ox in pledge.
- 4 They turn the needy from their right ;<sup>3</sup>
[At sight of them] the wretched hide themselves.
- 5 Behold them ! Like the desert-roaming ass,
So go they early to their work—their prey ;
The barren wild their bread,<sup>4</sup> their children's food.
- 6 These reap his<sup>5</sup> fodder in the field—
The evil man's—his vintage do they glean.
- 7 Naked they<sup>6</sup> lodge—no rag to hide their shame ;
They have no covering in the cold.
- 8 Wet from the mountain storm,
All shelterless they make the rock their<sup>7</sup> bed.
- 9 The others<sup>8</sup> tear the orphan from the breast ;
Even from the suffering poor they take the pawn.
- 10 Stript of their garments<sup>9</sup> go they forth,
And in their hunger do they bear the sheaf.
- 11 The oil within their<sup>10</sup> walls they press,
And tread their flowing wine vats thirsting<sup>11</sup> still.
- 12 From the city<sup>12</sup> filled with dead, the groans ascend ; commentators, in his presenting both sides), God seems to have nothing to do with it, does not interfere with it, leaves things to take their own course, though seeing it all the while. Job is in a strange state of mind, bordering on a kind of fatalism; but his extreme positions are not so much his own better feeling as they are the ground to which he is driven in showing up the fallacies and one-sidedness of their views. This thought, kept in mind, will furnish a key to much that has seemed dark and contradictory in the chapter.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 2. Yes, landmarks. Here Job enters abruptly upon specifications of events showing the disorders God permits in the world. The whole chapter is a vivid picture of this, although the items are strangely mixed together, as though the passionateness of the speaker carried him out of all method. We have here the wretched vagabond wicked, the rich and powerful wicked, the suffering poor, the bold and dastard criminals, the murderer, the adulterer, the thief, characters of every grade, their prosperity and their misfortunes, the flight of the bad man (ver. 18), whether it be the thief pursued by the popular curse, or the fallen tyrant fleeing from the hootings of the proletaires, his rising again to power (ver. 22), his dying like all other men, the common grave, the worm, the oblivion, all set before us in a few touches that no effort of Dickens or Victor Hugo could rival. In the midst of it comes the brief-sketches scene of the stormed city (ver. 12), the dying groans, the wailing of the departing spirits of the slain, and what runs through all, and affects us more than all, the thought of God above, who sees, yet seemingly "cares for none of these things." This is the polemic aim of the picture as against the friends. Job's darkness has a background of truth, and we need not therefore fear to say, that it is better than their false light.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 6. Reap his fodder. The general sense clear, the particular applications uncertain. DELITZSCH seems to give the best interpretation: "The bad rich man has these vagabond proletaires to cut his fodder, but does not entrust to them the reaping of the better kinds of grain. So also he prudently hesitates to employ them as vintagers, but makes use of their labor to gather the straggling, late ripening grapes." In this and the following verses, the transitions from the one class to the other are very rapid. The most concise way to express it in a translation was to italicise one of the classes.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 11. Thirsting still. Not allowed to drink of it; even as the hungry laborer not allowed to taste the grain he is carrying. Their thirst aggravated by the sight of the wine flowing from the presses which they turn.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 12. The city filled with dead. Literally, the city of the dead. Here comes suddenly a new picture of a city taken by storm. The accents connect כְּתִים closely with עִיר, and if they are to be regarded, the former cannot be the subject of נִאֲקוּ, as EWALD and others render it, whatever may be the meaning of the noun. The vowel pointing, in most copies, is כְּתִים, generally rendered men, which would give the rendering in the one case, men groan, and, in the other, men from the city—a very feeble sense in both cases. DELITZSCH tries to remedy this by rendering it men of war, with a reference to Deuteronomy ii. 34; iii. 6; Judg. xx. 48. But men in those passages are simply so named in distinction from women. In the translations of EWALD, UMREIT, DILMANN, ZÖCKLER, it is rendered Sterbende, the dying, which CONANT also adopts. In this they follow the Syriac, which derived it from the reading כְּתִים instead of כְּתִים.

The English reader will see how slight the difference in the vowel pointing, (") instead of (:), and how easily the change might be made. The Syriac, from an unpointed text, took the reading that seemed most natural. It also appears in some Hebrew codices, and is well defended by DE

ROSSI as presenting the best parallelism to הָלָלִים, the slain or wounded. Those who have adopted the reading כְּתִים, which they render the dying, connect it with נִאֲקוּ, the dying groan, thereby disregarding the accents. These, however, may be observed if we give to כְּתִים its true rendering, which is not the dying, but the dead, past participle: From the city of the dead, so called because of the vast numbers of the dead lying within it—from the city filled with dead. Then there may be given to נִאֲקוּ a general subject, they groan, or it may be taken impersonally, as in the translation

And shriek aloud the<sup>13</sup> spirits of the slain;
But God heeds not the dire<sup>14</sup> enormity.

- 13 They,<sup>15</sup> too,—those enemies of light,
Who take no knowledge of its ways,
Who stay not in its trodden<sup>16</sup> paths;
14 The murderer—at the dawn<sup>17</sup> he rises up,
To slay the poor—the destitute;
By night he plays the thief.
15 The adulterer's eye waits for the twilight shade.
No one, says he, shall see the way I take;
A masking veil<sup>18</sup> he puts upon his face.
16 Through houses in the dark the burglar digs.
In covert<sup>19</sup> do they keep by day,—
All strangers to the light.

given above. The form נַפְשִׁים as distinguished from the more usual נַפְשָׁא, and as having more of an onomatopoeic resemblance to the thing signified, is used especially of the groans of the slain, as in Ezek. xxx. 24. "I will break the arms of Pharaoh and he shall groan the groanings of the slain." This greatly favors, too, the reading of נַפְשִׁים. Here, as in other parts of the Hebrew Scriptures, the authors of the accents, if they belong not rather, in some way, to the Divine originals, have shown their spiritual acuteness. By the connection they have made, נַפְשִׁים stands by itself, as it were; the subject is left to the imagination of the hearer, as something well known, and whose suppression, therefore, is more pathetic than its mention: "they groan." In this position, too, it becomes more strictly the imperfect of description, instead of mere narration: "they are groaning"—groans are continually ascending." All this makes it the more emotional. The force of it may have been given by a look or a gesture, but the strongest expression of it in a translation demands some interjectional word or phrase: hark! how they groan! as though the narrator brought the scene right before him.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 12. The spirits of the slain. נַפְשִׁים may be rendered spirit (or, collectively, spirits) as denoting the going out of the breath or life, or the soul, as DELITZSCH renders it. So UMBREIT: ruft laut die Seele der zum Tod Verwundeten; ZÖCKLER the same way. It need not be relied upon as proof of any peculiar notions about the separate existence of the soul, and yet is in perfect harmony with other ancient descriptions to the same effect. How often does Homer represent the spirits (ψυχαί) of those slain in battle as going out wailing, shrieking, τρίζονσαι, and often predicting the doom of their slayers, according to that very old belief in the vaticinating power of the departing spirit. So Hector's ghost takes its mourning departure to the Unseen World, Iliad xxii. 362.

ψυχῇ δ' ἐκ βελώνων πταμένη Ἀΐδ' ὁδοῦ βεβήκει.
δὲ πάμπαν ἸΟΥΩΣΑ—
Bewailing his sad doom.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 12. Dire enormity. The first feeling in the study of this passage is, that the reading תַּפְלָה, prayer, which the Syriac followed is the right one. It has led UMBREIT and COXAN, with other excellent commentators, so to render it: "God heeds not the prayer." There comes to mind, however, that rule of criticism, sound in the main, that the more rare form is to be preferred, on the rational ground that a change to it from the apparently easier is less likely than the contrary course. The view is strengthened, too, when we look carefully at the idea conveyed by the other form תַּפְלָה, though at first it seems strange. It is an unusual word, and its etymological sense, without salt, ineptum, (see this form Job i. 22; Jer. xxiii. 13; and another from the same root תַּפְלָה Job vi. 6; Lam. ii. 14) strikes us as poor, and unsuitable to so vivid and impressive a context. From this primary sense, how ver. of insultitas, unsaltedness, insipidity, comes that of absurdity, monstrosity, whence it is applied to anything odious and abominable, that which can be reduced to no rule of consistency—abnormal, abhorrent—an anomaly, as DELITZSCH renders it. Hence the term chosen by the translator from a similar etymology, though having more force than the word of DELITZSCH—an enormity (e norma) out of all rule, utterly irrational. The more it is examined, the more it will be seen to give, not only the truer sense lexically, but the more impressive,—the epithet only calling attention to it, without adding to its meaning. It is a monstrous enormity, so considered, a hideous blot on the face of creation; and yet, according to Job's picture, God pays no attention to it. Horrible enough when we think of some sacked town, or castle, in remote Idumea; but how is the feeling of such an enormity increased when we bring to remembrance other scenes of slaughter far surpassing it in modern warfare,—of Borodino, for example, or Sedan; or when we call up other bloody pictures from Ancient History, such as THUCYDIDES' account of the terrible defeat of the Athenians in the land and sea fight at Syracuse (close of Book vii. 70, 71). Some of the language is very much like that of this verse of Job, the mingled wailing and shouting of the combatants: "the cry of the slayers and the slain," ὁ ἀλγύντων τε καὶ ἀδαιμένων, in describing which the dry language is carried up to the Homeric grandeur of language and conception. Another reason for preferring תַּפְלָה is that יִשְׁכִּינ would have been the most natural verb to follow תַּפְלָה (prayer), though יִשִּׁים, with the usual ellipsis, would suit either reading. The VULGATE renders, Et Deus inultum abire non patitur; LXX. Αὐτὸς δὲ διατί τούτων ἐρισκομένην οὐ πενοίχεται, which may suit either reading.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 13. They too. הֵמָּה emphatic. A new class mentioned, but spoken of as well known—those notorious characters.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 13. Trodden paths, well known, נִטְיָבוֹת, in distinction from the more general word דֶּרֶךְ—like Gr. ἀπάτης. Compare also the same word, Job. xxxviii. 20: "paths to its house," that is, the light.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 14. At the dawn. Literally at the light, the first beginning of day-break. There is no contradiction here, as MEXX maintains, of the previous description. They are called enemies of light as much in a moral as in a physical aspect. But even in the latter it is all consistent. The murderer starts at the break of day to surprise and slay the poor as he goes forth to his labor. Or the emphasis, as is most likely, is on קוֹם, denoting not his rising from his bed, but his sudden rising up from his ambush where he has been lying all night, waiting for his victim, whom he surprises at break of day.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 16. In covert do they keep. Literally, they seal themselves up. לָכֹן, by themselves, or giving, as sometimes does, a reflex or hithpahal sense to the verb, though in such cases some call it pleonastic—as לָךְ לָךְ.

- 17 Yes, morning<sup>20</sup> is as death shade to them all ;
For (in it) they discern, each one, the terrors of the dark.
- 18 Light as<sup>21</sup> the bubble on the water's face,
He flees,—accursed his portion on the earth ;—
Nor turns he ever to the vineyard<sup>22</sup> way.
- 19 As drouth and heat bear off the melting<sup>23</sup> snows,
So Sheol those<sup>24</sup> who sin.
- 20 The womb<sup>25</sup> (the mother's heart) forgets him there ;
Whilst on him sweetly feeds<sup>26</sup> the worm.
He comes in memory no more ;
— And broken like a tree Injustice<sup>27</sup> lies.
- 21 Again ; the man who wrongs the barren,<sup>28</sup> childless one,
And to the widow no compassion<sup>29</sup> shows.
- 22 The strong, too, by his might, he bears<sup>30</sup> away ;
He riseth up ; no one is sure of life.

הלך לו, Gen. xii. 1, בַּרַח לֵךְ, Amos vii. 12. This view is now generally adopted, but the old rendering of E. V., TREMELLIIUS and others: "which they have marked (VULGATE, agreed on) for themselves by day," has some claims to consideration. The absence of י gives it very much the appearance of a relative clause, and the verb to seal may easily denote anything put upon the house for recognition. RASCHI tells us that some of their Rabbins explain it of the thieves putting balsam אַפְרֹכְכוּן upon the treasure houses discovered during the day, that they might know them by the smell in the night.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 17. Morning. DELITZSCH would make morning the predicate: "The depth of the night is as the dawn of the morning," but his reasons, drawn from the position of the accents, are not satisfactory. The other idea is the more consistent one: the morning is to them the time of fear. They recognize in it the terrors of the night, or what to other men are such. A change of number again, יָכִיֹר, but to be taken distributively: each one of them, whether murderer, adulterer, or thief.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 18. Light as the bubble. See the same comparison Hosea x. 7, "as the foam upon the waters," swiftly gliding away. It is the thief making his escape when the morning terrors come, as shown by its connection with the previous verse. The simplest and most literal view is the best and clearest. It removes immediately the difficulties which some find, as though Job here was contradicting himself in pointing out something unfavorable to the wicked man. For this reason it has been turned into a prayer, a wish: "light may he be, etc.," but without a single mark in the language to countenance any such idea. It is a part of his picture, even if taken as describing generally the transitoriness of the evil life, and it is at once explained by keeping ever in view the two leading ideas contained in the first verse, namely, events (times) known to God, but no visible signs of retribution coming from His hand. The wicked man's misfortunes are freely mentioned, the popular curse pursuing him, his death, and being carried off to Sheol, his fleeing and keeping out of the way of the vineyards; but these come from social and natural causes, not from any seen hand of God. It is just as the drouth and heat carry off the snow waters. No more appearance of retribution in the one case than in the other. Both classes of events alike confirm his argument.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 18. The way of the vineyards is the open, known, cultivated country, in contrast with the forest, or the desert. See the similar expression: the way to the city, Eccles. x. 15.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 19. Melting snows. This is the best expression the translator could find for מַיִם שֶׁלֵּג, waters of snow; the watery more; unless it refers to the streams that have become swollen from the snows; but the sense of quick carrying off which is in מַלֵּךְ would not so well suit the drying up of full streams. Compare, however, Job vi. 17. For the application of this, see remarks in note above.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 19. Those who. The second clause is an example of the extreme Hebrew conciseness; and yet the English nearly admits of it without sacrificing clearness: So Sheol, who have sinned—a construction barely tolerable, if we regard who as containing the object in the subject (like the relative what), just as in the Hebrew of the above the relative or object is contained in the personal pronoun existing in the form of the verb.

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 20. Feeds the worm. A most striking, yet mournful picture: Dead and gone; forgotten by the maternal heart; but the worm loves him—feeds sweetly on him. Comp. xxi. 33. There is no need of the sense sucks here, although it may be primary in מָצָן (compare מִצָּן), unless it carry the idea of sucking with relish; since the thought of pleasure or sweetness must not be lost from the comparison.

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 21. The barren childless. This was esteemed a more desolate state than that of the widow, even the bereaved or childless widow.

לֹא יֵיטִיב (for יֵטִיב), are sometimes the most positive and aversive in their significance: "Does no good to the widow" as UMBRELL and DELITZSCH render it, is very tame. Not to do good here is to be inhuman and unmerciful. It is not a mere selfish neglect. So בְּלִיעַל (belial) is not unprofitableness (its etymological significance), but utter villainess, and בְּנֵי בְלִיעַל (sons of Belial), the worst of men. So in Greek and Latin. Compare the ἀχρεῖος δοῦλος, the unprofitable servant of the gospel. In like manner, in-imicus is not merely not a friend (non amicus), but a positive enemy; in-mittis, not simply not mild, but most fierce and cruel.

<sup>30</sup> Ver. 22. Bears away. מִשֵּׁן here may have the Arabic sense, very near akin to the Hebrew of seizing, holding fast; Comp. Ps. xxviii. 3, although the common sense of drawing, dragging away, would suit very well. Whether this is a new character that here enters into the picture, or an old one brought up again, cannot be certainly decided. It looks some as though the one described, ver. 18, as pursued by the popular curse, whether robber or tyrant, had recovered power to the dismay of his enemies and of all others. "He rises up again," and they have to escape for their lives.

- 23 God lets them rest<sup>31</sup> in their security ;
But still His eyes are ever on their ways.
- 24 They tower a little while, and straight are gone ;
Brought low like all,<sup>32</sup> like all they're gathered in ;
Even as the topmost ears are severed like the rest.
- 25 Is it not so ? Who then shall prove me false ?
Or bring to nought my words ?

DELITZSCH makes God the subject of כִּשָּׁן: "He (God) preserveth the mighty." But there is not the least warrant for this on the face of the text, nor does he give any authority for the sense of preserving thus taken for the verb. Nowhere has כִּשָּׁן any such meaning. Others, like UMBERT, make אֲפִירִים the subject: Die Starken halten fest an ihrer Kraft.

The singular verb itself is not an insuperable objection to this, although it is not easy, and no such indications appear as justify the collective use of the plural here, or the distributive use of the singular in some other verses. The context, too, is all against it. No intimation is given that the true subject of the verb here is not the same man, whoever he may be, that wronged "the childless barren," and "showed no compassion to the widow." He it is who, after his injustice to the weak, drags down his powerful foes. The conjunction I would be sufficient to warrant such an inference, besides the structure of both verses pointing to a contrast as intended between these two varying classes of his victims, and thus making a completed picture. The verb קִסַּם, too, seems to carry the idea of one who had once been overcome, but now rises up to a greater vengeance.

31 Ver. 23. God lets them rest. Literally: "He grants to them that they may be stayed in confidence." God is doubtless the subject here of יָתַן, but the verse is not to be taken as indicating either favor or disfavor. DELITZSCH's version is so made as to give the first idea: "God giveth him rest, and he is sustained, and His eyes are over all their ways," that is, to preserve and prosper them. In this the e is to be seen the influence of that idea which has so perverted the interpretation of this whole chapter. It is, that Job is solely intent on describing the prosperity of the wicked. But the contrary picture so comes out, in a number of verses, that no forcing can keep it out of sight.

Hence the strangely conflicting efforts at explanation; one class of commentators charging the others with holding untenable positions, until extreme men, like MEX, settle the whole thing, to their own satisfaction, by the most arbitrary changes in the text. Generally Job is not very logical; but in this chapter, he seems never to lose sight of the two leading ideas, before mentioned, with which he sets out in its beginning: Events are not hidden from God, and yet those who profess to know Him do not see his visible days of retribution. Both are maintained here. God lets the wicked go on in their security; but He is not favoring them in so doing. The second clause does not mean looking upon them for preservation, but simply what it says: "His eyes are on their ways;" or as it is said Prov. xv. 3: "beholding the evil and the good." The language here reminds us of that which Paul uses Acts xvii. 30; when he speaks of God as overlooking the times (τοὺς μὲν χρόνους ὑπερὶβλῶν, Job's word עֲתִיבָה, ver. 1), not in the sense of not seeing, or winking at as our translation gives it, but of looking over, or beyond, to the great day when all shall be right; just as the German verb übersehen and our overlook may have both senses according to the context, or to the division of its parts. In interpreting this chapter, the memorable passage xxi. 30, though controverted, is not to be lost sight of. Neither are we to regard Job as denying a thing so undeniable, whether regarded in the light of history or of revelation, as the fact of there being sometimes visible divine retributions upon earth, striking, though rare. But it was this view of their non-visibility, or of their comparative rarity, that was here to be urged against extremely one-sided opponents, and every pious interruption of that argument would have been out of place.

32 Ver. 24. Like all. The force of כָּלֵךְ, "like all," goes through the clause.

CHAPTER XXV.

- 1 Then answered Bildad the Shuhite, and said :
- 2 To Him<sup>1</sup> belongs dominion—yea,<sup>2</sup> and fear.
'Tis He who makes the harmony<sup>3</sup> on high.

1 Ver. 2. To Him. Bildad would overwhelm the impatient Job with a display of God's power and mighty works. He does this in a very grand style. As abstract truth, or regarded as something said about God (see remarks on the interpretation of אֱלֹהִים, xlii. 7, INT. THEISM, p. 85), it is better than Job's passionate expostulation; but the latter, it may be said, is nearer to the great mystery which the untried Bildad has little feeling of, much as he thinks he understands it in theory. RENAN says here: "Bildad, désespérant de vaincre l'impiété obstinée de Job, et pour montrer combien sa prétention d'arriver jusqu'au trône de Dieu est insensée, cesse de le prendre à partie et se borne à exalter d'une manière générale la puissance divine."

2 Ver. 2. Yea, and fear. The conjunction I seems to have the force of the double et in Latin—both fear and dominion—or, dominion and fear, too, as though he meant to terrify the daring Job who talks (xxiii. 3) of coming even to God's throne. Such a view is suggested by פֶּחַךְ, a stronger word than יִרְאָה, religious fear. This denotes dread, terror; and, as thus making a climax, seems like something added to the idea. "With Him is dominion," etc. It reminds us of the doxology to the Lord's Prayer: "Thine is the kingdom, the glory."

3 Ver. 2. The harmony. Heb. שְׁלוֹם, peace, pax, pactum, as though referring to personal beings. Here, however, as spoken of the heavenly bodies, God's hosts or armies, it must mean a physical harmony—something like "the music of the spheres," or rather the higher thought of beauty and order out of which that Pythagorean conception arose. See Ps. xix. 5: "Their line (their vibrating musical string) hath gone out to the ends of the world." VULGATE: Concordiam in sublimitibus enis. It is that idea of law as holding together the universe which all devout minds had long before Newton, although it was unknown in its mathematical

- 3 The number of His armies, who can count?
Or say o'er<sup>4</sup> whom His light doth not arise?
- 4 How then can man be just with God?
Or how can he be clean, of woman born?
- 5 Look to<sup>5</sup> the moon; behold! she pales her;
The stars, to His beholding, are not pure.
- 6 Much less a mortal man—corruption's<sup>6</sup> child—
The son<sup>7</sup> of man—the worm!

terms. It is admirably expressed by SOCRATES in the Gorgias, 508 A, though treated there as an old idea of the wise: "For they say, the sages, that community (κοινωνία), harmony, peace, holds together heaven and earth, and therefore do they call it Kosmos."

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 3. O'er whom—arise. Some would render קִים surpass: God's light surpasses that of the moon and stars. This is undoubtedly the idea, as appears in the verses following, but the more simple and literal rendering clearly expresses it. There is suggested, moreover, the idea of these lesser lights being but reflections from Him, "the Father of Lights," James i. 17. With the first clause of the verse compare Isaiah xl. 26.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 5. Look to the moon: even to the moon. עַד here expresses degree: usque ad, עַד כְּדָר—even to the moon so high. It goes with הִנֵּה in calling attention.

an unpleasant tautology in English may this rendering be used, but as really giving that fuller etymological significance of the word which must have been felt in the original, since רֶפֶה, the generic term for worm, is so called as the supposed product of putrefaction; see Exod. xvi. 24. אֲנוֹשׁ, man individually, poor and wretched, mortalis, Sporós.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 6. The son of man. בֶּן אָדָם, man generically—the human race, humanity. See xvii. 14:

To corruption have I said—my father thou;
My mother and my sister—to the worm.

How the Bible expresses the physical lowliness and the spiritual greatness of man—especially redeemed man united by faith to the Eternal—may be seen from Isaiah xlii. 14, 16: "Fear not thou worm, Jacob; fear thou not; for I am with thee, I strengthen thee; I help thee; I uphold thee by the right hand of my righteousness. Thou art mine."

CHAPTER XXVI.

- 1 Then answered Job and said:
- 2 How hast thou helped the powerless?
Or saved the feeble<sup>1</sup> arm?
- 3 How hast thou counseled the unlearned?
Or truth,<sup>2</sup> in its immensity, made known?
- 4 Of Whom<sup>3</sup> hast thou declaimed?<sup>4</sup>
Whose inspiration is it comes from thee?

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 3. Truth in its immensity. The expression לִרְיָ almost always denotes a vastness beyond count or measure; as Deut. i. 10; x. 22, etc., stars for multitude: Josh. xi. 4; 2 Samuel xiii. 5, etc., sand on the sea shore, etc.; Judg. vi. 5; vii. 12, the innumerable locusts; 1 Kings ix. 27, the countless willows of the valley, and so on in many other places. הַנִּשְׁתַּחֲוֶה here suggests the same idea as in xii. 16, where see note; as also EXCURSUS V, pa. 188.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 4. Of whom. אֵת כִּי. This is rendered by some, with whom, that is, by the aid of whom. It agrees with a sense that is given to אֵת when regarded as a preposition, and harmonizes quite well with the question in the second clause. UMBREIT renders it to whom. So DELITZSCH and others, whom hast thou taught, making it the subject of הִנָּחֵת, as in xxxi. 37. The latter view may be modified by regarding כִּי as the object of the verbal sense in כִּלְיִן, rather than of the verb expressed; and that probably gives the reason of its being accompanied by אֵת, the sign of the object, used when there is something emphatic about it, or requiring to be peculiarly noticed. Or it taken directly with הִנָּחֵת, it may be because the verb, in that case, has a double object (whom dost thou speak words about?) like the Greek ἀλέγειν τινα τι. In many cases where the sense of with is given to אֵת, it simply denotes government, as in the frequent phrase, עָשָׂה חֶסֶד אֶת־פֶּ, did good with (or to) any one. This may be better rendered do one good (show him mercy), exactly like the other Greek phrase, ἐδῶν τινα τι.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 4. Hast thou declaimed. This seemingly free rendering is given to הִנָּחֵת כִּלְיִן because the words, taken together, convey here just that idea. כִּלְיִן is thus used for the more formal speeches (sermones) or speech-making, sententious and showy. The verb in its more primary sense of holding forth (setting before), making a show, contains the same idea. This is increased by the emphasis on כִּי, taken with אֵת: who is it, who is the Being you are making speeches about? The reference is to Bildad's display in respect to the heavenly bodies, as Eliphaz, too, had done xxii. 12. These are patent glories; but the mind of Job is on the dark mysterious side of things, and, therefore, instead of looking up, he looks down, and calls attention, in the opposite direction, to the depths below, left only to the trembling imagination of man, but as visible to God as any of the upper splendor that strikes our eye.

- 5 Where<sup>5</sup> groan the giant<sup>6</sup> shades, Beneath the waters and their habitants,—
6 All bare before Him lies the Underworld,
And deep Abaddon<sup>7</sup> hath no covering.
7 High o'er the Void, He stretcheth out the<sup>8</sup> North;
And over<sup>9</sup> nothing hangs the world<sup>10</sup> in space.
8 He binds the waters in his cloud;
Nor is it rent beneath their weight.
9 He closes<sup>11</sup> firm the presence of His throne,
And o'er it spreads His cloud.
10 A circle<sup>12</sup> marks He on the water's face, Unto the bound where light with darkness blends.
11 Heaven's pillars rock;<sup>13</sup>
They stand aghast at His<sup>14</sup> rebuke.
12 So by His strength<sup>15</sup> He quells<sup>16</sup> the [raging] sea,
And by His wisdom smites its threatening down.
13 By His spirit hath He made the heavens fair;<sup>16</sup>
The serpent swift (on high) His hand hath formed.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 5. Where. This word of place is necessary as connected with the declaration ver. 6. See EXCURSUS VI., pa. 189.

ting is only a secondary sense as used in Kal. Neh. vii. 3; but there it more properly means holding tight the gate after it is shut; the shutting being expressed by another word. The best places to determine its meaning here are 1 Kings vi. 6, where it is used of the building of Solomon's house, and 2 Chron. ix. 18, where, as here, it is connected with the building of a throne. The Piel here is simply intensive of Kal. It never loses its primary sense, and therefore firmly closing, as by a ceiling or a bar, would be better than DELITZSCH's "enshrouding," which makes, moreover, a mere tautology of the second clause. It may be a question whether strengthening or firmly maintaining is not the sense here, rather than shutting. Thus regarded, the verse would be nearly parallel to Ps. xcvi. 2: "Clouds and darkness are round about Him; but Justice and Truth are the establishment of His throne." פְּנֵי כִסֵּה, the face of the throne, would be the אֹהֶל, the vestibule or porch of the throne regarded as a large structure (עַל פְּנֵי הַיְבֵל) as described 1 Kings vi. 3.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 10. A circle. This is simply phenomenal, or optical, rather. It sets forth the visible horizon though it may be taken to represent the earth's remotest limit. DELITZSCH makes too much of it. It has nothing to do with "the conception of the ancients that the earth is surrounded by the ocean, on the other side of which the region of darkness begins." That was an idea of the Mediterranean Greeks and Phœnicians, rather than of the desert-roving or inland Arabians.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 11. Heaven's pillars rock. The word רֹבֵף, Poel of רוּף, occurs only here, but it almost explains itself: yerophaphu. It expresses a rapid, vibratory, oscillating motion,—a quivering, like the Greek ῥομφαλῶν, phonetically similar, but having a different etymology. The "pillars of heaven" are the high mountains that present the optical appearance of holding up the heavens, as Atlas to those who sail on the African Atlantic; whence the Greek fable.

moreover, Ps. cxiv. 5-7: "What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan that thou wast driven back? Ye mountains that ye skipped like rams, ye little hills, like lambs. Tremble thou earth (חָרַל) at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob."

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 12. He quells. EWALD, DELITZSCH, and ZÖCKLER, give רָגַע the opposite sense of rouses up, but the other is certainly more in accordance with the Hebrew usage (see Isaiah li. 15), as well as with the corresponding Arabic verb (to return). So in the second clause, they translate Rahab (רָחַב) as a proper name, and refer it to some supposed monster of the deep. The sense of pride, threatening, rage, or strength (Ps. xc. 10) which the word undoubtedly has, suits well the application to the sea, although, there is no pronoun: Smites down the threatening storm (רָגַע) smites it at one blow). This is the rendering of GESSENIUS, UMBREIT, and CONANT. It is too, in the more perfect harmony with the parallelism, even if we regard Rahab as the sea monster, to render רָגַע as GESSENIUS does. It would carry the idea of this mighty creature sporting in the storm, and struck down by the power that quells it. Comp. Ps. cvi. 9.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 13. The heavens fair. By this rendering, which is that of UMBREIT and CONANT, the parallelism is better maintained than by any other. The transition is now from the stormy sea to the serene heavens. It is first to the heavens generally, or the brilliant nightly sky with its glorious array of constellations, and secondly to one particular constellation (Serpens, or Draco), of excellent interest and beauty. This constellation, from its striking and graceful appearance, is represented as the special work of God's hand, as the whole is of His creating, order-producing spirit (see Gen. i. 2). It is called the swift serpent (fleeing, fugitive) from its appearance of gliding among the stars and twining as it were, around the North pole of the heavens. To one who looks at this very ancient figure, as it now shines in our northern nightly heavens, a very little imagination will call up the appearance that suggested this epithet to Job.

חָרַל, as the Poel of חָרַל, has the generative or parturitive sense from the primary idea of pain, travail, or struggle, and thence transferred to production generally. When applied to God's creative efforts, if we may use the term, it seems to carry the idea of some mighty struggle with opposing forces; not literally, of course, but as indicative of the comparative greatness of the work (see Ps. xc. 2; Dent. xxxii. 18). The other rendering: wounds, pierces the Serpent

(from חָרַל), makes an incongruous image, and drives to some far-fetched supposition like that which DELITZSCH gives, namely, God's piercing the Dragon who swallows up the sun in an eclipse (see also his comment on ch. iii. 5). The supposed parallelism, in that case, between the first and second clauses, would consist in the first mentioned serenity of the heavens, and the restoration of their light on the slaying of the sun-devouring dragon. With all respect, however, for so excellent a commentator as DELITZSCH, the opinion must

- 14 Lo, these, the endings<sup>17</sup> of His ways;
'Tis but a whisper<sup>18</sup> word we hear of Him;
His thunder-power, then, who can comprehend?

be expressed that this is extremely forced, beside being destructive of the exquisite harmony of the passage. It may be said, moreover, that this fable of the swallowing dragon, however it might suit the monster-loving Chinese, or Hindu imagination, is alien to the clear Shemitic mind. There is no proof of its having ever conceived any such thing. There is a difficulty in שפּרה, first clause. It cannot be the Piel

(make fair), it is said, for the want of the Dagesh; but that objection is, by no means, insuperable. The gender also seems in the way, unless, as some think, ה is paragogic. This, however, may be resolved by the idea of an attraction between the verb and רוח, in ברוּחו, which is in fact the more immediate agent; or it may be said to be demanded to make a more perfect parallelism with הוללה ירו in the second clause: if we may not rather regard יר itself as the subject of שפּרה, anticipated, as it were. By taking it, however, as a noun (the heavens are beauty), we get the same general idea, and, as some might think, more vividly expressed. There is some plausibility in the rendering "by his breath (his wind) he makes the heavens serene," as by a clearing up after a storm. This has in its favor its agreement with the previous verse, but it would impair the connection with the second clause. Another idea may be entertained, that by the serpent here is meant the ordinary serpent described by his ever gliding away, and then the parallelism might be said to consist of a contrast between the heavens, the great works of God, and one of the lowest things on earth. The astronomical idea, however, suits best with the spirit of the whole chapter.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 14. The endings of His ways. The reference is to the works of nature, or rather to those of the greatest beauty and magnitude, such as are represented in the latter verses of this chapter. These phenomena, splendid as they are, are but "the ends of his ways,"—the lower ends. The great power stands back of them, or above them. It calls to mind a most impressive formula employed by the Arabian Schoolmen. Our present knowledge, or the knowledge of sense, they called makateu 'lamure (מקאטעי אלאכורי, the ends or off-cuttings of things—sectiones rerum, something, perhaps, like what Paul meant, 1 Cor. xiii. 9, 12, by "knowing in part," ἐκ μέρους). They compared it to the threads which stick out from the lower or wrong side of the tapestry which the great Artificer is weaving above—exitus finales rerum (קצות) comparati cum telis quæ super iugo textorio divinæ voluntatis texuntur (see WILLMET Arab. Lex. 811). Even the brilliant heavens present to us the lower side, the wrong side of the carpet, as it were, in which the figures (the ideas) are dim and confused. How gloriously, then, must they stand out above, or to the mind that sees them from the higher plane!

is that displayed in the great creations, or creative days (referred to in the theophanic Address, xxxviii. 4-12), when the Word went forth like "the seven thunders in the Apocalypse," or the great days of renovation referred to in Ps. cii. 27, and Isaiah lxv. 17: "Behold I create new Heavens, and a new earth." Or it may refer generally to the miraculous in the history of this world, or God's special dealings with it, in distinction from the orderly movements in the common course of things. See EXCURSUS on Ecclesiastes xi. 6, Lange Com. vol. x. p. 150.

CHAPTER XXVII.

- 1 Then Job again took up his chant and said.
- 2 As liveth God who turns<sup>1</sup> away my plea,—
The Almighty One who hath distressed my soul,—
- 3 So long<sup>2</sup> as breath remains to me,
And in my nostrils dwells Eloah's<sup>3</sup> life,—
- 4 These lips of mine shall never say the wrong,
My tongue shall never murmur<sup>4</sup> what is false.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 2. Turns away. E. V. and others, "takes away my right," conveying the idea of an unjust decision. But Job cannot mean this. In the first place, the words will not bear it. They cannot here be carried beyond the idea of turning aside, or putting off. In the second place, the charge of an unjust decision would be inconsistent with the act of swearing by God, which implies that He is the sure support of right, as well as of truth—the ground of confidence. God's people are represented as those who swear by his name, Deut. vi. 13, וְשָׁבַע אֱלֹהֵינוּ, Isai. lxxv. 16, "shall swear by the God of truth and justice," בְּאֱלֹהֵינוּ אֱמֶת, Isai. xlviii. 1; Ps. lxxli. 12: "Let every one rejoice that sweareth by Him." There is, therefore, weight in the remark that RASCHI quotes from Rabbi Joshua, that "Job must have served God from love, because no one swears by the life of the king (בְּחַיֵּי הַמֶּלֶךְ) unless he loves the king."

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 3. So long as. DELITZSCH and ZÜCKLER, with others, take the 3d and 4th verses as a parenthesis, and bring the force of the oath on the 5th. The reasons they give will not hold. SCHLOTTMANN goes with the old expositors, and gives substantially the rendering here adopted, which is that of E. V., LUTHER and CONANT. For כִּי after verbs of swearing, see 1 Sam. xxi. 16; 2 Chron. xviii. 13.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 3. Eloah's life. רִיחַ here evidently denotes something more than נְשָׁמָה in the first clause: The breath of life, in distinction from the mere respiration. Eloah's life, the life that Eloah has given. Comp. Gen. vi. 3, רִיחִי, "my spirit," the spirit or life that I have given man. Comp. Ecclesiastes xii. 7.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 4. Murmur. The Hebrew רָגַל is frequently rendered to meditate; but this is only a secondary sense. The primary idea is that of a low muttering, or murmuring voice, as when one is reading to himself. A contrast of diminution is evidently intended here, and our word murmuring, in its primary sense of a low sound (not that of complaining), is the best our language affords for its expression: shall not speak it—shall not even breathe or murmur such a thing.

- 5 Away<sup>5</sup> the thought; I'll not confess<sup>6</sup> to you;
Nor mine integrity, until my latest breath,<sup>7</sup> renounce.
- 6 My right I hold;<sup>8</sup> I will not let it go;
My heart shall not reproach me<sup>9</sup> while I live.
- 7 Mine enemy; be he the wicked one;
And mine accuser,<sup>10</sup>—he the unjust.
- 8 For what the false<sup>11</sup> man's hope that he should<sup>12</sup> gain,
When once Eloah redemands<sup>13</sup> his soul?
- 9 Will God regard his cry
When trouble comes?

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 5. Away the thought. חֲלִילָהּ Profanum. As used thus, it is a kind of interjection expressing the utmost abhorrence: O profane! O abomination!—procul abest.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 6. My heart shall not reproach me. RENAN: Mon cœur ne me reproche pas un seul de mes jours. So DELITZSCH: My heart reproacheth not any one of my days. This may do if we take כִּי in its prative sense: any one of my days. But the other view which regards the expression as denoting the time how long is easier and saves a difficulty. The reader sympathizes with Job's general vindication of himself; but the assertion that nothing to cause self-reproach had ever occurred in any single day of his life is extravagant and repelling.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 7. Mine accuser. Literally, one who riseth up against me—his adversary in the litigation. This idea is in the Hithpoel כְּתוּבָם, like the Greek Middle participle

ὁ καταδικάζων. It is not an imprecation, nor even a harsh wish, personally, except so far as it affords a vehement way of repelling the charge from himself. It simply means: if he cannot make it out, then he is the wicked man, he the unjust.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 8. The false man. Such a one as they would make Job to be, and such a one as he would truly be, should he make a false confession. GESENIUS gives to חָנֵן the general sense of profane, impious, impure, which is almost the direct contrary of the Arabic حَنِيف. Most of the later commentators follow this. The old rendering hypocrite, however, is almost everywhere used by E. V., and the idea of falsehood of some kind, which the context generally connects with the word, gives it countenance, especially in such a place as this. It furnishes, too, a better ground of agreement with the Arabic sense of devotee, which might easily come from it, or give rise to it, by that reverse association which has great influence in language.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 8. That he should gain. This corresponds to the old versions, to the Syriac especially, and, in general, to the views of the older commentators. The rendering, when He cutteth off, given to the Kal בָּצַע (DELITZSCH, ZUCKER, UMBREIT and others), is presented with great confidence; but there are to it very serious objections. 1. It makes, in fact, an intervening clause, to which, however short, the accents ought to have conformed. 2. It gives one subject (God) to two verbs, in two separate clauses, each beginning, unnecessarily, with the particle כִּי—a thing certainly very unusual, if not unexampled in Hebrew. The rarity of such a construction seems admitted in the fact that DELITZSCH can only cite two cases: Job xx. 19; Neh. iii. 20. But a careful examination of those places shows very essential differences, rendering them quite inapplicable here. In both, the verbs are preterites, and follow each other immediately in the same clause. What is still more important, in each example the first verb is evidently used as adverbially qualitative of the other. Thus xx. 19, רָצַץ עֵינָיו, "he hath crushed, he hath forsaken the poor," he hath cruelly forsaken after crushing, or in crushing. The two make one complex act, the first heightening the effect of the other. The example, Neh. iii. 20, is still more clear. It is a graphic picture of the builders of the walls of Jerusalem, each one earnestly engaged in his separate work: "After him Bazuk, the son of Zabbai, הָרַחֵץ הָהוּא, he was zealous, he strengthened;" that is, he zealously strengthened; as in other cases where one verb is qualitative of another. 3. It would make a feeble repetition, besides changing the figure: "cut off—draw out his soul." 4. It destroys the parallelism, as it breaks the clauses. The other view is very easy and natural, besides most perfectly preserving the parallelism and the harmony of contrasted ideas. It is certain that בָּצַע in

Kal has this sense of gaining, gathering wealth, though coming from the sense of seizing plundering, in a word, of rapine (rapuit); that, too, derived from the still more primary sense of cutting. The pure primary sense, however, is quite rare, and is mainly confined to the Piel, though even there the sense of rapine is predominant. The idea of gaining wealth by violent means is the most common, especially in Kal, and as it appears in the noun בָּצָע, which comes to mean gain acquired in any way. In Job vi. 9, we have the Piel with the sense of carrying or taking away. Had it been Piel here, it would have been more favorable to the view of DELITZSCH; and it is not easy to see why, if such had been the intended meaning, there should have been used another form more commonly associated with the other idea. RASCHI gives the same idea as we have in E. V. He renders it by גָּנַל to plunder (when he hath plundered). This, too, has the primary sense of excision, and gives the same play of words, or rather of ideas, which is one of the elements of the parallelism: the rapine of the wicked man (his evil gain) and his own rapine or carrying off, when death makes a prey of him. DR. CONANT aims at preserving this in his translation, whilst preserving also the old idea. The rendering above given calls up the picture drawn by our Saviour, Luke xii. 20, of the rich man congratulating himself upon his gains at the very time when his soul is required of him, or literally when they demand back his soul (ἀπαρτίζουσιν; "then whose shall those things be," etc. The rendering which this demands for the first כִּי is certainly its most usual and natural one before a future: תִּקְוֶה כִּי יִבְצַע,

"hope that he shall gain," or may gain. In the next clause, where this connection ceases, it has the other and very frequent rendering of when, which is both temporal and causal. There is no difficulty about this. כִּי connects as motive, as reason, or as occasion: that—for or because—when. All these uses come from its original pronominal sense, and are analogous to the two senses of ὅτι in Greek (that and because), and to the closely allied ὅτε (when), all of which flow out of the pronoun like the double sense of quod in Latin (that and because, also quum when, neuter of quod form quid), and the similar double use of that in English.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 8. Re-demand. Great difficulty is found with יִשְׁאֵל, which cannot be made, grammatically, from נָשָׂא, nor from שָׁלַל, whilst the attempt to derive it from שָׁלַח falls to give any suitable sense, unless we borrow it from a similar Arabic verb, as GESENIUS and others do for this occasion. They would thus render it draves out his soul, as from the body it's sheath—a conception having little warrant in the Hebrew psychology, and only a seeming one—as connected with a totally different word—in the Chaldaic of Daniel vii. 15. It, however, the Arabic is to be resorted to, then is there a very strong warrant for SCHNURER's view, which GESENIUS says "is not to be contemned." Regarding it as pure Hebrew in sense and etymology, he would treat it as taking a form prevailing in the corresponding Arabic word. Thus it would be from שָׁאַל, to ask, demand, or יִשְׁאֵל abbreviated for יִשְׁאֵל with a falling out of the weak N, and the vowel of the preformative lengthened by the usual law of compensation. In Arabic the abbreviation comes from

- 10 Is he the man who in the Almighty<sup>14</sup> joys?
Or who at all times on Eloah calls?
- 11 I'll teach you now by God's own hand;
His dealings<sup>15</sup> I will not keep back from you.
- 12 Behold, ye all have seen the<sup>16</sup> sight;
Why then speak ye such utter vanity?
- 13 This is the bad man's dole assigned<sup>17</sup> by God,
The robber's heritage from Shaddai's hand:
- 14 'Tis for the sword his children multiply;
His offspring are not satisfied with bread.
- 15 Those that remain are buried<sup>18</sup> all in death;
His widows<sup>19</sup> do not weep.
- 16 Though silver like the dust he heaps,
And raiment common as the clay<sup>20</sup> provides;
- 17 He may prepare, the just shall put it on;
His treasures shall the innocent divide.
- 18 His house he buildeth like<sup>21</sup> the moth.
Or like the vineyard booth the watcher makes.
- 19 Rich<sup>22</sup> lies he down, never to sleep<sup>23</sup> again;

the trite use of the word. The same reason would have force in the Hebrew, and is, moreover, strengthened by the fact of cases where this weak נ is actually lost in the derivative noun, as in שְׁלֵה for שְׁלֵהָ, 1 Sam. i. 17. Such a rendering, demands or re-demands (ἀναιρεί), would make perfect the parallelism which is felt to exist between this and Luke xii. 20, before cited: τὴν ψυχὴν σου ἀναιροῦν, "they will demand thy soul of thee;" although there, instead of God, the subject is plural—the evil agents whom He permits to carry away the avaricious man's soul. Meax is often very extravagant in his treatment of the text; but here he keeps the usual reading, and is very happy in his rendering, especially of this second clause:

Was hat der Lasterer denn zu hoffen, wenn er raubt,
Und wenn sein Leben durch den Fluch gefordert wird?

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 10. Is he the man? The rendering in the future (E. V.), "will he delight himself?" instead of the indefinite present, mars the force of the passage as descriptive of character. Job contrasts such a man and his probable doings with his own well known religious life. It is not to boast of it, but to repel the idea of his being such an evildoer as their charges would make him. They had no proof of them, and, therefore, they were bound to take his character for piety, so well known throughout the East, as evidence that he could not be guilty of such sins. His life of prayer was opposed to it, especially what is recorded, i. 5, of his continual supplications, and his offering of sacrifice for his children when exposed to temptation in their hours of feasting. "How does this suit the man you have repeatedly described? Will he take delight in the Almighty? Will he be earnest and constant in prayer?"

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 11. His dealings. Literally, "the things that are with the Almighty." His peculiar dealings. The preposition עִם has been several times used to denote some special attribute or way. Comp. xii. 16: "With Him is strength and wisdom;" xv. 9; xxiii. 14: "Many such things are with Him." Job takes high ground here. He not only repels their charges, but assumes the position of their instructor. He has a wider experience than they possess, both of the ways of God and the ways of men. On the consistency of what follows as compared with former speeches of Job, see EXCURSUS III. of the ADDENDA, p. 183.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 12. Ye all have seen the sight. This language, as DELITZSCH well observes, is of the highest importance in the interpretation of the rest of the chapter. You have seen the man, he says, as you have described him, and as I am about to describe him. You profess to be familiar with the case. Am I like him? Does my life, known to you, known to the world, carry those marks of the רָשָׁע that you are fond of setting forth? If not; if ye have no proof of any such thing, what utter falseness and absurdity in the application ye so repeatedly make of it to my case!

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 13. Literally with God, עִם אֱלֹהִים: in the course of His dealings. See Note 15, ver. 11.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 15. Buried in death. Unnecessary trouble has been given by this phrase, as here occurring. BÖTTCHER, quoted by DELITZSCH, regards כָּוֶן here as denoting pestilence, as it seems to do, Jer. xv. 2: xviii. 21; and so DELITZSCH himself takes it, whom ZÖCKLER follows. OLSHAUS N and DE WETTE would draw back the negative from the second clause, or supply it here by way of correction: not buried, that is, left unburied in death. May it not be simply a kind of summing up: They are slain by the sword, by famine, etc., and these miserable remnants that escape such violent ends are all somehow buried in death, whatever may be the manner of it.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 15. His widows. etc. The same Ps. lxxviii. 64. comparisons, not of quality, but of quantity merely.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 18. Like the moth. Not as the moth builds, but frail as the moth—same comparison iv. 19. The watchers' booth. A transient, temporary hut for the watchman of the vineyard. See Isai. i. 8.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 19. Rich lies he down. Not the rich man; for that would seem to denote another character introduced. רִשְׁוֹן is not a new subject, but a descriptive epithet.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 19. Never to sleep again. In order to get the rendering there must be a different pointing אָכַף, making it אָכַף (= יוֹסֵף) instead of אֶכַף, out of which it is difficult to get any meaning. Literally, then, it would be: he lies down, and adds not, that is, never does it again. This is adopted now by the best commentators, and the chief authority for it is the LXX. version: οὐ ποσθίσει, which, in such a case, is good testimony for the supposed ancient vowel reading to which it corresponds, however little its authority, in general as a translation. The far more accurate Syriac translation here has also לוֹכָה וְנֹכַח לֹכָה, and he shall not again arise, being sufficiently variant from the LXX. to show that it was independent of it. Like the images in the next clause, and in the next verse, the whole language denotes his sudden taking off.

- Once opens<sup>24</sup> he the eye, and is no more.
 20 Terrors o'ertake<sup>25</sup> him like a flood;
 A tempest steals him in the night away.
 21 The east wind lifts him up, and he is gone.
 Tornado like,<sup>26</sup> it hurls him from his place.
 22 God sends (his bolt)<sup>27</sup> upon him—spares him not;
 Though gladly from His hand would he escape.
 23 Men clap their hands at him;
 At sight of his abode<sup>28</sup> they hiss in scorn.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 19. Once opens he the eye. One glance, one look, and he is gone. Or as RENAN gives it:

Il s'est endormi opulent; mais c'est pour la dernière-fois!
 Il ouvre les yeux, il n'est plus.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 20. Terrors o'ertake him. The image of a pursuit and capture; "terrors catch him." It is like the Greek idea of the chase of the Furies. Æsch. Eumenides, 130, 140.—

—λάβε, λάβε, λάβε, λάβε—
 *Ἔγειρ', ἔγειρε καὶ σὺ τῆνδ', ἐγὼ δὲ σέ.

Steals him in the night away. Comp. xxxvi. 20.

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 21. Tornado like. The Hebrew word is a very strong one, and the Piel form adds greatly to its intensity. It gets its verbal sense here from the noun שַׁעֲרָה.

Literally, it storms, or hurricanes him. Comp. Dan. xi. 40, and the cognate סער, Isab. iii. 14.

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 22. (His bolt). God is doubtless the subject of the verb שָׁלַח. The near or direct object is unexpressed, because, so easily implied in such a connection, like βέλος in Greek. It is the thunderbolt which Greeks and Latins, as well as the Hebrews, regarded as the peculiar weapon of the supreme Deity. Comp. xxxvi. 32, 33: "His thunder tells of Him."

his place. But the translation of E. V., which is nearly that of EWALD, DELITZSCH, and ZÖCKLER, may give a wrong idea: Hiss him out of his place, as though that were a means of driving him away from his place. But this had been already done by the tempest, and by God's bolt. מִקְוֹחוֹ can, therefore, only denote the position of the hisser. When men come to the place where he once lived, they hiss in scorn. It might be given in English by changing the order: from his place they hiss. This, however, being liable to ambiguity, the translator has adopted the fuller rendering of the VULGATE: et sibilabit super illum intuens locum ejus. The Hebrew is secure from ambiguity by reason of the preposition עִלָּיוֹ

(hiss at him), which translators seem strangely to have neglected. It is not likely that Job meant this as a general description of the wicked man's doom, any more than he intended some, or any, of his seemingly opposite pictures, for universal application. It has the look of being a marked case of sudden and overwhelming downfall, which he had himself known of, and which was probably notorious to the friends, as we may gather from his language, v. 12:

Behold ye all have seen the sight.

It had made a great impression upon all minds as a striking example of both Divine and popular vengeance. Job shows by it that his experience, in such matters, was not limited, and that, after all, there was a substantial agreement in their views, although he denounces their applications to himself as utter vanity, ver. 12.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

- 1 Yes<sup>1</sup>—truly—for the silver there's a vein,
 A place for gold which they refine.
 2 The iron from the dust is brought,
 And copper from the<sup>2</sup> molten ore.
 3 To (nature's) darkness man<sup>3</sup> is setting<sup>4</sup> bounds;
 Unto the end<sup>5</sup> he searcheth<sup>6</sup> every thing,—
 The stones of<sup>7</sup> darkness and the shade of death.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. Yes, truly. A musing pause is to be supposed between this and the abrupt end of the previous chapter. The probable cause of such unexpressed thinking, very rapid it may be, is attempted to be traced in EXCURSUS V., p. 186, which see. The particle כִּי is the connecting confirmation of the passing thought or emotion (taking form) which makes the transition, and with which the speaker breaks silence, as one who had been thinking aloud, as it were, or as though it were something known to those with whom he speaks, or which they would immediately apprehend.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 3. Man. In the Hebrew the verb has only the pronominal subject: He puts an end. Most commentators, however, regard man as the subject, and the context forces to it.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 3. Setting bounds. Literally, puts an end, that is, he throws the dark border farther and farther back, extends the horizon of knowledge. The imagery suggests that of xxvi. 10.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 3. Unto the end. תְּכֵלִית taken adverbially.

The rendering is that of DR. CONANT.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 3. Searcheth. (חֹקֵר), or, is the explorer, taken as a noun. This shows that man is the subject above, as it would not be in harmony with the idea of God. The participle is to be carried all through the verses following, and should be expressed where there is no specifying verb. It is not adding to the translation, but a filling up; whether the singular or the plural number be required.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 3. Stones of darkness, etc. אֲבָנִים taken collectively. The ores hidden in the earth, and conceived as

- 4 Breaks from the settler's<sup>8</sup> view the deep ravine;
And there, forgotten<sup>9</sup> of the foot-worn path,
They let them down<sup>10</sup>,—from men they roam afar.
- 5 Earth's surface (they explore) whence comes forth bread,—
Its lowest depths, where it seems<sup>11</sup> turned to fire; lying near Tzalmaveth or the confines of the underworld (the terra umbrarum).

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 4. Settler's. The word is a modern one, and yet seems to give the idea here. נָזִיר is rendered inhabitant, but it means rather a resident, a dwellor merely, as distinguished from a born native. נָזִיר is rendered stranger pilgrim, one away from home; but in fact the two words are nearly the same. One of them is used to define the other, as in Leviticus xvii. 12, הָגֵר הַנָּזִיר, "the stranger that sojourneth in the midst of you." The idea here, as colored by the context, seems to be that of one dwelling in a remote region, the last inhabitant, in fact, on the very frontier of this wild mining district. If so our word pioneer, or settler would convey just that idea of remoteness required, and the double preposition, מִן, would intensify the meaning (from with, from his society, to the desert wild). From this last border of civilization they go, letting themselves down the precipices, lost to the beaten road, and far away in the trackless solitude. The description, though very abrupt and concise, suggests almost literally the similar language with which Æschylus describes the wild Caucasian region.

Χθονὸς μὲν εἰς τηλοῦρον ἤκομεν πίδον,
Σκύθην ἐς οἶμον ἄβατον εἰς ἐρημίαν.
ὕψηλα κρημνοῖς— —πρὸς πέτρας τῶν ἀπανθρώπων πάγῳ.

"A frontier land—an untrodden desert—high beetling rocks—a craggy region far from human haunts." On the words נָזִיר and נָחַל, and the differing interpretations given to them, see Excursus VIII., pa. 199.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 4. Forgotten of the foot. נָזִיר denotes here a well trodden, well-known way. To this they are lost, if we may take the Niphal participle deponently; but the literal passive is far more poetical. Instead of their having lost their way, or wandered from it, the way itself is personified as having forgotten them. It is in accordance with such expressions as we have, Job vii. 10; Ps. ciii. 16; "the place thereof knoweth it no more."

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 4. They let them down (themselves down), by ropes, or other means from the precipices: דָּלָה—דָּלָה.

On this see Excursus VIII., pa. 199.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 6. Place of sapphires; near this region of fire or affected by it. There may be here, perhaps, some idea of sapphires and other precious stones being the product of fire,—pyritic, pyrogenous; or, in some way, of a fiery formation. See Exc. VIII., pa. 201.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 7. A path. The place where or whither, for all these researches preceding it; or it may be confined to what follows, to the 12th verse. Or it may denote, generally, the scene of every thing narrated or described from the נָחַל, the entering valley, wady, or ravine, ver. 4. Such a view would be conclusive against the idea of its meaning the narrow shaft of a mine. The eagle's glance, the vulture's eye, the wild beast's tread, suggest something more than this. They give the thought of deep and dark places on the earth, difficult of access, indeed, but foreign to the idea of channels sunk under the earth. נָחַל, a word of place, used as נָחַל is used, ver. 4. קָוֹם ver. 6, and אָרָץ, ver. 5, "above."

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 8. Roaring Schachal. There are so many different names for lion in Hebrew, and especially in the book of Job, that it was thought best to transfer this, as has been done also iv. 10. The sense of roaring, which Gesenius gives, is adopted, although founded on slender authority, from the Arabic. Still less satisfactory, however, is the other view, which would regard שָׁחַל as equal to שָׁחַר, with a change of ר into ל, thus making it to mean black lion.

8.—The hardest kind of rock; see Deut. viii. 15; xxxii. 13.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 9. Overturns. On הִפְךָ as here used and as compared with Niphal, ver. 5, see Exc. VIII., pa. 201.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 11. The streams. The word נַחֲלֹת is ever used of the larger kind of streams, and often of the mightiest rivers. It never denotes a mere vein, or trickling flow in the rocks, unless the sense be manufactured for it just to suit the supposed exigency of this place, as Gesenius seems to do. The word alone is sufficient to show that the operations here described, from ver. 4 to 12, cannot be confined to so narrow a place as the artificial shaft of a mine. Though mining explorations do certainly form a chief part, yet the language gives rather the idea of extended wilds, precipices, inaccessible places, where they are carried on. What is said about the birds and the wild beasts shows this. The reference here, then, would rather be to the damming of large streams, so as to leave their channel dry for "prospecting" to use an Americanism. The poetical expression weeping, would have all its force when applied to the percolations from dams, as well as to the ooziings from the rocky veins.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 12. Clear intelligence. Our word understanding is hardly the right one here. It is too vague, and taken in too many different senses. The German Einsicht carries with it too much of the idea of mere sagacity, skill, as

- 13 A mortal knoweth not its price;
Among the living<sup>19</sup> is it never found.
- 14 The Deep<sup>20</sup> saith—"not in me;"
The Sea,—“it dwelleth<sup>21</sup> not with me.”
- 15 For it the treasured<sup>22</sup> gold shall not be given,
Nor massive<sup>23</sup> silver for its price be weighed.
- 16 With Ophir bars it never can be bought;
Nor with the onyx, nor the sapphire gem.
- 17 The glass with gold adorned gives not its price,
Nor its exchange, the rarest jewelry.
- 18 Corals and crystals, name them not;
The wealth of Wisdom far excelleth pearls.

belonging mainly to natural knowledge, or the discernment of natural causalities. The true sense of בְּנִיָּה, here, must correspond to that of חֲכָמָה. Whatever that may be, as absolute truth, בְּנִיָּה is the power of discerning it, the higher vision of the higher truth. ZÖCKLER makes the distinction to be between “wisdom in its practical aspect חֲכָמָה, and its theoretical,” בְּנִיָּה; but that tells us nothing. If the חֲכָמָה here set forth is above us, so is the בְּנִיָּה; though something is gained when we understand that they differ as truth, and the faculty or power of discerning that truth. It is something which man has not in this life, as is most clearly expressed in the next verse. It is, however, an intelligence clear, unmistakable, not admitting the least doubt. The pronoun הֵן here, is simply emphatic; to render it by our demonstrative would overload the sense.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 13. Among the living. Lit.: in the land of the living. This wisdom is unknown to men in this life. No declaration can be clearer, and it is one of the utmost importance in the interpretation of this wonderful chapter. It is confirmed in ver. 21, hidden from the eyes of all living,—of all living in the present state. In the other world, or in Death and Abaddon, as distinguished from “the land of the living,” there first begins to be heard a rumor, a whisper of it. Whatever may be that state of being, it is then that the great secret of God, the great end for which He made the world and man, begins to disclose itself. Something is learned about it after death, which no amount of natural knowledge, or of human science, can give us here; whether it be the science of Bildad, or of Ptolemy, or of Laplace, or of a thousand years hence. Such merely natural knowledge never has, it never will, shed one single ray of light on the great question of questions. The utmost knowledge of the physical world can only give us the how; and even there, in its own natural department, the darkness and the mystery grow faster than any light it sheds. Nature itself is growing darker the more we study it. It presents more unsolved and unsolvable problems now than in the days of Pythagoras. Its study can never give us the διὰ τί, the why, the reason of nature itself. So Natural Theology may discover adaptations, designs term nating in nature, and that without end, but never the design of those designs. And that, perhaps, is the reason why what we call by that name has so little place in the Bible. For we are still in nature. It cannot take us out of it to the wisdom above, or to the world beyond, or to that remoter end to which the physical is only a means, and without which, or in the ignoring of which, it has neither a rational nor a moral value. Nature is but subordinate to a higher supernatural world. Science without this idea is leading us to atheism. It is darkening all minds except those who have, in some way, been taught, as from a higher plane, the solemn lesson conveyed in the close of this chapter, that the fear of God, faith in Him, and in His goodness, whether we can see it in nature or not, is, for man, his highest, and, in a comparative sense, his only wisdom.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 14. The deep saith. The Deep and the sea represent the physical world. They are put for its more unexplored recesses. It is a confirmation of the thought dwelt upon above. There could not be a more express way of saying: this great wisdom of God is not revealed in the physical world. The broad face of nature, its Immediacy, even its unsearchableness, proclaim His glory. His greatness, the existence of something immensely above man, a divine conceivable being (see Ps. xlx. 1; Rom. i. 20), but it reveals not the great secret of moral destinies; it answers not the question: “where shall wisdom be found?”

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 14. It dwelleth not. The second clause goes beyond the first. It has the asserting negative particle אֵין, giving a stronger emphasis to the declaration, and also the more intimate preposition עִנְדָּי—it is not with me—no where with me.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 15. Treasured gold: so rendered from the etymological sense of כְּנֹר, something shut up, kept secure as very precious. The chief difficulty in rendering this splendid passage, arises from the number of names for gold. In respect to the other precious things, absolute correctness is not required to give the impression of great and incomparable value. Unless, however, we can get reliable diversities for these different names for gold, it is difficult to avoid tautologies, with their weakening effect, such as we know could not have been in the original. Gold is mentioned, in some way, four times. In our E. V. it is first simply gold, (ver. 15 כְּנֹר). Next, ver. 16, we have what is rendered

“gold of Ophir,” or aureum pretiosum, as Gesenius very vaguely gives it. Etymologically it would be stamp of Ophir (כֶּתֶם אוֹפִיר, from a verb — כָּתַב, and meaning to mark, cut, etc.). Hence the translator has rendered it bars of Ophir, or Ophir bars, as denoting gold uncoined, too precious for numismatical purposes,—bars with their value marked upon them. In ver. 17 there is a compound expression, זָרָב וְזָכִית, rendered by E. V. gold and crystals, but by most commentators, and more correctly, perhaps, gold and glass. The difficulty with this, however, is two-fold: We have gold again unqualified, which looks like a coming down, and joined with it a substance, which, however rare and precious it may have been in early times, is now very common. If it be gold and glass, it must be some combination of the two, such as awrated glass, or crystalline (glacial) gold, expressing something once esteemed very rare and precious, but now unknown. The translator has here followed PAREAU, who renders it vitrum auratum, or vitrum auro ornatum, and makes a very good argument for the existence and preciousness of such an article. Transparent gold was thought of; but the other rendering appeared less hazardous. In verse 19, we have again the word כֶּתֶם (mark, stamp) as a name for gold, but joined with טָהוֹר the pure, the unmixed.

Hence it was taken as a superlative expression, denoting the very highest degree of purity—gold in its זָכִית, or essence —gold without a particle of alloy of any kind, like the χρυσιον πενταμενον of Rev. iii. 18,—the purest and most precious metallic substance, as a type of the spiritual wealth. For the most elaborate and satisfactory dissertation on the precious things mentioned in this chapter, there is recommended to the reader the work of PAREAU, De Immortalitatis ac Vitæ Futuræ Notitiis ab Antiquissimo Jobi Scriptore adductis. The latter half of the volume (pp. 229-367) is occupied with an exhaustive analysis of this remarkable chapter. According to the view taken, the fourth mention of gold, at the close of the long comparison, ver. 19th, is simply a confession that no conceivable earthly value makes even an approach to the worth of wisdom.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 15. Massive silver. Silver being more common than gold, quantity enters the more into the estimate of its value. The epithet massive, therefore, only gives the emphasis implied in שָׁקָל, the verb of weighing.

- 19 With it the topaz gem of Cush holds no compare
No stamp of purest gold can give its estimate.
- 20 But Wisdom,—whence, then, doth it come?
And where this place of clear intelligence?
- 21 So hidden from the eyes of all that live;
Veiled even to birds<sup>24</sup> (that gaze) from heaven's height?
- 22 Death<sup>25</sup> and Abaddon say:
“A rumor of it hath but reached our ears.”
- 23 God understands its way;
HE knows its place.
- 24 For He to earth's remotest ends looks forth,
And under all the heavens, all beholds.
- 25 'Twas when He gave the wind<sup>26</sup> its weight,
And fixed the waters in their measurement;
- 26 When for the rain He made a<sup>27</sup> law,
A way<sup>28</sup> appointed for the thunder flash;

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 21. Birds (that gaze). They are taken as the symbol of the keenest intelligence, as they actually exhibit the highest perfection of mere sense vision, aided by the vast height to which some of them, especially birds of prey, as before mentioned ver. 7, rise in the air. The words in brackets only give the clearly implied idea. UMBREIT here, under a show of learning, utters a great deal of absurdity: “In the East,” he says, “a deep knowledge and an extraordinary power of divination was ascribed to birds. They were regarded as intrusted with the interpretation of the Divine will. We are only to call to mind the personification of the good spirits of Ormuzd through the birds, as we find it in the Persian religion, or think of Simurg, the primeval king of the birds, who represented the highest wisdom, and who dwelt on the mountain Kaf, or of the bird language as set forth by FERIDEDD in ATTAR, the great mystical poet of the Persians, etc., etc.” This is all rationalistic nonsense, or “the higher criticism” run mad. Such an idea of the birds’ intimacy with the gods, in consequence of their apparent nearness to heaven, (towards which they seem to soar), very probably entered into all old systems of bird divination, whether in the East or in the West; but there is not the least trace of it in the Bible, and it has left no mark on the Shemitic languages, like ἀνέμω (bird omen) in Greek, or auspiciū (aves specio) in Latin. Especially preposterous is this idea of UMBREIT when viewed in relation to a theism so reverentially pure, as to make a plous man like Job actually jealous of the effect of the heavenly bodies. “the sun in its brightness, the moon walking in glory” (xxx. 26), lest it might detract from what is due to “Him who setteth His glory above the heavens.” There is no doubt, too, that im Morgenlande, or in some parts of it, there was a superstitions regard to precious stones. Certain gems were regarded as having magical or divining properties; and UMBREIT might just as well have made the same remark (Man denke nur an) in respect to Job’s use of these in his comparisons of the value of Wisdom. The meaning, too, of the bird comparison is so obvious. The keenest sense vision, Job means to affirm, cannot discover it. What is this but saying that its perception does not belong to the sense world at all, even though sought by the keenest and most microscopic science, but to the sphere of things “unseen and eternal”—that world of supernatural being which “eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, (unless it be an ear that hath passed beyond the bounds of mortality, see ver. 22) nor hath it ever ascended in the heart of man” to conceive.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 22. Death and Abaddon. Compare this with the 2d clause of ver. 13, and also with remarks on that verse in note 19. The language implies a bare whisper in respect to this ineffable wisdom,—a rumor, something said about it, and which first reaches the soul in that land beyond death, whether it be the region of the rest secure in Hades, or of the irrevocably lost in Abaddon, “the bottomless pit,” Rev. ix. 2.

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 25. The wind its weight: The air (as רוּחַ might be rendered) its gravity. The sublimity of Job is only lessened by studied attempts to find in it any of our modern scientific conceptions; but this is evidently selected from other parts of creation, as furnishing a wonder. The lightest of these known substances, or rather one which, to the common mind, was altogether imponderable, has a true weight assigned to it by God. Our Saviour speaks of this popular mysteriousness of the wind, John iii. 8, but He was comparing it with the higher mystery of the Spirit named after it in the necessary analogies of language. As a physical fact, however, the gravity of the wind, or air, needed no formal scientific teaching to bring it under the notice of that contemplative mind which regarded the earth (xxvi. 7) as resting in space, supported only “by the everlasting arms.”

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 26. A law (חֹק) for the rain. Comp. xxxviii. 33; the laws of the heavens, Jerem. xxxiii. 25; the laws of the heavens and the earth; Jerem. xxxi. 35, the laws of the moon and stars חֹקֵי יָרֵחַ וּבִלְכִּים. The “law of the rain” here, according to ZÖCKLER, is simply the determining “when and how often it shall rain, and when it shall cease.” We cannot help regarding this as an inadequate view of the language. Why should not the term be taken in a sense as high and as profound as any we attach to the modern term law of nature, as used by scientific men, or any others? The idea of law in nature is a different thing from a knowledge of the details of that law as they may be expressed in numbers, or in mathematical formulas. Law in nature, as an idea, may be defined to be regulated sequence with a uniform, and uniformly expected, recurrence, and this connected with the thought of a real nexus of causality distinct from the bare fact-conception of antecedence and consequence. The ancient mind had this. The Greek mind had it clear and distinct. Never has it been better defined than by Socrates when he speaks of it as “the harmony, the law, that holds together heaven and earth, and makes the universe a κόσμος instead of ἀκόσμος” (see PLAT. Gorg. 508, A.) The Hebrew mind had it, as represented by David when he said (Ps. cxix. 89, 91): “All things stand according to Thine ordinance,” “Thy word forever fixed in Heaven.” The most important part of the idea, in fact, namely, that of a necessary inherent causality in distinction from the mere fact of sequence, some of our modern savans, and philosophers, have wholly discarded. They pride themselves in knowing a few more of the steps of causal fact, though but an infinitesimal part of the immeasurable road, but this, in fact, has a less intimate connection with the essential idea than the part which they have rejected as unknowable and therefore unreal. On the “Bible Idea of Law in Nature,” see remarks, SPECIAL INTRODUCTION to the First chapter of GENEIUS, LANGE series, Vol. I, page 143. In this passage, there is no reason for doubting that, to a mind so contemplative as that of Job, to say nothing of any guiding inspiration, the thought, though formally undefined, was present in all its inherent power. It was not arbitrary; it was not mere sequence; he knew that there was “a law for the rain” extending to every link in its physical production. As respects the knowledge of the number of those links, he was a few inches behind a modern savan, but to the inherent causation the latter is no nearer,—he may, in fact, be farther from it,—than Job himself.

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 26. A way. Here, too, ZÖCKLER’S conception seems inadequate. He renders דֶּרֶךְ, a way, a path, ein 27 'Twas then HE saw<sup>29</sup>,—declared it [good],

And built it firm,<sup>30</sup> and made its<sup>31</sup> testings sure.

Bahn, which would do very well, were it not for his comment, nämlich durch die Wolken, through the clouds. Poetically this is expressive, and is favored by the context xxxviii. 25, where the whole language is intended to be in the highest degree phenomenal. But here the train of contemplation which is produced by this description of the ineffable Wisdom seems to demand something more than the mere conception of a passage through the clouds. As חָק decree (primarily, mark, line, terminus) may be taken for the inward law or idea, so רָחֵק suggests, not so much the space way, or direction, as the phenomenal order of causalities. In this sense it is yet a way to science. More and more facts, or links, are constantly making themselves known, but they are only additional steps in the way of which Job speaks. This is not ascribing to Job any measure of what would be called science, or philosophy. It is a distinction belonging to the common thinking, to every contemplative mind in all ages. There is another scriptural term for law in nature which goes deeper than all. It is the word בְּרִית (covenant) as applied to nature; as in Jerem. xxxiii. 20, "My covenant of the day and my covenant of the night," the established order of time, of the seasons, of nature's courses. It is God's covenant with His rational beings, that they may trust nature, with its order of sequences established by Him for their moral benefit, or for ends higher than nature itself. It is appealed to as a kind of oath, confirming the constancy of His moral and spiritual purposes by the constancy He has established in the physical world: "If ye can annul My covenant of the day and of the night (see Gen. i. 14, 15; viii. 22; ix. 12-17) then may ye annul my covenant with David": The great promise of the Messiah and of His eternal kingdom, confirmed, as it is, by an oath, having for its pledge the constancy of nature. Here is a higher constancy. Here is an order of things in respect to which the dictum of the naturalist, asserting invariability, holds true. The moral and spiritual system can admit of no breaks, no suspensions or deviations in its eternal laws. For it all lower law was made.

<sup>29</sup> Ver. 27. He saw, רָאָה. There is a Masoretic note indicating another reading with Mappik רָאָה, he saw it, which ZÖCKLER adopts. It would seem a plausible emendation, until we think of the resemblance here suggested to the i. of Genesis, the repeated declaration as made with this same verb without a pronoun, וַיֵּרָא אֱלֹהִים, and God saw, Gen. i. vers. 3, 10, 12, etc., and especially the closing one ver. 31, "And God saw all that He had made, and lo it was good, very good." The word וַיִּסְפָּר here: and He declared it, suggests the same great announcement, and, therefore, the translator has ventured to add the word in brackets. It might, however, be regarded as actually contained in the verb itself, which has the sense of praising, celebrating, as in Ps. xix. 1, where the response to Gen. i. 31 seems sent back: "the heavens are telling (יְסַפְּרוּ) the glory of God"—the greatness and goodness of Him who pronounced them good, His glorious handiwork. The pronoun in וַיִּסְפָּר must refer grammatically to חֹכְמָה, the ineffable Wisdom, but the more immediate reference must be taken as being made to these works of Wisdom, or the creation as its outward phenomenal representative. But the whole chapter is involved in a contradiction, unless a distinction is made between such manifestation of its effects, and the eternal Wisdom itself. Of this it cannot be said, that sie kund, as ZÖCKLER and ÜBEREIT translate, or erschülte sie, as others render it. The phenomenal representation (and so in some sense the thing itself as an ineffable fact) is made known, narrated, reported, but not so can it be said of the Wisdom itself, whose place is here so earnestly inquired after as something hidden from all the living, and of which the afterworld and underworld have barely heard a rumored whisper. Neither can Wisdom here be the Divine architectural skill in the construction of the world. It is not the wisdom shown in the adaptation of natural means to natural ends, such as that which forms the subject of natural science, and even of natural theology. It is not nature, or God's great skill in nature itself, or in utilitarian happiness-producing final causes, as they are called, but the great ineffable reason why nature, why man, why the world at all, was ever made. If it were natural knowledge, then it might be said that men like Newton, Laplace, and Faraday, made some advance in it, though infinitely small in comparison with the vast unknown. If it were any speculation about ideas, and an ideal world, then Pythagoras, and Plato, and Cudworth, might claim some standing there. But every thing of this kind is shut out in the most express terms. It is not a priori knowledge, or any rudiments of such knowledge, through which we may humbly inquire, though to a very feeble extent, how God made the worlds? It is not in nature at all, whether viewed a priori or inductively, and, therefore, through nature can it never be revealed.

The deep saith—not in me;
The sea—it dwelleth not with me.

These are evidently put for nature's most unexplored and inaccessible departments. Although, therefore, we cannot affirm what it is, or go beyond the fact of a mystery, ineffable, yet having a most intimate practical relation to the human moral destiny, yet this may be said, and every one who believes God's Word should fearlessly assert it, that the humblest Christian, the most ignorant man who has in his soul a true reverence for God, and a true hatred of sin, is nearer to this great secret of the Universe, even in the present life, than the proudest philosopher, the proudest man of science, who neither knows nor prizes such a state of soul.

<sup>30</sup> Ver. 27. And built it firm, הִכִּינָה. Here, too, the objective pronoun must be taken as referring to the phenomenal creation, though grammatically related to the Wisdom which it represents, or rather, for which it was made, (τὰ πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ, καὶ ἐν αὐτῷ ἐκτίσθησαν—καὶ τὰ πάντα ἐν αὐτῷ συνέστηκεν, Coloss. i. 16, 17). ZÖCKLER interprets הִכִּינָה, and especially יִסְבְּרָה, above, as an "evolution of the everlasting Wisdom, or an unfolding of its contents before men and other rational beings, the whole creation being nothing else than such an Entfaltung and display of its adaptedness" (Vergesellschaftlichung). But this certainly makes it, after all, only a knowledge of God in nature, or of His ways in nature, and seems to contradict the idea so expressly set forth in other verses of its being utterly unknown to men in the present life. It moreover buries all in nature, and leaves no moral end or moral world wholly above it,—the great heresy, and the source of all the irreligious positions of our modern science. There is found in a few manuscripts the reading הִבְיִנָה, he understood it. It seems strange that it should have been adopted by EWALD, as it makes a barren repetition of what is said in ver. 23, besides being out of place in its relation to what follows. There is, moreover, lost by such a reading, another striking suggestion of the creative account. The supposition that this was known to Job traditionally or otherwise, and that there was some degree of familiarity even with its language, derives strong support from the Divine address xxxviii. 4, 13, where the resemblances are unmistakable. Here הִכִּינָה calls to mind the assertion וַיֵּרָא חָק repeated after every going forth of the Word. Each originates a new movement in the ascending scale of things, and then this formula is used (imperfectly rendered and it was so), as though merely giving the narrator's assurance that it actually took place. Even if we render כֵּן as an adverb, so, it does not lose its participle sense of firmness, establishment, fixedness.—It was so, and it continued so,—became כֵּן, fixed, established,—in other words, became a nature to remain such until suspended as God might see fit, or finally revoked when the great end for which nature was constituted, or the great Wisdom of God might, perhaps, dispense with nature altogether. So here the same root is used: הִכִּינָה, He fixed it—built it firm. The language loses none of its strength or sublimity by being thus anthropopathically rendered. He made it to stand till its end was answered.

<sup>31</sup> Ver. 27. Its testings. We certainly cannot render חָק here, as we would when used of man, as in ver. 3, or as E. V. has given it, and many others: He searched it out. It would not be applicable either to the creation, as the work, nor to the Wisdom as the pattern, unless taken anthropopathically, not in the sense of discovering the unknown, but of testing the work, or the model, when made. There is something of this kind of representation in the creation account itself. It is an emphatic mode of conveying to the finite mind a sense of its excellence and perfection. God appoints the heavenly bodies as denoters, among other things, of times and seasons. He is represented as trying them, putting them in the heavens for that purpose. What right-feeling and right-thinking mind would lose the sublimity of all this for any assurance of scientific accuracy, which, after all, is no accuracy, for science is never finished. Again, God looks at the whole, as the maker would survey his machine

- 28 But<sup>22</sup> unto man He saith :
 ["Thy] wisdom ; Lo, it is to fear the Lord ;
 To fly from evil, (thine) intelligence."

after he has set it in motion, and pronounces it admirable, שׁוֹכֵן כָּאֵל, καλὰ λίαν, valde bona—good—VERY GOOD. We would not think of charging PLATO with anthropopathism, when in a similar way he represents (Timæus 37, c) the great ζωον, with its animal life, or plastic nature, as the subject of admiration to the "Generating Father," Πατὴρ ἀγεννής, when he sees it move on in all its harmony and perfection. So God is said here to test, or try, the world He had made, to see if it answered that great supra-mundane end which is here called Wisdom, transcending all PLATO'S ideas as much as it transcends our limited inductive science.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 28. Unto man. Some would render אֲדָמָה of man: So PAREAU, de homine, concerning man. The direct address, however, is the more common for the preposition ל. The other may be regarded as implied, and either view would justify the possessive pronoun placed in brackets. It is a special Wisdom for man, leading, at some time, to some glimpse of the great Wisdom. The distinction is demanded by the whole spirit of the chapter

CHAPTER XXIX.

- 1 Then again<sup>1</sup> Job lifted up his chant and said :
- 2 O that it were with me as in the moons of old ;
 As in the days when o'er me still Eloah watched ;
- 3 When shone His<sup>2</sup> lamp above my head,
 And when through darkness by His light I walked ;
- 4 As in my autumn days ;
 When God's near presence<sup>3</sup> in my tent abode ;
- 5 Whilst still the Almighty was my<sup>4</sup> stay ;
 Around me still my children<sup>5</sup> in their youth ,
- 6 When with the flowing<sup>6</sup> milk my feet I bathed ;
 And streams of oil the rock poured forth for me.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. Then again, וְעַתָּה. It certainly seems to indicate a pause of some kind; being said, not after the words of another, but in the course of Job's own speaking. It may have been a waiting for the friends to resume their argument. There is, however, no contradiction between the close of the xxviii., and the opening of the xxix. The under-current of thought can be easily traced, and yet the difference in style between this and the resumption demands the idea of some intervening silence, aside from this expression in the caption. In the xxviii. Job's thought of God's ineffable wisdom came from the contemplation of his own mysterious sufferings, bringing him to the grand conclusion that it is man's wisdom to believe and adore where he cannot understand. This high train of thought carries him, for a season, out of and above himself. Such a pitch, however, cannot be sustained, and so he comes down again to his own sorrows, his ever smarting pains, and that leads to the contemplation of former happiness which that same unsearchable wisdom had so bountifully conferred upon him. This is far from being an unnatural transition, although it is emotional rather than logical. It may be said, too, that the ascent, if we may call it such, is all the more pathetic as thus succeeding a meditation so glorious and profound.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 3. When shone his lamp. Lit.: In its shining of his lamp. The first suffix pronoun does not refer to God, as though the verb had a Hiphil sense: in His making to shine. Neither is it to be taken as DELITZSCH renders it: "when He, when His lamp shone, etc." It is the pleonastic use of the pronoun so common in Syriac, and if it were of much importance this might be called one of the Aramaisms of the book.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 4. Near presence. קִרְבָּנִי, concessus, familiar intercourse. See Ps. lv. 15; Job xix. 19. קִרְבָּנִי, God's favor. The rendering of our translators, the secret of God is very happy, giving the idea of a heart intercourse unknown to others.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 5. My stay. Lit.: With me. But עֲמָי always seems to have something more than its preposition sense.

It denotes not only a very intimate communion, or a connection nearer and stronger than עִמִּי, but also the idea of constancy (see its use ver. 20 and Note) firmness, support, as the context generally shows. So Ps. xxiii. 4, כִּי אֵלֶיךָ עֲמָי, "for Thou art with me, Thy rod and Thy staff they sustain me." It suggests the idea of the verb עָמַד to stand, as though עֲמָי meant my stand by. This is not without ground etymologically, although lexicographers regard it as only a strengthening of עִמִּי by insertion of י euphonic, a thing, however, which has no other example in Hebrew.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 5. My children in their youth. בְּנֵי עֲמָי means simply a youth, either a boy or a young man, as in ver. 8. Some would render it here, my servants, because it is sometimes so used like puer, or pais, but that would destroy all the pathos. Still, it rendered my children, it needs the qualifying words. Job's children seem to have come to manhood at the time of his great bereavement, but he remembers them best in their tender age, when their presence was pure joy, or less mingled with anxiety, such as increased with their approach to adult manhood. The anticipated trouble to which he seems to allude, iii. 25, 26, had probably some connection with the fears that grew out of their older state, and which led to those touching acts of prayer and sacrifice mentioned, l. 5.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 6. The flowing milk. The epithet is needed here to give the proper emphasis, and, thereby, bring out the fair meaning which might, otherwise, be mistaken. This emphasis is on the words milk and oil, as both, from their smooth-flowing nature, suggestive of exuberance. It is not a mere effeminate luxury that Job has in mind. It is true that in the case of a rich man of old, possessed of vast flocks and herds, such a luxury as actually lathering the feet in milk would be neither incredible nor improbable. In the case of Job, however, we must take it as a hyperbolic expression figurative of great abundance, and not only that, but as something peculiar to him beyond others. This latter em-

- 7 When up the city's way, forth' from my gate, I went,
And in the place of concourse fixed my seat;
8 The young men saw me, and retired;
The elders rose—stood up.
9 The leaders checked their words;
And laid their hands upon their mouths.
10 The men of note, their voice was<sup>8</sup> hushed;
Their tongue suspended to the palate clave.
11 Then, too, there was an ear that heard<sup>9</sup> and blessed,
An eye that saw and testified,
12 That<sup>10</sup> I had saved the poor man when he cried,
The fatherless, the one who had no friend.
13 Thus on me came<sup>11</sup> the blessing of the lost;
The widow's heart I made to sing for joy.
14 I put<sup>12</sup> on justice,—it became my robe—
As mantle<sup>13</sup> and as diadem, my right.
15 Eyes to the blind was I—Feet to the lame.

phasis is given by the strong preposition עַל, which denotes something more than mere adjacency, as some take it, the rock, "near Job," or "in his neighborhood." It has a close personal sense: with me in distinction from others,—in my case, as something peculiar, or beyond the case of men generally. And this puts a still stronger emphasis on the substances mentioned. It was milk, in distinction from other fluids, in which the feet might be laved; or as though he intended to say, it was oil instead of water, the usual product of the rocky fountain, that the rock poured forth. Nature gave to Job her richest abundance. So UMBREIT seems to take it: Statt Wasser strömte der Fels Oel. See the same hyperbole Deut. xxxii. 13. עַל occurs only in this place.

It is rendered steps by some, feet by others. UMBREIT admits that the feet are here intended, even though the rendering be steps or goings. And indeed the other makes a most extravagant idea—a walking or wading in milk. It is rather strange that this whole verse is omitted in the Syriac.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 7. Forth from my gate. Does שַׁעַר here mean the gate of Job's dwelling or the gate of the city? It would seem that such places as Gen. xxxiv. 24, and Job xxi. 34, ought to settle it. They can only mean the gate or door to the place of departure, or of one's abode. DELITZSCH, however, rejects it on the ground that "the place where Job dwelt in the country is to be thought of as without a gate." But private dwellings in the country may have had gates to protect them against marauding banditti, and this would be especially necessary in the case of a man of great wealth, like Job. The preposition עַל may be rendered simply to, but its etymology suggests the idea of ascend, up to. It may mean position merely, by the city; but that requires the supposition that שַׁעַר is the city gate. The other is the more natural from the fact that a city, with its acropolis, was anciently built on the higher ground, as making, in that way, a better place of defence for its inhabitants, as well as for persons coming into it from without, and who, in time of peace, dwelt in the plain below.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 10. Was hushed. Heb. hidden, that is, suppressed. For the plural form see ZÖCKLER. Vers. 8, 9 and 10 present a very concise yet most graphic picture of the effect produced by the sudden entrance into an assembly of one held in great and universal respect. Its simplicity, its air of truthfulness, and the pathos of its connection with his then state of extreme suffering, divest it of every appearance of vanity and boasting. The language gives the idea of one not in office, but living a most honorable private life. Job would have been called by the Greeks one of the καλοκάγαθοι, the good men and fair, the good men and true, who held no public station, but still, on that very account, possessed more true influence than the professional politician.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 11. And blessed. UMBREIT ruhmt mich, made good report of me. This is very touching. In such assemblies there was not only the honor paid to him by the orators, and the leading men, but here and there some poor man's ear arrested by his voice, some eye that testified to acts of beneficence of which public fame made no report.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 12. That I had saved. To render כִּי for or because, in this place, as most commentators do, seems greatly to mar the effect of the passage. It makes it a reason, and a somewhat boasting one, asserted by Job, instead of a testimony to the fact: That I had saved, etc. The latter view is not only in harmony with the more usual sense of כִּי as a connective (quod, ὅτι — that instead of because, see Note 12, ver. 8, ch. xxvii., pa. 113), but seems also demanded by the future following and denoting a subjective succession of event, or idea, dependent on a preceding governing word, such as יִתְעַדֵּן in this case. Thus Jerome in the VULGATE renders it eo quod, as dependent on testimonium reddebat. If כִּי denotes a reason independently, it is not easy to see why it should not have been followed by the präterite, or why אֲמַלֵּט, as it stands, should not be rendered in the future.

It may be said that the exigentia loci demands the other sense, but if the view taken of כִּי be correct, then the saving is a dependent idea, and the word takes properly the Future, that is, the Subjunctive form. If it is an independent assertion, it is impossible to distinguish it from לְבַשְׁתִּי, ver. 14, below. כִּי has no converse power except as it connects, not as a reason, but as an assertion of dependence on a preceding verb whose sense is incomplete without it.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 13. On me came. The Future form of the verb יָבִיאוּ, is because of the train of thought being still under the influence of the recital, ver. 11. Though it may be regarded as grammatically independent of the כִּי, it still keeps the direction thereby given to it. So is it in respect to the 2d clause (אָרְוֵנוּ). It is all a part of that which made "the ear to bless and the eye to testify."

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 14. I put on. Here begins an entirely independent clause, and the assertion having no connection, either logical or grammatical, with what precedes, takes the preterite form לְבַשְׁתִּי. There is no tautology in the clause. The latter verb יִלְבֹּשֵׁנִי simply explains the figurative sense by the literal: yes, it did really clothe me—It became my habit—as the figure has become naturalized in English—habitual to me.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 14. Mantle and diadem. These are not mentioned as ornaments, but as expressing the completeness of the clothing: From head to foot attired in righteousness.

- 16 A father to the poor;
The cause I knew<sup>14</sup> not, I would search<sup>15</sup> it out.
- 17 So would I break the fangs of evil<sup>16</sup> men,
And from their very teeth would dash the prey.
- 18 Then said I, "in my nest shall I expire,
And like the palm tree<sup>17</sup> multiply my days;
- 19 My root laid open to the water's breath,
And all night long the dew upon my branch;
- 20 My glory constant<sup>18</sup> with me—still renewed,
And in my hand my bow forever<sup>19</sup> green."
- 21 To me men listened—waited eagerly;
Were silent at my counseling.
- 22 After my word, they answered<sup>20</sup> not again;
For on them would my speech be dropping still.
- 23 Yes, they would wait as men do wait for<sup>21</sup> rain,
And open wide their mouths, as for the latter rain.
- 24 That I should mock<sup>22</sup> them they would not believe,
Nor make to fall the brightness of my face.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 16. Cause I knew not. Some would render it, "the cause of one I knew not." It requires too great an ellipsis, a double ellipsis in fact, [וְ] לֹא יָדַעְתִּי רִיב (אִישׁ) לֹא יָדַעְתִּי רִיב. The rendering given implies the same and more. In the one case it would simply denote impartiality; the other and more literal rendering gives, in addition, that of carefulness to obtain a full knowledge of the case in order to be impartial.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 16. I would search it out. אֲחַקְרֶהוּ is the subjective future denoting disposition, and, in that way, habitual or repeated action, such as we denote by our auxiliary would (from will) which never loses its subjectively future idea: "I would do so and so;" it was my way. This is carried into the next verb at the beginning of the next verse, וְאֲשַׁרְהוּ; its ו, whether we call it conversive or not, giving it the exact time force of אֲחַקְרֶהוּ immediately preceding.

The paragogic ending, however, gives it an optative as well as a subjunctive sense: "I would desire to break:" "I took pleasure in breaking the fangs of evil men."

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 18. Like the palm tree. On the three interpretations of חוֹל, in this verse, see EXCURSUS IX. pa. 206.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 20. With me. עִמִּי. This seems to be a favorite preposition in Job's speeches. It is stronger than עִמִּי would have been: My glory, in distinction from that of others. It gives also the idea of permanence.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 20. Ever green. תַּחֲלִי, regerminates. It is the same word that is used of the tree, xiv. 7. See Ps. cii. 27; Isai. ix. 9; xl. 31; in Kal Ps. xc. 5, 6. The bow the emblem of vigor, strength, power. See Gen. xlix. 24.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 22. They answered not again. The reason is given in the 2d clause, commonly rendered, and my speech dropped upon them. To regard ו, however, at the beginning of this second clause, as merely copulative, and thus denoting a subsequent speaking, would be an absurdity. By taking it as illative, that is, as connecting by way of giving a reason, we understand why they answered not. It was on account of the gentle and persuasive manner of his speech disinclining them to make reply. And this suggests another idea closely akin to it, and well deserving of notice as favored by the peculiar sense of נָטַף, "distillation, gentle and repeated dropping, as of dew or rain." It may be taken as describing what may be called the musical effect of his words, the charm they possessed, as though still sounding on, or distilling in the souls of the hearers. UMBRETT gives a similar idea when he represents it as a spiritual influence: Meine Rede in ihrer Einwirkung auf die Herzen der Zuhörer war zu vergleichen mit dem auf den Erdboden träufelnden Regen. This is in harmony too with the tense form of נָטַף, the subjective future, expressive of repeated influence, regarded as in the mind. The voice that charmed the soul seems still to prolong its tones, producing music in the soul, and there is a reluctance to destroy this effect by speaking again after its outward utterance had ceased. In this respect it suggests the striking passage Phædo 84, B. When Socrates closes his great argument on the Immortality of the soul as drawn from Ideas, the charm of his words still fills the ear, keeping them from speaking for some time, whilst each of the auditors is reluctant to break the silence. A similar effect is most poetically described in the Odyssey XI. 333, where Ulysses ends the long narrative of his wanderings, terminating with what he saw in Hades:

ὧς ἔφαθ' οἱ δ' ἄρα πάντες ἄκην ἐγένοντο σιωπῇ, καλῆθ' ὃ δ' ἔσχεοντο κατὰ μέγαρα σκιάεντα:
He ceased to speak, and all, in silence hushed,
Were held as by a rapture sounding on Amid the shadowy halls.

Κηληθμός, a soothing strain prolonged, still vibrating, undulating, throbbing. So נָטַף carries a similar idea of dropping, distilling.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 23. For rain. An instance of subtle emotional transition. This mention of the rain is suggested by הָטַח in the preceding verse, or rather, the spiritual metaphor contained in it.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 24. That I should mock them. See how the word שָׂחַ is used xii. 4, in the sense of mocking or scornful. There is no reason why it should not be so translated here. The rendering smile, in the sense of favor, pity, as DELITZSCH and some others would give it, has no example in the Scripture. שָׂחַ is used with אֶל or ל, and with עָלַי. The two first denote laughing at, in the sense of sport or mockery, the third carries the stronger idea of laughing against, that is, of scorn, or derision. There are only two places where it even seemingly varies from this. In Job v. 22, it might seem capable of the rendering smile, but it is the smile of contempt ("at destruction and at famine shalt thou laugh" or smile) not of favor or pity. So Pr. v. xxxi. 25, "she rejoices" (E. V.) "she laughs (CONANT) at the time to come." If rendered smile there, it is the smile of fearlessness. The stronger word laugh is according to the usage of the ancient world generally. They expressed all emotions of the kind, whether of grief or joy, by words and actions of a more violent nature than we exhibit. The sense of smiling for fa-

- 25 'Twas thus their way I chose,<sup>23</sup> and sat their head.
As king amidst the multitude<sup>24</sup> I dwelt,— Among the mourners as a comforter.

vor, however, having no example whatever in Scripture, there is no need of dwelling on the rendering some give to לֹא יֵאֱמָנוּ, in order to accommodate it to such a view. It is a mode of exegesis consisting simply in that easy resort of turning a clause from the apodosis to the protasis of a sentence, by supposing an ellipsis of the relative, which will only do when the context most clearly demands it. According to this DELITZSCH and ZÖCKLER would give the general idea to be: He smiles upon (favors, pities) the despairing—or "He smiles upon them in their hopelessness;" as though it were an ellipsis for אֲשֶׁר לֹא יֵאֱמָנוּ. This, however, even if it could be tolerated by itself, only makes the next clause all the more difficult and unmeaning. See the efforts of DELITZSCH and others to make any sense out of it. The substance of it as given by EWALD, ZÖCKLER, and DELITZSCH is, that they did not make him cease to smile by their hopelessness. One can hardly look at the structure of the verse, however, without seeing that a strong contrast is intended which this treatment fails to give. The virtue which Job here claims for himself is that of gravity or dignity. Equally opposed to this, as they are to each other, is levity, whether in the form of frivolity, mockery, or derision, on the one side, or of petulance, moroseness, or anger, on the other. The meaning of the expression in the second clause would seem to be determined by Gen. iv. 5: In Kal, to be angry, as Cain was וַיִּפְּלוּ בָנָיו, and his countenance fell; consequently, in Hiphil, to make angry, or to act angrily, as in Jerem. iii. 12, or to make sad, gloomy, morose. Men would not believe that Job could indulge in mockery or vain laughter; neither could they ever make him angry, or disturb the gravity of his countenance;—ever the same even, cheerful, dignified, God-fearing man.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 25. Their way I chose, guided, directed, them in their way of life. Sat as head: as judge or arbiter among them; as in ver. 16.

וַיִּרְךְ is used oftentimes of warlike bands, but to give it a military sense here, so as to make Job captain of a troop, or to render it as RENAN does,—

Je trônais comme un roi entouré de sa garde—is not only preposterous in itself, but destroys one of the most touching contrasts in the chapter. Though וַיִּרְךְ is mostly used in a bad sense for a troop of banditti, or marauders (Mos. vii. 1; 1 Kings xi. 24; Gen. xlix. 11), yet there is nothing in the way of its meaning any large crowd or body of men, especially of a turbulent character. (UMBREIT, in dem Haufen.) It would be the best Hebrew word to be found to designate a mob, whom the presence of such a man as Job would overawe by his very force of character. The expression as a king (כִּמְלִיךָ), or, as though a king, is conclusive against the idea some have entertained that Job was in reality some kind of monarch or duke. He was that far higher thing, a holy, God-fearing man, known to be most just, whose very appearance struck with reverence and respect even a godless multitude, and made him, for a season, like a king among them. It is a picture that reminds us of one of Virgil's best comparisons: Æn. I. 148.

Ac veluti magno in populo cum sepe coorta est

Seditio, sævitque animis ignobile vulgus;

Tum, pietate gravem ac meritis si forte virum quem

Conspexere, silent, arrectisque auribus astant.

Ille reor dictis animos.

That is he sits as REX. A strong contrast is evidently intended between what is expressed by וַיִּרְךְ (the turbulent assembly) and the hushed mourning circle, where Job appears in so different a capacity. The idea of EWALD and DILLMANN that in this language Job meant to give the three friends a kind of back-stroke for their failure to comfort him is unworthy of such excellent commentators, as it would be wholly at war with the impassioned earnestness of this most pathetic chapter.

CHAPTER XXX. [SCENE: The Border of the Desert. See Exc. X.]

- 1 And now they mock me; younger men than I,
Whose fathers I disdained,
To set them with the dogs that watched my flock.
- 2 For what to me their strength of hand,
In whom (the hope) of ripened manhood<sup>1</sup> fails?
- 3 Through want and hunger like the arid<sup>2</sup> rock, <sup>1</sup> Ver. 2. Ripened manhood. בָּלֹחַ occurs only, here and in ver. 26; but there the comparison seems to fix its meaning: the ripened age, the ripened corn. It is not necessarily old age, though that well fits the first passage, but ripeness in general: so that it may be rendered here, manhood, mature age and strength, which these poor wrecks of humanity fail to reach. It has perished (אָבַד) in their youth, and hence they are unfit for any industrial service.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 3. Arid rock. נֶלְכָח. See Job iii. 7; xv. 34; Isai. xlix. 21 (where it has Patach in the first syllable, here only Segol). The primary idea is hardness (hence barrenness, Isai. xlix. 21). The Arabic word means hard rock, or earthen. It may be taken here as a collective noun-epithet: Want and hunger have made them rock—or like the rock, dry and hard; the particle of comparison in the concise language of poetry left out.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 3. Vagrants. עָרַק, as a verb, occurs only here. It is quite common in the Syriac in the sense of fleeing. This it always has in the Peshitto; as in Matth. ii. 13:

"Flee into Egypt," iii. 7, "to flee from the wrath to come," Jas. iv. 7, "Resist Satan and he will flee." So also Mark xiv. 52; Acts vii. 23, and a large number of other places. So in the Old Testament Peshitto (Zech. xi. 16, the only seeming exception, being a wrong reading for פָּרִקוּ). The sense of gnawing is found in the Arabic, though there, too, it has the other meaning: to roam through the land; the gnawing sense being secondary, in some way of derivation, or most likely onomatopoeical, like the Hebrew חָרַק to grind the teeth, חָרַק. In verse 17, the noun, or participle, עָרִיק, may be rendered my gnawers, and suits very well the context (gnawing pains); but there again we are met by the fact that the corresponding Arabic has the sense of veins, arteries, or sinews, such as our translators have given it. How it gets this we may not clearly know; although the conjecture may be hazarded that it has some connection with the idea of fleeing or darting pains, as they are called. See Note on that verse. It cannot be denied that in this place, the sense of "gnawing the desert," the "hard ground of the steppe," is very harsh and hyperbolic. In the sense of fleeing, as so

- These vagrants<sup>3</sup> from the land of<sup>4</sup> drought—
Of old time<sup>5</sup> waste and wild,—
4 Who in the jungles pluck the acrid<sup>6</sup> herb ;
The roots of juniper<sup>7</sup> their food.
5 From human concourse<sup>8</sup> are they driven forth ;
Men shout against them as against a thief ;
6 Within the gloomy gorge<sup>9</sup> their dwelling-place ;
In holes of earth,<sup>10</sup> amid the hollow rocks.
7 Between the desert shrubs they bray ;<sup>11</sup>
Under the brambles do they herd<sup>12</sup> like beasts.
8 Children of folly, sons<sup>13</sup> of nameless sires,
With scourgings<sup>14</sup> are they driven from the land.
9 And now their song have I become,
Their ribald word<sup>15</sup> of scorn.
10 They view me with abhorrence—stand aloof—
Yet from my face their spittle<sup>16</sup> hold not back.

common in the Syriac, the Chaldaic, and the later Rabbinic, it has the usual prepositions to and from. As joined here with צִיָּה, the latter meaning (fleeing from) is the easiest ; since, in other languages, a verb of flight (when meaning from) often has the accusative directly without any preposition (as to flee the land), whilst the other ellipsis, when fleeing to is meant, is unexampled. It does not, therefore, mean, as our translators give it: "fleeing into the desert;" and that is a sufficient answer to DELITZSCH, who says "that the meaning fugere is tame, since the desert is the proper habitation of these people." There is nothing, however, opposed to the idea of their being driven in from the desert, on account of want, or of their roaming back and forth from their wild haunts to the borders of civilization, and to that the word vagrants is exactly adapted.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 3. Land of drought. צִיָּה, simply means aridity, drought; as in Job xxiv. 19, from the root צָרָה. In Psa. lxx. 2: cvii. 35, אֶרֶץ is joined with it. Here it stands for the place—the desert.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 3. Of old time. אָנָּשׁ. Some render this word darkness, forcing its derivation for that purpose. It never has that sense, however, in any other place, but always the clear idea of yesterday or yesternight (Gen. xix. 34; xxxi. 29; 1 Kings xii. 26). But how could a word meaning yesterday be used for remote or indefinite past time? That objection is met by observing that רִמּוֹל, with the same meaning of yesterday, is used Ps. xc. 14: a thousand years as yesterday. Time past and gone, is all gone; yesterday is "with the years beyond the flood." And so all past time is called yesterday, even in the non-poetical language of the New Testament (Heb. xiii. 8, ὅς τις καὶ σήμερον καὶ εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας, "yesterday, to-day, and for the ages"). It may be said, too, that this indefiniteness of time associates well with that indefiniteness of space, and is poetically suggested by it.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 5. Lit., from the body—that is, of society. גֵּר does not mean specially the back. It does not suit this place, and it gives a false notion (גֵּרָה) Job xx. 25. The Syriac גֵּר always has the sense of within, and becomes a preposition, as גֵּרָה from within.

כַּפְפִּים; etymologically hollow rocks—caverns—though the word in Syriac means rock or stone generally.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 7. They bray. Descriptive future: They are ever braying. In vi. 5 נָחַק is used for the ass braying for food. The braying here is not necessarily for the same cause. Their famished state had already been expressed. It may denote their barbarous language, which sounded like braying, or some mere animal noise they made, whether of pain, or of wild exhilaration. שִׁיחִים the desert shrubs. The plural is here used to denote a more special locality, as demanded by the preposition בֵּין. So in Gen. xxi. 15: the desert shrubs under which Hagar cast the child Ishmael in the wilderness of Beersheba. Elsewhere it is שִׁיחַ, the singular taken collectively.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 7. Herd like beasts. MICHAELIS and EICHORN seem to give the truest exposition here, referring it to a beastly conduct demanding an euphemism for its expression. Such is the Hebrew word itself, נִכְרָה, primary sense effunder, the same in the Arabic, and easily giving rise to the rarer secondary meaning of addition, flowing together, increase, association. But this latter sense seems very poor here, and DELITZSCH's rendering, "under the nettles are they poured forth" gives hardly any consistent idea. Huddle together would be better as suggesting smaller numbers. The general Arabic sense is that of pouring, like the Hebrew, but its third conjugation has the sense scortari, coming very naturally from the primary. It is a deponent, and in this corresponds to the Hebrew Pual, as the Arabic III, generally does. The best argument, however, is from the parallelism; the beastly sounds in the first member suggesting some kind of beastly action in the second. It is thus that Herodotus, I. 203, describes the ways of the old Caucasians of whose stock we boast ourselves to be. It is rather worse, because more open and shameful: μίξιν τε τούτων τῶν ἀνθρώπων εἶναι μὲν πάντα κατὰ τὴν τοῖς προβάτοις.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 8. Sons of nameless sires. Not sons of infamy, as some render it. The first בְּנֵי is simply descriptive, like "sons of Belial," "daughters of song," as the word is often used in Hebrew. A son of folly is, simply, a fool. The context, however, demands that the second בְּנֵי be taken as strictly genealogical: sons of the nameless,—thus intensifying their own namelessness.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 8. With scourgings. נִכְּתָה, they are beaten, can only indirectly mean that they are driven. They are whipped out of the land.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 9. Word of scorn. בִּיָּה, a by-word. Something often repeated. LXX, ὑπόβλημα. Job's appearance on their borders in his strange plight (see EXCURSUS, App., p. 208), was the constant theme of their brutal jest. They could not understand his calamity.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 10. Their spittle. or their spitting. The rendering, "they forbear not to spit before my face," would be merely charging them with a want of politeness. It has probably come from a supposed difficulty in רָחַקוּ, as though it meant a distance too great for spitting in the face;

- 11 Since HE hath loosed<sup>17</sup> my girdle—humbled me—
They, too, against me come with unchecked<sup>18</sup> rein.
12 At my right hand they rise, this beastly brood;
My feet they thrust aside;
Against me cast they up their deadly<sup>19</sup> ways.
13 They mar my<sup>20</sup> path;
As though 'twere gain to them,<sup>21</sup> they seek my hurt,
With none to help<sup>22</sup> (the mischief all their own).
14 Like a wide fracture in a<sup>23</sup> wall they come;
Beneath the desolation roll they on.

[PAUSE.]

- 15 All turned<sup>24</sup> against me—terrors everywhere;
My dignity it scatters like the wind;
Gone as a cloud is my prosperity.

but this supposition is not demanded. They stand some distance off, and spit at him, from some strange dread his appearance occasions. It is thus a most graphic picture of turpitude and ignorant malignity. Or the order of event may be different from that of expression: they spit at him, and then start back.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 11. Loosed my girdle. The metaphors in the two members are different, but they suggest one another. The agent in the first clause is God, unnamed, as is frequently the case in Job, and for reasons similar to those given in note to iii. 20, and other places. The other verbs which have these Troglodytes for their subject are all plural (vers. 7, 8, 9, 10), and therefore it would be strange that there should be a singular, or a distributive, here. The verb פָּתַח, literally to open, may be rendered to loose, when by the loosing something is made bare, and, therefore, in such a connection as this it cannot be used of the bow string, as some take it; nor as applied to God can it denote the metaphor of the loosened rein, as in the second clause. It must therefore be taken figuratively of the girdle (or the loins) as the symbol of strength. It may be said, too, that יַעֲנֵנִי would not suit as used of the wild horde. Their other acts are most specifically set forth, and it would be strange that such a general term (hath humbled or afflicted me) should occur among them. For these reasons, too, the Kerl (יָתֵר) my cord, is to be preferred to the Ketib (יָתֵר).

רָכַן שְׁלָחִי. It is exactly the Latin phrase habenas immittere, or remittere. So remittere fræna—dare fræna—German: den Zügel schiessen lassen—English: Give him the rein: Greek: ἀφείναι τὰς ἵππας. שְׁלָחִי, the Piel; they send, or throw them, violently, or suddenly,—cast them on the horse's neck, as EURIPIDES, πάλους ἐμβαλόντες ἵππας. The metaphor is a very natural one, and it does not require us to suppose that these creatures actually rode horses. It simply denotes the suddenness and violence of their attack.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 12. Their deadly ways. Lit.: The ways of their destruction. The suffix in דִּמְרוֹם belongs to the whole compound expression. The whole figure denotes an invading and besieging host. The language is military and hyperbolic.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 13. They mar my path. To be taken figuratively, says DELITZSCH: They make escape impossible; others: they take away all my resources. This answers very well in general; but there are grounds for taking much of this description in its most literal sense. These creatures wantonly destroy the poor accommodation Job had in his lonely leper house (בֵּית הַחֲפְשִׁית, 2 Chron. xxvi. 20; Ps. lxxxviii. 6), and annoy him every way in his helplessness.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 13. As though it were gain to them. Most commentators simply render this clause: "They aid my fall, or my ruin;" E. V., they set forward my calamity; giving עֵילָה the sense of עָוָר. The references made by ZÖCKLER and others are to Zech. i. 15, and Isai. xlviii. 12, neither of which resemble this case in the essential point. The context sometimes allows this rendering to the verb (to help, to aid, etc.), but it never loses the radical idea of profit, real or supposed. This makes the contrast here, which the clause presents, although so very short. It might be rendered almost word for word according to a common English idiom: they profit to my hurt. But the future is subjective, not signifying an actual but a seeming fact: they would profit; or, it is as though they would profit. It is indeed pure wantonness, the mischief they do, but they labor as though they were really to get some gain from it. Then there is the implied personal contrast: whether it be gain, or wantonness, or sport to them, it is trouble and ruin to Job. In this view there is no need of bracketing any words in the full translation given. There is no more than is needed to express the contrast so concisely presented in the Hebrew.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 13. With none to help. Lit.: no helper to them. EWALD renders this: niemand hilft vor ihnen. This is also Dr. CONANT'S: There is no helper against them. It seems to fit the passage admirably, but there cannot be found an example of ל being thus used with this verb in the sense of against. The words put in brackets may be regarded as the briefest exegesis: They are too vile to have an ally. The mischief they do, and the malice they show against a man in Job's wretched condition is sui generis: "None but themselves can be their parallel."

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 14. Fracture in a wall. Compare Isaiah xxx. 13, where we have the exact image. It is the rendering of the Vulgate: quasi fracto muro. Here too there is something which has the appearance of being intended literally. It looks like a real assault upon Job's wretched temporary habitation (his בֵּית הַחֲפְשִׁית, free or separate house, see note 20 above) whether upon the mezbele or place of offal far from the city of which DELITZSCH speaks (LXX., οὗ τῆς κομπίας ἔξω τῆς πόλεως) or on the border of the Desert according to the view taken Exc. X., p. 207. They break it all down through pure recklessness, rushing in upon him and filling him with terror. The wholly fugitive view would regard the language as denoting simply great change of condition, or great reverse of fortune; but there is too much particularity in the painting for that alone. If literal, it must refer to events which occurred to Job's annoyance before the coming of his three friends.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 15. All turned against me: A total reverse of fortune, an overthrow, a catastrophe. הִפְתָּהּ is taken impersonally: It is all upturned, or, there is an upturning, an overthrow (אֵל כִּהֲפֹכָהּ see the word as often used of Sodom and Gomorrah) most graphically presented in the impersonal rendering of the verb regarded as having for its subject its own idea: subvernum est, like the Latin concurrunt, pugnant, or, pugnamus est, it is fought, there is a battle. UMREITER assumes God (unnamed) as the subject: Er hat sich gegen mich gewandt, "He is turned against me." But this does not suit the extremely passive Hophal conjugation as used here, although it might, perhaps, have been consistent with the use of the Niphal (see Note to xxviii. 5, and EXCURSUS VIII., p. 201). The Kal having two related senses, namely, that of transformation (one thing turning into another), and that of subversion (turning upside down, or reversed), the Niphal is the passive of the first as the Concordance uniformly shows, the Hophal (comparatively unfrequent) of the latter.

- 16 And now my very<sup>25</sup> life is poured out;
The days of my affliction hold<sup>26</sup> me fast.
17 By night my every bone is pierced<sup>27</sup> above;
My throbbing nerves<sup>28</sup> (within me) never sleep.

Its subject must be the state or thing overthrown, and therefore cannot be God. The more common way is to take בְּלִהוֹת for the subject, as DELITZSCH and EWALD do, but there is the same incongruity (terrors cannot be overturned, and even when it is rendered "turned") it makes but a vague and feeble sense) whilst there is the other difficulty arising from the disagreement both in gender and number. It is indeed the case that in II-brew, where the verb precedes, there may be, sometimes, a subject, or seeming subject, differing in number; but this is not a mere arbitrary rule of the grammarians. There is a reason for it. In such cases the predominant subject is the very idea of the verb itself, which on that account comes first, whilst the subject afterwards expressed represents only an aspect of that more important idea. As for example Jer. li. 48, יְבוֹא לָהּ הַשְׂדֵּדִים, "shall come (there shall be a coming) upon her, —the scollers." The coming upon her, or that there should be an invasion, an invasion of the strong Babylon, was the strange thought, the important idea, and therefore the verb is placed first, and left uncontrolled by the number of the noun, in order to give it prominence or emphasis. In the preceding part of the same verse, on the other hand, the noun subject contains the predominant idea, and the verb, notwithstanding it is placed first, conforms to it: וְרָנְנוּ עַל שָׁמַיִם בְּבָבֶל, "the Heavens shall cry out against Babylon." In this case, moreover, the accents make a separation between הַהֲפֹךְ and בְּלִהוֹת, although the latter belongs to the same clause, and, therefore, there should be given to it something of an independent, or partially separate rendering, as the translator has endeavored to do, in order to prevent the enfeebling which would come from making it the sole subject of this abrupt and exclamatory verb: terrors everywhere, as the result of the overturning, whether taken literally or figuratively. So RENAN, Les terribles m'assiégent de tous parts. The expression here might seem to resemble the one we have, 1 Sam. iv. 19, נִהְפְּכוּ עֲלֶיהָ צָרָה, rendered: her pains were turned upon her, but there it is Niphal, and, as we have elsewhere seen (EXCURSUS VIII., p. 202), denotes transformation, a sudden "turn," as we say, from quiet to extreme anguish. Besides in that case all is regular, whereas the peculiar feature of this passage is its passionate abruptness as shown in the brokenness and irregularity of its language. No commentator has taken a better view of this than the quaint and greatly unappreciated CARYL. He makes his exegesis and his pious practical commentary illustrate each other: "For as terrors discompose the mind and put it out of all due frame and order, so the construction of this text, wherein Job complains of them, is out of all grammatical frame and order. There is here a double anomalie, or breach of ordinary grammar. The word terrors, being of the plural number, is joined in construction with a verb in the singular; there is, also, alike irregularity in the genders of these two words. It is as if the Spirit of God would hint to us by these disturbed expressions, how much disturbance and irregularity such terms will and impress upon the affections." CARYL on Job, Vol. II. 710. This learned old non-conformist is right. The Spirit of God makes its revelation to us through the souls of men, through the medium of their emotions and conceptions; the language, therefore, that comes out to us from such a process is His language, even when most intensely human. The impassioned state of soul stamps itself upon such broken utterances; and to overlook them in an exegesis is to act the part of unfaithful interpreters. In these chapters, xxix. and xxx., we have pictures from the life. It is no invented thing. A true experience lies before us. The view taken of הַהֲפֹכֶה is confirmed by the 2d and 3d clauses of this same verse. They are but illustrations of the great change of fortune so abruptly expressed in the first, whether we regard that as referring to the general description given in the xxix. (of which this may be taken as the reverse picture) or whether we suppose Job to have in mind the literal overthrow as before referred to, or to mingle both together in the images of the wind and the clouds that immediately follow. UMBREIT seems to enter into the spirit of the passage when he says of עַל, הַהֲפֹכֶה, als Ausruf zu nehmen. It is, in fact, an exclamation, an outcry, caused by the terror of the assault he seems to be describing, or by a sudden vivid recollection of the terrible overthrow or reversal of his condition, as though he had said: "dire catastrophe!—how great the change!—everything against me—all terror and confusion!" LICHORN renders הַהֲפֹכֶה עַל, "es ist mit mir ganz anders worden," taking it impersonally, and בְּלִהוֹת by itself as an addition to the general exclamation. There is no difficulty in making the subject of תָּרַד in the second clause refer to בְּלִהוֹת taken collectively; but a better way is to regard the feminine as denoting generally the event, or the whole course of events, for which the feminine pronoun would stand in II-brew as the neuter does in Greek.

<sup>25</sup> V. r. 16. My very life. Literally: My soul is poured out upon me, or my soul upon me. It seems to be merely an intensive expression. Or, upon me may mean, while yet alive.

מֵעַל. Hence TREMELLIUS renders it perfordiuntur (a stragula) imposita mihi, supplying coverlet or blanket as something that chafed his bones,—a rendering not at all unnatural, since the idea of a chafing or fretting of his garment, or bed-clothes, is so easily suggested. Again, מֵעַל may mean not much more than עַל above, my bones upon me, with me, in me, as our translation has it (see the places in NOLMIUS where this preposition, like עַל, seems to have the meanings, in, apud, juxta). Thus taken it, too, may be merely intensive: my very bones, each one of them, as is denoted by the distributive plural with a singular verb. But there seems intended something of a contrast between the two members of the verse. The bones may be regarded as above, without, or over, in respect to the nerves, or veins supposed to belong more especially to the interior of the body. We do, indeed, commonly think of the bones as within, but beside the general demand of such a comparison, there was something peculiar in Job's extreme emaciation, that would make the contrast very striking. His bones protruded; they had become visible; so that his body seemed like a skeleton. all bones. So he speaks of himself vii. 15: Death rather than these bones. So Elihu says xxxii. 21, evidently meaning Job: His bones before me stick out. Compare also Ps. xxii. 18: "I can count all my bones, they look and stare at me." Thus viewed מֵעַל in its common literal sense of above, or from above, becomes not only allowable, but most appropriate. In his contemplation of himself in this condition, the bones become the outside of him, as it were. The rendering, pierced from me, as some translate, gives a strange sense, or if paraphrased as a constructio prægna (ZÖCKLER: Die Nacht durchbohrte meine Gebeine, sie von mir abfließend, as also, in substance EWALD, DELITZSCH, UMBREIT, and RENAN) seems forced and unwarranted. The rendering of TREMELLIUS, "cut or fretted by the blanket above" is to be preferred, if the view here taken cannot be sustained. There is, moreover, the view of RASCHI, presenting less difficulty than the harsh constructio prægna to which UMBREIT and ZÖCKLER are compelled to resort. He takes עֲצָמֵי מֵעַל as equivalent to עַל מֵעַל, and interprets it as meaning "the worms who strip off the flesh from above my bones."

<sup>28</sup> V. r. 17. My throbbing nerves, עֲרֻבֵי. In Note 3 ver. 3 there have been already given some of the reasons for adhering to the old translation of the word in this place, as supported by the TALPUM, by MALMONIDES, with the learned Jewish Rabbis, and by the older commentators, such as MERCERUS, PISCATOR, and others mentioned in POOLE'S Synopsis. ABEN EZRA renders it by עֲרֻבֵי נֶרְוִי (LXX. νεῦρα πού) a sense which he says it has "in the Ishmaelitic language." So Kimchi in his book of roots: עֲרֻבֵי יָקְרוּ הַנִּרְוִי "in Arabic they call the nerves (or sinews) אַלְעֻרֻק,

- 18 By great exertion is my garment<sup>29</sup> changed;
Close as my tunic's mouth it girts me round.
19 Into the mire, His hand hath cast me<sup>30</sup> down;
To dust and ashes is my semblance<sup>31</sup> turned.
20 I call to Thee—Thou answerest not;
Before Thee do I stand—Thine eye beholds;
21 But Thou art turned relentless (to my prayer);
Thou art against me with Thy mighty hand.
22 Thou liftest me upon the wind to ride;
As in my very being<sup>32</sup> Thou dissolvest me.

אלערוק," using the Arabic article. It is thus used indiscriminately of all the finer or more interior parts of the body, as of sineus, arteries, or veins; and the latter especially were so called from the idea of continual motion in them increased by pain or heat. They were conceived of as continually fleeing, throbbing, pulsating, etc. (see Note on ערקים ver. 8). It is this which justifies the epithet added in the translation, and it would seem to have been some idea of this kind, as attaching to the word which suggested that other graphic expression יִשְׁכְּבוּ לֹא, they never lie down, they are never still. This was the thought, too, which suggested to RASCHI his interpretation of the word in this place:

גִּידֵי אֵין לָהֶם מְנוּחָה גִּיד, to which he adds: in the Arabic גִּיד is called עֵרוֹק. So RABBI LEVI BEN GERSON renders it הרפקים, "my nerves that pulse and never rest, on account of the strange and distempered heat that is in me." MAIMONIDES, too, in his comment on this place has a similar thought about the motion caused by the increased heat of the body, and this leads him to a remark so curious that the translator hopes to be pardoned for inserting it. This most philosophical commentator has his thoughts so carried away by the idea suggested that he cannot stop short of the Primus Motor: "When a thing is moved we may say, it is the staff that moves the stone, but the hand moves the staff, the chords (הַמִּיתָרִים) move the hand, the muscles (הָעֵרָקִים) move the chords, the nerves (הַחֹסֶם הַטָּבֵעִי) move the muscles, the natural heat (הַצֹּרֵר) moves the nerves, the form (הַצֹּרֵר) moves the natural heat. The Prime Mover God (הָרָאשׁוֹן) moves, originates and sets in action, the idea." On this frequent Rabbinical word, see Buxtorf Lex. Chald., and the Worterbuch Chaldaisches, lately published, of RABBI DR. J. LEVI. It is an argument for this sense of עֵרוֹק that it seems demanded by the parallelism.

The mention of bone in the first clause, requires that some other part of the body should be the subject of the second. The Syriac עֵרוֹק, wherever it occurs in the Peschito version of the Old and New Testaments, always means some kind of ligament (lorum) string or cord, being equivalent to גִּידִים by which the Rabbins render the Hebrew עֵרוֹק. See Gen. xiv. 13 (corrigia, strings or ties for the shoe) Isai. v. 27; Job i. 27; Ezek. xxiii. 15; Mark i. 7; Luke iii. 16; Acts xiii. 25. The participial form is one common to a great many Hebrew nouns like שָׁקַד סָהַר, etc.

<sup>29</sup> Ver. 18. My garment changed. The word הִתְחַפֵּשׂ occurs in this Hithpael form in four places, 1 Sam. xxviii. 8, which is the key passage, 1 Kings xxii. 30; 2 Chron. xviii. 29, and 1 Kings xx. 38. The first gives us the sense of the word as clear as any Lexicon could have done. It shows that the sense of disguise is not, by itself, the predominant one. The word simply expresses the mode by which it is effected, as the words immediately following show:

הִתְחַפֵּשׂ himself, that is, put on other garments, יִלְבֵּשׁ אֲחֵרִים גִּידִים which may be regarded as an epexegetical of it.

The 24 and 34 examples in the same way give the explanation: The kings in the battle exchanged garments. In 1 Kings xx. 38, the disguise seems to have been made in a different way, עָלַי עֵינָיו, בְּאָפֶר, with ashes upon his eyes, as commonly rendered, but as rendered by the LXX. with a strip or belt (τελαμώνι) upon his eyes,—the word being אָפֶר instead of אָפֶר, the usual one for ashes. GSENIUS regards it as a different word, if the true reading of the text before them was not, rather, אָפֶר (unpointed), an ephod or linen veil. Reading it, however, as ashes it may fairly be taken as something additional to the action expressed by the verb יִתְחַפֵּשׂ just before it; or it may well be that the phrase, originally meaning change of raiment, had come to represent the idea of disguise in whatever way effected. If this is regarded as inherent in the Hithpael form it may, perhaps, be supposed to come from the Kal sense to seek, investigate, etc., with the reflexive idea added: one who causes himself to be sought, inquired after. This, however, is not easy, and a more direct way, if allowable, would be to regard the sense of change of raiment as predominant, and connect it with the cognate חָפֵשׁ, to be free from, liber, solutus, as in the word חֹפֶשׁ, Job iii. 9, and many other places. Hence the idea of having the garment stripped off, or of being free from it, to be replaced by another. So PARKHURST would seem to view it, though, from his disregard of the Hebrew punctuation the two verbs are regarded by him, not simply as cognate, but as one and the same root. It should be noted, too, that in any view we may take of the word, the idea of disguise is not in the garment, but in the person. Here, however, to give it any application at all in that sense, it is the garment itself that is disguised. That could in no way be truly said, though it were ever so much fouled by the disease. If the view taken can be sustained, it certainly gives a clear and suitable sense. Job undoubtedly would desire to change his garments. There are a number of passages (see especially iv. 31) which show that he was very sensitive in this matter, and that his neatness was greatly offended by the foulness of condition produced by his disease. This would make the change very desirable, and, at the same time, very difficult in consequence of the adhesion. The necessity for it, and the pain occasioned, would be no small part of his wretchedness, and even hyperbolic language would seem most natural in describing the effort for that purpose. The chief difficulty of the other view is in the words כֹּהֵל. To render this "divine" or "almighty force," as DELTITZSCH and UMBREIT do, seems utterly extravagant, and to take it of the violence of the disease, as E. V. and others do, is not warranted by any other usage of כֹּהֵל. The second clause gives the reason why so much force was required, and which would seem all the greater from the pain it occasioned.

<sup>31</sup> Ver. 19. My semblance turned. לִי: I have likened myself. But the Hithpael is intensive rather than simply reflex: I am become the picture, the perfect copy or resemblance. The reference is doubtless to the earthy, ashen, cadaverous appearance that the leprosy occasioned; though there probably mingles with it something of that idea of weakness and mortality connected with the word ashes in other parts of the Bible.

<sup>32</sup> Ver. 22. As in my very being. This is given as the best rendering of that difficult word הַנִּשְׁיָה in its accommodation to the demands of this place (see Exc. v. p. 169 and also Notes upon it, xii. 16; xxvi. 3, and other places). Its general etymological sense of reality, solidity, substantiality, true being, or ovvia, may be referred either to knowledge or truth. It is the deepest essence, and may be taken here adverbially, as is not unfrequently the case with qualifying

- 23 I know that Thou wilt turn me back<sup>33</sup> to death,
The assembly house<sup>34</sup> ordained for all that live.
- 24 Ah! prayer is nought,<sup>35</sup> when He sends forth the hand;
In each<sup>36</sup> man's doom, of what avail their cry?
- 25 Have I not wept<sup>37</sup> for him whose life is hard?
Has not my very soul grieved<sup>38</sup> for the poor?

Hebrew nouns, essentialiter, substantialiter, οὐσιωδώς. It may have, moreover, something of a superlative sense, like the similar words נִצְחָה excellency, truth, splendor, לִנְצָה completely, triumphantly, or תְּכִלִּית perfection, perfectly. TRE-

MELLIUS: Efficit ut diffusum substantia; COCCÆIUS, among the older commentators: et maceras me reipsum (re ipsa), in very truth, using it as a term of intensity. VULGATE valde. BEXTORY, Lex. Chald., in essentia, id est, ut tota essentia perent, totoliter, et omnino; though he seems to regard it as equivalent to a Targumic word תְּשִׁיבָה, meaning foundation. DE WETTE, zerrüttet Sinn und Geist. Others translate it happiness, safety, though still retaining the old reading. Our translators, by "substance," may have meant wealth, as the Greeks use the word οὐσία, so very similar etymologically. In the margin, however, they have given the word wisdom. In this old rendering, being, essence, reality, etc. is entitled to the more regard in view of the great difficulty later commentators (EWALD, DILLMANN, DELITZSCH, ZÖCKLER) have in giving anything more satisfactory. They render it, "the crash, noise, roaring of the storm;" ZÖCKLER: und lässt mich zergehen in Sturmesbrausen. But to get this they have to take another and quite different reading, תְּשִׁיבָה, as found in xxxv. 23, and xxxix. 7. UMBREIT and GESNIUS turn it into a verb, תְּשִׁיבָה, and give it the sense of a Chaldaic word found only in another conjugation: "Thou frightened me." But there is no suffix pronoun, as there ought to be in such a case. The greatest objection, however, besides the change required in the reading, is the wretched anticlimax it makes: "Thou catchest me up to the wind; thou makest me to ride upon it; thou dissolvest me; thou frightened me." It is supposed by some that the first clause is meant to represent Job's prosperity, the second his downfall. But there are no words giving the least indication of such a contrast, and there is little in the calm, God-fearing, domestic happiness of Job, that suggests such a picture of sudden elation. It is rather that of ruin expressed in a weird and passionate style which almost resembles the language of delirium. Such an idea is favored by that most sober Jewish commentator ABEN EZRA, who ascribes this strange language to the "wild imaginations caused by fever; Job dreams of riding on the wind." It may, in fact, have been one of those "scaring visions" of which he speaks vii. 14; xx. 8, and which formed no small part of his misery. There is nothing, as CARYL supposes, unworthy of the Scriptures in such an idea. Were not the first clause so clear, so incapable of being taken in any other way, we might almost suspect the translation as too Shakespearean, or Duntcan, for Job, though he shows much more imagination than the other speakers. But everything except the תְּשִׁיבָה is so perspicuous, the "being lifted up to the wind," the "riding upon it," the being "dissolved," or melting away, that there can be no doubt of the rendering: It reminds one of Virgil's description of the expiating processes endured by spirits, Æn. VI., 740.

—Alie pandantur inanes
Suspense ad ventos.

Job's language resembles some of the mad utterances of Lear, giving the impression that called out the comment of ABEN EZRA. It is almost in the very words of Othello:

"Blow me about in winds," presenting also something of a parallel to Homer's language, employed Odys., IV. 727, and elsewhere, to denote utter and remediless destruction:

ἀΐστον ἀνερρίψαντο θυέλλα, —

a "carrying away by the gales," a "disappearing" in their unknown viewless regions. Stress has been laid on the fact that the word is abbreviated in its viewless, wh. as in other places it is written full (הָ) for (הַ); but this is evidence rather of some difficulty which old transcribers or editors may have had about the meaning of the word, and hence of a desire to exchange it for another. Had there been some other word in the original it is almost incredible that this difficult תְּשִׁיבָה should have been put in place of it. MEXX, as usual, solves the difficulty by his arbitrary reading תְּשִׁיבָה.

<sup>33</sup> Ver. 23. Turn me back. Comp. שׁוּבוּ בְנֵי אָדָם, Gen. iii. 19; שׁוּבוּ בְנֵי אָדָם, "Go back ye sons of Adam," Ps. xc. 3.

<sup>34</sup> Ver. 23. The assembly house. בֵּית כְּנֻעַר, the house of rendezvous, of gathering. It suggests the frequent phrase gathered to the fathers, gathered to his people. All such language must have come from some idea of death or Sheol being a place of waiting for something to come after it. See LANGE Gen., Note 585.

<sup>35</sup> Ver. 24. Prayer is nought. The translation given of the whole verse is nearly that of RENAN:

Vaines prières! — Il étend sa main;
A quoi bon protester contre ses coups?

אֵין לֹא-בְּעֵי. The negative לֹא, here, seems to be a qualifying rather than an impliedly asserting particle. It is joined with בְּעֵי, prayer, like our inseparable negative syllables in, im, un; as in חֲסִיד לֹא חָסִיד Ps. xliii. 1; לֹא חָסִיד, infirmus Prov. xxx. 25; לֹא אִישׁ, without men, uninhabited, ἀνάνθρωπος; לֹא דרך, without a way, inivius, ἀπορος, ἀβατος, wayless, trackless. It is a case that is prayerless, he would say, that is, where prayer is of no avail; the substantive verb understood: It is a prayer that is no prayer, like the Greek νόπος ἀποπος. For the other view which resolves the word into parts, בְּ and עֵי, see DELITZSCH.

<sup>36</sup> Ver. 24. In each man's doom . . . their cry. It is a case where a distributive singular in one part corresponds to a plural pronoun in the other. Our own tongue admits it. But what authority for giving it this turn, or inserting the words "of what avail," or, a quoi bon, as RENAN does? It is because of the אֵין, leaving the question unanswered, or making what is called an aposiopesis,—a silence that leaves the answer to the thought as the most expressive way of asserting its unavailableness: "what if they do cry?" It occurs in all passionate or animated language, but especially in the ancient. "If it bear fruit," Luke xiii. 9. There is nothing more there in the Greek; but the silent answer is all the more expressive on that account. "He that planted the ear (Ps. xciv. 9), shall he not hear? He that fashioned the eye, shall he not see? He that teacheth man knowledge"—There it closes in the Hebrew, but the answer is admirably given in E. V. in italics: "Shall he not know?" Shall the source of knowledge be unintelligent? For a striking example, see Iliad i. 26. So here: "If they cry, each of them (בְּכֵדָם) in his own special doom,—what then?" There is, however, nothing here like an arraignment of God for injustice or cruelty. It is simply stating the inevitableness of death as the common doom. It is in this way no harsher than Gen. iii. 19, and Ps. xc. 3. The fem. לָהֶן may be a mere matter of euphony to avoid the harshness of final ך before שׁ in שׁוּבוּ (see the Sepher Ha Rifka or Hebrew Grammar of JONA BEN GANNACH, Sec. VI., changes of ך and ך, pa. 37, where he gives a number of analogous examples). We have examples of לָהֶן for לָהֶם Ruth i. 13, and of הִנֵּה for הִנֵּה, 2 Sam. iv. 6.

<sup>37</sup> Ver. 25. Have I not? אֵין לֹא is equivalent to a strong assertion; but the interrogative form is the more pathetic.

<sup>38</sup> Ver. 25. Grieved. עָנָה. This verb occurs but once. The context, however, leaves little doubt about it, though we get no help either from the Syriac or the Arabic.

- 26 But when I looked for good, then evil came;<sup>39</sup>
When I expected light, then darkness came.
- 27 My very bowels boil,<sup>40</sup> they're never still;
The days of pain have overtaken me.
- 28 Mourning I go,<sup>41</sup> no sunlight (on my way).
In the assembly do I rise; I cry aloud.
- 29 Brother am I to howling desert<sup>42</sup> dogs, Companion to the owls.
- 30 My skin is black above;<sup>43</sup>
My bones are dried with heat.
- 31 My harp,<sup>44</sup> to mourning is it turned;
My organ like the tones of those who weep.

<sup>39</sup> Ver. 26. Evil came . . . darkness came. The repetition of the same word, both in the Hebrew and in the English, increases the force and pathos.

<sup>40</sup> Ver. 27. Bowels boil. This may mean mental affliction (bowels put for the feelings), but it is easier taken literally.

<sup>41</sup> Ver. 28. Mourning I go; or, with darkened face I go. The key to this obscure verse is to be found, we think, in Jer. iv. 28, where a day of trouble is thus described by the same verb, קָרַר הַשָּׁמַיִם כַּמָּעַל, the heavens are darkened above. The sense of mourning in קָרַר comes from that of obscuration. The sunlight denotes joy and happiness, as in Eccles. xi. 7, "sweet is the light, and pleasant to the eyes to behold the sun." The sense of the words put in brackets are really included in the idea of הַלְכָתִי. The second clause seems abrupt and disconnected, but this is what is to be expected in such a passionate strain.

<sup>42</sup> Ver. 29. Howling desert dogs. It is some hideous animal that makes a wailing melancholy sound, and that is all that can be determined from BOGHART's long discussion. The word in the second clause may be rendered ostriches, but the idea of desolation intended is far better given by owls, as in E. V.; at least to our modern conceptions.

<sup>43</sup> Ver. 30. My skin is black above. See remarks on כָּעוֹל in Note 10, ver. 17. The contrast there was between bones and the more interior parts, nerves or sineua. Here it is between the skin above, and the bones as the interior. It may be rendered my skin upon me.

<sup>44</sup> Ver. 31. My harp, etc. The exact nature of the musical instruments here mentioned, it is now very difficult to determine. An objection is made to rendering עֲוִיבָה, here and Ps. ci. 4, by the word organ. It is however a wind instrument, and may, therefore, be a combination of pipes; or organ may be taken for any compound instrument, complex or simple. The single pipe was a shepherd's instrument, and hardly corresponds to our idea of the dignity of Job. It may be said, however, that a seeming exactness may sometimes fail as a translation by destroying the very impression intended to be made. RENAN, we think, exemplifies this.

*Ma guitare s'est changée en instrument de deuil;
Mon hautbois ne rend que des sons de pleurs.*

Something antique is needed, yet still enough understood to give the effect intended, without marring by a lowering familiarity. In general, however, no translator excels RENAN in purity and taste.

CHAPTER XXXI.

- 1 Yes,<sup>1</sup> I did make a covenant for<sup>2</sup> mine eyes;
How<sup>3</sup> then could I upon a virgin gaze?
- 2 What portion of Eloah from above,
What heritage [could I expect] from Shaddai in the heights?
- 3 Does not a woe await the evil man?
A vengeance strange,<sup>4</sup> to malefactors due?

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. Yes. We cannot suppose that the commencing words of this chapter come directly after the closing words of the xxx. There is no inconsistency, but certainly a change of style, indicating a silent meditation for a few moments, and then a sudden resuming with the thought to which it had led him. Thus regarded, the starting yes, or something equivalent, is nothing more than the expression of such a resuming. The need of it in the Hebrew was compensated, virtually, by the feeling of the context, and, perhaps, by look, tone, or gesture.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 1. For mine eyes. Not as a party with whom the covenant is made, for that would require עִי, but rather as the evil or enemy against whom Job had made a solemn compact with God. Hence the language that follows—how could I, etc.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 1. How then? It is the strongest denial. Why, as commonly rendered, is too tame, as though simply asking what reason could I have?

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 2. Could I expect. These words in brackets are but the filling up of what is clearly implied.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 3. A vengeance strange, נִקְמָה. See the same segolate, only with the O vowel, Obad. 12. The primary idea of strangeness adheres in the word, but giving it a bad sense as suggestive of the awful, the sudden in calamity. There is the same word in Arabic, with the O vowel, and used precisely as this is here and in Obadiah 12. For clear examples see HARIRI, Seance xiii., p. 153 (De Sacy, Ed.) xvi., p. 188, xxiv. 288. It occurs in the same sense in the Koran; as in Surat lxx. 8, xviii. 86, where it is joined with the most severe word for punishment: "He shall visit him with a strange (nukran) or awful penalty." In Surat xviii. 73 it is, in the same way, associated with the crime of murder: "Hast thou slain an innocent person, then hast thou done a thing (nukran), awful, strange." Compare the very similar language in the Antlia Mundi of TIMÆUS the Leontian, 104 E: τυσώπαις ἐξείναι, "strange vengeance," the fearful nature of which is shown in the context. Compare it with ξέρον, 1 Pet. iv. 12.

- 4 Does He not see my course of life,
And number all my steps?
5 If I have walked in ways<sup>6</sup> of vanity,
Or if my foot hath hasted to deceit,—
6 So weigh<sup>7</sup> me God in scales of righteousness
And know Eloah mine integrity.
7 If from the path my step hath turned aside,
Or soul hath strayed<sup>8</sup> submissive to mine eyes,
Or aught of blemish to my hand hath cleaved,
8 Then let me sow, and let another reap,
And let my plantings all be rooted up.
9 By<sup>9</sup> woman, if my heart hath been seduced,
Or at my neighbor's door, if I have watched,
10 Then let my wife for others grind;<sup>10</sup>
Let others humble<sup>11</sup> her.
11 For that were deed of foul intent<sup>12</sup>,—
A sin demanding sentence from the Judge.
12 A fire<sup>13</sup> consuming to the lowest<sup>14</sup> hell,
And killing<sup>15</sup> all my increase at the root.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 6. Ways of. This is implied in the metaphor: vanity. The Hebrew נָפִישׁ denotes generally what is most false and vile, the good for nothing as opposed to the sound or the true. We have become accustomed to our word vanity in its usual Scriptural rendering, and as thus understood nothing could be better adapted here.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 6. So weigh me God. It is the language of adjectival appeal, like the words "so help me God," "God do so to me," etc. The most concise rendering, therefore, is the clearest as well as the most forcible. The reader need hardly be reminded that weigh and know are both to be taken as the 3d pers. Imperative.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 7. Or soul hath strayed. Lit.: Or my heart has gone after mine eyes. לֵב here, as in many other places, denotes the will or active reason, rather than the mere feeling. It is what Socrates calls the reversal, or turning upside down, or wrong end foremost, of human nature, indicating a dire catastrophe: the reason following the sense, and submitting to the sense instead of controlling it.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 9. By woman; or, on account of, as עַל may be rendered.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 10. Humble her. The rendering here best corresponding to a Scriptural expression עָנָה אִשָּׁה, Deut. xxii. 24, 29; Jud. xix. 24; xx. 5; Gen. xxxiv. 2. The servile idea, however, is the main thing. The other is indicated as a mere incident to it, and there was less indelicacy in the language than would now be felt. But would not this be a great sin in Job, to think or utter such a wish? No commentator treats such questions more purely and judiciously than the Puritan Caryl. After admitting that there was wrong and rashness in such language, he goes on to speak of it as the "strongest expression of the retributive or retaliatory idea (the lex talionis): as he hath done to others, so be it done to him) which, in itself, or as brought about in the causative or permissive providence of God (2 Sam. xii. 10; Hos. iv. 12, 13, 14) is the very essence of justice." "But holy Job," he farther says, "did not strictly wish his wife's adultery. He speaks thus to show that by the law of counterpassion he deserved to have suffered in such a way had he himself been guilty. An adulterous and unfaithful wife is a fit affliction for an adulterous and unfaithful husband. Breach of the marriage covenant is a due reward for marriage covenant breakers."

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 11. Of foul intent. זָכָר primarily means purpose, intent, but is mostly taken in malum partem, like the Latin facinus, which is, etymologically, a deed or doing, but in usage denotes a bad deed, an enormity. So the Greek ἔργον unqualified, or when joined with μέγα, is taken in a bad sense, μέγα ἔργον being equivalent to κακὸν ἔργον;—a most severe satire which language, in its unconscious formation thus casts upon human nature. It is nothing less than an implication that the majority of human acts, especially the great and notorious, are so surely evil that the word becomes a synonym for the idea of crime. The same linguistic law affects this Hebrew word. It is equivalent here to an act done feloniously, or with malitia,—malice prepense—as our law calls it; not so much, however, in such a case as this, with the idea of passion, or hatred, as with that of evil design, or depravity, of any kind.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 12. A fire consuming. It is quite common in the Scriptures to compare this sin to a fire. See Prov. vi. 27, 28, 29. The language there is, most likely, derived from this older Scripture. For the richest illustrations of the way in which it consumes every thing, body, estate, honor, dignity, conscience, and, finally, the very soul itself, see CARYL, Practical Remarks on the passage.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 12. The lowest hell. There is more of literality in it than commentators express. See remarks on the word אֲדָמָה Note 5, ver. 5, chap. xxvi., and Excursus VI., p. 20. It may be taken here as strong hyperbolic language, like that in Deut. xxxii. 2, תַּחֲתִיתִּים שְׂאוֹל, instead of confining it to the mere etymological sense of loss or destruction. It is entire destruction, body and soul, in the world of destruction. The words reach there, whatever measure of force or of idea Job put upon them.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 12. Killing. הָרַג here can hardly be confined to the sense of uprooting, tearing up the roots, eradicans. It would be out of harmony with the figure of the consuming fire which is the subject of הָרַג as well as of הָאֵשׁ. It is rather the fire of Inst, killing the root as well as the branches. So MEAX very happily renders it:

Das alle Frucht mir in der Wurzel tödtet; whilst most of the later German Commentators, like UMBREIT, SCHLOTTMANN, EWALD, DELITZSCH, DILLMANN, ZÖCKLER, destroy the metaphor by giving the sense of uprooting, or rooting out. It might have been seen that the preposition בְּ בְּכָל was in the way of this. It must either be regarded as redundant, or it denotes some deadly influence in or upon the increase—not uprooting, but killing it in its root, bringing death into the very root of all prosperity, whether belonging to the outward or the inward estate, all of which may be denoted by the word הַבְּרִיאָה, revenue, income. In such a wide way is it used, Prov. xviii. 20, "the income or fruit of the lips," תְּבוּאַת שִׁפְתָּיו, or what a man gains or loses by his talk. Here, as CARYL well says, it denotes every

- 13 My serf,<sup>16</sup> or handmaid, if I spurned<sup>17</sup> their right,
When their complaint before<sup>18</sup> me they have laid, 14 What could I do when God to judgment<sup>19</sup> rises?
When He makes search, what could I answer him?
15 Who in the womb made me, made He not him?
And from one<sup>20</sup> common mother formed us both?
16 From poor men's want,<sup>21</sup> if I have kept<sup>22</sup> aloof,
Or caused the widows' eyes to fail<sup>23</sup>,— 17 If I have eaten by myself alone,
And from my crust the orphan had no share,
18 [No—like a father, from my youth, he made<sup>24</sup> me his support,
And from my earliest dawn<sup>25</sup> of life was I to her a guide], 19 If e'er I saw<sup>26</sup> the perishing, with nought to cover him,
Or any lack of raiment to the poor,
20 His very loins, if they have blessed me not,
When<sup>27</sup> from my lambs' fleece he hath felt the warmth, thing which may be called worth or value in a man, not only outward estate, but honor, fair repute, spiritual dignity. Of all this the very roots are killed, burnt out by this fire of hell. It "leaves neither root nor branch." Comp. Malachi iii. 23.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 13. Serf. עֶבֶד here is not a slave or bondsman bought with money. Neither, on the other hand, is he, probably, a perfectly free hired laborer. The context seems to intimate a vassal, or client, under the jurisdiction of a superior lord.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 13. I spurned. It can hardly be rendered in any other way; and yet it is a question worth noticing why the future form is used here instead of the preterite as in הֲלֹכְתִי ver. 5 above. The only answer is that the verb for despising is more inward or subjective, and that there is denoted here disposition, state of soul, intention (looking to futurity) rather than a single outward act as is expressed by the other word, though apparently in the same grammatical connection. It is also more conditional or hypothetical: if I should ever have been so disposed. The keeping this idea in mind will explain changes in the Hebrew tenses which otherwise would seem wholly arbitrary.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 13. Before me. עֵינַי, in the second clause, confirms the opinion expressed above that this is the relation of lord and vassal, in which the former could not be sued by the latter as an equal party in an outward court. In such a case it would have been עֵינַי instead of עֵינַי, as DELITZSCH well observes on the authority of the Talmud. The preposition עִמִּי would denote litigation with; עֵינַי may be rendered apud, penes, at my own tribunal, in the lord's manor court where he sits as judge, not as party. The claim that Job makes here is stronger on this account: He rendered justice, he listened to the complaints of his vassal, even against himself, though no outward law compelled him to do them justice. עֵינַי may express either kind of interpleading.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 14. To judgment. Implied in יָקִים אֵל. See Ps. vii. 7; ix. 20; iii. 8; xiv. 13; lxviii. 2.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 15. One common mother—one common source or origin. Make אִמִּי the subject, and refer to Malachi ii. 10. See DELITZSCH. The LXX. and Symmachus take it as agreeing with רַחֵם. There is no need of the article. This DELITZSCH admits, and also that it may express unity of kind rather than a numerical oneness. רַחֵם can only mean the womb as place; רַחֵם as a derivative from the sense of loving, cherishing, fostering, denotes maternity in general.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 16. Kept aloof. The subjunctive future אֶכְתֵּב, indicating disposition, or rather aversion. See Note 18, ver. 13.

pointment. See Lam. iv. 17. Our eyes fail for our help, that is, with looking for it.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 18. Made me his support. נִרְלִי. This is variously rendered: UMBREIT, EWALD, DELITZSCH, ZÖCKLER, DILLMANN, wuchs er mir, he grew up to me, as if we should say concisely in English, he grew me up. SCHLOTTMANN, erzog ich sie, for what he takes as the literal, sie wuchs mir auf. This is very similar to the rendering, he grew up with me, which some give; as UMBREIT, who thinks it may stand for נִרְלִי

עִמִּי. That would resemble 2 Chron. x. 8, where it is said of Rehoboam's young companions, אִתּוֹ נִרְלִי who grew up with him. But there the preposition makes a marked difference. Had it been נִרְלִי אִתּוֹ the cases would have been similar. The Piol reading has been proposed, נִרְלִי (OLS-HAUSEN) er ehrte mich, he magnified, honored me. That however gives too strong, and at the same time, too limited a sense. Growing up with me, or to me, would denote the relation of foster brothers rather than that of patron and ward.

Although it would be rare, there would be nothing in the way of keeping the Kal form, and giving it the sense of esteeming great.

In this it will agree with the Latin magnifico, and the Greek μεγαλύνω, which are both used in this way sometimes. The nearest resemblance to it, however, would be found in the Greek αἰξω, αἰξάω, which is intransisitive primarily, like נִרְלִי or נִרְלִי, but becomes transitive with an object of the person, and the sense of esteeming great;

hence of honoring; celebrating, as a nurse, or patron. See

Oed. Tyr. 1091:

σὲ καὶ τροφὸν καὶ μητὲρ' αὔξεν.

Allied to this is the version above given, to esteem great, that is, rely upon as his support. The e is an impassioned eloquence in this irregular burst from the hypothetical to the direct asseveration, as though the thought of what he had truly done to the orphan and the widow would not allow him to pass on without this vehement parenthetical statement.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 18. Earliest dawn of life. The literal Hebrew: from my mother's womb, is evidently hyperbolic. As far back as I can remember was I a guide to the widow and a friend to the orphan.

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 19. If e'er I saw. Another subjunctive future in אֶרְאֶה. See Note 14, ver. 13, and 22, ver. 16. If I could bear to see it—have the heart to look upon it.

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 20. When. This is generally taken as a separate hypothetical asseveration with אֲנִי understood: "If from my lambs' fleece, etc." There is, however, not only no need of such an ellipsis, but it actually destroys the pathos as well as the grammatical simplicity of the passage. It needlessly makes two asseverations out of one act, the second clause being simply a touching illustration of the effect of the beneficence mentioned in the first clause and the verse before. It is the feeling of the soft, warm, comforting lamb's fleece, that makes the shivering loins pour out their blessing on

- 21 If o'er the orphan I have stretched my hand,
When at the gate<sup>28</sup> I saw my helper near,— 22 Then fall my shoulder from its blade,
And let my arm be broken from the bone.
23 For God's destruction would have been my fear;
Before His majesty I could not stand.
- 24 If I have made the gold my confidence,
Or to the coined<sup>29</sup> gold said, thou art my trust;
25 If I rejoiced<sup>30</sup> because my wealth was great,
Or that my<sup>31</sup> hand had gotten mighty store;
26 If e'er I saw<sup>32</sup> the sunlight when it shone,
The moon in glory as it walked above,
27 And then my soul was silently enticed,
And hand (in adoration)<sup>33</sup> touched my mouth;
28 Even that<sup>34</sup> would be a sin for vengeance calling,
For then had I been false to God above.<sup>35</sup>
29 If in my foe's calamity I joyed,
Or lifted up myself when ill befell him,
30 (No, no<sup>36</sup>—I suffered not my mouth to sin,
To ask a malediction on his life);
31 If men of mine own household have not said,
"O tell us one not sated from his meat, 32 (The<sup>37</sup> stranger never lodged without;
My doors I opened to the traveller");

the giver. The conjunction ו may indicate almost any kind of connection, time, reason, inference, comparison; or it may be merely copulative. The spirit of the context here demands the first. When he felt the lambs' wool it warmed him into gratitude that could not refrain from pouring, it self out in benedictions. This mode of taking it also agrees best with the Hithpael תְּחַנֵּן.

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 21. The gate. The place of judicial proceeding. The helper is some corrupt ally among the judges.

<sup>29</sup> Ver. 24. Coined gold; rendered generally, the pure gold, or fine gold. See Note on כֶּסֶף, chap. xxviii., ver. 16.

<sup>31</sup> Ver. 25. My hand. This is not a tautology. The first joy relates to the abundance, the second to the self-acquisition.

<sup>32</sup> Ver. 26. If e'er I saw. אִם־אֶרְאֶה Subj. Fut. See Note 26. CONANT calls it here the Future, or Imperfect of repeated action. But it comes to the same thing. Repeated action expresses disposition, tendency, what one is wont to do, and so demands the tense of continuous or unfinished action.

<sup>33</sup> Ver. 27. In adoration. This is certainly implied, whatever may have been the mode. But it is clear enough. The barely touching the hand to the mouth is just the gentle, silent act which would be prompted by a rising thought of adoration. The idea of throwing a kiss is a trifling modernism. It implies submission—silence, rather—laying the hand upon the mouth. If any kind of worship, except to God, could be thought blameless, it would be Sabæism in such a gentle form. Job's selecting this, therefore, shows how far he was from the first thought of idolatry.

<sup>34</sup> Ver. 28. Even that, or that too, הֵן־כֵּן, light as it might seem, would have been a sin, and one to be ranked in enormity with adultery, ver. 11, and called like it פְּלִילִים, פְּלִילִים. It would have been not simply impiety, but falseness—express or implied violation of covenant by which a rational being is bound to God (בְּרִית or religio) like that of the marriage vow. There is suggested the same idea here that appears elsewhere in the Old Testament, and especially in the Prophets, of the affinity between the sins of adultery and idolatry.

<sup>35</sup> Ver. 23. To God above, כִּמְעַל. However enticing the conception, that would be the enormity of it, namely, falseness to Him who is above the heavens, and "putteth His glory upon or above the heavens," Ps. viii. 2;

"Who looketh down (stoopeth down לְרֹאשׁוֹ), (הַמִּשְׁפִּיל לְרֹאשׁוֹ), to see even the things in the heavens," Ps. cxlii. 6. DELITZSCH's rendering gehuechelt, plays the hypocrite, fails to meet the idea.

<sup>36</sup> Ver. 30. No, no (οὐκ οὐκ). Another of those impassioned outbreaks, driving the speaker from the more even hypothetical style of denial. See Note 24, ver. 18. He will not even allow it as a supposition that he could have done so. In such a case, not only acts, but words and thoughts of evil were kept under strictest guard. The same breach comes again, ver. 32. The irregularity increases with the passion. Sentences are commenced and left unfinished; a vehement protasis has no apodosis; strong parenthetical appeals every where break in, and when the general vindication is resumed, it is in another strain, and apparently lacking any direct connection with what preceded the broken utterance. It has led some commentators to talk of interpolations and displacements; and, what seems most strange, this is often done by those who are fondest of characterizing the book as "a work of art," and who have most to say, in a patronizing style, of "the genius of the old Dichter." The exceeding eloquence of the chapter is in these very irregularities. They are evidence of the highest art, or rather of that reality of which we have spoken as transcending all art. An evidence of this is the difficulty of putting it into English, and especially of giving it a right grammatical punctuation,—there are so many sentences apparently unfinished, and from which the speaker seems driven by the strong and wayward current of his conflicting emotions. The two most impassioned dramas in the world's literature are the Lear of SHAKESPEARE, and the Œdipus Coloneus of SOPHOCLES. In neither of them do we find anything that, for emotional eloquence, can be compared to this vindictory protest of Job.

<sup>37</sup> Ver. 32. The stranger. This first clause of ver. 32 may be taken as a continuation of what was said by the "men of his household," to whose testimony he appeals in the preceding verse. The 2d clause also (my doors, etc.) might be regarded as the same, in spirit, as though it had been,

- 33 If I, like Adam, mine offences hid,
My sin concealing in my secret breast,
34 Because I feared the rabble multitude,
Or scorn of families<sup>38</sup> affrighted me,
So that I kept my place and went not forth—
35 (O had I one to hear me now;
Behold my sign<sup>39</sup>—let Shaddai answer me;
Mine adversary—let him write<sup>40</sup> his charge.
36 Would I not on my shoulder<sup>41</sup> take it up,
And bind it to me as my crown?
37 The number of my steps<sup>42</sup> would I declare,
Yes, as a prince, would I draw nigh to him.)
38 Against me, if my land hath cried,<sup>43</sup>
And all its furrows wept,—
39 If I have eaten of its strength for nought,
Or made its toilers pant<sup>44</sup> away their life;—
40 Instead of wheat let there come forth the thorn,
And noxious weeds in place of barley grow;
Job's words are ended,<sup>45</sup> [he protests no more].

"his doors he opened," etc.; but Job's vehemence confounds the persons.

<sup>38</sup> Ver. 34. Scorn of families. קִשְׁפָּחוֹת, families, is used for men of families,—men of rank, of birth, in distinction from the common multitude, or רֶבֶךָ הַכֹּהֵן. Some take כִּי as the apodosis: Then let me dread, etc.; but there is very little ground for this in the particle, and what follows, if taken as apodosis, would be beneath the gravity of impressive adjurations: "If I have committed these crimes, then let me fear the great multitude, and the contempt of families, and keep to myself." CONANT and others render רֶבֶךָ הַכֹּהֵן the great assembly, as though it meant some great judicial proceeding, but the words do not favor this. We expect something different, if there is to be an apodosis at all. Had none been expressed, it would still have been most impressive, as in other scriptures, where it is left in silence to the moral judgment. There is, however, an express apodosis, although it does not come in until several verses after. In his wrought-up state, the speaker breaks off again, as he had done twice before, with an impassioned cry that could not wait: O why continue such appeals, why vindicate myself instead of calling on my accusers for their proofs,—and this leads immediately to what follows, ver. 35, "O had I one to hear me now."

<sup>39</sup> Ver. 35. Behold my sign. My signature, or my writing; the letter הָ being put for the alphabet, not for the sign of the cross as made by one who could not read nor write,—a custom which was long afterwards. Our translators regarded it as equivalent to אֲנִי my desire, but this makes a feeble sense, and is generally rejected.

<sup>40</sup> Ver. 35. Let him write. The preterite פָּתַח is really connected with יָתָן above: O that he had written—would that, etc., equivalent to imperative, 3d pers.

<sup>41</sup> Ver. 36. On my shoulder. Not, as some think, because of its supposed weight, whether actual or moral; but rather to give it a conspicuous position; or it may have been some ancient form of challenge.

<sup>42</sup> Ver. 37. The number of my steps, or of my stepplings, indicating a firm and steady walk. No irresolution; every step visible and capable of being counted. No shrinking and hiding away like Adam (see ver. 33). Very bold in Job, but very sublime. What there was in it that was wrong he sees afterwards, and most penitently confesses.

<sup>43</sup> Ver. 38. Against me cries: either on account of injustice in obtaining it, or on account of oppression to those who have cultivated its soil. The second idea is most evident in the second clause. Note again the Fut. Subjective, תִּזְעַק, repeated, constant action. The weeping is that of the unrequited serfs, or hired laborers who have ploughed its furrows and watered them with their tears. This is strengthened by the word יַחַד, altogether, everywhere alike, o'er all its furrows. Compare Jas. v. 4, "Behold the hire of the laborers that have reaped your fields, it crieth out." There is taken another view, not so probable, yet still having much force, that the reference is directly to the harassed land itself, to which a greedy and ill-judging avarice would not allow its demanded rest. So CARYL (among other interpretations) with reference to Lev. xx. 4, 5, on the land enjoying its Sabbath. It is, too, an old idea, and Job may have heard of it, which makes the earth the representative of justice, on account of its paying back most faithfully what is given to it, and the labors bestowed upon it. Hence the explanation of the two names Θέμις and Γαῖα which ÆSCHYLUS treats as a mystery. Prom. Vinc. 200, οὐκ ἀπαξ μόνον Θέμις καὶ Γαῖα, πολλῶν ὀνομάτων μορφή μία.

Justice and Earth, one form of many names.

This idea of earth's justice and impartiality is finely brought out by Virgil, Georgic, II., 460:

Fundit humo facilem victum JUSTISSIMA TELLUS.

It is very poetical, this representing the just Earth as weeping for the injustice done to her. It is, however, no less so if we regard the passage as referring to the laborers. The two ideas are closely connected.

<sup>44</sup> Ver. 39. Or made its toilers pant. This may not sound well to those accustomed to a different mode of translating. DELITZSCH and others render it: "I have caused the soul of its possessors to expire." (So E. V.) The verb הִפְחִיחַ is also used to denote scornful treatment, as in Ps. x. 5, "all his enemies he puffeth at them," פָּחַח בָּנָם; the preposition there making but very little difference in the general idea. It might perhaps be rendered here, "I have blown away, puffed at, treated as wind, or worthless, the breath (that is, the laboring, panting breath) of the laborers." These may properly be called פָּחַח from the idea of some right in the soil derived from having mingled with it their sweat and tears.

<sup>45</sup> Ver. 40. Thus end. These words have been generally regarded as merely a note made by the author, or some very early transcriber. There is cited, as a similar case, the words Ps. lxxii. 10: "The prayers of David the son of Jesse, are ended." There is no doubt that this was an early practice of translators and transcribers. A formula just like it is attached to the books of the Peschito Syriac Version, Old Testament and New; very much as finis used to be put to the end of English books. There is, however, an impressive propriety in this last clause regarded as the closing words of Job himself, and his using his own name this once adds to its force. As though he had said: "This is my vindication; I have done; you will hear from Job no more." It is true, he speaks afterwards, but it is under remarkable circumstances, xl. 3; xlii. 1-6, and even then he seems to have reference to some former close he had made (אחת דברתי) and repeats again: "I will add no more."

If, however, it be decided that these words are put to the end of the chapter by a third person, either author or early transcriber, it would seem almost conclusive against the idea that in that ancient time there immediately followed the address of Jehovah, chap. xxxviii. Such an immediate answer from the thundercloud (though no such cloud or storm had been mentioned) would have rendered them impertinent and superfluous as a note to the reader. They bear the intimation that Job's part in the drama is, for the present, closed, but only as suggestive of other human speakers (whether the old or some new one) who are to follow. Thus it furnishes a preparation for the speech of Elihu. If in our present copies, chap. xxxviii., followed directly after ch. xxxi., we could not help feeling the incongruity of such a note, so made by author or transcriber, and it would long ago have been rejected as most decidedly out of place.

CHAPTER XXXII.

- 1 So these three men ceased from answering Job because he was wise in his own
- 2 eyes. Then was aroused the zeal of Elihu,<sup>1</sup> son of Barachel the Buzite, of the family of Ram.<sup>2</sup> Against Job was his zeal aroused because he accounted him-
- 3 self more<sup>3</sup> just than God. And against his three friends was his zeal kindled,
- 4 because they had found no answer, and yet had condemned Job. Now Elihu
- 5 had waited till Job had spoken, because they were older than he. And Elihu
- saw that there was no answer in the mouth of the three men, and his zeal was
- 6 kindled. Then answered Elihu, the son of Barachel the Buzite, and said :

I am but young in years,

And ye are very old.

It was for this I shrunk<sup>4</sup> away,

And feared to show you what I thought.

- 7 For days should speak, I said,

And multitude of years should wisdom teach.

- 8 But surely there's a<sup>5</sup> spirit dwells in man,

'Tis Shaddai's breath that gives intelligence.

- 9 Not always wise, the men of many<sup>6</sup> years;

Elders there are who fail to know the right.

- 10 For this I said: "O listen now to me, Let me, too, show my knowledge, even me."<sup>7</sup>

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 2. Elihu. On the genuineness of this Elihu portion, see INTRODUCTION, THEISM OF THE BOOK, pa. 89, and especially the marginal note, pp. 26, 27.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 2. Family of Ram. The genealogy of Elihu is here given, but not a word is said about the way and time of his introduction into the Drama. It is left to the reader's imagination, along with other things, such as the probable place of the dialogue, the number of days and nights that may have been occupied with the discussion. How many persons may have come and gone during this time, or been present throughout, cannot be told. There is something in the xix. 13-15-19 that seems to intimate an occasional presence and departure of kinsmen and others. It seems, however, almost certain that if some later hand had wholly interpolated this episode, he would have explained, in some way, the connection, had it been only to make it seem natural and consistent. The original writer would have felt no such responsibility, as he would have feared no such charge of inconsistency. He would have felt that the story was his own, to give in his own way, or as he received it, without an obligation to fill up any blanks or omissions as others might conceive them.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 2. More just than God. UMBREIT renders: Wen er sich für gerecht hielt vor Gott. Job, he says, had never claimed to be more just than God. Still his language suggested such an inference, and such a charge against him on the part of Elihu, even though a mistaken one. DELITZSCH renders it, auf Kosten Gottes—"at the expense of God."

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 6. I shrunk away. The primary idea of נָחַס is that of an animal that creeps, or winds like a serpent, into his hole, and is reluctant to come out again. The cognate נָחַס becomes the common Syriac verb to fear instead of נָחַס.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 8. A spirit. The lowest and most naturalizing exegesis is compelled to give רוּחַ here a high spiritual sense. If not the Divine Spirit, it is that in man which is most akin to it—the rational principle, or the Reason, in the highest sense that can be given to the word. See Gen. ii. 7.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 9. Many years. רַב is taken by most commentators with reference to age. The בְּנֵי־יָמִים are not the great in rank or magnitude, but the πολυχρονοί—still, however, carrying the idea of superiority, as COMANT says.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 10. Even me. Nothing can be more unjust, and, at the same time, more uncritical than the charge some German commentators delight to make against Elihu as an incoherent, as well as forward and impertinent babbler. He does, indeed, seem to repeat himself, but it is this very sincere diffidence that causes it. They are neither affected nor cringing apologies he makes. It is the hesitating feeling of a thoughtful yet modest young man, deeply interested in the discussions to which he has been intently listening, conscious of having something to say which is worth their hearing, and yet with a true reverence for persons not only older, but esteemed wiser, than himself. The introduction and the speech that follows are certainly most characteristic; and if this be proof of artistic merit, it may be said that, in this respect, there is nothing surpassing it in the drama.

- 11 Lo! I have waited while ye spake;
To all your reasonings have I given<sup>8</sup> heed,
Whilst<sup>9</sup> ye were trying words.
- 12 Yes, unto you with earnest thought I look,
And lo, there's no one that convinces Job,—
No one of you who truly answers him.
- 13 Beware<sup>10</sup> of saying, we have wisdom<sup>11</sup> found;
(Know ye) 'tis God that crushes him, not man.
- 14 At me he hath not marshalled<sup>12</sup> words,
Nor with your speeches will I answer him.
- 15 All broken down, they fail to make reply;
(Some power) hath taken<sup>13</sup> all their words away.
- 16 And still I waited, though<sup>14</sup> they did not speak,
But silent stood,<sup>15</sup> and offered no reply.
- 17 I too<sup>16</sup> would answer, I would bear my part;
Let me, too, show my thought.
- 18 For I am filled with words;
The spirit in my breast<sup>17</sup> constraineth me.
- 19 My heart<sup>18</sup> is full, as with unvented wine;
Like vessels new that are about to burst.
- 20 Yes, I would speak<sup>19</sup> that I may find relief—
Open my lips, and give it utterance.
- 21 O let me not regard the face of man;
To no one let me flattering titles<sup>20</sup> give.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 11. Given heed. Clearly intimating that he had been present during the whole discussion.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 11. Whilst.  $\kappa\alpha\iota$ , like  $\kappa\alpha\iota$  in Greek, may mean until, as long as, or whilst. The latter seems preferable here as more suited to the context.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 13. Beware,  $\pounds$  implying caution with an ellipsis of some verb—lest ye do it—that is, take care, look out lest ye do it. Just so the Greeks use  $\mu\eta$  and sometimes  $\sigma\omega\varsigma$ , Latin ne. See another example Gen. iii. 22,  $\pounds$  יִשְׁלַח  $\pounds$ : "lest he send forth his hand," etc.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 13. We have wisdom found: that is, discovered the truth in Job's case. Elihu's language in the second clause is a denial of this: You have not found out the secret; it is one of God's mysteries. He crushes him, not man, or in the way of, or after the notions of men.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 14. Marshalled words. Bitter, hostile, controversial words, set in battle array, as it were. Such is the force of  $\pounds$ . "There is nothing in the way of my answering Job carefully and candidly."

with reference to Ps. xlix. 15; Luke xlii. 20, and other similar places. The same general explanation answers here. Most commonly, as we have seen, there is, in such cases, something terrible or revolting in the subject, or agent, which suppresses mention. Again, it is something perplexing, astounding, inexplicable, suggesting the idea of strange, mysterious influences. It would be just the place here for such an idiom: "Something seems to have taken away their power of speech;" referring to their strange and prolonged silence. The words in brackets are an attempt to give the idea implied in this particular idiom. SCHLOTTMANN would explain it by Gen. xii. 8; xxvi. 22, where  $\pounds$  gets the sense of moving on, from the action of putting up the pegs that fastened down the tent. Hence he renders it, not passively, but intransitively: das Wort war ihnen entwichen, "the word was gone from them; it moved away." This, however, seems like putting a great strain upon the metaphor. It may apply to a tent; but it would be very strange as used of words.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 16. Though they did not speak.  $\pounds$  as causal, or as giving a reason, may be taken in two ways, according as the context demands. It may give a reason for, and then it is rendered for or because. Or it may be a reason against, and then it must be rendered though, or notwithstanding. See the numerous examples of the latter given by NOLDIUS.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 16. But silent stood. The particle  $\pounds$  is repeated here, but the asyndetic rendering is more forcible in English, and therefore more true to the spirit of the passage. This picture of Elihu is most faithful to the life, and could hardly have come from anything else than an actual life scene. The young man has been intently listening. His breast is alternately swelled with indignation at the treatment Job experiences from his professed friends, and with wondering awe at some of the bold language of the sufferer. Yet still he constrains himself. Even after they had ceased speaking, the reverential feeling felt to be due to his elders holds him silent, although his thoughts and emotions are becoming irrepressible. It is a very frigid criticism that overlooks the exquisite naturalness of this scene, takes no heed of the speaker's unaffected embarrassment, and treats him as a mere stammerer, repeating over and over again, his platitudes and tautologies.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 17. I, too,  $\pounds$  אֲנִי. It recurs twice in the two clauses, not as the language of egotism, but of sincere modesty, hesitating, embarrassed, repeating, but with a consciousness of having truth that had been overlooked, and an irrepressible desire to utter it.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 18—19. Breast—heart. The most faithful rendering of  $\pounds$  in these places is that which modernizes them, that is, translates by transferring the idiom as well as the words. The Hebrews and the Arabians both use this word (commonly rendered the belly) for the most interior seat of thought and feeling, like the bowels and the reins. See Note 3, ver. 2, ch. xv., and the references there made to Prov. xxii. 27; Heb. iv. 12.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 20. Yes I would speak. Paragoric or optative future.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 21. Flattering titles give. The Hebrew  $\pounds$  is almost identical with the Arabic verb of the same consonants, which is very common in the sense of naming, especially used of surnames, cognomina, or titles; hence denoting metonymy, or the expressing a thing by some other

22 I know not how to flatter; were it so,
Then would my Maker take me soon away.

name than its own, or the usual one. In this way the noun also among the Rabbinical Grammarians כְּנִי is the word becomes in Arabic a grammatical and rhetorical technic. So for epithet, periphrase, pronoun.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

- 1 And now,<sup>a</sup> O Job, but listen to my speech.—
Thine ear attentive to my every word.
- 2 Behold I have unbarred<sup>b</sup> my mouth;
My tongue gives utterance<sup>c</sup> distinct.
- 3 My words—they are my soul's sincerity;<sup>d</sup>
The truth I know, my lips do purely<sup>e</sup> speak.
- 4 God's spirit made me man;<sup>f</sup>
'Twas Shaddai's breath that gave me life.
- 5 If thou canst do it, answer me;
Array<sup>g</sup> thy words against me, take thy stand.
- 6 To God<sup>h</sup> belongs my being, like<sup>i</sup> thine own;

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. And now, O Job. Still the excusing, deferential tone so becoming in the young man. אֵינִי a strong adversative particle,—οὐ γὰρ δὲ ἀλλὰ, LXX.—notwithstanding my youth. DELITZSCH, Jedoch aber. My every word כָּל דְּבָרִי: "As though he had said, I hope I shall not speak one needless word,—not a word beside the business." CARYL.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 2. Unbarred my mouth. Justice to this wise and godly young man, whom some critics treat so injuriously, demands an interpretation of his words that will not make them a flat tautology, such as he never could have intended. As shown by the context, פָּתַחְתִּי here means more than simply opening. It is an unclosing of what had been shut or barred. CARYL gives the key to it: "the phrase opening the mouth, here importeth that he had been long silent." See Note <sup>15</sup>, ver. 16, xxxii. Unable to repress (see chap. xxxii. 18, 19) he opens it at last. The emphasis we have given to the word is justified by the particle הִנֵּה calling attention to the fact of his venturing to speak at all in the presence of his elders.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 2. Gives utterance distinct. The second clause, rendered as is done by E. V. and others: "my tongue hath spoken in my mouth," or my palate, would make a like tautology, or rather empty platitude. "How should a man speak but with his mouth?" asks CARYL in view of such a rendering. UMBRETT remarks most characteristically: Es ist hier zu deutlich dass der Verfasser unseres Buches den Elihu absichtlich als einen eingebildeten Schwätzer sich geberden lässt. He does not go with those who reject the Elihu portion, as EWALD does, but thinks that the author meant to represent the speaker as talking like a conceited fool. Our old Puritan commentator shows a keener insight into such shades of difference and matters of emphasis than many modern critics who underrated or wholly ignore him. He regards "speaking in or by the palate" as a phrase for well considered utterance, or the use of carefully chosen words. The idea is well supported from the fact that the palate is the organ of taste as well as of utterance, and that so universally in language is there this transfer of idea from the sense taste to the mental discernment (Lat. sapio, sapiens, Heb. אָכַל): "So saith Elihu, my mouth hath spoken in my palate, I tasted my words before I spoke them." The word tongue, however, suggests another idea. The palate, in connection with the tongue and its motions, is an organ of articulate speech in distinction from the confused and the stammering. So COCCURUS: disertis verbis, distincte et enucleate. Notwithstanding his diffidence and hesitation, he gets confidence at last to speak distinctly, and with what wisdom, this chapter and the following clearly show, notwithstanding the disparagement of UMBRETT and EWALD. The attempts to give force to the language, aside from the two ideas mentioned, avail but little to save the tautology. Says DELITZSCH: "He has already opened his mouth, his tongue is already in motion,—they are circumstantial statements that solemnly inaugurate what follows." SCHLOTTMANN's comment is to a similar effect. DILLMANN, "die Zunge in Gaumen denotes that he is just ready to speak," like the bow to sprang, etc.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 3. Purely. כְּנִי taken adverbially may carry an intellectual or a moral sense,—speaking clear and distinct, or sincere and true. The last suits the passage best, though both may be included.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 4. Made me man. Elihu undoubtedly takes the words according to the obvious idea of Gen. ii. 7. It is not mere breath, or breathing. It is the manner of making him specifically man, as something distinct from the formation of what may be called the human physical, whether by processes of typical growth, or by evolution, or by direct mechanical creation. "And God breathed into him and man became," or, he "became man, a living soul." Other animals are called נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה breath of life, but they become animated from the general life of nature, or the רוּחַ "that brooded upon the face of the waters." But it was in a more divine or special way, or by a peculiar fiat, that man became נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה. The emphasis is on the manner of becoming. Thus he became man. This higher life directly from God is his specific distinction, that which makes the species אָדָם, homo, in distinction from other animal tribes who are nothing but animals. See LANOE, Gen. Am. Ed., pp. 174, 211, Marginal Notes.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 5. Array thy words. See xxxii. 14, עָרַךְ מִלִּין.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 6. To God my being. לֵאלֹהִי. RENAN, Devant Dieu je suis ton égal. But this can hardly be what Elihu means to assert, and it would have little association with the second clause. Literally, Godward, if we would imitate the conciseness of the Hebrew; as regards God, or in respect to the Divine side of our common being.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 6. Like thine own. כַּפִּיךָ. The rendering of E. V.: according to thy wish. or thy mouth, etc., comes from regarding כִּי, כַּ as separate and taking it literally. It is, however, only an intense form of the comparative particle

- And I, too, was divided<sup>10</sup> from the clay.
 7 Behold, my terror shall not frighten thee,
 Nor heavy shall my hand<sup>11</sup> upon thee press.
 8 But surely thou hast spoken in mine ears;
 The sound of words I hear [they seem to say]:
 9 "A man without transgression—pure am I;
 Yes, I am clean<sup>12</sup>—I have no sin.
 10 Against me, Lo He seeketh grounds<sup>13</sup> of strife;
 He counts me as his foe;
 11 My feet He putteth in the stocks,
 And watcheth all my ways."
 12 Behold, in this, I answer thee, thou art not just;
 For know, Eloah is too<sup>14</sup> great for man.
 13 O why against Him dost thou make complaint,
 That by no word of His<sup>15</sup> he answereth?
 14 For God does speak—He speaketh once<sup>16</sup>—
 Again, again—though man regard it not;
 15 In dreams, in visions of the night,
 In slumberings on the bed;
 When falls on men the overwhelming<sup>17</sup> sleep.

occurring in a number of places in the old, and becoming quite common in the later Hebrew. כ and כפ are to each other like as and as in Greek (as, and just as). Our translators were led to this to justify their rendering of לל, "in God's stead," or as one representing him. But this is without authority in the usage of the preposition ל. DELITZSCH, ZÖCKLER, CONANT and others render: "I am of God as thou art," which is in substance the idea conveyed by the words employed: We stand to God in the same way and in both respects—soul from His spirit—body from the clay, or as a "lump taken from the clay." GESIENUS, Sicut tu a Deo (creatus sum).

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 6. Divided. The Hebrew קר is used of the biting of the lips, Prov. xvi. 30, of the winking of the eyes, Prov. vi. 13; x. 10; Ps. xxxv. 19. Hence Lexicographers deduce as a primary sense that of cutting, which connects it with verbs of forming or creating. So GESIENUS regards it, De luto decerpit sum et ego, imagine a figulo repetita qui vasculum formaturus luti partem de massa decerpit. Hence from it a noun in Syriac denoting a crumb, frustum, or piece of anything. This will be more easily accepted when we bear in mind how much this idea of division, separating one thing, or one element, from another, enters into the language of Genesis 1. Each step is a parting of something from that with which it before was blended—a rising above, or an evolution from. We need not be in the least afraid of this kind of language, of which some scientists are now so fond, as long as we hold to the idea of a commencing flat, or of an outgoing word. Whether through longer or shorter stages, man's physical, man's animal or earthly, is a cutting, out of nature; a Divine elevation, not a salus or leap.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 7. My hand. אכח occurs only here, but its etymological affinity to כח, and the parallelism presented to xlii. 21, where the second clause is precisely like the first here, and כח stands in it just as אכח stands here, would seem to put the matter beyond doubt. Of the ancient authorities the Targum and the Syriac give it the sense of burden, connecting it probably with כפח to bend, or bow down. The LXX. render it hand, and with that agrees the great Jewish authority KIMCHI. RASCHI renders it כפית, and explains it by Prov. x. 26, אכח עליו פיהו.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 9. Clean. חה has the sense of smoothness, from the primary idea of friction in the verb חפה. Hence חוף, the shore of the sea, the beach worn clean by the washing of the waters.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 10. Grounds of strife. תנאות. See the word and its root, Numb. xiv. 34; xxxii. 7. Elihu is now pressing Job with allusions to some of his rash speeches. Says CARYL: "Having ended his sweet, ingenious, insinuating preface, he falls roundly to the business, and begins a very sharp charge."

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 12. Too great for man. This rendering answers well to the comparative כ, and yet is not the same as the proposition: God is greater than man." As a naked fact, or truism, that could hardly be what Elihu meant to assert; but rather that God's acknowledged greatness made such language as Job had used, very unseemly. He is too great a being, to say nothing of his holiness and other attributes, to be addressed in that manner. So DELITZSCH: Denn zu erhaben ist Eloah dem Sterblichen.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 13. By no word of his. More literally, that not a word of his he answereth, making דבריו the direct object of יענה, as 1 Kings xviii. 21, וְלֹא עָנָה דָּבָר, and they answered not a word (the same Isai. xxxvi. 21; Jerem. xlii. 4; xlv. 20). This is the rendering of SCHLOTTMANN:—

Warum hast mit ihm du g-hadert, dass kein einzig Wort er erwiederte—making a universal negative according to the Hebrew idiom. E. V. and the older commentators generally, render כ (2d clause) for or because: "Why strive, since he giveth no account," etc. The view adopted by DELITZSCH, SCHLOTTMANN, ZÖCKLER, et al., making כ denote the ground of Job's charge (why complain that he does not) harmonizes better with the verse following. Along with this view of כ, however, DELITZSCH and ROSENUELLER take דבריו as denoting, generally, deeds, dealings. But here, too, the rendering of SCHLOTTMANN is to be preferred for the same reason, or as agreeing better with the peculiar diction of ver. 14. Job complained that God did not answer him—did not speak—xix. 7; xxx. 20. Elihu says God does speak to man. There is also some discussion respecting the pronoun in דבריו. HIRZEL would refer it to אנוש, man generally. Some would understand it of Job, as though Elihu, in his earnestness, suddenly changed to the 3d person (his for thine), forgetting himself and speaking of Job instead of to him. The rendering given has the least difficulty. It makes Job's charge and Elihu's answer, each more clear and direct.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 14. Speaketh once. נכחת. DELITZSCH renders, "in one way;" but it comes to the same thing. As opposed to בשתית means more than once—repeatedly.

Comp. xl. 5.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 15. Overwhelming sleep. GESIENUS makes ררר an onomatopoe, from the morning (stertor) of heavy sleep—comparing it in this respect with the Latin domio, and the

- 16 Then opens He their ear,
And seals the warning given ;
17 To make<sup>18</sup> man put away his deed,
To hide from man<sup>18</sup> the way of pride.
18 That from the pit He may keep back his soul,
His life from passing on the spear.
19 With anguish is he chastened on his bed—
His every<sup>20</sup> bone—a never-ceasing pain ;
20 So that his very life<sup>21</sup> abhorreth bread,
His appetite<sup>22</sup> rejects the once<sup>23</sup>-loved food.
21 His flesh, from sight, it wastes away ;
His bones laid bare, before concealed<sup>24</sup> from view.
22 Unto perdition<sup>25</sup> draweth nigh his soul ;
His life awaits the messengers of<sup>26</sup> death.
23 And is there then an angel<sup>27</sup> on his side,—
The interceding one,—of thousands chief,—
To make it known to man,<sup>28</sup> His righteousness ;
24 So does He show him grace, and say :
“ Deliver him from going down to death ;
A ransom<sup>29</sup> I have found.”
25 Moist as in childhood<sup>30</sup> grows his flesh again,
And to his youthful day does he return.

Greek σάβανον. Sleep, however, thus regarded, is not favorable to the clear undisturbed dreaming or vision here demanded. Better take as primary the sense which the Niphal has, Dan. viii. 18 : x. 9 : Psalm lxxvi. 7, of awe, astonishment (Vulg. consternatus) denoting a trance-like state. See the note on this word iv. 13, and the reference there to the Introduction. Here it may be less clairvoyant, but it clearly denotes something different from ordinary slumber, and that ordinary dreaming which comes from a semi-consciousness of something affecting us from the outer world around us. On the other hand, the dreams here spoken of are supposed to come from within the soul itself, as from its deeper being, or as the voice of God in it, or from some plane above, when the sleep is of such a nature that the outer world is wholly excluded.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 17. To make man put away. The syntactical harmony of this verse is preserved, without any change of subject, by giving to the Niphal הִסְתִּיר a double, or an intensive causal force, such as it will bear, and which the context seems to demand. It may thus be regarded as having a double object, אָרָם and כַּעֲשֵׂה.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 18. To hide from man. The hero or mighty man (גִּבּוֹר) in distinction from (אָרָם). Some ellipsis seems demanded with וְהָיָה, such as look, way, or deed of pride. It seems to resemble the Greek ὑψηλός, denoting haughty, reckless action, rather than mere feeling. So כַּעֲשֵׂה in the last clause would denote a bad deed. See Note 12, ver. 11, chap. xxxi., on Heb. וְהָיָה, Lat. facinus, Greek ἔργον. SCHLOTTMANN gives schcheiden, to divide, separate, as the rendering of כָּסַף, but that seems to destroy the metaphor—covering, hiding, veiling, putting it away from his sight, or giving it a different appearance.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 19. His every bone. The Holem vowel in רוּחַ shows the true rendering, making it exactly like iv. 14. The other reading moreover, is made very clear by comparison with iv. 14—the multitude of his bones: an expressive mode of saying, every bone of the many bones in his body, great and small. Anatomy reveals how numerous they are, and, before precise anatomical knowledge, the number seemed, perhaps, still greater. It should be remembered, too, how abrupt the style is. Elihu seems moved by his own description, and his language becomes passionate, leaving out the verbal copula: His every bone—pain unceasing.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 20. His very life. This use of חַיָּה, life for soul, is unusual, but the parallelism with נַפְשׁוֹ makes it clear. It is meant to be intensive: the very life which the food would sustain rejects it.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 20. Appetite. So נֶפֶשׁ is used Prov. vi. 30 ; x. 3, 27 ; xxvii. 7 : Isai. lv. 2.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 21. Before concealed from sight. So the Vulg. renders לֹא רָאָה as a relative or descriptive clause (which are not seen). In like manner JUNIUS and TREMELIUS, and most of the old commentators. DELITZSCH, SCHLOTTMANN, EWALD, take רָאָה directly: they are not seen.

They either connect it with שָׁפָן, making two distinct assertions: his bones are bare, they are not seen; which seems a contradiction, unless by bare is meant wasted away, and so disappearing, which is not an easy view; or they take the Kethib here, שָׁפָן, as the noun subject: seine verstörten Glieder, DELITZSCH; seine dürrer Gebel, SCHLOTTMANN; ses os dénudés s'évanouissent, RENAN. The old way of taking it as a relative clause is much easier than in some other places where that method of interpretation is freely adopted, but the strong argument for it is the harmony it makes in the parallelism: His flesh once seen, so plump and fair, now wasted out of view; his bones once closely covered by the flesh, now projecting, thrusting themselves out to view, as it were, “looking and staring at him,” as Ps. xxii. 18. ÜNBREIT very concisely and clearly: und kahl wird sein Gebel das man vorher nicht sehen konnte. For שָׁפָן see, in Niphal, Isai. xlii. 2—used of a mountain bare and projecting. The corresponding Syriac and Arabic words have the same meaning.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 22. Perdition. שְׁחָתָה means more than the grave here, or corruption. The idea is not distinct, but it is that of some great loss,—something terrible connected with the thought of the going out of the life.

<sup>30</sup> Ver. 25. In childhood. כַּנְעֹנָר here in כַּנְעֹנָר is not comparative but causal. DELITZSCH.

- 26 He prays to God and God accepts his prayer,
To let him see His face with joy,
And thus give back to man his righteousness.<sup>31</sup>
- 27 It is his song<sup>32</sup> to men, and thus it says :
" I sinned, I made my way perverse,<sup>33</sup>
And it was not requited<sup>34</sup> me ;
- 28 My soul hath He redeemed from passing to the grave,
My life that it may yet behold the light."
- 29 Behold ! in all these ways, so dealeth God,
Time after time,<sup>35</sup> and times again, with man ;
- 30 His soul to rescue from the grave,
That it may joy<sup>36</sup> in light,—the light of those who live.
- 31 Attend, O Job, give ear to me ;
Be still<sup>37</sup> that I may speak.
- 32 If thou hast words, then answer me ;
Speak out ; my wish is thy defence.
- 33 If not, then give to me thine ear ;
Be still, if I may wisely counsel thee.

<sup>31</sup> Ver. 26. His righteousness. Man's righteousness objectively ; but the righteousness of God, to whom the pronoun may be referred in the sense of God's dealings with man in return (וְיָשָׁר) for man's dealings towards him,—or righteousness and mercy for unrighteousness. See remarks on יָשָׁר Ver. 23, in Excursus XI., p. 210.

<sup>32</sup> Ver. 27. It is his song. שִׁיר from שָׁר — שָׁר ; he chants or sings. It is now the commonly admitted view of the word. This deliverance becomes his song of holy rejoicing. Thereby as the Psalmist does, he tells men, " what the Lord hath done for his soul," at the same time most humbly confessing his sin. Compare also xxxv. 10 ; Songs in the night—or season of sorrow.

<sup>33</sup> Ver. 27. Make my way perverse. Lit., pervert, or make crooked the straight.

<sup>35</sup> Ver. 29. Time after time. The dual פַּעַמַּיִם. Lit., two strokes, blow after blow, thus coming to be used for changes, turns (vices) vicissitudes—שְׁלֹשׁ פַּעַמַּיִם two times,—three times—repeatedly.

<sup>36</sup> Ver. 30. That it may joy in light. DELITZSCH : Und mein Leben labt sich am Lichte. Compare the expressions Ecclesiastes and elsewhere, in which seeing the light is equivalent to life. See INT. THEISM., p. 5. לְאֹרֶךְ לְהָאֹר, Inf. Niphal—be made light.

<sup>37</sup> Ver. 31. Be still. The language would seem to intimate some impatience,—a look or gesture of dissent or appeal. There is much in this speech of Elihu that suggests the idea of a real life scene. See INT. THEISM., p. 39.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

- 1 And Elihu continued his reply and said :
- 2 Hear, O ye wise, my words ;
Ye knowing ones give me your ear.
- 3 It is the ear that trieth speech,
As tastes the palate<sup>1</sup> food.
- 4 Let us then make the right our choice,<sup>2</sup>
And aim to know between us what is good.
- 5 For Job saith, " I am innocent ;
'Tis God who puts away my cause.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 4. Our choice. בָּחַר, to examine, but in order to choose. So the Greek δοκιμάζεν καὶ τὸ καλὸν κατέχειν. 1 Thess. v. 20. The paragogic futures, in both clauses, express aim, desire.

- 6 Against my right shall I speak what is false?
Sore is my wound, but from no crime of mine.”
- 7 Where is the mighty<sup>3</sup> man like Job?
Who like the water drinketh scorning down;
- 8 Who<sup>4</sup> joins the malefactor's band,
And walks the way of wicked men.
- 9 For he has said: “It does no good to man,
That he should take delight in God.”
- 10 To this,<sup>5</sup> ye wise of heart, my answer hear:
Away the thought;<sup>6</sup> O far be God from wickedness;
O far be evil from the Almighty One.
- 11 For sure, the work of man, to him will He requite,
And make him find according to his way.
- 12 Yea, verily,<sup>7</sup> God will not do the wrong;
The Almighty One cannot pervert the right.
- 13 Who gave<sup>8</sup> to Him the charge of earth,
And on it built the world?
- 14 Should He think only of Himself,<sup>9</sup>—
His breath and spirit (from the world) withdraw,—
- 15 All flesh together would expire,<sup>10</sup>
And man go back to dust.
- 16 O could'st thou see it!<sup>11</sup> list to this,
Give ear unto my words.
- 17 A hater of the right; does he (the world) restrain?<sup>12</sup>
The Just, the Mighty—Him shalt thou condemn?<sup>13</sup>
- 18 Even to a king shall one say Belial?<sup>14</sup>

<sup>3</sup> ver. 7. Mighty man. גִּבּוֹר. Elihu seems to have some admiration of Job's bold, heroic bearing, though censuring him. גִּבּוֹר may refer to his haughty repelling of the charges made against him, or to his mode of speaking of God.

<sup>4</sup> ver. 8. Who joins, etc. Elihu does not charge this literally, but only as the tendency of Job's language.

<sup>5</sup> ver. 10. To this. לָכֵן is more special than עַל כֵּן. It is a reply to something just said, and prompting an answer that cannot be suppressed. See the example, chap. xx. 2, where it denotes Zophar's haste to reply to Job's bold speech at the close of the preceding chapter: לָכֵן, for so—to such a speech as that, I make haste to answer. This is implied in שָׁמַעְתִּי: hear what I have to say to this—prompter-er.

<sup>6</sup> ver. 10. Away the thought. This is the answer he is impatient to give. חָלַלָה, O profanum; a vehement protest. The best translation is that which gives it most strongly and clearly without attempting to imitate the almost untranslatable Hebrew construction. The thought of a God of wickedness is not to be tolerated for a moment. The idea of Omnipotence connected with that of injustice is still more horrible. It is to be protested against, not argued about.

<sup>8</sup> ver. 13. Who gave. “A mere viceroy might do wrong, but the Supreme Ruler is in a different position.” So DELITZSCH and others. The argument, however, seems to be a higher one. It is simply the a priori idea of the moral sense. We cannot reason about it. So Abraham, Gen. xviii. 25:

Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? חָלַלָה לֵךְ, far be it from Thee, Lord.

<sup>9</sup> ver. 14. Of himself. E. V. and others regarded אֵלַי as referring to man. לֵב יָשִׁים, put his mind upon him, (προσέχει νοῦν τινί), that is in the way of judgment. The interpretation given above is that of GROTIUS, and has since been generally followed. See SCHLOTTMANN, DELITZSCH, et al. The statement is in proof of the Divine benevolence. His continuation of the universe is an evidence of it.

<sup>10</sup> ver. 15. Would expire. See Ps. civ. 29: “When thou takest away their breath (principle of life) they expire, (יָנֻעִין) gasp and return to their dust.” The source of life must be the fountain of all goodness.

<sup>11</sup> ver. 16. O could'st thou see it! DELITZSCH regards כִּי־נָה as the Imperative verb instead of a noun; but thinks the joining with it of the אַם, makes it equivalent to אִם תִּבִּין. E. V., and others, took it as a noun; but thus viewed it comes to about the same thing either way. It does not imply a reflection on Job as the E. V. rendering seems to do, but only an earnest wish that he could see things rightly. Elihu is very zealous and, at the same time, tender. This gives interest to his seeming repetitions, as it divests them of that tautological, prattling character, which some are fond of ascribing to him. It is a sufficient answer to all this jaunt criticism, that nowhere in the book, except in the address of the Almighty, are there to be found grander ethical and theological ideas: God cannot do wrong; It cannot be a deceiver of right that blinds the world in harmony; His very continuance of man and the world show this; O that Job's sufferings would allow him to see it. Nothing in the speeches of Eliphaz and Zophar comes up to this.

<sup>12</sup> ver. 17. Restrain. חָזַק is not the usual word for governing, but such a sense here would be analogous to the use of the similar word, נָצַר, to restrain, 1 Sam. x. 17, and אָכַר, to bind, Ps. cv. 22. In the usual sense of binding, which it has both in Hebrew and in Arabic, it would be very appropriate here. Elihu has reference to God's government in the most general sense, as the binding power of the universe. Injustice here would be anarchy and dissolution in the moral, as it would ultimately be in the physical world.

<sup>14</sup> ver. 18. Belial. בְּלִיעַל. The idea is best expressed by keeping the well understood epithet—worthlessness.

- To (earthly) powers, O wickedness ?
- 19 There's One who favors not the face of kings,
Who knoweth not the rich before the poor;
For His own hands did make them all alike.
- 20 So suddenly they die (these mighty ones);
At midnight rage the people—rush<sup>15</sup> they on—
And take away the strong; 'tis by no (human) hand.
- 21 For sure His eyes are on the ways of men;
He seeth all their steps.
- 22 No darkness<sup>16</sup> is there, yea, no shade of death,
Where men of evil deeds can hide themselves.
- 23 He needeth<sup>17</sup> not repeated scrutiny,
When man to God in judgment comes.
- 24 He breaks the strong, in ways we cannot trace;<sup>18</sup>
And setteth others in their stead.
- 25 To this end knoweth He their works;
He overturns them in the<sup>19</sup> night—they're crushed.
- 26 [Again],—He smites the wicked as they<sup>20</sup> stand,
In open place, where all behold the sight.
- 27 It is for this, because they turned aside,
And disregarded all His ways;
- 28 To bring before His<sup>21</sup> face the poor man's cry,
That He should hear the plaint of the oppressed.
- 29 When He gives quiet, who can then<sup>22</sup> disturb?

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 20. Rush they on. וַיִּעֲבְרוּ, and pass on; the rapid motion of a transported mob. It has also the sense of attack, as Nah. iii. 19; Ps. cxxiv. 2; Job xlii. 13, etc., in which cases, however, it is generally followed by עַל here unnecessary because the object is so clearly implied in the other verbs. Some take יִעֲבְרוּ passively with אֲבִיר for its passive subject. The other way is the easier, as well as the more vivid. The sudden and stormy rising of the people, (וַיִּעֲשׂוּ), VULGATE: in media nocte turbabantur populi, et pertransibant, et auferent violentem is the cause of the tyrant's dethronement. And yet, although it is the popular commotion which makes the visible and immediate cause, it is truly the hand of God which we may regard as the remote and unseen agency. Comp. Ps. xvii. 14, 15: כִּמְתִים יָדָהּ, from men, thy hand, כִּרְשָׁע חֲרָפָה, from the wicked thy sword. The truth has often had its illustration in modern as well as in ancient times. That Elihu means to represent it as God's doing, notwithstanding His seeming neglect, or His forbearance, appears from the words לֹא בָדָה, which can hardly have any other meaning, and is confirmed by the language of the verse following.

φύγῃν δὲ τοῦ
μῆτις γενέσθαι φῶτος ἀνόςτου βροτῶν.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 23. He needeth not. etc. This is the substantial meaning of the verse as given by EWALD, and as it is well explained by RENAN:

Dien n'a pas besoin de regarder l'homme deux fois,
Pour prononcer sur lui son jugement.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 24. Cannot trace. Lit., no searching (perscrutatio), לֹא חָקַר, adverbial negative phrase, inscrutably. The fact is seen, as in the midnight popular commotion, but the real hand that does it is invisible. Comp. Amos iii. 6, "Shall there be evil in a city and the Lord hath not done it?"

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 25. In the night. The same imagery as in ver. 20, suddenness and darkness; the hand unseen.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 26. As they stand. Lit.: Beneath the wicked He smites them, or if we take כָּפַק as a noun—beneath the wicked their blow. This expression רָחַת רָשָׁעִים, has been very variously rendered. רָחַת has been taken to mean, "as though they were wicked," or as wicked, or in place of wicked, or after the manner (DELITZSCH, nach Missethäter Art, or mit den Ruchlosen (SCHLOTTMANN); or רָשָׁעִים is made the plural of רָשָׁע, on account of, or as the price of their transgressions. These are all secondary senses of רָחַת coming from its primary sense of under, very much as υπο is used in Greek. But may not the difficulty here have arisen, as in other places, from overlooking the simple idea that comes from the exact literality? It is a second example, as is sought to be expressed by the word in brackets. The first was an unseen blow; this is an open one. Beneath the wicked smites he them—right where they stand—the very ground beneath their feet. Or רָחַת may mean their support, that which is under them—thus meaning their very limbs. This latter idea is strengthened by a comparison of Habakkuk iii. 16, וַתִּחַתֵּי אֲרֵנִי, I trembled beneath me, in my underneathing, my limbs or supports. Just so Homer uses υπο; in Iliad VII. 6 υπο γυια λεδυνται—his limbs relaxed beneath—not beneath his limbs; υπο used adverbially.

Thus regarded as two varying examples, לִילָה in verse 25, and the words בְּמִקּוֹם רָאִים in the 26th, are in direct contrast. Such a sudden and open blow at the very foundations, suggests the מַהֲפֶכֶה or upturning of Sodom and Gomorrah, which is RASCHT's idea.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 28. Before his face. The pronoun in עָלָי may perhaps refer to the sinner. In that case it should be rendered to bring upon him, the cry, the μῆτις, vengeance or retribution, of the poor. See Homer, Iliad XXII. 358; Odyss. XI. 73: μη τοι τε θεῶν μῆτις αὐγέωμαι.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 29. Disturb. Primary sense of רָשָׁע, whence that of wickedness. It is in evident contrast here with יִשְׁקֵט.

- Or who can trace Him, when He hides his face, Whether towards a nation or a man ?
- 30 Whether against<sup>23</sup> the ruling of the vile,
Or those who of the people make<sup>24</sup> a prey ?
- 31 For O had he but said<sup>25</sup> to God :
"I bear it.—I will not offend ;
- 32 Beyond what I behold, O teach thou me ;
Have I done evil, I will do no more."
- 33 On thine own terms,<sup>26</sup> shall He requite [and say],
"As thou dost spurn or choose [so be it], not as<sup>27</sup> I?"
- 34 Let men of understanding say,—
Or any strong and wise<sup>28</sup> who hears me now.
- 35 Job speaks in ignorance,
And without understanding are his words.
- 36 O would that Job were proved to the extreme,
For his replies like those of evil men.
- 37 For sure he adds rebellion to his sin ;
Among us in defiance claps his hands,
And still at God doth multiply his words.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 31. For, had he said. An elliptical expression of a wish, or of what Job ought to have done: Ah, had he said. The adversative sense of the כִּי denotes that he should have so said. It is, however, very difficult to preserve both in English, namely the chiding and the reason in the 'כִּי, and, at the same time, the regret and surprise expressed in the particle הִנֵּה which is exclamatory as well as interrogative. וְהָאֵל is not the infinitive Niphal, as some take it, but the Kal preterite and the exclamatory interrogative with Segol before a guttural with Quamets.

Elihu; but it makes a sudden change of person, which, though allowable in Hebrew, is too abrupt for a close English translation, without a preparation such as is supplied by the bracketed words, and say, in the first clause, or something equivalent.

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 34. Or any strong and wise. Lit., strong, wise man. וְהָאֵל is not used superfluously here, or tautologically. וְהָאֵל לְכָבֵד may be taken as referring to those present who claimed the reputation of wisdom from age, position, or otherwise, such as the friends who had been contending with Job. Elihu appeals to such, or to any other one in the audience who might be a man of note, or strength, (וְהָאֵל), though not professedly a וְהָאֵל or Sage. He appeals to all men of character and intelligence.

CHAPTER XXXV.

- 1 And Elihu<sup>1</sup> answered and said :
- 2 Dost thou hold this for right ?
Thou said'st, I am more just than God.
- 3 Yes—thou<sup>2</sup> dost say it : "what the gain to thee ?"
What profit have I, more than from my sin ?"
- 4 I answer thee ;
And thy companions<sup>3</sup> who take part with thee :
- 5 Look to the heavens and see ;
Behold the skies so high above thy head.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. And Elihu answered. This chapter follows on so closely and directly in the spirit of the preceding, and especially of its concluding verses, that it may well raise a question as to the genuineness, or antiquity, of this intervening statement.

particle of proof, as though Job had intimated some dissent by look or gesture. Such is the fair import of thy words; it cannot be denied.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 4. Thy companions. This cannot mean the three friends. As unlikely is the opinion of DEHRZSCH that

- 6 If thou hast sinned, what doest<sup>4</sup> thou to Him?
If many are thy sins, what doest thou to Him?
- 7 If thou art just, what givest thou to Him?
What profit from thy hand does He receive?
- 8 To one just like thyself pertains thy wrong;
Unto the son of man<sup>5</sup> thy righteousness.
- 9 "From hosts of men oppressed<sup>6</sup> the cries resound;"
[So sayest thou<sup>7</sup>]; "they groan beneath the tyrant's arm."
- 10 But no one saith,<sup>8</sup> "where is my maker God;
Who in the night<sup>9</sup> time giveth songs<sup>10</sup> of praise?
- 11 Who teacheth us beyond<sup>11</sup> the beasts of earth,
And makes us wiser than the birds of heaven."
- 12 Thus<sup>12</sup> is it that He hears not when they cry
By reason of the pride of evil men.
- 13 For God will not hear vanity;
Nor will the Almighty hold it in regard.
- 14 Yes, even<sup>13</sup> when thou sayest, thou seest Him not,
There is judgment still before Him—therefore wait.
- 15 But now, because His anger visits<sup>14</sup> not,

Elihu means the פְּעִיל of xxxiv. 36, and the פְּעִיל of xxxiv. 8, with whom Job is represented as joining himself. It is more probably a general challenge to all who might take his side in justifying such complaints.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 6. What doest thou to him? The expressions in the two Hebrew clauses are so alike that it would seem idle to seek diversity of translation. There is moreover a real impressiveness in the repetition: In either case, whether it be a single sin, as might seem implied in the preterite or aorist, וְאַתָּה, or many transgressions, or a life of transgression, what doest thou to Him? Such a contrast seems intended. The variance in the verbs, הַפְעַל הַפְעִיל, would seem to be rather for the sake of parallelistic rhythm than as intending any difference in the appeal. DELITZSCH: Wirk'st du auf ihn—thät'st du ihm.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 8. Son of man. It is in vain here to seek nice distinctions between אִישׁ and אָדָם.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 9. Oppressed. עֲשֻׁקִים here cannot be rendered oppressions. Amos iii. 9 gives it no countenance, and Ecclesiastes iv. 1 is against it, since, in the same verse, the word is used in its only proper sense of oppressed men. The noun however may be regarded as implied. The subject of the verb may in like manner be included. They do not cry out singly and apart, but from a great multitude of the oppressed. They cry out—men everywhere cry out, but not to God.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 9. (So sayest thou). The words in brackets simply express what is certainly intended by Elihu, namely to cite one of Job's speeches for comment, whether rightly understood or not. This reference is to what Job says generally, ch. xxiv., and especially in ver. 12, where almost the very words occur.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 10. But no one saith. It gives the reason why God does not hear: The oppressed no more acknowledge Him than do the oppressors. A godless humanitarianism cannot expect his favor. Both parties being alike deficient here, He lets things work their own cure in such ways as are so graphically described, xxxiv. 20. It is, however, the strongest mode of saying that He does hear those who fly to Him for relief and consolation in the night of suffering. Elihu was a sound political philosopher, as well as a devout theologian.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 10. The night time. Metaphorically, the time of sorrow and oppression.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 10. Songs of praise. Such is the special meaning of שִׁיר. "Songs in the night." Comp. Ps. xlii.

8; lxxvii. 6; cxix. 15; cxxxiv. 1; xvi. 7; Cant. iii. 1. For a specimen of rich and glorious practical exposition read the old Puritan CARYL on these Songs in the Night.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 11. Beyond: more than. Some render מִן from, instead of taking it as comparative: from the beasts, etc. On the metaphorical wisdom of the birds, see notes to xxviii. 7 and 21.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 12. Thus is it. שֶׁ (there) may denote condition as well as place and time: in such a case, or in such circumstances, or relations; as Ps. cxxiii. 3: שֶׁמֶן כִּי שָׁמַיִל for there (in such a state of things, that is, in the exercise of brotherly love) the Lord commended the blessing. The reference is not to the mountain there mentioned. See also Hos. vi. 7. The Hebrew order of the first clause of this verse is somewhat unusual. If strictly followed it would require this rendering:

Thus is it that they cry—and He hears not—
By reason of the pride of evil men.

But in that way the English reader might miss the sense; since כִּי, in the second clause, must clearly be connected with יִצְעֻקוּ they cry. To connect it with יִנְהַר as the ground of God's not hearing, would be meaningless and absurd.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 14. Yes, even when thou sayest. אֲךָ כִּי is often rendered much less, quanto minus, but here the sense is better reached by the rendering adopted. See DELITZSCH, who renders it although. Notwithstanding what Elihu says about God's not visiting, or strictly marking human wrong, he does not mean to teach the Divine indifference either to man's evil, or to his suffering. רִי לִפְנֵי; the cause is still before Him; judgment is with Him; in its own way and time it will appear. The reference is to what Job says, xxiii. 8.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 15. Visits not. אֵין has strictly a verbal sense, and is not a mere qualifying negative particle like לֹא. It simply denotes, it is not so, being the negation of the other verbal יֵשׁ, it is. Here, however, it is a more emphatic way of expressing the negation of פָּקַד: It is not the case that His anger visits, expressing the general truth rather than a particular fact, or a particular denial. Its being followed by לֹא shows that אֵין is not taken here by itself, for the prodoes to which פָּקַד, אֵין is the apodosis, as E. V. regards it: "because it is not so, therefore hath He visited in His anger." Such a view breaks up the whole argument of Elihu; as is also done by those who refer this, ver. 15, to God's visitation of Job. SCHLOTTMANN leaves it indefinite, and DELITZSCH regards it as doubtful. BENAN refers it to God's wider dealings:

- Nor strictly<sup>15</sup> marks wide-spread<sup>16</sup> iniquity, 16 Job fills his mouth with vanity,
 And without knowledge multiplieth words.

Mais, parce que sa colère ne s'exerce pas encore,
 Parce qu'il fait semblant d'ignorer nos fautes.

Elihu is plain with Job, but at the same time tender, and cannot mean that God had not visited him as he deserved.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 15. Strictly marks. נָאֵר qualifies יָדַע to know (here in the sense of notice, similar to פָּקַד visit), to know particularly. It cannot qualify פָּשַׁע. Compare Ps. cxxx. 11: If thou Lord should'st be strict to mark iniquities.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 15. Wide-spread iniquity. The Hebrew פָּשַׁע and its derivatives with the predominant sense of exuberance, extravagance, multiplication, taken in malam partem (licentiousness), gives the sense required here without going to the Arabic. See how it is used, Hab. i. 8; Mal. iii. 20; Jer. l. 11; Nah. iii. 18 (פָּשַׁע, Lev. xiii. 17, and a number of other places, of the spreading leprosy). So the Targum and Jewish commentators generally. The LXX. and VULGATE give it the sense of פָּשַׁע, and there is good reason for regarding them as cognate words. פָּשַׁע transgression is passing over, going beyond bounds—license, licentiousness. The idea is: God is not always exhibiting His special vengeance in the multiplicity of human sins. "He is not strict to mark iniquity;" or He would be always striking. Besides His long-suffering, so often spoken of in the Old Testament, there is the great יָדַע, or judgment, ver. 14, always before Him. No cause is really forgotten. But Job complains of Him because He lets "the wicked live;" see xxi. 7. There is a greatness in Elihu's views unsurpassed by anything in the book outside of the Divine address, and that is a sufficient answer to those who would argue the spuriousness of this portion, because there is no mention of his being answered with the rest.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

- 1 Then Elihu continued and said :
- 2 A moment wait<sup>1</sup> that I may show thee still,
 That there are words for<sup>2</sup> God.
- 3 Unto the Far<sup>3</sup> will I lift up my thought;
 'Tis to my Maker<sup>4</sup> I ascribe the right.
- 4 Indeed, there is no dissembling in my word;
 It is the all-knowing One<sup>5</sup> that deals with thee.

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 2. Wait. Some appearance perhaps of impatience on the part of Job leading to a slight interruption, and then a resumption, as indicated by the scholium of continuance at the head of the chapter. וְעַתָּה, וְעַתָּה, וְעַתָּה have been pronounced Aramaisms, but they are all pure Hebrew as well as Syriac.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 2. For God. In justification of the Divine proceedings. There is nothing arrogant in this declaration of Elihu as some maintain.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 3. Unto the far. The double preposition מִן וְעַתָּה, gives a twofold sense, to and from, including here both ideas, elevating the thought to God (the Afar) and deriving thought from Him. The words easily bear this, since מִן וְעַתָּה may have the two senses of taking, or raising, according to the context and the preposition used. A very little change here gives that appearance of boasting and vanity which UMBRETT and some others are so fond of ascribing to Elihu. It is, however, perfectly consistent with the unfeigned modesty of his opening. The word יָדַע or יָדַעַת (יָדַעַת) is not necessarily knowledge as science, exact or inexact, but often means opinion, view, sincere conviction. It may be cognitio, notitia, rather than scientia or intellectus. This is the way in which the Rabbinical writers everywhere use יָדַעַת. Elihu says that the view he takes shall not be a narrow, or personal, or party one. He will aim to bring all his reasonings from that far-reaching, yet most near and plain truth, the unchangeable righteousness of God. This gives him confidence, and when this is understood all appearance of conceit disappears.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 3. To my Maker I ascribe the right. In ascribing to God the right, he can, without arrogance, speak in his name, and all the more confidently whilst using such tenderness towards Job. This helps to explain what follows.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 4. It is the all-knowing one that deals with thee. A comparison of this with what the same speaker says in the very same words, xxxvii. 16, puts it beyond doubt that God is meant. Even if regarded as a claim to inspiration, it would not be inconsistent with a true humility. If Elihu felt that he was speaking to Job the very truth of God, however learned, it would be false modesty in him to disclaim it. Therefore does he so affirm his sincerity in the next verse: לֹא שֶׁקֶר, there is truth in what I say: Through it, "the Perfect in knowledge speaks with thee;" if we may so render עֲבָרָה. This is quite different from the impression that RENAN's version would give, applying the words to Elihu himself. C'est une homme d'une science accomplie qui te parle. SCHLOTTMANN and ROSENUELLER regard it as spoken by Elihu of himself, yet without boasting, and as only claiming what was due to the strength and depth of his convictions. They thus take תָּמִים in its more primitive sense of integer, purus, etc., rather than as denoting perfection in the degree or height of knowledge. The old commentator MERCERUS gives this admirably: De se dicit Elihu quod Job habet hominem acum agentem integrum sententis, et pure, sincere, ac ut par est, sentientem, qui nihil sit adulteraturus, aut depravatus in alienum sensum. The passage has been marred by the rendering is before thee, which cannot be obtained from עֲבָרָה. It gives a wrong impression as to the one of whom it is said, and of the spirit with which the declaration is made. Regarded as denoting speech (speaks with thee) it would be an inward rather than an outward communing; but as we have seen in several places, עֲבָרָה standing alone (or without any verb) denotes rather dealing with, and in either view would favor the idea of God being the subject intended rather than Elihu himself. It may be said, however, to come to nearly the same thing whether Elihu intends to represent God by the words תָּמִים יָדַעַת, or himself as speaking to Job in His name. In either case it is Divine knowledge he professes to give, or "knowledge brought from afar" (ver. 3).

- 5 Lo—God is great,<sup>6</sup> but nought does He<sup>7</sup> despise; Great in the power of His intelligence.
- 6 He will not “let the wicked<sup>8</sup> live;”
And justice will He render to the poor.
- 7 His eye He takes not<sup>9</sup> from the righteous man;
With kings upon the throne,
He makes them sit in glory;<sup>10</sup> they are raised on high.
- 8 Again, when bound in iron chains,<sup>11</sup>
And held in sorrow’s bands,
- 9 Then showeth He to them what they have done,
Their oversteppings,<sup>12</sup> how they’ve walked in pride.
- 10 Thus openeth He their ear to discipline,
And warns them that from evil they turn<sup>13</sup> back.
- 11 If they will listen and obey,
Then shall they spend their days in good,
Their years in joyfulness.
- 12 If they hear not, they perish by the sword,
And without knowledge<sup>14</sup> shall they yield their breath.
- 13 But those impure<sup>15</sup> in heart, they treasure wrath;
Such cry not<sup>16</sup> when He bindeth them.
- 14 Their very soul dies<sup>17</sup> in them in their youth;
Their life, it is a living with the<sup>18</sup> vile.
- 15 Yet in his suffering<sup>19</sup> saveth He the poor;
In straitening openeth He their ear.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 5. Despise, דָּנָה, reject, overlook. Elihu presents the sublime contrast, or that general equilibrium in the Divine attributes which our science so much ignores: God’s attention to the most minute as well as to the largest things of His creation. “He numbereth the very hairs of our heads.” This is “the power of His intelligence,” (כֹּחַ לֵב), force de son intelligence, as RENAN renders it. It is a higher thing than His dynamical force.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 6. Let the wicked live. This is the literal rendering of יִחְיֶה; that is, live on in their wickedness. It is not inconsistent with what Elihu says, xxxv. 9, 10, 15, about God’s forbearance. This rendering is chosen because it would seem as though the word יִחְיֶה had been used with direct reference to Job’s complaint, xxi. 7: “Wherefore do the wicked live, grow old, etc.?”

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 7. Takes not from. Lit., does not diminish; constant, steady vision, never relaxing. What follows about the righteous man, and his vicissitudes, has, undoubtedly, reference to Job, but not in the narrow way taken by the friends. Elihu does not charge him with gross outward crimes, such as “wronging the widow,” and “breaking the orphan’s arms” (xxii. 9), but he sees the possibility that even one who has borne the character of the just (ὁ δίκαιος, ὁ καλοκαγαθός) if placed in high station, “sitting with kings,” and greatly tempted to pride, may become self-confident, and so fall as to need the chastisements of God, “whose eye is never withdrawn from him.” This “sitting on the throne with kings,” as an honored and consulted assessor or vizier, may have been suggested by what Job says himself very eloquently, but somewhat proudly (xxix. 9), of the honors paid to him by people and princes.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 7. Sit in glory. לִנְצַח is improperly rendered forever, like לְעוֹלָם. It is not a word of time but of degree, completeness,—a general superlative of excellence, or superiority.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 8. Bound in iron chains; either from the capricious tyranny of their royal or popular patrons, or from their own too strongly tempted pride. It is a supposed case, but one readily presenting itself to the speaker’s mind from what Job says, xxix. 9, of the favor he had once enjoyed with the people and the great.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 9. Their oversteppings: The most literal etymological sense of פְּשָׁעֵיהֶם. RENAN:

Par leur péchés, par leur orgueil.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 10. From evil they turn back. The word שׁוּבוֹן implies barely a beginning in the evil way. Whatever suspicion of Job Elihu here may intimate, it is very different from the gross and wholly unwarranted criminalations of the three older friends, besides being stated as a mere hypothesis. But the striking distinction is the freedom from all exasperation, such as they show, especially Zophar and Bildad (see viii. 2; xi. 2, 3; xx. 2). Elihu represents God’s dealings thus far as all proceeding from love, from that merciful “eye upon the righteous man,” which is never withdrawn, though sometimes leaving him to himself for a season, that he may be tried and gain self-knowledge. It reminds one of a touching passage in the Koranic Commentary of Al-Zamakshari on Surat xviii. 75: Mohammed had committed a fault for which he had been severely visited. Says the commentator: “We have it from the Prophet, Allah bless him, that when this was revealed (Sur. xviii. 75) he prayed, O Allah! never again leave me to myself for the wink of an eye.” Al. Zam., p. 780.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 13. But those impure in heart. The לֵב in distinction from the צִדִּיק, or reputed righteous man tempted and disciplined, as described above.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 13. Such cry not. Another difference: They are not led to prayer and repentance. See xxxv. 10.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 14. Their very soul. Soul is here in contrast with life in the 2d clause. Passages like it in the Proverbs would support the idea of spiritual death. Their life: their course of life.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 14. The vile. קִלְשִׁים, the unclean, the obscene rather. Lit., those devoted to the obscene worship of Astarte, and other heathenisms. See the Deut. xlii. 18; 1 Kings xiv. 24; xv. 12; xxii. 47. Comp. also Gen. xxxviii. 21, 22.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 15. In his suffering. SCHLOTTMANN ren-

- 16 Thus thee, too, would He draw<sup>20</sup> from trouble's mouth,
To a broad place,<sup>21</sup> no straitening underneath,
With richest food<sup>22</sup> the spreading<sup>23</sup> of thy board.
- 17 But hast thou<sup>24</sup> filled the judgment of the bad;
Judgment and Justice will lay hold on thee.
- 18 For there is wrath,<sup>25</sup> see lest it stir thee up against the blow;<sup>26</sup>
Then a great ransom may not turn thy<sup>27</sup> scale.
- 19 Thy wealth<sup>28</sup> its price! no treasure here avails ders: in His compassion, referring the pronoun to God. This is a sense which עֲנִי will bear, but it would not harmonize here with לֶחֶץ in the 2d clause.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 16. Would He draw. הָסִית means literally to incite—either to or from—by sharp or by gentle means. The former is the more common, but the latter is to be taken here. SCHLOTTMANN: loct or aus—allures, entices. The general word, draws, attracts, seems better.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 16. Spreading of thy board. More literally, setting—that which is set down to rest upon it. נָחַת from נָחַת to rest. Hiph. demisit, deponit.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 17. But hast thou filled: if thou hast filled. So SCHLOTTMANN takes it, conditionally. Elihu does not regard Job as one of these impure of heart, or “hypocrites in heart,” as E. V., renders it, or the חֲנוּפֵי לֵב of ver. 13. He however makes the supposition of what would have been had Job gone to that extent, and makes it the ground of warning in ver. 18. The word חָיָה here, just like our word judgment, may denote Job's judgment in the case, as some take it, or God's verdict or sentence upon the wicked. In this latter view, which is preferred here, it may be transferred to the wickedness that causes judgment. Hast thou filled up the wickedness of the wicked (the measure of his judgment) then expect no mercy. “Judgment and justice” instead of threatening, “will take hold on thee.” יִתְכַּבֵּן, which DELITZSCH strangely renders, “will take hold on one another.” He seems to have regarded it as an abbreviated Hithpael: יִתְכַּבְּנוּ יִתְכַּבְּנוּ. The pronoun is not needed, it is so easily supplied. It can hardly be that הָיָה is used of Job's judgment in the one clause, and of God's judgment in the other.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 18. For there is wrath. By comparing כִּי חֶמֶד with the same words, used in a very similar manner, xix. 29, it will be seen that this is a warning formula. Cautionary words accompany it in both cases; there immediately preceding, here immediately following. הִנֵּן is an el-litical particle of warning, or of calling attention, like the Latin ne, or the Greek μή with ὅρα (see to it), or δεῖδω, or some similar word understood; comp. PLAT. Phædon, 69 A., “Ὁ μακάριος Σίπυλος, μή οὐκ αὐτῷ ἢ ᾧ ὀφείλει κ. τ. λ.;” Iliad I. 26, μή σὺ παρὰ τῶν κακίων, Odys. V. 467 (δεῖδω understood; compare line 300) and other places. The הִסִית with its usual sense of inciting to or from (here to or against, because followed by כִּי) must have an indefinite or impersonal subject. DELITZSCH and SCHLOTTMANN render it allure, as in ver. 16, but this would require חֶמֶד for the subject which would be harsh (wrath alluring) even if the grammar would allow. It would, however, be giving a feminine subject to a masculine verb following, which is hardly defensible from the case Prov. xii. 25. חֶמֶד may, perhaps, be regarded as implying the subject of הִסִית, by reason of its representing the whole case. If the impersonal view does not satisfy, the subject may be regarded as implied in שָׁפַק, or that to which the warning refers: “Let it not stir thee up (the blow) against it (the blow itself). This would make the כִּי in שָׁפַק very easy, and perfectly grammatical.

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 18. The blow. The places to gulde us in determining the meaning of שָׁפַק = שָׁפַק, are ch. xxxiv. 26, 27. The idea of sudden striking is in both. In the second, however, hand is understood (clap the hand), or some other part of the body, as in Numb. xxiv. 20; Lam. ii. 15; Job xxvii. 33, and that gives it the secondary sense of scorning or defiance. Blow, however, is the primary literal sense (evidently onomatopoeic, S. P. K.) and that seems here most fitting, besides being better adapted to יָסִית—against the blow, or the chastisement as CONANT renders it. SCHLOTTMANN would give it the sense of mockery (zum Spott), DELITZSCH of scorning (zum Hohnen, with reference to xxxiv. 37. These, however, would require that יָסִית be followed by לֵב instead of כִּי, as DILLMANN remarks (see concordance of places). DELITZSCH regards חֶמֶד as denoting the anger of Job, but the comparison with xix. 29, where it is used in precisely the same way, shows that God's wrath is meant, and that כִּי חֶמֶד is to be taken independently. The drift of Elihu's language is that Job has got to that point where he needs a caution, such as he himself gave to his monitors, xix. 29. Beware of further defiance. He has reason to pray: “Keep back thy servant from presumptuous sins” (יִסְרוּסִים), Ps. xix.

14), from the defiant, unforgivable sin, כִּפְשֵׁעַ רָב, “from the great transgression.”

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 18. Turn thy scale. The word ransom here (כֹּפֶר) is suggested to Elihu by his own language respecting the penitent sufferer, xxxiii. 24: “I have found a ransom.” The word נָטָה, Hiph. הִנָּטָה, to incline (transitively) or to deflect, is repeatedly used, elliptically and figuratively, in the sense of deflecting the scale in judgment. See Prov. xviii. 5; Isai. x. 2; xxix. 21; Amos v. 12. The last case is most like this since we find them in close connection with this same word כֹּפֶר. The verb thus used, might just as well, as far as grammar is concerned, have for its object the person favored, although the cases cited relate to the unjustly condemned. The context alone must determine whether it is a turning the scale in favor of or against; and, in fact, the one implies the other. DELITZSCH gives יָטָה the sense ver-leiten, mislead, seduce, and makes the ransom refer to the hope of restoration. It must, however, have the same application here as in xxxiii. 24. It is something which God provides, not the sufferer. Job had been stripped of all, so that, as DELITZSCH says, “any reference to his own riches,” as something that he could offer, “is out of the question.” In regard to the negative אַל, it is used in the same way as the Greek μή for οὐ where the declaration is a subjective one. It is not simply a denial of the happening of the event, but of its possibility, and so the particle is really dependent: It cannot be that, etc. There is, moreover, to be taken into the account the influence of כִּי above in making the clause subjective; as though repeated: take care lest a great ransom should not turn the scale in thy favor. The version of E. V. would demand יָסִית in the clause above.

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 19. Thy wealth its price! The word שִׁנְיָה here used, may mean either wealth, or a cry, as clearly appears by the respective contexts in which they are found. For the first see xxxiv. 19 (שִׁנְיָה), Isai. xxxii. 18, and this place, where it seems determined by its connection with בָּצַר, for which see Job xxii. 24, 26. The other usage is more frequent. The connection between the two meanings is not easily traced. שִׁנְיָה, to cry, implore, and its noun derivatives, seem like onomatopoeies: shinagh—sugh—sigh. Comp. the Syriac שִׁנְיָה used for the crying, bleating of the flocks, Jud. v. 16. As Job was utterly destitute, the reference must have been to his former vast possessions. All his camels and oxen, etc., could not avail as the price of this ransom. It is its spiritual value vainly estimated by the richest outward things. עָרַךְ, with the price for its subject, is used here precisely as in xxxviii. 17, in the attempted prizing of Wis-

Nor all the powers<sup>29</sup> of might.

- 20 O long not for the<sup>30</sup> night,—
The going up of nations in their place.
21 Take heed—turn not thy face<sup>31</sup> to sin,
For this thou chooseth<sup>32</sup> more than suffering.
22 Lo God exalteth by His power.
Who is a teacher like to Him?
23 Who is it that assigns<sup>33</sup> to Him His way?
Or who can say to Him, Thou doest wrong?
24 Remember that thou magnify His work,
Which men so celebrate.
25 With wonder gaze they<sup>34</sup> on it, Adam's race,
And every man<sup>35</sup> beholds it from afar.
26 Lo God is great,<sup>36</sup> we know Him not;
Unsearchable the number of His years.
27 For He it is who draws<sup>37</sup> the water drops;
Whence they distil to rain in place of<sup>38</sup> mist;

dom: "Gold and crystals cannot prize it, give its estimate,"

לֹא יִעֲרֹכֶנָּה. The price of redemption is far above rubies.
<sup>29</sup> Ver. 19. Powers of might. Literally, the mighty of strength. כֹּחַ does not mean opes here, or wealth, but has its literal sense—no wealth—no strength.

<sup>30</sup> Ver. 20. The night. הַלַּיְלָה, with the article, is the night of death emphatically, as our Saviour styles it, John ix. 4, "the night wherein no man can work;" see Ecclesiastes ix. 5. Elihu alludes to Job's having prayed for death, as appears in several places. The whole passage furnishes another of those cases where the closest adherence to the most literal rendering gives the best guide to the idea.

The verb עָלָה, to go up, becomes used of dying (departing, going off) from the old idea of the spirit, or breath, going up to God, its source, and the body going down to dust. There is no reference here to the underworld, and the difficulty arises from a feeling of incongruity connected with the figure of going up, especially where the language is used of evil men. But there is in it no idea of going to Heaven according to the modern notion. It is simply a mysterious going off. Another seeming incongruity is made by תַּחַת, the opposite to עָלָה, apparently. This is especially felt in the translation of CŒNANT, which otherwise would seem to have much in its favor:

Long not for that night,
When the nations are gathered to the world below.

Even where a word like עָלָה has lost its figure, as employed in some special applications, poetical feeling would be against its use in connection with a real opposite. But תַּחַת here means simply in their place, right where they stand, their very foundation, as in the examples cited, note to xxxiv. 26. The proof passages for this sense of עָלָה (dying, as going up, or off) are Ecclesiastes xxi. 7, where we have the idea without the word, and Job v. 26, and Ps. cii. 25, where the very word occurs just as it does here; the Hiphil in Ps. cii. 16, making no difference. In the first passage (Job v. 26) the incongruity alluded to is not felt as jarring with our modern conception, because it is said of a supposed good man, and it is in beautiful harmony with the figure of the sheaf going up to the garner, which overcomes the other image, in the same passage of going down to the grave. In Ps. cii. 25, אֶל תִּעָלֶינִי (take me not up (not off) from the midst of my days), the going up (or being taken up) means no more than the עֲלִית in this place, though said here of many going up, or going off, in the night of death. The plural עַמִּים, peoples or nations, is used here to make it the more impressive, and to give Job the idea of its being a general or common doom which he should not desire to anticipate. They are going off fast enough, this vast procession of the dead, disappearing in that night to which all human existence seems to lead. עַמִּים the multitudes. It calls to mind Homer's κλυτὰ ἔθνεα νεκρῶν, the far-famed nations of the dead (Odys. X. 526, and other places); more numerous than the nations of the living. In the word לַעֲלֹת, the ל of the infinitive may be taken as specificative: to wit, the going up, etc.; and so the second clause may be regarded as exegetical of the first, or as in apposition with לַיְלָה: the night, I mean, in which the nations go up, etc. DELITZSCH renders it: "Long not for the night to come which shall remove people from their place," and seems to refer it to some great and special judgments, not to the general night of death. He has no authority for rendering תַּחַת from their place. SCHLOTSKY renders more correctly, as their Stätte, in or on their place, right where they stand, or just as they are. Comp. Ecclesiastes xi. 3.

<sup>31</sup> Ver. 21. Turn not, אַל תִּפְּנֶה. Look not; do not even set your face in that direction, give no countenance (פְּנֵה, פְּנִיָּה) to iniquity.

<sup>32</sup> Ver. 21. Thou chooseth. That is, thou art choosing to turn in the wrong direction—towards sin, and away from God. It is a tendency charged upon him, but not actual sin. Elihu is very plain with Job, but at the same time judicious and tender. He desires his justification, xxxiii. 32.

<sup>33</sup> Ver. 23. Who is it that assigns? Comp. Isai. xl. 13, 14.

<sup>34</sup> Ver. 25. With wonder gaze. Among the Hebrew verbs of sight, רָאָה may be regarded as more emotional, and more spiritual than רָאָה. It denotes sight with feeling, or an interest of wonder in the object, like the Greek θεάσθαι, or the Latin specto, in distinction from ὁράω the merely visual, or deapéo which is more perceptive, that is, of facts and truths rather than of objects.

<sup>35</sup> Ver. 25. Every man—from afar. The most common man, אָדָם, cannot help seeing it in its remotest aspects. Comp. Ps. xli. 1, and Rom. i. 20.

<sup>36</sup> Ver. 26. Lo God is great. This declaration seems more frequent in Job than in any other book in the Bible, and strongly calls to mind the similar Arabian and Mohammedan doxologies.

<sup>37</sup> Ver. 27. Who draweth up. Drawing is the more usual sense of the verb דָּרַג, that of diminishing, seeming to come from its sense draweth, but the rendering of E. V., maketh small, suits very well some parts of the process intended to be described. If we render it draweth, then the water drops must denote the substance drawn up, whatever it may be, and which becomes water drops afterwards.

<sup>38</sup> Ver. 27. In place of mist. Gen. ii. 6 puts beyond

- 28 Even that with which the heavens<sup>39</sup> flow down,
And drop on man abundantly.
- 29 Is there<sup>40</sup> who understands the floatings<sup>41</sup> of the cloud,
The thunderings<sup>42</sup> of His canopy?
- 30 Behold, upon it<sup>43</sup> spreadeth He the light, Whilst darkening<sup>44</sup> the sea's profoundest depths.
- 31 (Yet, 'tis by these that He the nations rules, And giveth food in rich supply).
- 32 O'er either<sup>45</sup> hand the lightning doth He<sup>46</sup> wrap, doubt the meaning of אֶרֶב as vapor or mist, in distinction from rain itself which comes from it. But the ל has given trouble. "According to the vapor thereof," E. V.; "with its mist," DELTSCHE; zu Regen l  uert sich's im Nebel, SCHL  TTMANN; wenn er in Nebel sich geh  llt, UMBREIT; Qui se fonde en pluie et forment ses vapeurs, RENAN. But the vapor is the preceding state. Vice, in loco, in place of, is a meaning of ל, of which NOLDIUS in his Concordance of particles gives a good number of examples. The one nearest to this is Gen.

xi. 3, bitumen for mortar, וְהָחֹמֶר לָחֹמֶר, or וְהָחֹמֶר לָאֶבֶן, brick for stone. Bitumen for mortar, or in place of mortar; the imperfect substance for, that is, as a preparation for the more finished; or mortar in place of bitumen, according to the reverse conception. Grammatically, the preposition ל would denote either of these according to the context. Here it would demand the latter—rain now in place of what was mist before the distillation. The pronoun in לֹאֲרוּ shows this—its mist—the rain's mist, or that from which the rain is formed. The subject of יֹקֵד, taken intransitively, is water drops. They distill into rain, that is, the water or vapor that was raised up called by the name of what it becomes. The primary sense of וָקֵק is binding (whence וָקֵק chains, ver. 8), compression, hence straining or condensation. They condense into rain, would be a good rendering if it would not seem to make Elihu talk too scientifically; and yet some such idea must have been in his mind. וָקֵק may be taken, grammatically, as either the direct or the remote object of the intransitive verb: They distill, or condense, rain, or they distill into rain. There is really no great difficulty in the clause unless made, as is often done, by overlooking the directness and simplicity of the language. The general fact of the transformation is known to all, but our best science yet finds a mystery in attempting to trace the exact rationale of the process. "The law of the rain" (חֹק)

לְמִטְרָה, xxviii. 26) is yet, in some points, one of the secrets of the Divine חֹכְמָה, as it was in the days of Job.

<sup>39</sup> Ver. 28. The heavens. שָׁחִים is the poetical word for the skies, the high, attenuated expanse, from שָׁחַק atruviti, comminuit, made smooth or thin, as רִקְעָה from רָקַע to beat out like gold leaf, to spread out. See xxxvii. 18, and Ps. lxxxix. 7.

<sup>40</sup> Ver. 29. Is there? This may be treated as a section by itself. After the general account of the rain comes a special description of the thunder-storm.

<sup>41</sup> Ver. 29. The floatings. מְפֹרְשֵׁי עָב, Comp. עָב מְפֹרְשֵׁי עָב xxxviii. 16, suspensions of the cloud. It is, in both cases, the mystery of the cloud hanging in the air, seemingly without support. We talk of gravity and think we have explained it. GESENIUS gives to מְפֹרְשֵׁי here the sense of expansion merely, as in Ezek. xxvii. It would then refer to it as stationary, or in a tranquil state, reminding us of Graham's description:

Caltness sits throned on yon unmoving cloud.

This sets the two phenomena in contrast and gives more force to the allusion to the gathering storm in the 2d clause.

<sup>42</sup> Ver. 29. Thunderings of His canopy. תְּשֻׁאוֹת; see xxxix. 7; Isai. xxii. 2. God is said to dwell in the nimbus, or thunder-cloud, as in a tent, or canopy. The word כֶּכֶבֶת strictly means a temporary booth, as a retreat or hiding-place. Comp. Ps. lxxxix. 8, בְּכֶכֶבֶת יָרַעַם, in the secret place of the thunder, and especially Ps. xviii. 12, where we have this same figure of the booth or canopy: הַשֶּׁכֶת.

מִים עָבִי שָׁחִים.

<sup>43</sup> Ver. 30. Upon it; עָלָיו, upon the cloud, (עַל עָב), the nimbus. The pronoun is by many referred to God: He spreadeth the light upon himself; but there is no need of this. It mars the parallelism, and makes very difficult the rendering of the second clause, which then must be taken in the same way.

<sup>44</sup> Ver. 30. Whilst darkening: Taken participially to denote the close conjunction of the two acts. Lit., and He covers, that is, with darkness, as the context demands. The object covered (not that with which he covers) is the roots or depths of the sea. The other rendering is, He covereth himself with the roots of the sea. This is grammatically harsh, and makes the English or German more difficult to understand than the simple Hebrew. Such a rendering, in both clauses, seems prompted by Ps. civ. 2, "He covereth himself with light, although there is no personal or reflex pronoun there. But in that case the verb is עָטָה, which, more strictly than כֶּכֶבֶת, follows, in its government, the analogy of verbs of clothing, arming, etc. It is there, moreover, a description of creation, and there is no other object of the verb. Here the design of Elihu is simply to present phenomena, and the language, therefore, is demonstrative and optical instead of reflective. Some take the sense of the light (the lightning) covering the roots of the sea, so vividly that the bottom of the ocean is illuminated. No one, however, ever saw that, and it would have been wholly imaginative in Elihu, instead of an appeal to things visible, and conceivable by all. Again, the roots of the sea, say some, is the water drawn up, though once lying in the depths (ver. 27), and God has a robe of double texture woven of light and the waters, or the darkness of the waters. We may doubt whether the mind of Elihu in this grand optical description was in the mood for such a fine-spun conceit. Everything, too, both here and in the next chapter, goes to show that he spoke under the vivid emotion of an actual storm then making its approach in the distance. There is a contrast undoubtedly between the two clauses of ver. 30, but it is one which every black thunder-storm presents, especially to those who view it, or conceive it, in connection with the vicinity of waters. It is the bright blazing in the heavens, and the dark horror, as the poet calls it, which it makes upon the face of the sea. See how Virgil pictures the two things together,   n. I., 90—89, —Mical ignibus   ther,—

—ponto Nox incubat atra.

Again   n. III., 199—194:

—Ingeminant abruptis nubibus ignes,— —Et inhorruit unda tenebris.

So Homer's Odys. V., 294:

—  ραπει δ' ο  ραν  θεν ν  ξ;,—
And night rushed down the sky.

<sup>46</sup> Ver. 32. Doth he wrap. בִּסְחָה has here both its direct and remote object, and the sense is unmistakable. The light here is the lightning. It is the figure of the slinger

And giveth it commandment where<sup>47</sup> to strike.
33 Of this the<sup>48</sup> crashing roar<sup>49</sup> makes quick report, gathering up the cord around his hands, and taking a firm hold that he may hurl the weapon the more forcibly, as well as more surely. For that purpose he takes it with both hands. If it is plain, it is exceedingly sublime.

<sup>47</sup> Ver. 32. Where to strike. כִּפְּנֵי. Hiphil participle here, admirably expresses the opposing object, that which comes in the way or causes a meeting. It seems strange that DELITZSCH should say that the Hiphil sense is lost in such rendering. He himself makes it, not the object, but the aim, by virtue of the all-explaining both essential. The participle thus used as object becomes synonymous with כִּפְּנֵי vii. 20, only it is better here as more easily admitting the personificative idea, as though the thing hit were regarded, for the moment, as the adversary against whom the bolt is hurled. The verb in this Hiphil form appears most expressively Isai. liii. 12, וְיִפְּנֵי פֶשַׁע יְהוָה, "and He (the Redeemer) interposed for the transgressors"—came between them and the bolt of justice, so that it might fall on Him. From the very nature of the verb כִּפְּנֵי, its Kal and Hiphil must be very much alike in their general significance; the latter being only the more intensive. It is, in this respect, like the kindred verb פָּנַח, to meet, in which Kal, Piel, and even Niphal present nearly the same idea.

<sup>48</sup> Ver. 33. Of this. עָלָיו; that is, the mark, the thing hit, or the fact of hitting. Those who refer the pronoun to God, as in the other cases above, get into great confusion. It turns away the thought from the optical, or the direct picture, on which the speaker seems intent, to a kind of moralizing out of place and interrupting the effect.

<sup>49</sup> Ver. 33. The crashing roar. An error in respect to עָלָיו leads to a false view of רָעַע, or to the rendering friend, or thought, as some take it, whilst it so obviously means the sharp sound of the thunder when the lightning strikes near. See the use of it, Exod. xxiii. 17 for the wild cheering or uproar of the camp, and especially Micah iv. 9. The latter place leaves no doubt of its meaning, or of its derivation, לִפְנֵי תְרִיעֵי רָעַע, lamna tha-ringni reangh, if we give to the y something of that nasal tone with which the modern Jews pronounce it: "Why ringest thou out, breakest thou out, with that roaring cry, quare vociferaris vociferando?" רָעַע is onomatopoeically like רָעַע, only its guttural, especially if there is something nasal in it, makes it better adapted to represent a rough, hoarse, roaring, crashing sound, in which everything seems breaking to pieces. When in a thunder-storm there is heard that peculiar crash simultaneous with the vivid lightning blaze, we say immediately, that has struck somewhere, and very near. It immediately announces the effect, such as is not expected when the thunder is distant, though it may be very heavy, and the lightning very vivid. Hence we call it a report. רָעַע well expresses this—telle—telle—declares—puts it before us (רָעַע) in a way we cannot doubt.

<sup>50</sup> Ver. 33. The ascending flame. Here is another example where the most literal following of the words in their most literal sense, but with a sharp look to the context, furnishes the best guide in the interpretation. כִּקְנָה, אֵף עַל עוֹלָה, the herds, even of the ascending: Unchanged the words give that and nothing else. עַל is to be taken as just before in עָלָיו. There it is, "make report of it," that is, the striking. Here it is a making report (for יָדִיד belongs to both clauses) of something else described as עוֹלָה (ascendens, de surgente, or de ascendente). But what is it that goeth up? This is to be determined by the context, and the use of the participle עוֹלָה in other passages of Scripture, or of the verb from which it comes. Connecting it with the lightning stroke in the first clause we can hardly help thinking of Gen. xxi. 28, where "the smoke of Sodom" is pictured as "going up," (עוֹלָה), like the smoke of a furnace," or of Joshua viii. 20, וְהָיָה עוֹלָה עֶשֶׂן הָעֵיר, "and lo, there went up the smoke of the city." For similar imagery see Judg. xx. 40; Jerem. xlviii. 15, and other places. The name, too, given to the burnt offering, עוֹלָה, with only a change of vowel to make it a participial noun, presents the same image. It is so called because of the smoke ascending high in the air from the altar of incense and sacrifice, Coup. Gen. viii. 20, the ascent of Noah's offering; also such passages as Lev. vi. 2, מוֹקְרָה עַל מוֹקְרָה, Ezek.

viii. 11, עֹנֵן הַקְּסִיתָ עוֹלָה, "the cloud of incense going up." These passages are cited to show how easy and natural the image, and how difficult it is, in such a context to associate it with any other. Other views require changes in the text; for example, instead of כִּקְנָה, some would read כִּקְנָה, and then demand that it be regarded as equivalent to כִּקְנָה governing אֵף (as a noun) and making it mean, arousing jealous wrath. This to make any sense requires עוֹלָה (fem. of עוֹלָה) wickedness, and also that עַל should have the sense against; thus taking it out of the obvious parallelism with עָלָיו in the first clause. They say, too, אֵף is in the wrong place for it as a participle,—it should have come at the beginning of the clause. But the briefest consultation of NOLDIUS' Concord. Partic. would show that this is futile. See 2 Sam. xx. 14; Cant. i. 16; 1 Sam. ii. 7; Isai. xxvi. 9; Ps. lxx. 15, etc. It is frequently, as we here find it, when emphasizing a word as it emphasizes עוֹלָה,

"even of that which goeth up." Others take the text as it stands, but refer עוֹלָה to God. But this is very difficult. God does not go up in the storm. Still less fitting is the rendering in Anzug, on his approach (DELITZSCH) or im Zuge (EWALD), on the march. עוֹלָה is never used in such a way.

Some of the Jewish commentators regard it as equivalent to עַל, a supposed name of God, Hos. xii. 27, or to עוֹלָיו,—the Most High, so frequently used in Genesis; but that denotes position, height as rank, not ascension in any way. Some, following ABEN EZRA, refer it to the rising storm, and the cattle foreboding its approach; but that disorders the time, and takes us away from the scene so vividly painted as present to the imagination at least, if not to the actual sense of the persons addressed. It is something startling, as is shown by the close connection with the 1st verse of ch. xxxvii., and which any such retrospective reflections of the speaker would interrupt and impair. Others render רָעַע friend:

SCHLOTTMANN, Er zeigt ihm seinen Freund—Zorneseifer über die Feind; but that besides requiring two changes in the text of the second clause, seems a sort of reflective moralizing which would hardly come between such vivid description preceding and immediately following. It seems too forced to be capable of defence even by the reasoning of so excellent a commentator as SCHLOTTMANN. UMBREIT renders רָעַע in the same way; but in the second clause goes very far off in rendering עוֹלָה das gewachs, the plant, for which the places he cites Gen. xi. 10; xli. 22, furnish no warrant. Even if ever used in the Bible for a plant, it would be unmeaning here, and the construction he gives altogether ungrammatical. The epithet frightened, in the translation, gives only what is clearly implied, if the view taken of the passage be correct, and so is it used by RENAN, though referring it to the cattle's foreboding of an approaching storm:

L'effroi des troupeaux révèle son approche.
Others content themselves with rendering simply and safely de surgente, or de ascendente, without any attempt at explanation. But what is that which goeth up after the crash and the striking of the lightning? Not unfrequently do we witness what ought to give us the idea. It is when the lightning strikes anything that is highly combustible, a barn with grain, a stack of dry sheaves in the field, or, as it often does, the dry trees of the forest. It could not have been uncommon on the plains of Uz. In such a case the smoke and flame rise up almost immediately from the fierce combustion. A sight of this kind strongly associates itself in the mind of the translator, with the study of this passage. During a storm of terrific blackness a most blinding flash of zigzag chain lightning came down over a near hill. The terrible crash was simultaneous with it, and hardly had the reverberation ceased when up rose from a barn behind the hill a lurid column of pitchy smoke and flame ascending perpendicularly towards the heavens, like that which went up from the blasted plain of Sodom. It was, indeed, an awful sight, and had the fleeing cattle formed part of the scene, it would have been in closest conformity with the picture so vividly presented to us in these few Hebrew words. Taken as a whole, this portion of Elihu's speech (vers. 27-33) suggests most of the ideas which are prominent in VIRGIL'S description of the thunder-storm, Georg. I. 328:

Ipsæ Pater, media nimborum in nocte, cornusca

Fulmina molitur dextra.—

*fugere feræ, et mortalia corda
Per gentes humilis stravit pavor; ille flagranti
Aut Atho, aut Rhodopen, aut alta Ceraunia, telo Deiçit; ingeminaut Austri et densissimus imber.*

With the 4th and 5th lines of the above, compare Ps. clv. 32; He touches the mountains and they smoke. The difficulty of the passage gives the apology for so long dwelling upon it.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

- 1 At such a sight,<sup>1</sup> with shuddering fear my heart Leaps wildly<sup>2</sup> from its place.
- 2 Hear ye, O hear the roaring<sup>3</sup> of His voice,
The deep reverberation<sup>4</sup> from His mouth;
- 3 As under all the heavens He sends<sup>5</sup> it forth,—
His lightning to the edges<sup>6</sup> of the earth.
- 4 Then after it resounds a voice,
The glorious voice<sup>7</sup> with which He thundereth.
One cannot trace<sup>8</sup> them when their sound is heard.
- 5 Yes, with His voice<sup>9</sup> God thunders marvellously; Great things does He; we understand Him not.
- 6 For to the snow He saith, be thou<sup>10</sup> upon the earth;

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 3. Sends it forth. Not from שָׁר to direct, but from שָׁר to set free, let loose.

gives it the sense retardavit, citing the Arabic (Conj. II.) which does not support him, since it simply means coming behind (pressit vestigia). DELITZSCH, following GESENIUS, renders, und spart die Blitze nicht; SCHLOTTMANN. nicht zögern die Blitze; UMBREIT, und er hält's nicht zurück. On the other hand EWALD gives it the sense of finding, tracing, investigating, though he seems to regard as its object the men to be punished, for which there is no authority. This, too, is the rendering of the VULGATE (non investigatur, taken impersonally), of Symmachus, and of the Peschito, which uses the very word, and with the sense of investigating, tracing, tracking, which it always has in Syriac. See the numerous examples in N. T., and especially Acts xvii. 27, seeking after God and tracing Him (עֲקֵבִי used for the Greek ψηλαφῆσαι, feel after). So among the older commentators. עֲקֵב is a denominative or noun verb, and all its uses are easily traceable from the primary sense of עֲקֵב the heel; such as to go behind one (at his heels), to supplant, or trip the heel; hence to retard (impedire) should the context demand it. The most natural idea, however, belonging to the Piel, (as to the Syriac Pael) is that of tracking, investigating (from vestigium, a footstep). The same metaphor appears in the nouns; as in עֲקֵבוֹת, Cant. I. 8; Ps. lxxxix. 52, and especially, as strongly suggested by this, Ps. lxxvii. 20: "Thy way is in the many waters, and thy footstepe (or thy tracings עֲקֵבוֹתֶיךָ, vestigia tua) are unknown," untraceable. Here, however, it must be taken indefinitely as in the VULGATE:

One cannot trace them, that is, the thunder voices. In giving the verb the sense of holding back, DELITZSCH and UMBREIT make lightnings the object. But thunders, mentioned just before, is more properly the grammatical object, especially in the sense above given. The reference is to the rolling or reverberating thunder, "under the whole heavens," or all round the sky; unlike the sharp crash of the striking bolt which immediately announces itself (xxxvi. 33). It seems to be every where. We hear but cannot trace it.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 5. With his voice. The repetitions of the word קוֹל are somewhat remarkable, although the Hebrew seems to allow such a thing better than the English. It may be regarded as coming from the anxiety of Elihu to impress the idea that the thunder in the storm now raging around them, is really, and not metaphorically merely, the voice of God impressing itself in the undulations of the air. This idea of an actual thunder-storm coming up, subsiding or passing off, gathering again (as seems to be represented in the two chapters) and finally terminating in the tornado from which breaks forth the unmistakable voice of God, furnishes a clue to much that is peculiar in the style of this portion of Elihu's speech. Especially in ch. xxxvii. does he talk like a man amazed and awed by the approach of terrible phenomena. In the intervals of subsidence, he moralizes as men are wont to do at such seasons. Every few moments his attention seems called to some new appearance, interrupting and confusing his language: "See there"—"hear that," etc. A darkness comes up, and he "cannot speak by reason of it" (ver. 19); it passes away and his eyes are drawn to a strange electric light approaching from the North. For this effect of the storm on Elihu's speech, see INT. THEISM, pp. 25, 26, 27, and note.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 6. Be thou upon the earth. DELITZSCH, falle erdwärts. In thus rendering עָלָה, he goes to the Arabic هَوَى, decidit, delapsus fuit. GESENIUS, rue in terram; but as CONANT well says, "this very poorly expresses the gentle falling of the snow." Its quiet descent has ever given, in fact, its most poetical image. Homer uses it Il. III. 222, to represent the steady persuasion of true eloquence:

Kai ἔπεα νηφέσσιν εὐκότα χειμέριον, which Bryant so exactly as well as beautifully renders:

"And words came like the flakes of winter snow."

- Thus also to the pouring<sup>11</sup> rain,
His mighty<sup>12</sup> flooding rain.
- 7 The hand of every man He sealeth<sup>13</sup> up;
That all may know—all men whom He has<sup>14</sup> made.
- 8 Then go the beasts,<sup>15</sup> each to his hiding place;
And in their dens abide.
- 9 From the dark<sup>16</sup> South proceeds the<sup>17</sup> sweeping storm,
From the Mezarim<sup>18</sup> comes the chilling blast.
- 10 From God's own breath the hoar frost<sup>19</sup> is congealed;
By it the water's breadth is firmly<sup>20</sup> bound.
- 11 Through drenching<sup>21</sup> rain the dense cloud He exhausts,
The thin light-breaking<sup>22</sup> cloud He scattereth.

See Lucian's allusion to this, Eulogy of Demosthenes, sec. 15. A modern hymnist uses it for its soothing or sedative effect. SCHLOTTMANN regards נָשַׁם as simply the imperative of the Hebrew substantive verb in its older form: Sei auf erden, LXX., γίνου ἐν τῇ γῆς.

<sup>11</sup> Ver. 6. Pouring rain. נָשַׁם (gashem) as its very sound seems to indicate (gush, glessen) denotes the heavy rain when it seems to descend in floods, or almost in a body (Arabic شام sham) as it were, or like a mass or weight (Arabic شام josham).

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 6. Flooding rain. Lit. pouring of rains of his strength. In a compound expression of this kind, the Hebrew puts the pronominal suffix, generally, to the last noun, and uses it like an adjective.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 7. Sealeth up. Confines them to their homes during the storms, that, under shelter, they may think of God's works, and give Him glory. Comp. Ps. xlix., where there is a like description of a thunder-storm as witnessed from the sheltering temple: "He maketh bare the forests," whilst, at every thunder peal, "every one who sits in his temple אִמָּר כְּבוֹד, is crying, glory." The scenic state here is not easily determined, but they were all probably in the shelter of a tent.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 7. Whom He has made. Lit. men of his work. Some would make a change in the text, אֲנָשִׁים for אֲנָשִׁי, so as to make it like xxxiii. 17, that every man may know His work. But all that is expressed there is implied here, without a change, whilst there is the additional idea that men too are His work.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 8. The beasts. חַיָּה, here, is taken both collectively and distributively.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 9. The dark South. הַחֲרִי, the chamber, is an elliptical expression for the South. See its full form, חֲרִי תִּמָּן, chambers of the South, ix. 10. EWALD: The secret chamber. See Note 7 to xxiii. 9. It was the region in which thunder-storms arose.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 9. Sweeping storm. סֻפָּה, the sweeping storm, as distinguished from סֻעָה the tornado.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 9. Mezarim. The word is left untranslated. It evidently means the North, though on what grounds is not easily seen. Lit. the scatterers, and DELITZSCH refers it to the boreal winds that disperse the clouds and bring clear cold weather. It is not the Mazzaroth of xxxviii. 22.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 10. The hoar frost is congealed. Lit. it gives; but the Hebrew יָתַן, is used as a substantive verb, like the German es gibt, for any mode by which the event is brought about. קָרָה is generally rendered ice, but that does not suit well the figure of breath. Hoar frost gives just the image: frozen vapor or moisture, such as that of descending dew, or of the breath congealing on a cold day as it is exhaled from the mouth. Ice, however, as the product of breath is not any easy conception. Congealed moisture may be taken as the general idea, whatever may be the degree or form of congelation as determined by the context. For this reason, in Job vi. 16, we have rendered it sleet (frozen rain) as agreeing best with the darkened floods and the snow-flakes disappearing as they fall into them. The rendering crystal, Ezek. i. 32, is not primary, but comes from the sense of ice, which this word unquestionably has where the context demands it, as in xxxviii. 29, with its general words of production or generation. Frost, there, comes in the second clause (כָּפַר) the hoar frost, from the idea of covering, or overspreading, as the manna (Exod. xvi. 14). In Gen. xxxi. 40, and Jer. xxxv. 30, קָרָה is used generally for cold, as is shown by its being, in both places, the antithesis of חֲרִי, heat. So קָרָה, Prov. xxv. 30: בְּיוֹם קָרָה, in die frigoris.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 20. Firmly bound. מִצָּק from יָצַק to pour, to become fused. Hence the idea of something metallo that becomes solid from a molten state: It comes more directly, however, if we can regard יָצַק as deriving one of its senses from the cognate יָצַן, stabilize, or suppose מִצָּק —

מִצָּק or מִצָּן. Compare מִצָּק, xl. 15, xxxviii. 38. Akin to these are the derivatives from יָצַק, as מִצָּן, column, 1 Sam. ii. 8. מִצָּן, and especially 1 Sam. xiv. 15, where it seems to denote a basaltic pillar of rock, so named from the appearance of fusion such rocks obviously present. מִצָּן here is a clear case of the beth essentialis.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 11. Drenching rain. Copious effusion. This verse has occasioned much difficulty. פָּרַי has been derived from פָּרַי taken as equivalent to פָּרַי, and rendered purity, clearness, serenity. Then it has been taken as the subject of מִפְּרִי in its Arabic sense projectil, etc.: The serenity, or brightness (the clearing up), drives away, or precipitates the thick thunder-cloud. But this makes the two clauses express the same or a very similar idea. Others (like E. V.), take פָּרַי as a preposition, and פָּרַי as an abbreviation of פָּרַי, like כִּי (burning) for כִּי. Such an abbreviation would be still more likely with the preposition: פָּרַי for פָּרַי. The Arabic word פָּרַי copiosa irrigatio is just like it, and comes in just the same way from פָּרַי. This makes a clear and suitable sense which is supported by E. V. and the majority, perhaps, of authorities. Some who take this sense of פָּרַי, however, altogether change the idea by giving יִטְרִיחַ the sense of loading or putting a load upon (with copious rain He loads the cloud) resorting to the Arabic word from which no such idea can be fairly abstracted. The sense, however, which the context demands, comes very easily from the Hebrew idea of מִטְרָה, namely, weariness as in Deut. i. 12, and

Isa. i. 14, the only places where it occurs, but abundantly sufficient to fix its meaning. The idea of load is only passive or subjective, especially as it appears in the latter passage. The primary idea is moestia, defatigatio, and hence, exhaustion; by the copious flooding. He exhausts the עָנָה or the dense heavy cloud. There would be an incongruity in the idea of loading (charging) the cloud by irrigation. That of exhaustion gives just the sense that best fits the whole verse, and this E. V. has well expressed by "He wearyeth."

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 11. Light-breaking cloud. The clouds through which the light is breaking. Heb. literally, cloud of his light. עָנָן being in the construct state it cannot be rendered, His light disperses the cloud, though that would be a good sense, and in harmony with the general idea of the whole verse. There is, moreover, an evident contrast between עָנָן, the dark dense storm cloud, and עָנָן, the ordinary cloud, the cloud as it usually floats in the atmosphere,

- 12 In circling<sup>23</sup> changes is it thus transformed,<sup>24</sup>
By His wise laws,<sup>25</sup> that they may execute
All His commands o'er all the sphere of<sup>26</sup> earth ;
- 13 Whether as punishment, or for His land,
Or in His mercy He appointeth<sup>27</sup> it.
- 14 O Job ! give ear to this ;
Be still and contemplate God's wondrous works.
- 15 Knowest thou how over these Eloah laid His laws,
Or from the cloudy darkness<sup>28</sup> streams the light ?
- 16 Knowest thou the poisons<sup>29</sup> of the cloud,
The wondrous works of Him whose knowledge has no bound ?
- 17 (Or how it is) what time thy robes are warm ;
When from the South the land in sultry<sup>30</sup> stillness rests ?
- 18 Dost thou with Him spread out the skies
So strong—so like<sup>31</sup> a molten mirror smooth ?
- 19 O teach us what to say !
We cannot speak aright<sup>32</sup>,—so dark it grows.<sup>33</sup>

"the morning cloud," Hos. vi., or "the passing cloud," Job vii. 9. The contrast is lost in many renderings. Its preservation, and the clear calling to mind of the phenomena that attend the breaking up of a heavy thunder-storm, lead us out of all difficulty. The symptom that the shower is nearly over is generally a sudden and unusual outpouring as though the נֶבֶל or nimbus was emptying itself of all its contents.

Very soon the clouds assume a lighter appearance. We say it is beginning to clear up, and in a short time we see them in motion with the light breaking out of them, and through them in all directions. אֶרֶץ is indeed used for the lightning in a number of places, but here it would seem to be taken in its ordinary sense. Even should we render it His lightning cloud, as Dr. CONANT does, it would make no great difference in the general view: the cloud or clouds out of which His lightning had been playing. It is, however, more literal and more easy to render it as it stands, the cloud of His light—His illumined cloud, his light or lightsome cloud now almost transparent instead of dark and dense. The distinction is well given in the Article on Clouds, Am. Encyclopedia: "The nimbus (the נֶבֶל here) having discharged its moisture, the lighter forms of clouds appear (the cirrus in some of its modifications), whilst the fragments of the nimbus are borne along by the winds." There is a resemblance to this picture in the interpretation of the old commentators MERCERUS and DAUSIUS. Hanc appellat nubem lucis Dei, nubem qua dispulsa, lux et serenitas inducitur.

<sup>23</sup> Ver. 12. In circling changes. מְהִיבֵן, a circuit, a revolving. It is, however, in causality, rather than in space movement. The latter idea of a turning round, or over, of the cloud, gives no clear meaning here. In the kindred word מְהִיבֵן, as used 1 Kings xii. 15 (2 Chron. x. 15, מְהִיבֵן representing the same thing), it denotes a political revolution, a bringing about of events by a combination of physical and moral means, yet still, as here, ascribed to God's agency, as though the Scriptures made little of our distinction between natural and supernatural causation. It is here the series of changes through which these phenomena occur, taking in the whole process, from His "drawing up of the water drops," xxxvi. 27, the distilling from vapor to rain, ver. 28, to the discharge and clearing up of the storm as described in the verse above.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 12. Transformed. מִתְהַפֵּךְ may refer to the cloud thus formed, or to the event as it comes out of this circuitous causation bringing things back to their former state. See note on the Niphal מִתְהַפֵּךְ, xxviii. 5, and the Hophal מִתְהַפֵּךְ xxx. 15. The Hithpael מִתְהַפֵּךְ may sometimes present the idea of changes in space and motion, as in Ge. i. iii. 24, but in this place, and xxxviii. 14, the general idea of transformation, metamorphosis, or the causal turning of one thing, or one phenomenon, into another is to be preferred.

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 12. Wise laws. מִתְחַבְּלוֹתֵי. The uses of this word in such places as Prov. i. 5; xl. 14; xx. 18, where it is parallel with מַחְשְׁבוֹת, thoughts, designs, and עֲצָה, consilium (see also Prov. xxiv. 6), make it very clear. In regard to physical things it means just what we call laws (God's thoughts) though with a less pious meaning. The etymological image is in harmony with this as derived from the primary sense of the verb חָבַל to bind (noun חֶבֶל a rope or string). תְּחַבְּלוֹת, things or events tied together. God's counsels in the ligatures, linkings, or concatenations of nature.

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 12. Sphere of earth. Lit., the world-earth: The earth and the skies belonging to it, above and around it. For this use of הָאֶרֶץ see 1 Sam. ii. 8; Ps. xviii. 16; xciii. 1; Ps. xc. 2, אֶרֶץ וְהַבַּיִת, and Prov. viii. 31, הָאֶרֶץ.

אֶרֶץ. "The habitable earth," Dr. CONANT renders it. It has this sense sometimes, and it may be more proper here; but the prominent presence of aerial phenomena seems to justify the wider rendering: the terrestrial world.

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 13. He appointeth it. Dr. LITZSCH renders מִצְאָתוֹ, "He caused it to discharge itself," that is the cloud. It is an unnecessary loading of the sense beyond the requirements of מִצָּע, which, in Hiphil, is sometimes used in the manner of a substantive verb—to make a thing present, that is to make, to be, as in Job xxxiv. 11. From this comes the frequent Rabbinical usage of מִצָּע as a verb of existence.

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 15. Cloudy darkness. This rendering is given to עָנָן, not only as suiting the etymological idea, covering, overspreading, but also as best suggesting the wonder, or seeming miracle intended: the brilliant light radiating from so dark a source, like the sparks from the flint.

<sup>29</sup> Ver. 16. Knowest thou the poisons. Comp. xxviii. 25, 26, and notes: the law for the rain. Here, as in xxxvi. 29, the wonder presented is that of the cloud remaining balanced in the air with its heavy watery load.

<sup>30</sup> Ver. 17. In sultry stillness rests: Compare Isaiah xviii. 4: "I am still (אֲשַׁקֵּטָה), and look out in my place, as when the dry heat is in the air, or like the cloud of dew in the heat of harvest." The South, the region of heat and thunder-storms.

<sup>31</sup> Ver. 18. So like a molten mirror smooth. The true point of the comparison is lost when we connect כְּ with חֻקִּים. It rather refers to תְּרִיקֵעַ, and the resemblance is, not in the strength, but in the expansion or apparent smoothness.

<sup>32</sup> Ver. 19. Cannot speak aright. Lit., cannot arrange (words) by reason of (or before) the darkness. If there were nothing else, this would naturally be interpreted of mental darkness. So RENAN, who, however, gives a very fine rendering:

Mais plutôt, taisons-nous, ignorants que nous sommes.

But the thought again suggests itself that this is a real

- 20 Ah, is it told<sup>34</sup> to Him that I am speaking!
Has one so said?<sup>35</sup> take care lest he be swallowed up.
- 21 And now the lightning<sup>36</sup> they no longer see,—
That splendor<sup>37</sup> in the clouds;<sup>38</sup>
The wind has passed and made them clear.

scene. It is a real darkness perturbing his thoughts and disturbing his utterance. It may be a coming back of the nimbus as is the case sometimes in thunder-storms, or some strange darkening of the air from some unknown cause, and, therefore, more awing than though it came from clouds. Something still more fearful is anticipated. There are symptoms of the כַּעַר, or whirlwind. And so he turns again from the reflective to the phenomenal style, like that of a man calling attention to some new and strange appearances in the heavens, after the storm has partially passed by.

<sup>34</sup> Ver. 20. Ah, is it told to Him. An overawing sense of an actually approaching divine presence, making even the reverent Elihu fear lest he may have said something rash, as he charges Job to have done. From this his own confession, therefore, we may expect perturbation, confusion, and consequent obscurity in what immediately follows. He "cannot order his speech" or marshall (עָרַךְ) his words.

He hardly knows what he says, as was the case with the disciples (Mark ix. 6) when they came down from the mount of transfiguration; οὐ γὰρ ᾔδει τί λαλήσῃ ἦσαν γὰρ ἐκφοβοί.

<sup>35</sup> Ver. 20. Has one so said? It is not easy to get a clear meaning to this verse, unless we take כִּי elliptically with some word of caution, such as is sometimes to be supplied before the Greek ὅτι, or μή ὅτι, μή ὅπως, take care lest; or as the Latin ut is used as a caution, with some such word understood as fieri potest, or the like: it may be that he will be swallowed up. Among other places a good example of this elliptical כִּי may be found, Deut. vii. 17: כִּי תֹאמַר בְּלִבְּךָ take care lest thou say in thy heart. It is an idiom which would be especially likely to occur in impassioned language, such as Elihu uses in his confessed perturbation. RENAN renders it very freely, and supposes that the reference is to Job's rash language in demanding that God would appear and speak to him.

De grâce, que mes discours ne lui soient point rapportés!
Jamais homme a-t-il désiré sa perte?

<sup>36</sup> Ver. 21. The lightning. The question on which turns the whole interpretation of this and the following verse, is whether אֵשׁ here means the sun, or the lightning. Most commentators say the former. There are, however, strong objections to it regarded in itself, and they become still stronger in the attempt to make any application of such a meaning. It certainly seems against it that whilst אֵשׁ is used for the sun in but one clear place in the Bible, Job xxx. 26 (two other places cited, Hab. iii. 4; Isai. xviii. 4, being better rendered by the general term light) there are no less than five passages in this very description (xxxvii. 27—xxxviii. 24), and in close connection, where it is used for the lightning. They are xxxvi. 32; xxxvii. 3, 11, 15, about which there can be no doubt, and xxxvi. 30, where it makes the clearest sense. It is certainly the predominant meaning of אֵשׁ in these two chapters. The word עָרַךְ, too, seems to be taken in its temporal sense: at the present time, now, in distinction from something past; as is also denoted by the demonstrative הַהוּא in the second clause, the splendor that was in the skies, or clouds. Such a definition would not have been appended had the sun been meant, or light generally. It conveys the impression of something peculiar that had been very lately seen. The same effect is produced on the mind by the third clause: "the wind has passed and cleared them," the storm is just over; an assertion which seems to have no meaning in connection with the mere general reflection supposed to be expressed by this verse. The strongest argument, however, is that the rendering controverted stands wholly isolated. It seems to refer to nothing that precedes, and has no application to any thing following, except what is wholly inferential, or is to be supplied by each interpreter's own critical imagination. The analogy is certainly not expressed or even hinted at. The very modes of applying the fact supposed to be stated only render such interpretations all the more unsatisfactory. The principal one is that cited by SCHLOTTMANN, from RABBI SIMEON BEN ZEMACH, and which is adopted by most of the Jewish interpreters: "As men cannot look upon the sun in the heavens without being blinded, so they cannot judge of the works of God." This demands a potential sense for אֵשׁ, without any authority. The idea is indeed a good one, but wholly supplied from the commentator's own mind. Others, like DELITZSCH, refer it to the passing away of the storm as denoted in the 3d clause, and make the hidden doctrine to be that "as a breath of wind is enough to bring the sun to view, so God, hidden for a time, can suddenly unveil Himself to our surprise and confusion." This may be a true and striking thought, but it is wholly applied. It has, moreover, no connection with ver. 22, where וְהָיָה, whatever it means, cannot be the sun coming from the North. Added to all this is the general objection that such a view represents Elihu as suddenly turning from the demonstrative optical, or phenomenal style, which he has used almost throughout, to a refined moralizing in which, after all, he leaves the point of his preceptive comparison, to say the least, very obscure. By referring, on the other hand, אֵשׁ to the lightning, as it has been five times used in these phenomenal picturings, we get a clear sense, in closest harmony with what follows in ver. 22, and giving a consistent meaning to the 3d clause of ver. 21 which occasions so much difficulty in adapting it to the other interpretations; for if it means the sun appearing after a storm, then men do see it, and hail its appearance, and this is wholly at war with the application of RABBI SIMEON which SCHLOTTMANN cites. The key to the irregular language of both these chapters is found when we regard Elihu not as moralizing, or drawing on his imagination, but as describing real appearances in the heavens, the skies, the clouds (for שָׁמַיִם may have all these meanings) just as they occur.

EWALD, SCHLOTTMANN, DELITZSCH, all admit that the storm or כּוֹפֵה, terminating in the כַּעַר or whirlwind, out of which the Divine voice proceeds, is actually occurring during Elihu's speech. The latter draws this conclusion from xxxvii. 1, dass die Gewitter-schilderung Elihu's von einem dem Himmel überziehenden Gewitter begleitet ist, from which he justly infers that עָרַךְ, ver. 21, must be understood in its temporal, instead of its mere conclusive sense:

"None, at this present time, they do not see the light, etc. So SCHLOTTMANN, remarking on the article in עָרַךְ, xxxviii. 1, puts it on the ground, dass das bestimmte Wetter gemeint ist dessen Heraufziehen schon Elihu geschildert hatte. He means the painting which commences xxxvi. 27, and was most probably suggested by the symptoms of the thunder at that time beginning to show themselves. This makes it all the more strange that these commentators should have made so little use, or rather no use at all, of this important circumstance in their interpretation of vers. 21 and 22. If ver. 21 presents an actual scene then present to the beholders, instead of a mere moralizing imagination, then every thing becomes easy, and a most obvious preparation is furnished for ver. 22. The כּוֹפֵה or thunder-storm has passed by; they see no longer the lightning in the clouds; they are broken up (xxxvii. 11): "the wind has passed and made them clear. But see! Something else is coming (יָאֵרָה) ver. 22, future of approach) from the opposite direction, and all eyes are intently fixed upon it. What this is we are told in the next verse.

<sup>37</sup> Ver. 21. That splendor, הוֹאֵר פְּהִיר. The Arabic פְּהִיר has the primary sense of splendor, but it is almost lost in its numerous secondary applications. We get a better idea of the root from the Hebrew noun פְּהִירָה, which comes so frequently in the minute description of the leprosy, Lev. xlii. and xlii. It is the "inflamed" pustule of a "reddish color," which the LXX. constantly renders by words denoting brilliancy and burning, πυρρὴς, κατακαύμα, αὐράς, αὐράς, and similar words—VULGATE combustus—all leaving no doubt as to its appearance: a fiery red (Heb. אֶרֶב פְּהִירָה).

or inflamed spot. In analogy with this, the adjective פְּהִיר would mean a blazing, angry, radiating splendor, suggestive of the red lightning glow, though it might be applied to the sun if the context demanded.

<sup>38</sup> Ver. 21. In the clouds. This word שָׁמַיִם may be used either for the clouds or the skies. If the sun were intended it would be more properly בְּשָׁמַיִם, as the sun is never elsewhere said to be שָׁמַיִם.

- 22 From the North<sup>39</sup> it comes, a golden<sup>40</sup> sheen ;
O, with Eloah there is awful majesty !
- 23 The Almighty One ! we cannot find Him out ;
So vast His power !
So full of truth and right ; He'll not<sup>41</sup> oppress.
- 24 For this do men hold Him in reverence ;
For He regardeth not the wise of heart.<sup>42</sup>

<sup>39</sup> Ver. 22. From the North. The opposite direction to that from which comes the כִּסְפָה.

<sup>40</sup> Ver. 22. A golden sheen. זָהָב. Lit., gold. From the context there cannot be a doubt that by this word Elihu means an appearance of a peculiar kind in the heavens, and approaching them from the North. It is something that combines the beautiful, as we may judge from the name he gives it, with the terrible. That there was something of this fearful fascination about it is evident from the sudden cry which it calls out: with God is dreadful majesty; or as RENAULT most expressively renders it:

O admirable splendeur de Dieu !

It would have been out of place had he been calmly moralizing, and drawing refined analogies, as the other interpretations represent him. He saw something. It was this which made him cry out. Nothing but some wonderful glory before his eyes, something that filled him at the same time with admiration and alarm, could have called out such an exclamation. זָהָב here cannot represent the sun, (though aurous or golden would be a good descriptive epithet of it) since it comes from the North. The Future זָהָב, too, would be out of place, from its so evidently denoting approach. There is no ground for rendering it fair weather, as E. V. and others have done. Why should Elihu make a general reflection here about the weather, and what was there in such an idea to bring out that sudden cry of wonder and alarm? The literal rendering gold is the most preposterous of all. That he should stop in the midst of such a splendid storm painting (Gewitterschilderung) to express an opinion in metallurgy is more incredible than his supposed meteorological ideas about the weather; or that under such circumstances he should interrupt his speech in order to tell his hearers that gold comes from the North. All the learning about the "Arimasian mountains" with their fabled treasures, and Indian stories of guarding griffins, a kind of lore that UMBRELL and MEXX are so fond of displaying, cannot redeem it from absurdity. Such a mode of interpretation is specially unsatisfactory when an attempt is made to find a contrast, or a comparison, in the two members of ver. 22: The gold buried in the North and God's unsearchableness; or, as DELITZSCH says, "man lays bare the hidden treasures of the earth, but the wisdom of God still transcends him." How it ignores, too, the pictorial style so evident in the זָהָב of the first clause, and the strong emotional aspect of the second! The reference to chap. xxviii. is wholly out of place; since there the contrast between the Divine and human wisdom is evident throughout to every reader; but here all is optical, with no intimation of any such reflexive ideas as are drawn from it. Every thing goes to show that זָהָב here must be used to denote a peculiar celestial phenomenon, which no other word could so well describe; a steady, untwinkling brilliancy, having a fascinating yet fearful beauty, not dazzling like the sun, or irritating like the in- flamed splendor denoted by כְּהָרִיר. The Hebrew use, in this way, of זָהָב for color, is not frequent, though there is a very good example of it, Zech. xiv. 12, where זָהָב denotes the clear shining oil, but the classical usage is most abundant. It shows how easy and natural is the analogy in such applications of the word χρυσός, aurum, with their derivative adjectives, such as χρυσαννής, gold gleaming (see PRINCE, Olym. i. 1, χρυσός αἰθέμενος πύριον). Compare too the epithets most usually applied to gold by the Greek poets, such as καθάρσις, αἰγλήεις, φασγίνος, διαυγής, στίασων as Lucian styles it. So in the Latin, aurora the morning light, from aurum (not from auror as some absurdly make it), the clear calm light, in distinction from the blinding light of the meridian sun. Hence our word for the aurora borealis. So the Latins used aurculus (auricule) to denote the halo round the heads of gods or saints. For this idea of gold as representing the calm and beautiful in distinction from the fierce and inflamed light, see Rev. xxi. 18: "And the city was pure gold, χρυσίον καθαρόν, like to pure jasper." The rendering of the LXX. νέφη χρυσαννύοντα, gold-gleaming clouds, has been contemned; but it gives an idea most suitable to the context, as it immediately calls to mind the remarkable appearance described Ezek. i. 4, which of all others, is most suggestive of this. It is a wonder that the resemblance should have been so little noticed by commentators. That, too, comes from the North: "And I beheld, and lo, a whirlwind (רוח סערה), came from the North, and a great cloud of inter-circling flame (מְתַלַּקֶת) not diffusing itself but making a globe of light), and a brightness (or halo) round about it, and in the midst of it, like the color of amber (quasi species ELECTRI) from the midst of the cloud." It was God's cherubic chariot, as in Ps. xviii. 11. Some such strange appearance, represented in the distance mainly by its golden color, appears to Elihu as coming from the same direction. Ezekiel calls it (i. 28) "the likeness of the glory of God," and "falls upon his face." Elihu cries out, "O awful glory of Eloah;" and this is followed by no mere sententious wisdom, but by one of those doxologies which appear to have been common to the ancient as well as to the later Arabians: Allah akbar, God is very great, incomprehensible, vast in strength and righteousness; He will not oppress. It is an emotional cry called out by a sense of approaching Deity.

<sup>41</sup> Ver. 23. He'll not oppress. In the INT. THEISM, page 27 (note), the translator was disposed to regard יְעַנֶּה in Kal as the better reading. A more careful study, however, confirms the common text.

<sup>42</sup> Ver. 24. Regardeth not the wise of heart. That, is, those who are "wise in their own eyes," or vain of their own wisdom. "No flesh shall glory in His presence." It is a fitting conclusion to such a scene, as it was a most fitting prelude to the voice which soon breaks from the electric splendor of this whirling, inter-circling, cloud of gold.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

- 1 Then Jehovah answered Job out of the whirlwind;<sup>1</sup> and He said:
- 2 Who is it thus, by words makes counsel<sup>2</sup> dark?
Not knowing<sup>3</sup> what he says?
- 3 Now like a strong<sup>4</sup> man gird thee up thy loins;
'Tis I who ask thee; show me what thou knowest.
- 4 Say, where wast thou when earth's deep base I laid?
Declare it if thy science<sup>5</sup> goes so far.
- 5 Who fixed its measurements, that thou<sup>6</sup> should'st know;
Or on it stretched the line?
- 6 On what were its foundations sunk?
Who laid its corner-stone?
- 7 When morning stars in chorus<sup>7</sup> sang;
And cried aloud for joy, the sons of God.
- 8 Or who shut up the sea with doors,
When it gushed forth—when from the womb it came?
- 9 What time I made its raiment of the cloud,
The dark araphel<sup>8</sup> for its swaddling band?
- 10 When I broke<sup>9</sup> over it my law,
And set its bars and doors?
- 11 And said, thus far, no farther, shalt thou come;
And here it stops<sup>10</sup>—the swelling of thy waves?

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 2. Not knowing what he says. The accents separate כִּלִּים דַּעַת בְּלִי דַעַת. The general sense, however, is the same. See Exc. XII., p. 213.

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 3. Now like a strong man. A turning from Elihu to Job. For reasons for this view, see Exc. XII., p. 213.

<sup>5</sup> Ver. 4. If thy science goes so far. This may seem a free rendering, but it comes nearer to the meaning of the intensive form בִּינָה בְּיָדֶיךָ, than the rendering of E. V.: "if thou hast understanding." DELITZSCH'S Urtheilsfähigkeit seems to give a very tame sense. Literally it is know understanding, that is, with understanding, or understandingly, with discernment, or as we would say, scientifically—the reason as well as the fact. EWALD: Verstehst du klug zu sein, which seems to have hardly any meaning at all.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 5. That thou should'st know. Some regard this as irony. So RENAN:

Qui a réglé les mesures de la terre (tu le sais sans doute).

There is irony in the Bible, but the idea here is revolting. To say nothing of the theological aspect, it is inconsistent with the frank and encouraging spirit in which Job is invited to the conference (ver. 3d, 2d clause). The rendering above is the most literal, and gives a very satisfactory idea: Who fixed them so that they should fall within the measure of thy science? It is simply a mode of saying, without irony or contempt, that they are far beyond his knowledge. The measures of the earth are not known yet. The North pole is not yet reached, and even should that be accomplished, there is still "the Great Deep," the vast interior all unexplored and likely to remain so for ages we cannot estimate.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 9. The dark araphel. This word expresses a peculiar conception generally translated "thick darkness." It is something denser than the עָב, and darker than אֶפֶס. There is in it the idea of dropping or distillation from עָרָה, as though it were a kind of flowing or floating darkness, having some degree of black visibility. See Exod. xx. 18; Deut. iv. 11: 2 Kings viii. 2. Ps. xviii. 10: And the araphel was under His feet. As the word is well understood to mean intensive darkness, and is itself quite emphatic, it was thought best to leave it untranslated.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 10. Broke over it my law. The most literal rendering is the best. Much is lost when we attempt to substitute for it a more general expression. In this word אֶשְׁכַּח, there is the idea of something very powerful which the law had to deal with,—something very ungovernable, as though it really taxed the Almighty's strength to keep this new-born sea within bounds. We must not look for any geological science in Job, but this kind of language very readily suggests the idea of immense forces at work in the early nature. The breaking of the law upon it represents better than any other linguistic painting could do, its wild stubbornness. It is really the sea breaking itself against law; but there is great vividness, and even sublimity in the converse of the figure. We are reminded by it of PLATO's language (Myth in the Politicus) representing God as contending with, and putting forth His strength against, the inherent ungovernableness, and chaotic tendencies of matter. UMBREIT shows great insensibility to the grandeur of this passage in rejecting the common Hebrew sense of אֶשְׁכַּח, and going to the Arabic for the sense of measuring, which is only a denominative meaning, and, in the real application, very unsuitable here. ROSENUELLER is still more out of the way in his effort to make אֶשְׁכַּח equivalent to נָצַח decree, a sense which this frequent word nowhere else has in the Hebrew Bible.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 11. Stops. Some take יָשַׁת passively, or impersonally. Its active transitive sense, however, may be preserved by regarding קָח (ver. 10), the imposed law, as its

- 12 Since thou wast born, hast thou the morn commanded,
Or made the day spring know its place?
- 13 To reach the utmost limits<sup>11</sup> of the earth,
When from its face the wicked flee<sup>12</sup> dismayed?
- 14 Transformed<sup>13</sup> like clay beneath<sup>14</sup> the seal,
All things stand forth a fair<sup>15</sup> embroidered robe;
- 15 Whilst from the wicked is their light<sup>16</sup> withheld,
And broken the uplifted<sup>17</sup> arm.
- 16 To the fountains of the sea hast thou gone down?
Or walked the abysmal<sup>18</sup> depths?
- 17 The gates of death, have they been shown<sup>19</sup> to thee?
The realm of<sup>20</sup> shades, its entrance hast thou seen?
- 18 Or even<sup>21</sup> the breadth of earth hast thou surveyed?
Say, if thou knowest it<sup>22</sup> all.
- 19 The way,—where is it, to light's dwelling<sup>23</sup> place?
And darkness,<sup>24</sup> where the place of its abode?

subject. The preposition בּ בְּנִתָּן may, in that case, be regarded as making it the indirect object of יִשִּׁית: puts a stop to.

<sup>12</sup> Ver. 13. Flee dismayed. יִנָּעֲרִי is passive, and would be rendered, literally, are shaken. But כִּפְנֶה (referring to the earth) can hardly mean out of it. From it is more literal, that is, from its face, or from open appearance in it. The rendering given corresponds well with the usual primary sense of נָעַר agitation. Scared out of it, that is driven away to their lurking places when the light comes winging its way to the ends of the earth.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 14. Transformed. See notes on כִּתְהַפֵּן, xxxvii. 12, and the references thereto. Notes on נִהְפֵן xxviii. 5, and on הִהפֵן xxx. 15.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 14. Beneath the seal. "Its dark and apparently formless surface is changed to a world of varied beauty and magnificence; just as the shapeless clay takes the beautiful device from the seal; CONANT. See HERDER's idea that, in some sense, "every morning is a new creation."

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 14. A fair embroidered robe. To make the comparison good, by לבוש must evidently be meant a robe with figures worked upon it. CONANT, gay apparel; SCHLOTTMANN, Festgewand; DILLMANN, in mannigfaltigen Umrisen und Farben; RENAN, un riche vêtement.

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 15. Their light. "According to xxiv. 17," says DELITZSCH, "the light of evil doers is the darkness of the night, which is to them, as an aid to their work, what the light of day is for other men." Compare John iii. 19: "Loved darkness more than light."

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 16. Abysmal depths. חֲקֵר הַהוֹם. Lit., the secret of the tehom, or "great deep" mentioned Gen. 1. 2; vii. 11. It is sometimes used for the sea or ocean.

<sup>19</sup> Ver. 17. Been shown. The sense of נִתְּנָה here is not that of opening (the gate opened) but of revealing.

<sup>20</sup> Ver. 17. The realm of shades. צִלְכוֹת may be used figuratively of a state of sorrow, or of approach to death, as it seems to be taken Ps. xxlii. 4, but here by the usual law of parallelism, Tzalmaveth would mean something more remote and profound than Mareth (death), or farther removed from this present earthly being. In both, the imagery of gates is from the same feeling of returnlessness that gave rise to the similar language in Homer: Αἴθαι πύλαι, the gates of Hades, Il. V. 646, IX. 312.

<sup>21</sup> Ver. 18. Or even the breadth of earth. CO-NANT, even to (עַד), which is, perhaps, to be preferred; since עַד, here, as in some other places, denotes degree.

<sup>22</sup> Ver. 18. Knowest it all. It refers to all the questions asked, and not merely the breadth of the earth.

Wo geht der Weg hin zu des Lichtes Wohnung.

<sup>24</sup> Ver. 19. And darkness. It is not the same question. Darkness is spoken of as a positive quality having a source and place of its own. So Isaiah xlv. 7, יֹצֵר חֹשֶׁךְ וְכוֹרָא חֹשֶׁךְ. When God speaks to men He must address them in their own language, and that must be according to their thinking, or the conceptions on which their words are founded. Again, if according to their conceptions, it must also be in accordance with the science to which those conceptions owe their birth. This must be done, or the language will be unintelligible, conveying neither emotion nor idea. There is no more ground of objection here, on these accounts, than there is to the recorded announcements to the Patriarchs or the Prophets, or in any other cases in which God is represented as speaking to men in human language, whether from a flaming mountain, or from a burning bush, or from a bright overshadowing cloud (νεφέλη φωτεινή) Matth. xvii. 5, or from a whirlwind, or from "a still small voice." Light, darkness, Tzalmaveth, the gates of death, the sea with its bars and doors, the araphel with its swaddling band, the Tehom or great deep, are themselves but a language, the best that could be employed, to express the great ultimate truth here intended, namely THE IMMEASURABLE UNKNOWN to which the highest human knowledge only makes an approach, ever leaving an unfathomable, which is still beyond, and still beyond, its deepest soundings. However far the phenomenal is pushed the great ultimate facts are as far as ever from being known. We may think we have reached the last, and given it some name that shall stand, but another addition to the magnifying power of our lenses throws this again into the region of the phenomenal, or of "the things that do appear," leaving the ultimate law, and the ultimate fact, still beyond, and so on forever and for evermore. It has been rather boldly said that the questions of these last chapters of Job would not now be asked, since science has answered most of them long ago. Science has done no such thing; and no truly scientific man would affirm it. Whatever hypothesis we adopt, whether of rays, or of undulations, light itself, in its ἀρχή, is invisible. It is one of "the things unseen" (Heb. xi. 3); "the way to its house" is not yet known. And so of other things, even the most common phenomena mentioned in this chapter have yet an unknown about them. What change takes place in the molecules or atoms of water (whether in their shape or their arrangement) when it congeals, is as unknown to us as it was to Job. We know not out of what "vomb" of forces comes the ice, and the hoar frost, or the snow flake even, with its myriad mathematical diversities of congelation and crystallization. The truth is, the unknown grows faster, at every step, than the known. Every advance of the latter pushes the line farther back than it was before, and so long as the ratio of the discovered to the undiscovered is itself unknown, there is no rashness in saying that as compared with the Divine knowledge, the real truth, even of nature, we are as ignorant as Elihu or Job. That this is no mere railing against sci-

- 20 That thou should'st take it to its<sup>25</sup> bounds,
Or know the way that leadeth to its<sup>26</sup> house ?
- 21 Thou know!<sup>27</sup> It must be that thou then wast born,
And great the number of thy years.
- 22 The treasures of the snow hast thou<sup>28</sup> approached ?
Or seen the store-house of the hail ?
- 23 Which for the time of trouble I reserve,<sup>29</sup>
The day when hosts draw near<sup>30</sup> in battle strife.
- 24 Where is the way by which the lightning<sup>31</sup> parts?<sup>32</sup>
How drives<sup>33</sup> the rushing tempest<sup>34</sup> o'er the land?
- 25 Who made a channel for the swelling flood ?
A way appointed<sup>35</sup> for the thunder flash ?—
- 26 To make it rain on lands where no one dwells, Upon the desert, uninhabited ?
- 27 To irrigate<sup>36</sup> the regions wild and waste, ence is shown by the testimony of no less a scientist than Alexander Humboldt himself. Thus he says, Kosmos, Vol. II., p. 48, in respect "to the meteorological processes which take place in the atmosphere, the formation and solution of vapor, the generation of hail, and of the rolling thunder, there are questions propounded in this portion of the book of Job which we, in the present state of our physical knowledge, may indeed be able to express in more scientific language, but scarcely to answer more satisfactorily."

<sup>25</sup> Ver. 20. To its bounds. This shows that ultimate causal knowledge is intended,—or that finishing knowledge (τὸ τέλος as distinguished from the τὸ ἐκ μέσου, 1 Cor. xiii. 10) beyond which nothing more is to be known about it.

<sup>26</sup> Ver. 20. The way that leadeth to its house. Another mode of expressing the same idea. "Its house" where dwells the ἀρχή, or first principle that makes it what it is, and of which all subsequent phenomena are but different degrees of manifestation; the phenomenon last reached by scientific discovery being only called an ἀρχή till something beyond it is revealed, and takes the name. These questions, as Humboldt intimates, may yet be asked, each one of them, and no more names like "gravity," "force," "correlation of forces," can evade their point, or conceal our inability to answer perfectly.

<sup>27</sup> Ver. 21. Thou know! Many take this as irony. This is the way RENAN gives it:

Tu le sais sans doute! car tu étais né avant elles;
Le nombre de tes jours est si grand!

The idea is inexpressible. The voice of Jehovah is sounding loud above the roar of the tornado that bursts from the electric amber cloud; Job and all the rest most probably lying prostrate, with their faces in the dust! What a time for sarcasm, especially on such a theme, the fewness of the human years! But the translation above given, it may, perhaps, be said, comes nearly to the same thing. It is not so. The peculiar style, combined of the exclamatory and the interrogative, is to bring vividly before the mind the change that ensues in the illustrative phenomena to be now mentioned. The personal knowledge of the first mentioned great creative acts could only be claimed on the score of experience or contemporaneity, which are out of the question. Those now to be mentioned are familiar every-day phenomena, and observation, it might be thought, is sufficient for their discovery. But in these, too, there is an unfathomable depth of mystery. As no length of human days could give the one, so no keenness of observation, or of inductive analysis, could reach the other, though lying right beneath our eyes. So here רָעַתָּה, spoken abruptly and forcibly, but not with irony or contempt, is exclamatory and at the same time carries a hypothetical force: Thou knowest! that is, as if thou knewest, or could'st know! The second clause is only a varied and forcible mode of presenting the same thought. There is much here that reminds us of a passage in that strangely impressive apocryphal book of II. Esdras (sometimes styled the IV.): "Then said the angel unto me: go thy way; weigh me the weight of the fire, or measure me the blast of the wind, or call me again the day that is past. If I should ask thee of the springs of the Deep, or where are the outgoings of Paradise, peradventure thou would'st say, I never went down into the Deep, neither did I ever climb up into Heaven; but now have I asked thee only of the fire, and the wind, and of the day through which thou hast passed, and of things from which thou canst not be separated, and yet thou canst give me no answer. Things grown up with thee thou canst not know; how then should'st thou comprehend the way of the Highest!"

<sup>28</sup> Ver. 22. Approached. הִבֵּאתָ, most literal, gone or come to, visited, entered into, as בָּא may be rendered without the preposition, as, בָּא שְׁעָר עִירוֹ, Gen. xxi. 18.

<sup>29</sup> Ver. 23. I reserve. שָׁחֲבֵתִי, see Note xxi. 30; "the wicked reserved to the day of doom."

<sup>30</sup> Ver. 23. When hosts draw near. This gives the etymological idea of קָרַב: closeness and battle, literally, for battle closely joined. See Dent. xx. 2, 3, בָּקָרְבָנְךָ אֶל מַלְחָמָה, when ye draw nigh to battle, or join battle.

<sup>31</sup> Ver. 24. Lightning. So SCHLOTTMANN אֶרֶץ: Das Licht ist der Blitz, as in xxxvi. 32, and he might also have said, as in xxxvii. 3, 11, 15. He finds an argument for it from its agreement with the second clause: the lightning and the storm coming with the snow and the hail. The word רָךְ here may refer to the direction of the lightning flash so difficult to trace (see Note on xxxvii. 4) or to the method or law of the fact, as חֶק (see xxxviii. 26) refers to the dynamical principle. If referred to light it may be the law of its existence or origin.

<sup>32</sup> Ver. 24. Parts. Lit., is parted; but the Niphal may be rendered deponently or intransitively. If אֶרֶץ is the lightning, it presents the idea of the heavens cloven by it in all directions, or its being cloven from the cloud. Ps. xlix. 7 may be regarded as parallel to it: "the voice of the Lord (the thunder) cutteth out (heaveth out) the flashes of fire," RABBI LEVI BEN GERSON renders: "how it (the lightning) breaks from the cloud."

<sup>33</sup> Ver. 24. How drives—or spreads. יָפִיץ is taken intransitively, as in Exod. v. 12; 1 Sam. xiii. 8.

<sup>34</sup> Ver. 24. The rushing tempest. The East wind (קַדִּים), the classical Eurus is thus used for a tempest. See Ps. xlviii. 8, the wind "that breaks the ships of Tarshish, Job xxvii. 21." The East wind (or the storm) carries him away. See Jer. xlii. 17; Isai. xxvii. 8; Ezek. xxvii. 26.

<sup>35</sup> Ver. 25. A way appointed. This is exactly like the second clause of xxxvii. 26. There רָךְ is parallel to חֶק, law, decree, which requires something like it in the 2d clause. The way is not here merely space direction, but method of action.

<sup>36</sup> Ver. 27. To irrigate. To satisfy, does not seem to suit the context. The regions mentioned in the 1st clause, שָׂדֵה וּמְשֹׁאָה, wild and waste, are without any elements of vegetation, and rain can only water them.

As well<sup>37</sup> as cause to spring the budding grass.

- 28 Is there a father<sup>38</sup> to the rain?
The drops of dew, who hath begotten<sup>39</sup> them?
- 29 Out of whose womb came forth the ice?
Heaven's hoar frost, who hath<sup>40</sup> gendered it?
- 30 As by a stone<sup>41</sup> the streams are hid from sight,
And firmly bound<sup>42</sup> the faces of the deep.
- 31 Canst thou together bind the clustering<sup>43</sup> Pleiades?
Or loose Orion's bands?
- 32 Canst thou lead forth Mazzaroth<sup>44</sup> in its times,
Or guide the ways of Arctos<sup>45</sup> with her sons?
- 33 The statutes of the heavens knowest thou?
Their ruling<sup>46</sup> in the earth canst thou dispose?
- 34 To the clouds canst thou lift up thy voice,
That floods of rain may cover thee?
- 35 Lightnings canst thou send forth, that they should go,
And say, Behold us! Here we are?
- 36 Who hath put wisdom in the inward<sup>47</sup> parts?

<sup>37</sup> Ver. 27. As well as. There seems a contrast between the two clauses. The first is the sending of rain where no vegetation could be effected by it, as in the desert or the sea, the second where there is drought, but still something to germinate. There is no dwelling here on utilitarian ends merely, though there are such occasionally referred to; the great design seems to be to show the Divine sovereignty—God's omnipotence in making nature and her laws, just as it pleases Him.

<sup>38</sup> Ver. 28. A father to the rain. A creator to the rain; or is it the production of chance?

<sup>39</sup> Ver. 28. Begotten. The figure of generation is kept up in חוליד (Hulid). There has been a great lack of attention to the momentous fact that so much of this language of generation, or of evolution, or production by birth (one thing coming out of another), is employed in Scripture, not only in the poetical parts such as Ps. xc. 2 (הרים ילדו) —

אֵרֶץ (תחולל ארץ), Prov. viii. 22; Ps. civ., and here in Job, but in the prose account of Gen. i. "The earth bringing forth"—"the waters swarming with life"—the Spirit "brooding upon them"—the "generations" (חולדות) of the heavens and the earth." It is all so different from those ideas of mechanical or magical creation in which Mohammed indulges, and which distinguish so many pagan mythologies. It is a Divine evolution, through an outgoing Word, and the term should not be given up to the naturalists, who discard the idea of semination, and thereby make it an eternal, uninterfered with, self-evolving of the higher as lying hid in the lower.—in the lowest even,—from an infinite eternity.

<sup>40</sup> Ver. 23. Out of whose womb?—Who hath gendered? The same language of parturitive generation (חולדת) or causal growth, is here kept up. The cold ice the product of some cherishing heat, or brooding warmth, such as we can hardly separate from the idea of generation.

<sup>41</sup> Ver. 30. As by a stone. The icy covering. יתן. Firmly bound. The Hithpael כרוו (Lit., Hold fast to each other. The idea of the flow arrested. Nothing could better express the transition from the fluid to the congealed state. It is some change in the coherence and space relations of the ultimate particles, or it may be in molecules still undiscovered, yet at immense distances from the ultimate parts. But what that change is, or what a world of mystery lies so near us, right under our hands and eyes, we know no more than Job.

<sup>43</sup> Ver. 31. Clustering pleiades. מערנות. by metathesis for מעננות as generally received. Lit., the clusterings of Cima. For ענן see Job xxxi. 36; Prov. vi. 2, where it is used, in connection with the same word קשר, for the graceful binding of ornaments. There is evidently a contrast of binding and loosing between the two members, but as regards our knowledge of what particular constellations are meant we are not much beyond the ancient versions. How little can be certainly known is seen in the labored commentary of DELITZSCH.

<sup>44</sup> Ver. 32. Mazzaroth. The change of the liquids מ and ל is so common and so easy that there can be but little doubt of מנורות here being the same as מנולות (Mazzaloth) 2 Kings xxiii. 5, where it is used for the constellations. Literally, houses (in the heavens) as the term is used in the old astrology (from the sense to dwell, which נול has in Arabic). From the constellations generally it is transferred to the 12 signs of the Zodiac; though the signs in all parts of the heavens were observed for the determination of seasons.

<sup>45</sup> Ver. 32. Arctos and her sons. The Northern Bear; her sons, the three bright stars in the tail that seem constantly sweeping after it as this ever visible constellation circles round the pole. BOCHART (Hierozoicon, Vol. II., p. 113) shows beyond all doubt that עש is identical with the Northern Bear as named by the Arabians, and described in a similar way as accompanied by her daughters. The name is feminine here, as ἀρκτος in Greek, and ursa in Latin. So the Greeks called this constellation, as well as the Northern Indians of our own continent. The fixing it helps to determine some of the others ever named with it, probably, in the first place, by the Phœnician sailors much before the Homeric times. Among quite a number of other places see Odyssey, V. 272:

ΠΑΛΙΑΔΑΣ τ' ἑσπέρωντι—

ἌΡΚΤΟΝ θ'

Ἦν' αὐτοῦ στρεφέται, καὶ τ' ὈΡΙΩΝΑ δοκεῖσι.

The verb נחה has a pastoral air here; see Ps. xxiii. 3: leads them in the field of the skies as the shepherd his flock.

<sup>46</sup> Ver. 33. Their ruling. The corresponding Arabic verb שטר means to write, to make records. Hence it would seem to denote signs, prescriptions, and to suggest the idea given Gen. i. 14.

<sup>47</sup> Ver. 36. Inward parts. It is common in all languages to assign certain parts of the body as the seat of intellectual and passion movements. The Hebrew, like the Greek, has quite a number of such words—heart, reins, bowels, etc. The use of this word מנחות, Ps. ii. 8 (truth in the inward parts) ought to settle its meaning here as equivalent to reins, used as the Greeks use ἡρᾶς or ἡρᾶς (heart or liver) for the region where dwells the deepest thought. The refer-

- Or who hath given discernment to the<sup>48</sup> sense?
 37 Who, by his wisdom, rules<sup>49</sup> the clouds?
 Or who inclines<sup>50</sup> the vessels of the skies?
 38 When dust becomes a molten mass,
 And clods together cleave?
 39 For the lioness dost thou provide the prey,
 Or still the craving of her young?
 40 When in their wonted lairs they lay them down,
 Or in the jungle thickets lie in wait.
 41 Who for the raven maketh sure its meat,
 When unto God her children cry,
 And wander<sup>51</sup> without food?

rence of טחות to outward phenomena (lightning, etc.) as is done by EWALD and UMBREIT, depends on far-fetched Arabic etymologies, and requires us to regard such phenomena as personified, with little or no distinct meaning after all. SOHLTSMANN shows clearly the connection of thought: the mention of the celestial laws and their ruling in the earth suggests most naturally that greater work of God, the making and implanting the faculties that comprehend them. See Ps. xciv. 9.

<sup>48</sup> Ver. 36. The sense. The rendering given to the first clause determines the general meaning of the second, though leaving somewhat uncertain the precise meaning of שְׂכִי. The Rabbins render it a cock, which DELITZSCH follows, although such a rendering of the word (see BOCHART, Hieros. II., pp. 114, 115) breaks up the harmony of the parallelism. שְׂכִי, which occurs only here, must correspond to טָחוּת, but as it is not easy to determine what part of the body is meant, it is better to be governed by the etymology generally (שָׁכַח, as in its more frequent Syriac usage, to see, look for, contemplate, image, etc.), and by the other derivatives, שָׁכַח, image, picture, Isai. ii. 16, כְּשִׁכִּית figure, Ezek. viii. 12; Lev. xxvi. 1. As a part then of the physical system it might be rendered the sensorium, did not that sound too technical or philosophical. We have, therefore, simply rendered it the sense. This corresponds well to the distinction between חִכְכָּה בִּינָה which the common mind, even in the days of Job, accepts as familiarly as the most philosophical: the abstract reason, on the one hand, the inductive observing faculty of experience (ever dependent on the sense) as forming its intellectual counterpart or complement, on the other. The Hebrew, or rather the Syriac שָׁכַח (saka, saha, sah, seh) would seem to show an affinity (with its guttural worn out) to the German sehen, Gothic sawcan, English saw or see.

to cause to lie down, hence inclining or turning over a vessel to empty it. The Arabic sense (pour out) is a secondary one, in which the old primary is lost. The VULGATE renders it: quis enarrabit calorum rationem, et concentum caeli quis dormire faciet? In the last clause who shall make to sleep the harmony of heaven? there seems to have been had in mind the old doctrine of the music of the spheres (see Ps. xix. 5), and נְכִילִים to have been taken as meaning harps. It is a beautiful thought: who can make to sleep that everlasting harmony? but it is not in harmony with the context.

<sup>51</sup> Ver. 41. And wander. This is the literal rendering of יָרַע, but it can hardly mean outward wandering or flying about, which would seem forbidden by the context. It may be taken to denote wandering, or lapse of mind, if used of rational beings; as in Isai. xxviii. 7, it is used to denote intoxication. As applied to the young ravens, it may denote their ravening appetite. But the question is: why is the raven selected for an illustration here, and in other parts of the Scriptures, as in Ps. cxlvii. 9. and by our Saviour, Luke xii. 24? It seems to have been universal in the East, as appears from HARRIS, Seance XIII., Vol. I., p. 151, De Sacy's Ed.: "O thou who hearest the young raven in his nest!"—abandoned in his nest, as the supposed fact is stated by the Scholiast, and for which he gives a ridiculous reason: "the young raven," he says, "when it first breaks the egg, comes forth perfectly white, on seeing which the parents flee with terror; and when this takes place, Allah sends to it the flies which fall in the nest. And so it remains for forty days, when its feathers become black, and the father and mother return to it." It is not mere helplessness. The pathos is doubtless aided by the idea of the hideousness of the bird, which appears especially in the young. Had it been the dove it might have sounded prettier to us; but there is here no mere sentimentality; no mere utilitarianism. God's "tender mercies are over all His works" but it is also true that He "hath compassion on whom He will have compassion." The Divine sovereignty is the great lesson here taught, and our very deformities, as appears Gen. viii. 21, may draw His mercy.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

- 1 The goats that climb the rock, knowest thou their bearing time?
Or dost thou mark it, how the hinds bring<sup>1</sup> forth?
- 2 The months they fill, is this thy<sup>2</sup> numbering?
Their hour of travail, is it known to thee?
- 3 They bow themselves, their offspring cleave<sup>3</sup> the womb;

<sup>1</sup> Ver. 1. Hinds bring forth. Very common and near events, but all having a mystery beyond any explanation of human knowledge, past or present.

<sup>2</sup> Ver. 2. Thy numbering. CONANT gives the idea here: "Not the mere numbering, for that would be a very easy thing, but the original determination of the times." So in the second clause: It is the mystery of parturition, its regularity, its suddenness, its inexplicable pains.

<sup>3</sup> Ver. 3. Cleave the womb. Grammatically לִרְיָהּ is the object of תִּפְלְחָנָהּ; but it comes to the same thing whether we render the word causatively, or as above. Lit., she makes them cleave.

- Their sorrows<sup>4</sup> they cast forth.
 4 Strong are they young as on the plains<sup>5</sup> they grow,
 And wander from them to return no more.
 5 Who sent the wild ass free?
 Or loosed the Zebra's<sup>6</sup> bands?
 6 Whose home the desert I have made,
 The salt and barren waste his haunts.
 7 'Tis sport to him the city's noise;
 The driver's ringing shouts, he hears them not.
 8 The mountain range his pasture ground;
 There roams<sup>7</sup> he searching every blade<sup>8</sup> of grass.
 9 The Oryx,<sup>9</sup> will he be thy willing<sup>10</sup> slave?
 Or in thy stall contented make his home?
 10 As in a furrow canst thou bind his cord?
 To plane<sup>11</sup> the valleys will he follow thee?
 11 Ah, trust him! wilt thou? for his strength is great!
 Or leave to him the produce of thy toil?
 12 Canst thou be sure he will bring home thy seed?
 Or gather it to form thy threshing floor?
 13 The Ostrich<sup>12</sup> wing that flaps so joyously!
 Is it the feathered pinion of the stork?<sup>13</sup>
 14 Nay<sup>14</sup>—she it is that leaves her eggs to earth,
 And warms them in the dust,
 15 Forgetting that the foot may crush,—
 The roaming beast may trample them.
 16 Hard<sup>15</sup> is she to her young, as though not hers;

<sup>4</sup> Ver. 3. Their sorrows. Their sharp pangs. They are here spoken of as identified with the offspring. There is a great mystery here, whether we regard it as a moral one,—the parturition pangs of the animal as a curse from the fall of man,—or a purely physical one. Why does nature seem “to stumble here,” as Cudworth says; or if she has been from eternity “selecting the best,” why has she not, ages ago, reached the easier way? There is something very touching in this second clause: Their sorrows they cast forth. In the case of the human subject how pathetic the language of our Saviour, John xvi. 21: “A woman when she is in travail hath sorrow because her hour is come; but when she is delivered she no longer remembers her pain because of joy that one hath been born into the world.” DELITZSCH happily compares השלחנה here with the παῖς ὄδω of Æsch.

Agam. 1417, and EURIP. Ion. 45.

<sup>6</sup> Ver. 5. The Zebra's bands. The tautology of E. V., is intolerable. DELITZSCH attempts to hide it under his two words Waldesel and Wildling; as UMBREIT also under Waldesel and esel. The עֵרֹד must be something different from the פָּרָה. There is but little authority for rendering it zebra, but it suits the passage (the wild horse coming after the wild ass) and almost anything is better than the tautology. The next verse may be taken as referring to the עֵרֹד alone.

<sup>7</sup> Ver. 8. Roams he searching. The participial form is used as combining with דִּרְשׁוּ the verbal sense of exploration in יִתְרוֹ.

<sup>8</sup> Ver. 8. Every blade of grass. The Hebrew idiom in such cases makes כל distributive.

<sup>9</sup> Ver. 9. The Oryx. E. V., unicorn. Most commentators now make it the wild ox, noted for its fierceness.

<sup>10</sup> Ver. 9. Willing slave. The translation may be free, but it closely combines the sense of אָמַן and עֶבֶר.

<sup>13</sup> Ver. 13. The stork. הַסִּידָה is the well-known name of this bird,—the pious, so called from the care she takes for her parents and her young, here contrasted with the ἀστροφία, or want of natural affection, in the ostrich. The סִידָה is indirectly a denial. Instead of the construct state, wing of the stork, the word is taken rather as an adjective: the stork wing. So נֶצֶחַ feather, plumage, is descriptive.

It is the full, warm, thick-feathered wing of the one bird, as contrasted with the scant, featherless membrane of the other, unfitted for flying or hovering. The want of disposition, and the want of adaptation, go together. God made her so in both respects. On the Darwin or Lucretian theory, her poor flapper, which she uses so much, ought to have become a warm, well-feathered pinion ages ago.

<sup>14</sup> Ver. 14. Nay. The denial comes out more strongly in the כִּי which gives a reason for the contrast. And thus there is better preserved the main idea of both verses, namely, the variety of qualities displayed in the works of God. The ancient versions are very dark here. The LXX. does not pretend to translate, simply turning the Hebrew into Greek letters, velaxasta, avōba kai vēōssa.

<sup>15</sup> Ver. 16. Hard is she. There is no difficulty with the masculine verb here (הָקִי, since the feminine is only generic.

- In vain her labor since she has no fear.
 17 For God hath made her mindless,<sup>16</sup> void of thought,
 No share of knowledge hath he given her.
 18 But when on high she boldly lifts<sup>17</sup> herself,
 The horse and horseman both alike she scorns.
 19 To the war-horse gavest thou his strength?
 Didst thou with thunder<sup>18</sup> clothe his neck?
 20 Or like the locust canst thou make him bound?
 There is glory<sup>19</sup> in his nostrils—terror there.
 21 He paws the plain, exulting in his might;
 And thus he goes to meet the armed<sup>20</sup> host.
 22 He mocks at fear, at panics<sup>21</sup> undismayed,
 He turns not back in presence of the sword.
 23 Against him<sup>22</sup> rings the quiver (of the foe),
 The glittering lance and spear.
 24 With rage and trembling swallows<sup>23</sup> he the earth;

<sup>16</sup> Ver. 17. Made her mindless. E. V.: Deprived her of wisdom, as though they made it from הִשָּׁה = הִשָּׁה, or הִשָּׁה; Pa. lxxix. 23, exigit, taken away from. To make forget (Hiph. of נָשָׁה) would imply that she once had it.

<sup>17</sup> Ver. 18. Boldly lifts herself. GERENIUS is rendered כִּרְאָה the sense strinxit (equum flabello). Hence it is given to her she lashes herself. There is little or no authority for this. The idea of flapping her wings had been given before. Here it is evidently something else: her high stature, or her bold bearing, by way of contrast, or set-off to what was said about her stupidity. The Hebrew כִּרְאָה (for כִּרְאָה) gives just the idea which the context seems to demand, a bold contemptuous spirit. The old versions got very much the same idea, but in a different way, namely, by regarding כִּרְאָה as by metathesis for כִּרְאָה, which, however, would be a most unusual change. A striking illustration of this passage, thus regarded, is furnished by XENOPHON. Anab. I. 3; Στρούθῳ δὲ οὐδὲς ἔλαβεν. πολλὰ γὰρ ἐπέσπατο φεύγουσα, τοῖς μὲν ποσσὶ δρόμου, ταῖς δὲ πτερύξεσσι ἀράας ὥσπερ ἰστὶν χρωμένη: "But no one ever caught the ostrich, for in her flight she kept constantly drawing on the pursuer, now running on foot, and again lifting herself up with her wings spread out, as though she had hoisted her sails." Compare the Homeric expression Il. II. 462, ἀγαλλόμεναι πτερύγεσσιν.

<sup>18</sup> Ver. 19. With thunder. רָעָמָה Fem. of רָעַם the common word for thunder. Some render it here the flowing mane; as φόνος, supposed to come in some way from φόνος terror. Others, dignity, as though it were the same as רָאָה. Virg. hinnulus, neighing, as resembling thunder. The Hebrew רָעַם in its primary onomatopoeic sense of fremitus, trembling, thunder, answers very well when we keep in mind the subjective effect. When we think of the arched neck of the horse in his majestic boundings, of the quivering of the strong muscles, and of the idea of power which so naturally associates itself with these phenomena, we have something that may be called the feeling of thunder if not the outward hearing. There is hyperbole of course; but a perfectly scientific or farrier-like description of the mane, and ears, and neck, etc., might fall in this subjective truthfulness all the more for its objective accuracy.
